In order to judge rightly whether a Tranſcriber left out or added ſome things from a ſpirit of party, we muſt know which were the ſtate or religious factions what could ſway him, and of what conſequence the paſſages left out or added may be with regard to thoſe factions. If they could neither hurt nor ſerve any of the parties, it muſt be ſuppoſed that there was no knavery in the addition nor in the omiſſion; but one may ſuppoſe the contrary, when they relate particularly to ſome controverſy which raiſed people's paſſions. Wherefore Martin Polonus's manuſcripts would be ſuſpected of a fraudulent mutilation or addition, if they had been made ſince the Proteſtants and the Roman Catholicks began to write on the queſtion of the woman-Pope with ſo much heat and paſſion. But ſince they are anterior to that controverſy, and made when the hiſtory of that woman was not contradicted, one does not ſee that a falſe zeal, partiality, diſhoneſty, muſt have determined the Tranſcribers to ſuppreſs it. It might happen that ſome perſon left it out, becauſe he took it for a ridiculous ſtory. See the margin (45).

A ſpirit of party is a ſtrange kind of fury: there are ſome readers ſo angry and paſſionate, that they tear off every leaf of a book in which they meet with ſomething diſgraceful to their Sect. Judge by this what they would do, if ſuch or ſuch manuſcripts fell into their hands. It is impoſſible to deſcribe the havock, which that paſſion has made in the antient Libraries (46). And why would they not have dared to falſify manuſcripts, ſince men dare at this time to falſify ſecond editions, even whilſt the Author is ſtill living (47). I have been told for certain, that the third volume of the Revolutions of England (48) reprinted in Holland, has been ſpoiled in ſeveral places, ſometimes by additions, and ſometimes by omiſſions.

I muſt not forget to obſerve, that ſome perſons think that the ſtory of Pope Joan has been added to Platina's work. This is Bernartius's opinion. For, ſays he *, I have heard from Anthony Hetweld, a man of reputation, and a Magiſtrate of Lovain, that one Engelbertus Boonius, a grave man, and Dean of a conſiderable Church in Germany, told him ſeveral times that he had ſeen many antient manuſcripts of Platina, in the Vatican at Rome, and that he had examined them very carefully, and yet could never find one word in them concerning the woman-Pope (49). Alexander Coock urges very good objections againſt this. How comes it, ſays he (50), that thoſe antient manuſcripts are in ſuch a large number and ſo odd in the Vatican, ſince printing was already in uſe, and Platina died in the year 1481? How comes it, that neither Onuphrius, nor Bellarmine, nor Baronius, who had ſuch a free acceſs to the Vatican Library, could never find thoſe manuſcripts? What is the reaſon that no man, ſince Bernartius, ever urged that objection againſt Platina? Onuphrius, Bellarmine, and Baronius, acknowledging that that ſtory is in Platina, it makes me believe that Bernartius calumniated the Magiſtrate, or that the Magiſtrate calumniated the Dean, or that the Dean impoſed upon the Magiſtrate. For if he had had ſuch manuſcripts, ſome of theſe perſons would have ſhewed them to the world before this time. Spanheim (51) does not deny the fact which Bernartius aſſerts; on the contrary, he makes an advantage of it to ſhew by that inſtance, that it was cuſtomary to caſtrate manuſcripts. For my part I would not deny, that there were in the Vatican ſome faithful copies of Platina's work, which did not contain the ſtory of Pope Joan. It ſeems very probable to me, that that Author ſhewed his manuſcript, and ſuffered ſome copies to be taken of it, ſome

(42) Since at this time ſeveral Authors quote firſt editions, without knowing that there are others with corrections and additions; it might eaſier ſtill be unknown in those ages, that there were ſome editions of Polonus more complete than the firſt, ſo that the copies of the firſt were multiplied.

(43) See in the rem. [B] of the art. VOLKELIUS, what has been obſerved concerning a quotation from Monſ. Stoupp's book.

(44) Spanheim. de Papa fœmina, p. 54, 55.

(45) Unuſquiſque quæ ipſe digna memoria judicabat addidit: erraſitque quæ ſibi indigna lectu videbantur. Allatius Symm. p. 417. ſpeaking of Martin Polonus's chronicle, apud Spanhem. de Papa fœmina, p. 63.

(46) See the preface of Laurent Bouchel, in Decreta Eccleſ. Gallic. Rivet quotes him in his Remarques ſur la Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 602, of the 1ſt vol.

(47) See the rem. [F] of the art. PELLISSON, and the rem. [D] of the art. ANCILLON.

(48) By Father d'Orleans a Jeſuit.

HOW it comes that ſome manuſcripts of Platina want the ſtory of Pope Joan.

* Impudens aliquis nebulo interpolavit ſcripta Platinæ. Audivit ex Antonio Hetueldio, amplisſimo laudatisſimoque viro, conſulari Lovanienſi, dixiſſe ſibi ſæpius Engelbertus Boonius ... vidiſſe ſe Romæ in Bibliotheca Vaticana, antiquiſſima Platinæ exemplaria manuſcripta, ſedulo examinaſſe, & de Joanne fœmina ne literam quidem reperiſſe. Bernartius, de utilitate legendæ, hiſt. lib. 2. p. 111.

(49) Coocke, de la Papeſſe, p. 46, 47.

(50) Coocke, ib. p. 47, 48.

(51) Spanhem. de Papa fœmina, p. 64.

as a credulous Hiſtorian, and a man of very little judgment [C]. It is unqueſtionable that he was ſirnamed Polonus, becauſe he was a Polander, or becauſe he paſſed for ſuch [D]. Voſſius ought to have aſſerted poſitively, that Martinus Carſulanus whom Volaterranus has mentioned in the beginning of his twenty ſecond book is the ſame with him ſome years before he publiſhed it. It is probable that after he ſuffered it to be tranſcribed, he reviſed and corrected it, and made additions to it, and that the Hiſtory of the woman-Pope was one of theſe additions. So that it is very poſſible, that there were ſome manuſcripts of Platina ſeen in the Vatican, in which that ſtory was not related. But as Onuphrius, Bellarmine, and Baronius, did not doubt but the edition in which it was related, was faithful, they would ſcorn to urge ſuch manuſcripts; for it would have been to no purpoſe. It muſt even be confeſſed that Platina's teſtimony does not much hurt the cauſe which theſe three Authors aſſerted; for it is proper to perſuade us that there never was a woman-Pope, rather than that there was one. Coeffeteau did not omit that article. " One Martinus Polonus is charg" ed with being the firſt who expoſed it to the view of " all Chriſtendom, and Platina, whoſe words du

" Pleſſis borrows, confeſſes that he took it from him,
" adding even theſe words, which inſtead of con" firming du Pleſſis in his opinion, ſhould ſhake his " belief, and make him doubt, or rather condemn
" his whole narration. What I ſay of it † is a com- " mon report, and the Authors of it uncertain, and very " little famous, ſo that I thought it proper to give only
" a ſhort and plain account of it, that I might not be " thought to have obſtinately omitted what is related by
" almoſt all, (underſtand this of the later Writers) for if
" even the wiſe delight in follies, let us err with the " people, though it be plain that this particular is one of " thoſe things which are thought to be poſſible. Is not
" this a moſt glorious foundation of a monſtrous
" ſtory? And though a man had thought it true, is " not this ſufficient to make him diſbelieve it (52)?"

If there were ſome inſtances, by which it appeared that an Author came into trouble and made himſelf odious, by relating the ſtory of Pope Joan, one might imagine that Platina omitted that ſtory in the copies which he ſhewed to the Pope and the Cardinals. But at that time Authors were not put to any trouble upon that account; every one had the liberty to ſpeak of it with impunity. What could then have occaſioned Platina's precaution of having two kinds of copies, the one for the Court, and the other for his intimate friends? We can eaſily gueſs why Monſieur Varillas has not publiſhed all that he had written, and which an hundred perſons had ſeen in the manuſcript copies of his hiſtories (53). He was afraid of being ill uſed. When it ſhall be proved that Platina, who has related pretty freely ſome things much more odious than the ſtory of Pope Joan was in his time, did not dare to mention it publickly, it will be time enough to confeſs that his book was printed only from the copy deſigned for his intimate friends.

[C] He has been blamed as a credulous Hiſtorian, and a man of very little judgment.] Here follows another paſſage from Coeffeteau (54), " The moſt antient of " thoſe who have ſtained their writings with that " ſhameful ſtory, was one Martinus Polonus (55) a
" Ciſtercian Monk, who ends his Chronicle with
" Nicholas III. about the year 1278. It is from " him Platina borrowed it, both of them ſpeaking
" of it only from common report without any other
" knowledge. Du Pleſſis in order to aſſert Polonus's
" authority, told us above *, that as he had been Peni-
" tentiary to Pope Nicholas III. and afterwards Arch-
" biſhop of Coſenza †, we ought to give him more credit,
" and have more reſpect for him, than we ſeem to do.
" But as we honour his titles, ſo we know that they " do not always render a man a perfect Annaliſt, or
" a good Chronicler: which is very plain from his
" very writings; for when you read them it is eaſy
" to judge that he was a good plain man, who " collected as ſo many oracles the ſtories related by
" the common people, which he inſerted into his " works, without any judgment. But beſides, he
" himſelf ſpeaks of that ſtory of Pope Joan ſo coldly
" and careleſsly, that he makes it quite doubtful.
" This, ſays he ſpeaking of that monſter, was a wo-
" man, as it is aſſerted, ut aſſeritur. Naudé uſes him
" worſe ſtill. Without minding, ſays he (56), the dif- ference there is between the manuſcripts or the additions that have been made to this Martinus Polonus, it is more proper to concludes that his authority can by no means hurt Sylveſter, both becauſe of the preceding argument, and becauſe he has related ſo many fabulous ſtories in his Chronicle, that a man who can believe what he relates of Sylveſter, muſt be as light of belief as weak of judgment. I call to witneſs thoſe ſtories, which he has extracted from the book De Infantia Salvatoris (of our Saviour's infancy) and thoſe he borrowed from the Hiſtory of Pilate, of the Greeks who intended to ſteal the corps of St. Peter and St. Paul, his ſtory of Sylveſter's Dragon, which killed ſix thouſand perſons every day, of another which was ſo big that eight couple of oxen could not drag it to the place where it was to be burnt; of Aitus of Britany, of the Prophet Merlin, of the woman-Pope Joan, of the golden Letters, which weighed an hundred pounds a piece, and which Charles the Great gave to twenty three Monaſteries which he had founded, and a thouſand other ſtories of the ſame kind, which are proper only to lull children aſleep, whilſt the nurſes are rocking the cradle. Alexander Coocke ſuppoſes this objection is urged againſt him. " Know, that (as Bellarmine * and
" N. D. † obſerve) he was a very ſimple man,
" and that in Dr. Harding's judgment  his writ-
" ings are idle and impertinent, without any ap" pearance of truth. Nay, know again that he is " proper only to tell ſtories, for this is the cenſure which
" Bernartius †† paſſes upon him (57)." To which it is anſwered, that he was * learned in the holy Scriptures, and not unacquainted with the ſecular Doctrine, and that he was a man, on whom Platina † depended very much in point of Hiſtory, and whom he judged worthy to be eſteemed as a man of great learning and good morals (58). Coocke examines afterwards five inſtances which are urged as ſo many proofs of Martinus Polonus's ignorance, and aſſerts that he is calumniated; and that Bernartius and Florimond de Remond charge him with theſe five blunders. I have not got Bernartius's book (59), but I know that Florimond de Remond is here unjuſtly accuſed, for he has not charged Martinus Polonus with theſe blunders, but another Martinus, as will be plain to all thoſe who will read the following paſſage. " Hav" ing examined with all the care that the place where
" I am would allow, all that can be ſaid upon this
" ſubject, I happened to light on an old manuſcript,
" containing the Lives of the Popes and Emperors,
" the Author of which is named Martinus: there
" I met with this mitred Joan. I cannot tell whe" ther it be owing to their having the ſame name,
" that Martinus Polonus has been made to ſay, what
" that other Martinus wrote, whoſe work was never " printed that I know of, nor could I diſcover any " thing concerning him but that he was a German.
" There is ſome likelihood in this, eſpecially conſi-
" dering the difference there is in the manuſcripts
" mentioned by Simbler. There is another Chro" nicle of one Martinus, which abounds with ſilly
" ſtories (60)." The inſtances which Remond gives of this laſt particular are the five blunders, of which Coocke has cleared our Polonus. You muſt obſerve that Du Pleſſis has mentioned another Martinus of the Order of the Minorites, who wrote a Chronicle entitled Flores Temporum (the Flowers of the Times) where Pope Joan is mentioned (61). Blondel places him towards the end of the 15th Century (62).

[D] He was ſirnamed Polonus, becauſe he was a Polander, or becauſe he paſſed for ſuch.] He was of the noble family of the Streperi, Streporum, if we may believe Starovolſcius, who adds that he was then both the firſt and the only Polander, who gained a reputation by his writings, for which reaſon he was ſirnamed Polonus. Quod primus tum ex Polonis, idque ſolus, ſcriptis inter extraneos inclaruerit, unde & Polonus, à gente cognominatus eſt, ac ſi Scylurus ille Scytha, quod alium è Scythia parem ſibi ingenio non habuerit (63). There

(53) The paſſages omitted in his hiſtories of Francis I. and Charles IX. have been in the edit. printed in Holland.

(54) Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Miſtere d'Iniquité, p. 505.

(55) Father Mabillon, Muſæi Ital. Tom. 1. p. 27. ſays alſo Martinum Polonum primum eſſe hujus fabulæ ſi non auctorem, ſaltem narrationem, Serarius is of the ſame opinion, in chap. 42 of the 1ſt book of his Hiſtory of Mentz; but ſee the rem. [K] of the art. POPE JOAN.

* Page 165, towards the end.

† This cannot be; for Nicholas III. made him Archbiſhop of Gneſna, and not of Coſenza.

† Here follow Platina's words in Joanne 8. folio m. 140. Hæc quæ dixi vulgo feruntur: incertis tamen & obſcuris auctoribus: quæ ideo ponere breviter, & nude inſtituì: ne obſtinate nimium & pertinaciter omiſiſſe videar: quod fere omnes affirmant: erremus etiam nos hac in re cum vulgo: quamquam appareat ea quæ dixi ex his eſſe: quæ fieri poſſe creduntur.

(52) Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 504, 505.

(56) Naudé, Apolog. des grands Hommes, p. m. 559, 560.

* Lib. 3. de Rom. Pont. cap. 24.

† 3. Controv. part. 2. c. 3. n. 29. p. 399.

 Reſponſe au Cartel de l'Eveſque Jewel.

†† Martinus Polonus fabulis tantum celebrit, cætera obſcurus homo. Lib. 2. de militare legend. hiſt. p. 113.

(57) Coocke, de la Papeſſe, p. 63.

* Tritbem. de Script. Eccleſ. verbo, Martin.

† Vir magnæ doctrinæ ſingulariſque vitæ. Platina in Victor. 3.

(58) Coocke, de la Papeſſe, p. 64.

(59) De Utilitate legendæ Hiſtoriæ.

(60) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 2. num. 6. folio 367 verſo.

(61) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 102.

(62) Blondel, in Examen Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, p. m. 8.

(63) Simon Starovolſcius, in Centum Polonor. Elog. p. 29.

him who is the ſubject of this article [E]. You muſt obſerve that his Chronicle is called the Martinian Chronicle, and that it was printed in French at Paris, with the additions of Verneron Canon of Leige, and with thoſe of the Chronographer Caſtel, in folio, by Anthony Verard (d).

(d) Du Verdier, Biblio. Franç. p. 897.

There is in the Library of Vienna a manuſcript of this Martin, in which he aſſerts that the city of Oppaw in Bohemia was his native place. Ipſe Martinus in Præfat. Codicis MS. cujuſdam Bibl. Viennenſis, ſe ipſum ait de Regno Bohemiæ oriundum, patria Opimenſem, vel ut in alio MS. ut et codice Monaſterii Gamingenſis rectius legitur, Oppavienſem, obſervante Lambecio lib. 2. Bibl. Vindob. (64). Poland was at that time better known in Italy than in Bohemia, nor did men mind much a geographical accuracy. So that a man was eaſily looked upon as a Polander, when he was of ſome country in the neighbourhood of the Kingdom of Poland. They who aſſert that our Martin was a Polander and of the city of Carſula or Corſula (65) do not much examine what they ſay, for if he were of that city he would be an Italian (66). They blend together what Volaterranus aſſerts, that he was of Carſula, and what others maintain that he was born in Poland; but Volaterranus was miſtaken.

(64) Sand. Animadv. in Voſſium, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 173.

(65) F. Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 62. and Dr. Cave, de Script. Eccleſ. p. 739. are among thoſe.

(66) Volaterran. lib. 21. p. m. obſerves that Carſula is now called Caſcina: and in book 6. p. 199. he obſerves that it is a city of Umbria.

[E] Martinus Carſulanus, whom Volaterranus has mentioned in the beginning of his twenty ſecond book, is the ſame with him, who is the ſubject of this article,] Volaterranus expreſſes himſelf thus: Pontificum Romanorum, ſeu Temporum eorum hiſtoriam ſcripſere . . . . . Vincentius et Martinus Carſulanus, Ordinis ambo Prædicatorum, Jo. XXII. tempore (67). i. e. "Vincentius "and Martinus of Carſula, both Dominican Friers, "who flouriſhed in the time of Pope John XXII. "wrote the Hiſtory of the Popes, or of their times." He had ſaid in another place (68), where he gives a Catalogue of the illuſtrious Dominican Friers, Martinus Pœnitentiarius urbis, patria Carſulanus, quam Caſcinam vocant, Chronicam ſcripſit, quam Martinianam vocant, Jo. XXII. tempore. i. e. "Martinus Peni-"tentiary to the city, born at Carſula, now called "Caſcina, wrote a Chronicle which is ſtyled the "Martinian. he lived in the time of Pope John "XXII." It is plain that in theſe two paſſages he means the ſame Martinus, and yet Voſſius queſtions it (69). He commits a greater blunder ſtill, ſince he imagines that Volaterranus ſpoke of one Vincentius Carſulanus in the beginning of his twenty ſecond book. He confeſſes that he does not know that Author (70). How could he know him, ſince he is a mere chimera? Volaterranus ſpeaks of the ſame Vincent of Beauvais, whom he had mentioned in the twenty firſt book (71).

(67) Volaterran. lib. 22. init. p. 783.

(68) Idem, lib. 21. p. 759.

(69) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. 2. cap. 60. p. 485. and cap. 54. p. 507.

(70) De eo nihil ultra occurrit. Idem, ibid. p. 507.

(71) Page 759.

POMPONATIUS (PETER) was born in Mantua the 16th of September 1462 (a). He was ſo little in ſtature that he was almoſt a dwarf (b); but he poſſeſſed an exalted genius, and was conſidered as one of the moſt excellent Philoſophers of the age in which he lived. He taught philoſophy in Padua with great reputation, having for his antagoniſt the famous Achillini, whoſe puzzling objections would frequently have confounded him, had it not been for his ſkill in parrying them by ſome joke [A]. During the dreadful war in which the Venetians were engaged againſt the league of Cambray, he withdrew to Bologna, and taught Philoſophy there. He had three wives, and but one daughter (c), to whom he gave a portion of twelve thouſand Ducats (d). I know that he did not die in 1512 (e), as Moreri affirms; but then I myſelf do not know the date of his death. All I know is, that ſome relate that he died in a very advanced age (f), and that, according to others, he died of the ſtrangury at Bologna in the ſixty third year of his age (g). His body being conveyed to Mantua was honourably interred there by the appointment of Cardinal Hercules of Gonzaga (h). This great Philoſopher was brought into trouble by the Monks on account of his book on the Immortality of the Soul [B], and I knew a Profeſſor of Philoſophy, who had made himſelf vaſtly formidable by that means. He was a man of no depth, and would have eaſily been puzzled in publick diſputations, if he had not made uſe of jokes, and even buffooneries, which ſet the aſſembly a laughing. By this means the ſtrongeſt objections fell to the ground; and he was ſo firmly perſuaded that this was the beſt way of anſwering, that he even uſed to employ them, when he was able to employ arguments that were both ſerious and ſolid. But after all, perſons of good ſenſe are not ſatisfied with the method uſed by theſe jokers; they are diverted at it no leſs than others, but nevertheleſs they decree the honour of the triumph to thoſe who merit it. Paulus Jovius obſerves, that Achillini uſed to come off victorious in diſputation, by the inſurmountable force of his doctrine, though Pomponatius his antagoniſt diverted the company by his jokes, and employed many ſly tricks. Æmulum in corona veteratorie diſputantem, & riſum ſalſa dicacitate ſæpius excitantem, ipſo invicto doctrinæ robore ſuperabat (4). I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that Pomponatius, who was a cunning mortal, prevailed upon many of the pupils of Achillini, who was a plain downright man, and unfit for intrigues, to leave him, and become his (Pomponatius's) auditors (5).

(a) Lucas Gauricus, in Schemat. tract. 4. folio 57 verſo.

(b) Erat puſillus corpore homuncio quodammodo nanus. Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) See the cloſe of the rem. [B].

(f) Obiit ſenio confectus. Lucas Gauricus, in Schemat. tract. 4. folio 57 verſo.

(g) Sexageſimo tertio ætatis anno ſtranguria obortâ Bononiæ fato functus eſt. Jov. in Elog. cap. 71. p. m. 165.

(h) Idem, ibid.

[A] His ſkill in parrying them by ſome joke.] I am informed of this by Paulus Jovius. In coronis, ſays he (1), confeſſuque doctorum, quum exercitatione perutili ad prætoriam porticum diſputaretur, ita mirus evadebat, ut ſæpe ancipiti, & cornuto Achillini enthymemate circumventus, ſuperfuſo facetiarum ſale, adverſarii impetum, ex illis gyris, & mæandris explicatus eluderet. i. e. "In "large companies of people, and aſſemblies of learn-"ed men, whilſt uſeful diſputations were carrying "on, he made ſuch admirable evaſions, that being "frequently preſſed, by a fallacious and knotty ar-"gument, he would throw out his jokes, and there-"by eluding the force of his adverſary, extricated "himſelf out of the maze into which he had been "led." Nothing can be more advantageous, in diſputation, than this talent of Pomponatius. If a perſon has no good anſwer to make to an argument; finds it quite puzzling and unanſwerable, ſuch a one will extricate himſelf, provided he can but hit upon ſome joke; he will get the laughers on his ſide in ſuch a manner, that the confuſion due to himſelf, will fall upon his adverſary.

(1) P. Jovius, in Elog. cap. 71. p. m. 164.

Solventur riſu tabulæ, tu miſſus abibis (2).

"He laugh'd and jear'd at, you diſcharg'd the "Court." CREECH.

(2) Horat. ſat. 1. lib. 2. ver. ult.

It is on theſe occaſions that we prove the following maxim:

Ridiculum acri
Fortius & melius magnas plerunque ſecat res (3).

"A waggiſh ſneer
"Doth nick the great ones more than a ſevere." CREECH.

(3) Idem, ſat. 10. lib. 1. ver. 14.

(4) Jovius, in Elog. cap. 57. p. 134.

(5) Ipſo Pomponatio acri æmulo inſidioſa ambitione, ſcholam ejus depopulante. Erat enim à ſumma ingenii ſimplicitate ambiendi, adulandique prorſus imperitus. Idem, ibid.

[B] This great Philoſopher was brought into trouble by the Monks, on account of his book on the immortality of the ſoul.] Here follows a paſſage from Paulus Jovius: Exorto bello Veneto, poſt Achillini mortem Bononiæ profeſſus eſt; ubi cucullatos ſacerdotes contra ſe in caput, & nominis famam vehementiſſimè concitavit; edito ſcilicet volumine, quo animas poſt corporis mortem interituras ex ſententia Ariſtotelis probare nitebatur; ſecutus Aphrodiſæi placita, cujus dogmate ad corrumpendam juventutem, diſſolvendamque Chriſtianæ vitæ diſciplinam, nihil peſtilentius induci potuit (6). We here find that Paulus Jovius and was ſuſpected to entertain impious notions. Notwithſtanding the clamours raiſed and the books that were publiſhed againſt him, he yet could not be prevailed upon vius acts the part both of an Hiſtorian and a Judge on this occaſion. He ſays, not only that Pomponatius, by endeavouring to prove that, according to the doctrine of Ariſtotle, the ſoul of man is not immortal, was therefore preſented by the Monks; but that it is likewiſe the moſt pernicious doctrine poſſible, and the moſt apt to corrupt youth, and Chriſtian morality. He is certainly infinitely more in the right, when he acts as an Hiſtorian, than when he gives his judgment; for it is not at all material, whether Ariſtotle believed the ſoul's mortality; or whether he laid down principles, according to which it cannot well be proved that it is not mortal. If therefore Pomponatius aſſerted only this, that according to Ariſtotle's principles, it muſt neceſſarily be inferred, that it dies with the body, his opinion is no ways pernicious in its tendency, provided that he himſelf believes the immortality of the ſoul. But he believes it directly and expreſsly. He examines the hypotheſes of Ariſtotle; he produces what may be ſaid pro and con as to thoſe hypotheſes; he exhibits the philoſophical reaſons which were brought, in that age, as ſo many proofs either of the ſoul's immortality or mortality. He takes notice wherein the ſtrength or weakneſs of the argument lyes on both ſides; and afterwards concludes, that as there is no demonſtrative reaſon or argument to prove the ſoul's mortality or immortality, this queſtion ought to be conſidered as doubtful. Now as it belongs to God (ſays he) to determine thoſe doubtful queſtions which men diſpute about; let us enquire whether he teaches that the ſoul is immortal, and keep to his determination, as a definitive and infallible ſentence. He afterwards proves by the old and new Teſtament, that there is another life after this, and declares that he builds his faith upon them. His words are as follow (7): His itaque ſic ſe habentibus, mihi (ſalva ſaniori ſententia) in hac materia dicendum videtur, quòd quæſtio de immortalitate animæ eſt neutrum problema, ſicut etiam de mundi æternitate: mihi namque videtur quòd nullæ rationes naturales adduci poſſunt cogentes animam eſſe immortalem, minuſque probantes animam eſſe mortalem, ſicut quamplures Doctores tenentes eam immortalem declarant . . . qua propter dicemus ſicut Plato 1 de Legibus certificare de aliquo cum multi ambigunt ſolius eſt Dei; cum itaque tam illuſtres viri inter ſe ambigant, niſi per Deum hoc certificari poſſe exiſtimo. . . . . (8) Quapropter dico quòd ante donum vel adventum gratiæ, multifariam per Prophetas, & bona ſupernaturalia hanc quæſtionem Deus terminavit, ut manifeſtè per vetus Teſtamentum eſt videre; noviſſimè autem per Filium, quem conſtituit hæredem univerſorum, per quem fecit & ſæcula, eam quæſtionem dilucidavit, ſicut ſcribit Apoſtolus Epiſt. ad Hebræos. . . . . . (9) Quantò lux diſtat à lucido, & veritas à vero, & quantò cauſa infinita eſt potior effectu finito, tantò efficacius hoc demonſtrat immortalitatem animæ; quare ſi quæ rationes probare videntur mortalitatem animæ, ſunt falſæ & apparentes, cum prima lux, & prima veritas oſtendant oppoſitum; ſi quæ verò videntur probare ejus immortalitatem, veræ quidem ſunt & lucidæ, ſed non lux & veritas; quare hæc ſola via inconcuſſa & ſtabilis eſt, cæteræ vero ſunt fluctuantes. . . . . (10) QUARE INDUBIE (11) ipſam immortalem eſſe aſſerendum eſt: verùm ea non via incedendum eſt, quâ hujus ſeculi ſapientes inceſſerunt, qui cum ſapientes ſe dixerunt ſtulti facti ſunt, quiſquis enim hac via procedet ut exiſtimo ſemper incertus & vagus fluctuabit. To be impartial, can we juſtly charge a man who argues in this manner with being impious? Can we accuſe him of not believing the immortality of the ſoul? Might it not be aſſerted, by the ſame way of reaſoning, that all Divines doubt the truth of the Trinity, the incarnation, tranſubſtantiation, the reſurrection, and all the tenets in general, the proofs of which are drawn only from revelation; if they, at the ſame time, do not affirm, that they are diſcovered to us by the light of natural reaſon? Shall not the ſacred writings, if once fully admitted, as the word of God, as ſtrongly convince us of the truth of the ſoul's immortality, as a geometrical demonſtration (12)? But I will go no farther than to ſay, that Paulus Jovius has formed a very wrong judgment of this work of Pomponatius. Had he ſaid, in general, that the doctrine which denies the immortality of the ſoul is deſtructive to good manners, he would have aſſerted a thing that is looked upon as a common notion, but which nevertheleſs is not as certain and true in reality as it appears to be; for if we enquire into the manners of the Chriſtians, their lewdneſs, their knaviſh tricks, and the many arts they employ to get money or employments, or to ſupplant their competitors, it will be found that it would be impoſſible for them to be more wicked, though they even did not believe any thing with regard to a life to come. It will be found, generally ſpeaking, that they refrain only from ſuch actions as are attended with infamy, or a capital puniſhment, two curbs, which would as ſtrongly check, cæteris paribus, the wickedneſs of an impious man, as theirs. But this is a ſubject that would require a particular treatiſe.

(6) Jovius, in Elog. cap. 71. p. 164.

INCIDENTS concerning Pomponatius's treatiſe de Immortalitate Animæ.

When I conſider that Pomponatius acknowledged publickly, that the light of reaſon cannot prove, with certainty, our immortality, I know not what to think of the diſtinction, which it is ſaid he once made before his Judges. La Mothe le Vayer relates this affair in manner following. " Such a dexterous con- " duct was more ſucceſsful, not long ſince, to Pom- " ponatius the Philoſopher, who, having declared " with a peripatetick liberty and warmth, that he " did not believe the immortality of the ſoul, was " proſecuted by the Inquiſition; however, he got " off by the following explanation, that he did not " believe it, properly ſpeaking, ſince he knew it de- " monſtratively, as he declared in a very long ſpeech " made before his Judges, who had formerly been his " pupils, and whoſe favour he wanted pretty much at " that time (13)." I ſhould rather think that he diſtinguiſhed, before his Judges, between faith and knowledge, than between knowledge and opinion; I mean, that he owned to them, that he did not know, demonſtratively, that the ſoul is immortal; but that he believed it as an article of faith revealed in ſcripture, and determined by councils (14). However that be, it is ſaid that he was not diſpleaſed that a refutation ſhould be written to his work; and wiſhed that the pernicious venom, with which it was interſperſed, might be deſtroyed by the antidote of Javellus's anſwer. This is what is obſerved by Anthony Sirmond the Jeſuit, againſt a man who had printed, in France, Pomponatius's treatiſe without this anſwer. Quem repugnante autore, neſcio quis curioſus, aut impius, novis typis juſſerat in lucem exire ſolitarium & ſine reſponſione Javelli, quam ipſe Pomponatius ſcriptâ ad eum Epiſtolâ ita olim comprobârat, ut palam rogaret edici, ſe quoque ſuffragante, perſperſum libro ſuo venenum hoc antidoto niſi diluatur, peſtiferum eſſe, ac toti humano generi extimeſcendum (15). I am of opinion, that this Philoſopher thought of this charitable office very late; he defending his book, twice againſt Niphus, and once againſt Ambroſe, Archbiſhop of Naples. Sirmond the Jeſuit relates this particular (16); but he ſays nothing of the book which Contarinus publiſhed in 1516, againſt that of Pomponatius, and which that Philoſopher judged to be very ſolid. Edidit juvenis adhuc (trigeſimum enim tertium ætatis annum tunc agebat) librum contra judicium Petri Mantuani doctoris ſui . . . . . argumenta autem illa firma ad probandum & gravia fuiſſe, opuſque totum valde elaboratum perſpicitur, quia acutiſſimus ille phyſicus in libro, quo defendit opinionem illam ſuam acriter oppugnatam ab eo quem inſtruxerat, tradit eum librum & doctiſſimum omnium & uberrimum eſſe, qui omni tempore materiam illam perſecuti ſunt: additque videri prorſus eum divina opera & manu fabricatum fuiſſe (17). i. e. " When he was but in " the thirty-third year of his age, he publiſhed a " work in oppoſition to the tenets of Pomponatius, " whoſe pupil he had been. . . . It is evident, that " the arguments he brought in proof of his aſſertions " were ſtrong and weighty, and that the whole " work was finiſhed with great accuracy and pains; " ſince that moſt ſagacious Naturaliſt, in the book " in which he defends his opinion, that was ſo ſtrong- " ly attacked by his pupil, declares, that his work " was

(7) Petrus Pomponatius, de Immortalitate Animæ, cap. 15, & ult. p. m. 124.

(8) Idem, ibid. p. 125.

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 126.

(10) Idem, ibid. p. 128.

(11) I am to obſerve, that the title of his laſt chapter is, in quo ponitur ultima concluſio in hac materia, quæ ſententia mea videtur indubie ſuſtinenda.

(12) See citat. (46) and (47) of the art. PERROT (NICHOLAS.

(13) La Mothe le Vayer, Dialogue de la Diverſité des Religions, p. m. 294, 295. It is the laſt of the 5 dialogues of Horatius Tubero.

(14) Animam eſſe immortalem eſt articulus fidei, ut patet per Simbolum Apoſtolorum & Athanaſii. Pomponat. de Immortal. Animæ, p. 126.

(15) Antonius Sirmondus, de Immortal. Animæ, p. 1 and 2. printed at Paris in 1635, 8vo.

(16) Idem, ibid. in Appendice, p. 19 and 20.

(17) Johan. Caſa, in Vita Gaſparis Contareni, p. m. 184.

upon to change his opinion. He made more than one reply; and, inſtead of giving ground, he advanced ſtill farther, adhering invariably at the ſame time to his firſt corrective [C], viz. that the Divine Authority of the Scriptures was to him an immoveable foundation,

" was the moſt learned and copious of any that had " ever been compoſed on that ſubject; and adds, that " it really appeared to him as a divine compoſition." Why therefore did he not deſire that the anſwer of Contarinus ſhould be ever after printed with his treatiſe, as it is ſaid he wiſhed with regard to Javellus's anſwer? Niphus had wrote againſt Pomponatius by order of Pope Leo X. whilſt others, on the contrary, ſay Pomponatius drew up the treatiſe in queſtion, only to pleaſe that Pope. Theſe are refuted by la Mothe le Vayer. I ſhall give a conſiderable quotation with regard to what he ſays on that ſubject; and the Reader will therein find ſome remarks which will illuſtrate my text. " I need not carry theſe " conſiderations (18) to a greater length, as the Rea- " der may peruſe what was writ on this ſubject, up- " wards of an hundred years ſince, by thoſe mighty " adverſaries Pomponatius and Niphus. On this oc- " caſion, I muſt deſire my Readers to rank, among " the dreams of Poſtel (who is known to have had " very dangerous intervals) the aſſertion he preſumed " to make, viz. that the only motive which prompt- " ed Pomponatius to engage in that diſpute, was, " to pleaſe the Roman Pontiff *, whom he mentions " in very diſreſpectful terms. For the truth, on the " contrary, is, that Niphus was made choice of by " Pope Leo X. to whom he dedicates his work, and " whom Poſtel hints at, as one of the moſt learned " men of his time, and as able to defend a cauſe ſo " far as it can be defended. And indeed it muſt be " confeſſed, that he has done every thing that could " be performed in favour of a cauſe which had ſo " many diſadvantages; being confined, as it has been " mutually agreed upon by them, directly within the " bounds of the Peripatetic Philoſophy. Pompona- " tius jokes upon him for it, ſaying, that he had " imitated a Phyſician of Milan, who ordered all " the herbs growing in a meadow to be put into a " bath; firmly perſuaded that ſome one or other " of them would cure his patient; and that he, in " like manner, had employed all kinds of arguments, " though ever ſo weak and fallacious, in order to " ſee whether the readers would be ſatisfied with " one or other of them. The beſt of all is, that the " only queſtion was with regard to Ariſtotle's Phi- " loſophy, which, after all, cannot be more preju- " dicial to truth than what he has writ concerning " the eternity of the world, or of the quin- " teſſence of the Heavens, which is laughed at " in ſchools (19).". Spondanus having mentioned the prohibition of Leo X. to the Philoſophers, with regard to their teaching that the ſoul of man is mortal, and but one, in all men (20), obſerves, that it is thought Pomponatius had been the occaſion of promulgating that bull. Occaſionem autem prædictæ de philoſophis ſanctioni dediſſe dicitur Petrus Pomponatius Mantuanus, Jovii in philoſophiâ præceptor: qui enarrans Ariſtotelem & Averroëm Bononiæ, animas poſt corporis mortem interituras ex ſententiâ Ariſtotelis probare conatus, juventutem valdè corruperat; ſe eo tuens quòd philoſophicè loqueretur, ſed aliter, cùm Chriſtianus eſſet, ſentiret (21). i. e. " Peter Pomponatius of Mantua, " under whom Jovius learnt philoſophy, is ſaid to " have been the occaſion of the bull juſt now men- " tioned, with regard to the Philoſophers. Pompo- " natius, whilſt he explained Ariſtotle and Averroes " at Bologna, had corrupted the minds of youth to " a great degree, by endeavouring to prove that, ac- " cording to Ariſtotle, the ſoul dies with the body; " making the following defenſe for himſelf, that " he then ſpoke as a Philoſopher; but that as a " Chriſtian his opinion was different." Theſe words are not accurate, they ſuppoſing that Pomponatius taught like Averroes, that all men have but one ſoul, in certain reſpects, than which nothing can be falſer. Any one who peruſes his book will find that after having given Averroes's opinion, in the third chapter; he declares, in the beginning of the fourth, that it is abſurd and monſtrous; and the reaſon why he does not refute it is, becauſe Thomas Aquinas has demonſtrated the ſtupidity of that opinion, and put the Averroiſt beyond a poſſibility of making a reply. He has defeated them in ſuch a manner, ſays he, that the only thing they can do is, to rail at him (22). Referring therefore his readers to Thomas Aquinas, he contents himſelf with ſhewing that Averroes did not find that chimera in Ariſtotle. Quamvis hæc opinio tempeſtate noſtra ſit multùm celebrata, & fere ab omnibus pro conſtanti habeatur eam eſſe Ariſtotelis, mihi tamen videtur quod nedum in ſe ſit falſiſſima, verum inintelligibilis, & monſtruoſa, & ab Ariſtotele prorſus aliena; imò exiſtimo quòd tanta fatuitas nunquam fuerit nedum credita, verum excogitata: Et primò quidem de ejus falſitate nihil novi intendo adducere, ſed tantùm lectorem remittere ad ea quæ Latinorum decus Divus Thomas Aquinas . . . . . ſed quoad ſecundum hæc paucula quæ mihi plenam fidem faciunt adducere ſtatui, videlicet hoc alienum eſſe ab Ariſtotele, verùm hoc eſſe figmentum, & monſtrum ab Averroe conflctum (23). i. e. " Not- " withſtanding that this opinion prevails greatly in " our age, and is almoſt generally thought to be " that of Ariſtotle, it yet appears to me not only " very falſe in itſelf, but unintelligible and mon- " ſtrous, and quite oppoſite to Ariſtotle's way of " thinking: nay, I am firmly perſuaded that ſuch a " ridiculous conceit was never believed, nor even " thought of: and firſt, I ſhall not mention any thing " with regard to the falſity of it, but only refer my " readers to thoſe particulars which Thomas Aqui- " nas, that ornament of the Latin Authors. . . . . " Secondly, I ſhall take notice of a few things which " have fully convinced me, that Ariſtotle never en- " tertained ſuch an opinion, and that it is a monſtrous " forgery, invented by Averroes." Notwithſtanding this it may be ſaid, that he was one of thoſe who gave occaſion to the bull promulgated by Pope Leo X. He did not pay much regard to it. It was read and approved by the Fathers of the Lateran Council, in the eight Seſſion in December 1513, and he wrote his book De Immortalitate Animæ in 1516 (24); whence, by the way, it may be inferred, that Moreri, Konig, and ſeveral other Writers, are miſtaken in fixing the date of his death to 1512. According to the ſcheme of his nativity mentioned by Gauricus, he was born in 1462. Now, according to Paulus Jovius, he died in the ſixty third year of his age, and conſequently he died in 1525. According to Paul Freherus (25) he flouriſhed in 1530, which is a miſtake.

[C] He made more than one reply; and inſtead of giving ground he advanced ſtill farther, adhering invariably at the ſame time to his firſt corrective.] Having no other book of Pomponatius by me but that De Immortalitate Animæ, I am not able to give the chronological Hiſtory of the diſpute which that piece occaſioned. All I can do is, to employ the account given by le Noble. I do not look upon it to be quite accurate, there being ſeveral omiſſions in it; but I am of opinion that all the particulars related by him are true; and we muſt reſt contented with theſe when we are not able to procure any more (26). " This treatiſe (27) made a great deal of noiſe; be- " ing publiſhed in Venice, Pomponatius adds that " the Monks, whom he calls Cucullati, inveighed " ſtrongly againſt his Doctrine (28). Theſe Cucul- " lati railed very heartily at Pomponatius in their " Sermons, calling him a downright Heretic: cauſed " the peruſal of that treatiſe to be forbid by the Pa- " triarch whom that Philoſopher calls a man of a " moſt holy life, but very ignorant in Philoſophy and " Divinity; and afterwards the bookſellers, by a De- " cree of the Senate, were forbid to vend it. . . . . A " man of learning . . . . . wrote with great temper " againſt this treatiſe . . . . (29) Pomponatius wrote " an anſwer to this Author, and entitled it Apologia. " In the two firſt books of this apology he anſwers, " article by article, to all the arguments brought " againſt his Doctrine; and refutes them, and again proves

(18) Whether Ariſtotle teaches the immortality of the ſoul.

* Lib. 1. de orb. concord.

(19) La Mothe le Vayer, de l'Immortalite de l'Ame, p. 136, 137. Tom. 6. of his works in 12mo.

(20) The form of the Bull is given in the article SPINOZA, remark [L], towards the concluſion.

(21) Spondanus, Annal. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1513. num. 20. p. m. 308.

(22) Tam lucus Inter, tam ſubtiliter adverſus hanc opinionem invehitur, ut ſententia mea nihil intactum, nullamque reſponſionem quam quis pro Averroe adducere poteſt impugnatam relinquat; totum enim impugnat, diſſipat, & annihilat, nullumque Averroiſtis refugium relictum eſt, niſi convitia & maledicta in Divinum & Sanctiſſimum virum. Pompon. de Immortal. Animæ, p. 8, 9.

(23) Idem, ibid.

(24) Finis impoſitus eſt huic tractatui per me Petrum filium Joannis Nicolai Pomponatii de Mentua die 24 menſis Septembris anno Chriſti 1516 Bononiæ, Pomponat. ibid.

(25) In Theatro, p. 1441.

(26) Le Noble, Tableaux, des Philoſophes, Tom. 2. p. 80.

(27) That de Immortalite Animæ.

(28) Ibid. p. 81.

(29) Ibid. p. 82.

foundation, on which he grounded his belief of the ſoul's immortality. His book on Incantations was alſo thought very dangerous [D]. He did not fail of advocates (i); but ſome bring him off no otherwiſe than by ſuppoſing that he became a convert from atheiſm [E]. If the impious tenets which have been laid to his charge were grounded only

(i) See the rem. [E].

" proves that Ariſtotle did not believe the immorta" lity of the ſoul, and that it could not be proved by " the light of nature. He greatly blames in the " third book the paſſionate manner of writing of " brother Ambroſe of Naples, of the Order of the " Hermits of St. Auſtin, and who a few days before
" had been made a Biſhop. He complains of him
" for this, that preaching his Lent ſermons in the " Cathedral of Mantua, he had ſpoke very injurioufly
" of him, from the pulpit, and publickly called him
" a Heretic and impious wretch; and falſely charg" ed him with not believing the reſurrection or the " immortality of the ſoul. He therefore declares,
" that he does believe the ſoul's immortality, and is
(30) Some words are wanting here, viz. that it is, becauſe it is the authority of God, and that he has it, or ſomething like it.
" ready to die in defenſe of that truth, but (30) that " he revealed it to men, and not becauſe it is taught
" us by the light of reaſon; and that, in caſe bro" ther Ambroſe will inſtruct him, in order to make " him change his opinion, he is ready to receive his
" inſtructions." He afterwards relates, that the Patriarch of Venice wrote a letter to Peter Bembus, (who was at Rome,) the ſubject of which was, to deſire him to cauſe the Pope to condemn the treatiſe in queſtion on the immortality of the ſoul. Bembus read it, and did not find any thing in it contrary to the faith; nevertheleſs, as the duty of his employment enjoyned him to do it, he communicated it to the Maſter of the Apoſtolical Palace, who, after peruſing it, pronounced, as Bembus had done, that it did not contain any thing contrary to the opinion of the moſt famous Doctors of the Chriſtian Religion (31).

(31) Le Noble, Tableaux des Philoſophes, Tom. 2. p. 83.

" (32) After this, as Writers commonly grow
" warm, by much diſputing, and carry matters too
" far, he (33) aſſerts, and endeavours to prove, that
(32) Ibid. p. 84.
" the notion of the ſoul's immortality is contrary to (33) i. e. Pomponatius in his Apology.
" the principles of natural reaſon; and that nothing " can be more injurious to the faith than to attempt " to prove it from natural reaſons . . . . (34). After (34) Le Noble, Tableaux des Philoſoph. Tom. 2. p. 85, 86.
" that Pomponatius had writ the apology in queſ-
" tion, there was publiſhed, in oppoſition to his firſt
" treatiſe on the immortality of the ſoul, a new book
" written by a Philoſopher named Auguſtin Niphus,
" and Pomponatius anſwered it in another treatiſe
" called Defenſorium, in which he ſhews Niphus's ig" norance; and continues to prove more ſtrongly
" than he had done before, the particulars aſſerted
" by him, and concludes his work with the follow" ing words: if Jeſus Chriſt is riſen we ſhall ariſe;
" if we riſe, the ſoul is immortal. Now it is certain " that Jeſus Chriſt is riſen, and therefore it is true " that the ſoul is immortal. This, ſays he, is the " only ſolid way of reaſoning by which we are able " to prove the ſoul's immortality; whoever is not
" contented with it is unworthy of the Chriſtian
" name; ſuch a one does not know the excellency of " the faith which ought to have the firſt place in all
" our diſputes; and which alone is ſufficient to eſta-
" bliſh, in a ſolid manner, particulars which cannot
" be maintained by any other methods."

The Reader will ſee hereunder, that Mr. le Noble cenſures ſome of Pomponatius's thoughts.

[D] His book on incantations was alſo thought very dangerous.] He therein ſhews, that he does not believe any of thoſe things which are written on magic and ſorcery; and he lays prodigious ſtreſs on I know not what virtues which certain men have had, by which they produced miraculous effects. He gives a great many examples of this; but his adverſaries do not admit them to be true, or free from magic; and are ſurpriſed that Zacutus ſhould think himſelf obliged in conſcience to believe them. Let us hear Theophilus Raynaud (35). Exempla quæ ad ſpecialem aliquorum hominum proprietatem individualem ad miros effectus præſtandos, præſertim ſanationum, à Pomponatio addenſantur; vel fabuloſa ſunt, vel Magica, ut Addreas Laurentius capite (36) illo 4. contendit. Ridiculè autem Zacutus (37) dicta q. 53. inter magnos autores quibus fidem abrogaſſe piaculum propè eſſe dicit, numerat Pomponatium in Opere de Incantationibus, exempla illa recenſentem. i. e. " Pomponatius brings many " examples to prove, that there is a certain peculiar " and individual virtue in ſome men, for performing " ſurprizing things, eſpecially for curing diſeaſes; " but theſe are either falſe, or performed by necro- " mancy, as is aſſerted by Andrew Laurentius. But " Zacutus is ſo ſilly as to rank Pomponatius, with re- " gard to thoſe examples, in his book on Incanta- " tions, among thoſe great Authors whom he thinks " it a crime not to believe." He refers us to his Theologia Naturalis, where he writes as follows againſt the work in queſtion of Pomponatius (38): Nec minor Pomponatii culpa, qui (39) idem conatus in opere de incantationibus ad extremum tamen ſubjicit opus ſuum correctioni Eccleſiæ, à qua ut rectè ſupra divinavit (40) Carpentarius aliud expectare non potuit, quàm unam lineam à principio ad finem uſque ductam. Ita enim factum eſt, collocato ante aliquot annos, inter reprobata, illo opere, in quo Buccafferr. l. de divinat. per ſomnum lect. 29. ait aſſeri à Pomponatio, multa falſa, & multas ac magnas nugas. i. e. " The like cenſure falls upon Pompo- " natius, who endeavouring the ſame thing in his " book on incantations, did yet at laſt ſubmit it to the " cenſure of the Church, from which nothing could " be expected, (as Carpentarius exactly gueſſed above,) " but that it would order the whole to be expunged. " This happened in all reſpects, for not many years " ſince, this book, in which Buccaffer affirms that " Pomponatius advances many falſe and very trifling " particulars, was condemned." One of the brethren of this Jeſuit had writ in ſtill ſtronger terms. *Pomponatii de Incantationibus opuſculum certè miratus fui tam diu tolerari ab Eccleſiâ; nunc recens & meritò in Romano Indice damnatur, veriſſimum enim; quod ab Ant. Mirandulano * ſcriptum hoc opere Pomponatium, ſe nec philoſophum bonum, nec quod fœdius Chriſtianum bonum exhibuiſſe, cum effectus omnes mirificos cœlorum influctionibus adſcribit adeò ut velit & religiones & leges earumque latores ab iis dependere. Quod prorſus impium* (41). i. e. " I was " ſurprized that the treatiſe on Incantations was ſo " long tolerated by the Church: but it has lately " been very juſtly put into the catalogue of prohi- " bited books, for Antonius Mirandula's aſſertions " are true, viz. that Pomponatius, in the work in " queſtion, has not ſhewed himſelf a good Philoſo- " pher; nor even (which is ſtill worſe) a good Chriſ- " tian, by his aſcribing all extraordinary and won- " derful effects, to the influence of heavenly bodies: " ſo far as to conclude, that all religion, laws, and " legiſlators, depend on them, which is a very im- " pious opinion." Pomponatius, ſpeaking of the cures which are aſcribed to the virtue of relicks, ſays a thing that appears at firſt offenſive, but which may yet have a favourable conſtruction put upon it, according to the received opinions. He ſays that the bones of a dog would as ſurely work a cure, in caſe the ſick perſon who truſts in the virtue of relicks, ſhould have his imagination as ſtrongly impreſſed, with regard to ſuch bones, as the bones or aſhes of Martyrs (42). The controverſial Writers of the Church of Rome, not being able to deny but that ſome fictitious relicks have wrought miracles, as is pretended, ſay, that the pious intention of thoſe who have recourſe to them, procured them ſuch a recompence from God.

(35) Theophil. Raynaudus, de Stigmatiſmo ſacro & profano, ſect. 2. cap. 4. p. m. 321, 322.

(36) Book 1. de Strumis.

(37) Medicorum principum Hiſtoriæ, lib. 1.

(38) Idem, in Theolog. naturali, diſtinct. 3. queſt. 2. art. 5. num. 139. p. m. 200, 201.

(39) i. e. To reject what is ſaid of the Devil's Operation.

(40) i. e. digr. 4. in Alcino.

* Lib. 6. de ſingulari certamine.

(41) Mart. Delrio, Diſquiſit. Magicar. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. m. 22.

[E] But ſome bring him off no otherwiſe than by ſuppoſing that he became a convert from Atheiſm.] Helidæus, a famous Phyſician of Forli, uſed to ſay that his Maſter Pomponatius was an Atheiſt; but John Wierus hopes that he did not die ſuch. Pomponatium ante redditum ſpiritus extremi halitum reſipuiſſe ex ſingulari Dei miſeratione, nec permanſiſſe ἄθεον, ſperare volo. Talem etenim fuiſſe, à clariſſimo medicinæ ornamento D. Helidæo Forolivienſi, ejus olim diſcipulo non ſemel auditum eſt (43). Voetius informs us, that Gratarolus defended Pomponatius, and is ſo juſt as not to give into the common opinion. He owns that moſt Romiſh Writers, and ſome Proteſtant Authors, look upon our Philoſopher as an Atheiſt (44). He lays ſome ſtreſs on the obſervation made by his Advocate, viz. that only on his book concerning the Immortality of the Soul, no accuſation was ever more impertinent [F]; nor a more ſignal inſtance of the unjuſt prepoſſeſſion of thoſe who perſecute that Pomponatius laid down the principle of the ſoul's mortality, no otherwiſe than on Ariſtotle's hypotheſis: but he ought to have ſaid that this is a plain proof of our Author's innocency, unleſs he intended to conceal his pernicious tenets under that cover. Voetius alledges that reſtriction. Gul. Gratarolus Medicus Italus (quem propria ſcripta uno volumine in 8. Baſileæ edita, & teſtimonium Bezæ in epiſtolis, ut & in dedicatione libelli cujuſdam, aliorumque præterea doctorum virorum ſuffragia, quorum familiaritate Baſileæ & alibi uſus eſt, à pietatis zelo commendant) eum contra calumniatores tuetur, & piè pro eo tempore vitam cum morte commutaſſe ſcribit : in epiſtol. dedicator. Operibus Pomponatii anno 1567. Baſil. editis præfixâ. . . . Illud penitus conſiderandum, quod reſpondet : Eum ex mente Ariſtotelis negaſſe animæ immortalitatem : quod, ut illi cum aliis philoſophis ac Theologis ita judicantibus commune fuit (Plutarcho, Galeno, Aphrodiſæo, Juſtino Martyre, Theodoreto, Origene, Nyſſeno, Nazianzeno, Cajetano in 3. de Anima) ſic non debet hic fraudi eſſe : niſi probari poſſet illum ſub hoc ſchemate ſubdolè & tutò voluiſſe hunc Atheiſmum ſpargere in animos auditorum. Niſi itaque alia ex dictis, ſcriptis, factis ejus certior demonſtratio ſuppetat, utique in benigniorem partem, immo in optimam accipienda ſunt illa, quæ ille pro modulo & conditione ſua de Fato, Providentia Dei, & prædeſtinatione conſcripſit : in quibus ſi non rei dignitati, & ſolidis Theologis per omnia ſatisfaciat, ſaltem hoc præſtat, ne nigra Atheiſmi nota illi tam peremtoriè inuratur. Hæc ego in re dubia poſtquam omnia ejus opuſcula præſertim modo nominata videre contigit : qui ante multos annos ex lectione ſolius tract. de Incantationibus (ubi placitis Avicennæ & Averrois nimis adhæreſcens, in ſupernaturalibus quibuſdam ſatis miſerè fluctuat) & ex communi aliorum judicio ſiniſtram magis de illo opinionem conceperam (45). i. e. "William Gratarolus, an Italian Phyſician, who "was greatly eſteemed for his religious zeal, as is "manifeſt from his own compoſitions printed at Baſil in one volume 8vo, from the teſtimony given "by Beza, in his epiſtles, and from the dedication "of a certain book, and the teſtimonies of other "learned men, with whom he was intimate at Baſil "and elſewhere; this Gratarolus, I ſay, undertakes "his defenſe againſt thoſe who ſlandered him; and, "in the dedication to Pomponatius's works, printed "in 1567, declares that he died a pious death, conſidering the age in which he lived. . . . But we "ought to weigh very attentively, that paſſage in "which he anſwers, that Pomponatius denied the "ſoul's immortality, in compliance with the principles of Ariſtotle, which circumſtance, as it was "common to him with other Philoſophers and Divines, as Plutarch, Galen, Aphrodiſæus, Juſtin "Martyr, Theodoret, Origen, Nyſſenus, Nazianzen, "and Cajetan, ought therefore not to be imputed "to him for a crime; unleſs it could be proved, "that he employed that method, in order that he "might inſtil Atheiſm without danger to himſelf, "into the minds of his Auditors. Unleſs therefore a "ſtronger proof can be brought out of his ſayings, "compoſitions or actions, a more favourable conſtruction (nay the beſt poſſible) ought to be put upon "thoſe pieces, which he wrote, in his manner, concerning fate, providence, and predeſtination; in "which pieces, if he does not come up, in every reſpect, to the dignity of his ſubject, and the ſatisfaction of ſound Divines, he at leaſt ought not to "be ſo peremptorily branded with the ſtigma of Atheiſm. Such is the opinion I have entertained, "after having read over all his works, eſpecially "thoſe abovementioned: whereas, many years before, by reading only his book concerning Incantations, (wherein, by adhering too cloſely to the "opinions of Avicenna and Averrois, he is unaccountably at a loſs with regard to ſome ſupernatural "things) and from the common diſcourſe of others, "I had formed a much more diſadvantageous idea "of him." I muſt not omit the epitaph which ſome perſon made on our Philoſopher: Hic ſepultus jaceo. Quare? neſcio: nec ſi ſcis aut neſcis curo. Si vales, bene eſt: vivens valui. Fortaſſe nunc valeo. Si aut non, dicere nequeo (46). i. e. "Here I lye interred. "Wherefore? I know not; nor do I care whether "you do or no. If you are in good health, it is well: "I my ſelf, when living, was ſo. I perhaps may "be well now: but whether I am, or not, is un-"known to me."

(42) Pomponatius dicere non veretur in ſanatione acquiſita ex veneratione Oſſium Divis aſcriptorum, ſi eſſent oſſa canis & tanta & talis de eis haberetur imaginatio, non minus ſubſequeretur ſanitas. Jo. Wierus, de Præſtig. Dæmonum, lib. 5. cap. 17. p. m. 402. He cites Pomponatius's book de Incantamentis, lib. 2. cap. 12.

(43) Wierus, ib. lib. 6. in Epilogo Operis, p. m. 569.

(44) Voet. Diſputat. Theolog. Tom. 1. p. 197.

(45) Voet. Diſputat. Theolog. Tom. 1. p. 198.

(46) König, Biblioth. p. 654.

[F] If the impious tenets, which have been laid to his charge, were grounded only on his book concerning the immortality of the ſoul, no accuſation was ever more impertinent.] Firſt, it is at moſt but a perſonal injury, to aſſert that Ariſtotle's principles lead us to a belief of the Soul's immortality. Whoever makes ſuch an aſſertion, does at moſt, an injuſtice to a man who was tutor to the Conqueror of Aſia, and founder of a flouriſhing ſect. But can this be called an impiety? Secondly, as Ariſtotle is not alive, and conſequently cannot give an account of his faith, nor clear up the ambiguities and equivocations which are to be found in his writings, any perſon is allowed to take up the pen againſt him, if he finds, in Ariſtotle's compoſitions, as many, or more plauſible reaſons to ſhew that he taught the ſoul's mortality, than to ſhew that he taught the immortality of it. Nothing therefore, in ſuch a caſe, can be more offenſive, than for a perſon to propoſe, as a doubtful point, Ariſtotle's opinion on this important article; and to chooſe either ſide of the queſtion, according as he finds himſelf moſt affected by the reaſons given by him, for or againſt the ſoul's immortality. If ſuch a perſon as we are ſpeaking of ſhould not hit exactly upon his ſenſe, this would be doing Ariſtotle injuſtice; but then this would be only a material injury, which the old Philoſopher would be obliged to pardon, by aſcribing it to his inaccuracy, his variations and contradictions. The moſt famous of all his Commentators (47) and ſo many after him, as the two St. Gregory's, Leſcot, Cajetan, and Simon Portius, have acknowledged, that one muſt neceſſarily infer the ſuppoſition of the ſoul's immortality, from that Philoſopher's doctrine (48). He therefore muſt have advanced ſuch maxims as give any one a fair pretence of charging him with that impious tenet. Nothing therefore can be more ridiculous, than to aſſert that no perſon, without being guilty of impiety at the ſame time, can form ſuch a judgment of Ariſtotle's doctrine; and conſequently the pretended impiety of Pomponatius would be grounded on very groſs miſtakes. No one even ought to ſuſpect that he deſigned to do any thing injurious to the memory of the mighty Stagyrite. Thirdly, I obſerve, that it is allowable in a perſon to aſſert, not only that his works furniſh proofs of his believing the ſoul's immortality, but alſo that his ſyſtem, in the manner in which the Schoolmen have thought fit to explain him, and as he is ſtill explained in Schools and Univerſities, cannot give any proof of the ſoul's immortality, but can furniſh many arguments for the contrary. For the chief part of this ſyſtem is, 1ſt, That natural bodies conſiſt of two ſubſtances, one whereof is called matter, and the other form. 2d, That the form of all natural bodies, man excepted, is a corruptible being, which periſhes regularly whenever the compound periſhes; that is, whenever a ſtone, a tree, a dog, &c. are changed into ſome other ſpecies of natural body. From hence it neceſſarily follows, that, according to this ſyſtem, no proof can be given of the ſoul's immortality; for, to do this, proofs muſt be given of its immateriality: now how could this be ſhewn, ſince they own that the ſouls of brutes, though endued with the faculty of ſenſation, diſcernment and deſire, is nevertheleſs material? It is to be obſerved, that in Pomponatius's time, no other ſyſtem of Philoſophy was known, but that of Ariſtotle; ſo that to aſſert, that the immortality of the ſoul could not be proved from Ariſtotle's principles, and to aſſert that it could not be proved from philoſophical reaſons, was one and the ſame thing. This circumſtance goes a great way towards excuſing, and even juſtifying Pomponatius's treatiſe; and eſpecially as neither the Platoniſts, nor any other ſect, furniſhed better proofs. Des Cartes's ſyſtem is the only one which has laid down very ſound principles on this head. He eſtabliſhes

(47) It is Alexander Aphrodiſæus.

(48) Le Mothe le Vayer, de l'Immortalite de l'Ame, p. m. 139.

ſecute Philoſophers; ſince our Author did not doubt of the Soul's Immortality; but maintained, bliſhes it as a principle, that all thinking ſubſtances are diſtinct from matter; from whence it neceſſarily follows, that our ſoul is a ſpirit, or a ſimple and indiviſible ſubſtance, and conſequently immortal. No Carteſian, in this age, would ſcruple to aſſert, that according to the principles of the old Philoſophy, one ſolid proof cannot be brought in favour of the ſoul's immortality. Now would it not be ridiculous to affirm, that a Carteſian who ſhould advance ſuch an aſſertion, is an impious wretch and an Atheiſt? For what reaſon, therefore, was Pomponatius ſo ill uſed? It will be anſwered, that a Carteſian profeſſedly acknowledges that his ſyſtem furniſhes a demonſtrative proof of the ſoul's immortality; but Pomponatius did not acknowledge any ſyſtem which furniſhes ſuch an argument. Such a diſtinction cannot be admitted, but by ſuppoſing that this Philoſopher was acquainted with Des Cartes's ſyſtem, and rejected it; but as he was not acquainted with it, his only fault lyes in his not inventing a ſyſtem, according to which, whatever thinks is incorporeal and ſpiritual. This is the fault of a numberleſs multitude of orthodox men, and conſequently is a chimerical fault. Add to this, that although he had rejected the ſuppoſition, according to which every thinking ſubſtance is diſtinct from matter, he would have done nothing but what is done, in this age, by perſons of the moſt exalted underſtanding, and who relying, as Pomponatius did, entirely on the authority of the holy ſcriptures, cannot be juſtly charged with irreligion (49). Laſtly, I obſerve, that no conduct is more unworthy of a Divine, than to charge a Philoſopher with being impious, who declares, that in order to free our minds from the uncertainty of human reaſon, we ought to have recourſe to God's word, as containing the true foundation, and the moſt certain proofs of the immortality of the human ſoul (50). Now this Pomponatius did, and for this he was cruelly perſecuted by the monkiſh tribe. How ſcandalous was all this!

I go farther, and even ſay that the Carteſians, convinced of the ſoul's immortality, from the evidence they find in the principles of their Philoſophy, act very wiſely, in adviſing their Readers to have recourſe to faith, as an anchor of the ſoul, both ſure and ſtedfaſt, and which entereth into that within the vail (51), that is, to ground their belief of this doctrine on the authority of God, which is the true remedy for all doubts and uncertainties, and an infallible ſupply to the obſcurity of our reaſon. For, if they entertain right notions of things, they ought to believe that what appears ſo evident to them, does not appear ſo to a great number of Philoſophers who oppoſe it. I have read in a work of Arnauld's, that Gaſſendi's reply to Des Cartes has made many people, in Naples, incredulous with regard to the ſoul's immortality (52), becauſe Gaſſendus has employed the utmoſt efforts of his genius, to weaken Des Cartes's argument, with regard to this tenet; which proves that the Carteſian principle is not evident to every one. It is even true, that ignorant people, who ſhould make uſe of the ſenſe which nature has given them, could never be ſure of the ſoul's immortality, whilſt they ſaw the greateſt Philoſophers at variance on that head. Would an ignorant man be blameworthy, for reaſoning in manner following? Were Des Cartes's proofs or arguments evident, Gaſſendi could not oppoſe them in ſuch a manner as would ſatisfy multitudes; for had Gaſſendi writ ſuch a book, wherein, employing all his parts and learning, he had attempted to ſhew that the whole is not greater than its parts; and that, if things equal are ſubſtracted from things equal, the remainder is not equal, no perſon could have been prevailed upon to believe his aſſertions were true: ſince, therefore, he and ſeveral other great Philoſophers have followers, when they oppoſe Des Cartes's doctrine, they muſt neceſſarily oppoſe a doctrine that is not evidently true; it is therefore obſcure in ſome reſpects; it appears true to ſome, and falſe to others; how therefore will it be poſſible for a man altogether illiterate, and unuſed to diſputation, to determine with any certainty? Some of theſe great men muſt be miſtaken; and therefore, which party ſoever I ſide with, I run the hazard of being led into an error. People ought to argue in this manner, when they find learned men divided in opinion. However, ſuppoſing they ſhould do this, how would it be poſſible for them to get clear of their uncertainties? A good method, with regard to the ſoul's immortality, is to have recourſe to revelation. A Carteſian, therefore, who ſhould imitate Pomponatius, ought to be conſidered as a wiſe man, and charitable with regard to his neighbour. It will be well, in him, to maintain for ever invariably the truth of his principle; and to make the beſt anſwer he can, to thoſe who may object that ſubſtances diſtinct from matter are perhaps of ſuch a nature, as to be able to preſerve their exiſtence, without having any thought, and therefore that ſpirituality is not a neceſſary proof of immortality; for if the life of the ſoul conſiſts in thought, it is certain that a total ceſſation of thought would be the death of the ſoul; for which reaſon the ſoul might die without ceaſing to be a ſpiritual ſubſtance, as dogs die without ceaſing to be a corporeal ſubſtance; but after all, it would be praiſe-worthy in him, to adviſe his neighbour to rely on the word of God. I am to obſerve, that the elder Scaliger, one of the greateſt genius's of his age, and who was never thought a Free-thinker, acknowledged, with Pomponatius, that it is a matter of faith, to know whether there be a life to come; this, ſays he, has been always ſuſpected or believed, but it is ſtill a matter of diſpute (53).

I will conclude with a paſſage of the diſpute which has been carrying on for ſome years, between a Proteſtant Miniſter of Rotterdam, and another of Utrecht. The former (54) owns, that though he believes that matter is not capable of any ſenſation or knowledge, he has no diſtinct idea, no clear perception, of that truth; and that he cannot prove it to thoſe who deny it. That which I perceive therein, ſays he, is confuſed and indiſtinct . . . . (55). Can Mr. Saurin and his rational Collegues put their hands on their hearts, and affirm, that they have a clear perception, and a diſtinct idea of the ſoul's immortality? Are not theſe propoſitions clear in appearance, viz. that every thing which has a beginning muſt end; that a Being, whoſe duration is divided by months, days and years, cannot be eternal; otherwiſe it would be infinite, and, in that infinite duration, there would be an infinite number of moments, and nevertheleſs there would be but an infinite number of days and years; there therefore would be as many months and years as moments, which is a palpable abſurdity. An impious man calls theſe clear perceptions, and they appear to him ſuch. This Miniſter ſeems to have pretty near the ſame deſign with Pomponatius; he would have us miſtruſt our reaſon, and rely on the authority of God (56). Here follows the anſwer made by his Antagoniſt (57). I anſwer, that I have that clear perception and that diſtinct idea of the ſoul's immortality. I know that the ſoul is a ſpiritual and indiviſible ſubſtance, which can never be deſtroyed but by annihilation. I know that there is a Providence, a ſupreme juſtice, a ſupreme felicity, a natural morality; in fine, a great number of truths, which are neceſſarily connected with the immortality of the ſoul; and which, were the ſoul mortal, would conſequently be ſo many chimeras. Should a Chriſtian Philoſopher be leſs orthodox than Plato; and in drawing a parallel between the antient Philoſophers, give the preference to Epicurus . . . . (58). Jurieu refutes himſelf, by ſaying that theſe perceptions are clear in appearance: for if they are clear in appearance, nothing can be concluded from them in favour of thoſe which are really clear.

Here follow ſome remarks on this paſſage of Mr. Saurin; 1. Mr. Jurieu ſuppoſes evidently, that in order for us to know, by a diſtinct idea, and a clear perception, the ſpirituality of the ſoul; we muſt clearly underſtand, that matter is not endued with ſenſation or knowledge. Why then does not Saurin make ſome reply to this? Ought he not to declare that he has a diſtinct idea, a clear perception, which informs him, that it is impoſſible that an extended ſubſtance ſhould be endued with ſenſation? 2. It is not ſufficient to know

(49) See rem. [M], towards the cloſe of the art. of the firſt DICÆARCHUS, and rem. [L] of the article PERROT (Nicholas).

(50) Hæc ſola via inconcuſſa & ſtabilis eſt; cæteræ vero ſunt fluctuantes. Pompon. de Immort. Anim. cap. ult. p. m. 126. See what Ablancourt ſays on this ſubject, in the beginning of the rem. [L] of his art. PERROT (Nicholas) Sieur d'Ablancourt.

(51) Epiſtle to the Hebrews, chap. vi. ver. 19.

(52) See the rem. [G].

(53) In this manner I have tranſlated, with ſome latitude, the following words: Cæterum eſſe alterum eſſe ab hoc eſſe adeo neſcimus ut quotidianis vel ſuſpicionibus vel perſuaſionibus res etiamnum ſit controverſa, ſola fide res agatur. Scaliger adverſus Cardanum Exercit. 307. cap. 33. p. m. 990. Compare this with the citations (48), (49), (50), of the art. PERROT (Nicholas).

(54) Jurieu, Religion du Latitudinaire, p. 393.

(55) Ibid. p. 394.

(56) Note. He does not require that we ſhould know this authority by a clear and diſtinct idea, i. e. That we ſhould know evidently, that God has revealed this or that to us.

(57) Saurin, Juſtification de ſa Doctrine, p. 467.

(58) Ibid. p. 468.

maintained, on the contrary, that it is a moſt true doctrine, and which he firmly believed. He only aſſerted that the natural reaſons aſſerted for it are not ſolid and ſatisfactory. Now although an advantageous uſe may be made of the opinion he oppoſed, and that we ought to applaud and encourage ſuch Philoſophers as endeavour to enforce the human reaſons alledged for the Soul's immortality [G]; yet ſince they are only philoſophical arguments, every perſon ought to enjoy the liberty of diſputing concerning them; know, that the Soul cannot be deſtroyed but by annihilation. The ſame may be ſaid of extenſion, and yet trees and brutes are mortal. He therefore ſhould have ſaid, I know that the ſoul cannot exiſt without thought; the diſtinct idea which I have of ſpiritual and indiviſible ſubſtance teaches me, that, were it diveſted of thought, it would exiſt no longer. 3. Plato and Epicurus are introduced improperly; this is ſuppoſing that Jurieu is no leſs orthodox than Plato, and that he prefers the doctrine of Epicurus to that of the other antient Philoſophers. Now all this is falſe. He admits the immortality of the ſoul, but then he does not give a clear idea and diſtinct perception of it; that is, (according to his meaning) an idea as evident as that which makes us underſtand the property of numbers, and the connexion between local preſence and the extenſion of matter. Did Plato admit the ſoul's immortality by ſo clear an idea as this? When a man declares, that he believes as the common people do, that is, that his perſuaſion goes greater lengths than his evidence, it is unjuſt to charge him with unbelief. He is ſafe with regard to his orthodoxy, ſince he believes what ought to be believed; all that would be ſaid againſt him is, that he does not act like a Philoſopher. 4. The diſtinction between ideas clear in appearance, and ideas clear in effect, is trifling; for the clearneſs of ideas eſſentially includes a relation to our minds, and is never abſtracted or ſeparated from appearance; and they are always termed clear from appearance. But it is otherwiſe with truth. An object may be true and appear falſe; but an idea which appears obſcure is neither really nor apparently clear. So that if clear ideas of the ſoul's immortality are inconſiſtent with ideas apparently clear, Jurieu's reflection is ſolid, ſo far is he from refuting himſelf as his antagoniſt affirms. 5. Saurin is greatly to blame in not anſwering the objection, for he might have confounded Jurieu in that reſpect. He ſuppoſes very falſely, that thoſe who aſſert that whatever has a beginning muſt end, go upon this, that an infinite duration would contain as many months and years as moments. He ſuppoſes that this ſeems a great abſurdity to them. But he ought to know that Atheiſts teach, that the duration of matter never had a beginning, and will never end; and therefore they do not look upon the neceſſity of admitting a numberleſs multitude of moments, and a numberleſs multitude of months, years and ages, &c. as a good reaſon for rejecting a doctrine.

[G] Though an advantageous uſe may be made of the opinion which Pomponatius oppoſed; and that we ought to applaud and encourage ſuch Philoſophers as endeavour to enforce the human reaſons alledged for the ſoul's immortality.] What I have to ſay on this ſubject cannot be more clearly or more nobly expreſſed than in the words of a Divine, a Follower of Des Cartes; for which reaſon I ſhall not employ any other Commentary (59). "It is ſaid that there has "been diſcovered at Naples, a ſet of men, who, by "the peruſal of Gaſſendus's works, have been led "into Epicurus's error, viz. that the Soul is mortal. "It muſt be confeſſed, that the book of Inſtances of "that Philoſopher, in oppoſition to the metaphyſical "meditations of Des Cartes, may be too apt to "lead ſuch young perſons as are not well confirmed "in the Chriſtian Faith, into that pernicious error; "becauſe he has therein exerted the utmoſt efforts "of his genius, to ſhew that reaſon does not furniſh "us with any ſolid proofs which may prevent our "believing, that there is no other diſtinction between "our ſouls and bodies, than between a thin and ſubtile body and a groſs one. I know, on the contrary, that there are ſome devout perſons who believe, that we ought to conſider what Des Cartes "has writ upon that ſubject as an effect of God's "providence, who thought proper to put a ſtop to "the propenſion, which many perſons, in theſe later "times, ſeem to have to irreligion and free-thinking, by a method ſuited to their diſpoſition. The "perſons I mean are thoſe, who will admit of nothing but what may be known by the light of "reaſon, who have an extreme unwillingneſs to begin with faith; who look upon moſt perſons of "a pious turn of mind as weak in their underſtandings; and who can never have any ſenſe of religion, from their being prepoſſeſſed with the following notion (which in moſt of them is an effect "of the completion of their corrupt morals) that "whatever is ſaid of the life to come is mere fiction, "and that the ſoul dies with the body. One would "conclude therefore, that the beſt way to remove "the chief obſtacle to the ſalvation of the people in "queſtion, and to prevent the ſpreading of their "infection, would be, to diſturb them in their falſe "tranquillity, which is wholly grounded on their "firm perſuaſion, that it betrays a weak underſtanding to believe that the ſoul ſurvives the body. "Now have we not reaſon to believe that God, who "diſpoſes of his creatures at pleaſure, and who conceals, beneath human means, the wonderful orders "of his providence, has in view the reclaiming of "thoſe unbelievers, by forcing them to entertain a "juſt diffidence of their falſe ideas, when he raiſed "up a man who was ſo excellently well qualified by "nature to work upon them; a moſt extraordinary "penetration of mind for diving into the moſt abſtracted ſciences; a ſtrong application to philoſophy only, about which they do not entertain any ſuſpicions; "who openly proteſts to diveſt himſelf of all vulgar "prejudices, a quality they are very fond of; and who, "by that very means, muſt convince the greateſt "unbelievers, (provided they will but open their "eyes to the light which is preſented to them) viz. "that nothing can be more repugnant to reaſon, "than to believe that the ſoul muſt die with the "body. And how has he ſhewn this? By laying "down from clear principles, and ſuch as are grounded wholly on natural ideas, to which every man "of ſenſe muſt conſent, viz. that the ſoul and body, "i. e. that which thinks, and that which has extenſion, are two ſubſtances entirely diſtinct; ſo that "it is impoſſible that extenſion ſhould be a modification of thinking ſubſtance, or thought a mode "of extended ſubſtance. This only being ſtrongly "proved (as it is exceedingly well in Des Cartes's "meditations) there is no free-thinker, if he has but "a tolerably-juſt way of thinking, can be perſuaded, "that the ſoul dies with the body." For &c. (60).

The reader ſees, by this long paſſage quoted from Arnauld, the advantage which may accrue to religion from the hypotheſis oppoſed by Pomponatius; it may be employed againſt certain free-thinkers, who will ſee before they will believe, and who deſpiſe the obſcure arguments brought by Divines. Now nothing can more effectually reclaim the perſons in queſtion, than to convince them of the truth of the ſoul's immortality: this is an inlet into the right path; and if we once bring them ſo far, very happy conſequences may be expected. Pomponatius could not have worked upon them in that reſpect, but would rather have ſtrengthened them in their error; and conſequently his hypotheſis is more hurtful than advantageous, in that particular conflict whereby he propoſes to convert the ſort of people in queſtion: and, to ſay the truth, it would have been much more praiſeworthy in him, if inſtead of ſo painfully examining the arguments of the Ariſtotelians, he would have ſought for better proofs of the ſoul's immortality than ſuch as appeared weak to him. It is to be obſerved, that Arnauld produces this particular incident with regard to Des Cartes and Gaſſendus, to ſhew the wrong judgment of the Inquiſition of Rome. The

(59) Difficultez propoſées à Mr. Steyaert, part. 9. p. 81 & ſeq.

(60) Arnauld adds here a ſhort but excellent application of what he attempted to prove, &c.

them, to examine and give his opinion of them. The anſwer Pomponatius made to the objection, viz. that to inculcate the doctrine of the ſoul's mortality would prompt men to indulge in vices of every kind [H], is remarkable. I know not if we ought to believe (61) Difficultez propoſées à Mr. Steyaert, part. 9. p. 85.

The Licenſers of books at Rome, ſays he (61), had not a juſt regard to the advantage of religion, when they inſerted, in their Index, Des Cartes's work, in which he proves the ſoul's immortality by natural reaſons, in a more ſolid manner than ever was done before; and, at the ſame time have not put one of Gaſſendus's into it, even that wherein he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to deſtroy all thoſe proofs; which is to deprive thoſe, who have no faith, of every human method of diſengaging themſelves from the pernicious prejudices they entertain againſt that important truth. Is not this allowing them to ſwallow the poiſon, and preventing their taking an antidote? This they have likewiſe done by inſerting in their Index another piece of Des Cartes on the ſame ſubject: for one of his Diſciples, who had left him with regard to metaphyſical truths, having aſſerted, in a paper paſted up publickly, that were it not for revelation one might conclude that thought is only a modification of matter; Des Cartes thought it incumbent on him to refute this dangerous opinion, and ſhew its abſurdity: and yet this very book is prohibited in the Index, under the following title: Notæ in programma quoddam ſub finem anni 1654, in Belgio editum; though the paper paſted up is not mentioned there. Once again, is not this not to forbid a perſon to poiſon himſelf, and at the ſame time to forbid the taking an antidote?

I quoted, in the remark [C], an Author, whoſe cenſure of Pomponatius requires ſome reſtriction His words are as follow: "In which (62) it may "be ſaid that Pomponatius certainly carried things "too far, and countenanced too much the ſentiments "and inclinations of free-thinkers: we even cannot "forbear to charge him with being inſolent, when "he preſumes to ſay, that it is unworthy of a Chriſ-"tian to attempt to prove the ſoul's immortality by "philoſophical arguments; ſince, on the contrary, "nothing better prepares Heathens for receiving the "light of the Goſpel, than to firſt prove to them, "that reaſon teaches us that the ſoul is immortal; "and in conſequence of this, that men muſt endea-"vour to make themſelves happy after this life; "whereas, nothing would be a greater obſtacle to "the converſion of idolaters and free-thinkers, than "for them to believe according to the light of rea-"ſon, the ſoul muſt be mortal (63) . . . . (64). Here "follow the words (65), which were cenſured. It is "ſo far from being unworthy of a Chriſtian to en-"deavour to prove the ſoul's immortality by natural "reaſons, that nothing, on the contrary, confirms "him more in the truth of his religion, than when "philoſophical reaſons concur with the tenets of "faith, though the tenets of faith ought always to "be ranked firſt. I therefore was in the right to "affirm, that Pomponatius was guilty of inſolence, "in aſſerting that it is unworthy of a Chriſtian, to "ſeek for other reaſons, to prove the immortality of "the ſoul, than thoſe taken from revelation."

(62) i. e. By what Pomponatius ſays, that nothing can be more injurious to faith, than to attempt to prove it by natural reaſons.

(63) Le Noble, Tableaux des Philoſophes, Tom. 2. p. 84, 85.

(64) Ibid. p. 86.

(65) i. e. Thoſe in the rem. [C], above, at the end of the citation from le Noble.

EXAMINATION of le Noble's cenſure of Pomponatius.

I will hear examine this cenſure. Pomponatius's words, as they are couched in le Noble's book, may be taken in the following ſenſe; that a Chriſtian who endeavours to ſhew to unbelievers, that reaſon and ſcripture agree in teaching the immortality of the ſoul, does an injury to faith, and becomes unworthy of the name he bears. But in Pomponatius's book, I believe they ſignify, that a Chriſtian who has recourſe to any arguments but the authority of God, (becauſe he does not find that revelation, without the help of the light of nature, can remove his uncertainty) commits an inſult on revelation, and believes in a manner unworthy of the Chriſtian name. Such I conjecture to be the true ſenſe of that author's meaning. Not having his defenſes or apologies, I therefore am not able to be poſitive about it, and muſt therefore only be content with probability. What was the ſtate of the queſtion between him and his antagoniſts? It was to know whether he deſired to be looked upon as an heretic and an impious man, for having aſſerted that the philoſophical arguments in favour of the ſoul's immortality are not valid proofs; and that this doctrine can be proved only by revelation. The queſtion therefore was not to know, what judgment we are to form on thoſe who endeavour to reclaim ſuch free-thinkers as are madly fond of Lucretius, and have the higheſt contempt for the word of God: the queſtion was not to know, whether thoſe who offer philoſophical reaſons to thoſe pretended free-thinkers, and who endeavour by that way, (the only one that can work upon them) to bring them out of the ſnares of irreligion, do any thing injurious to the faith, and make themſelves altogether unworthy of the Chriſtian name. The queſtion was about ſuch Chriſtians as have recourſe to the light of nature for their own uſe, and to remedy their perſonal wants; a wavering ſet of people, and who know not which ought to be preferred, revelation or reaſon; who at leaſt do not rely on God's authority, unleſs it be confirmed by philoſophical arguments. To ſay that ſuch people act injuriouſly with regard to revelation, and do not behave as Chriſtians, is certainly to form a reaſonable judgment of them, and does not deſerve the cenſure which I examine in this place; for theſe perſons, ſtrictly ſpeaking, are not yet Chriſtians; they are as yet undetermined; they offer to believe the doctrine of paradiſe and hell, provided better proofs are given them than the Goſpel. They are not ſatisfied with God's authority; they require to have the promiſes of ſcripture ratified by the light of nature, otherwiſe they give no credit to them. In caſe the matter ſtands as I imagine it does, all my readers will own that Pomponatius has been unjuſtly cenſured; but the cenſure would be juſt, on the firſt ſenſe abovementioned.

I do not deny, but that he might have been told, that he was not a fit man to convert thoſe who believe the mortality of the ſoul, and who conſider the Goſpel no otherwiſe than as a human compoſition; and therefore his philoſophy had not the ſame advantage as that of his adverſaries. Had he been ſincere, he would have owned this; and have owned that, unleſs he imitated thoſe phyſicians, who, to prevail on their patients to take a doſe, aſcribe more virtues to it than they know it to have, he could not have maintained to unbelievers, that the mortality of the ſoul is certainly contrary to the reaſons which philoſophy furniſhes. He perhaps could not have diſapproved the charitable behaviour of ſuch Philoſophers as ſhould imitate thoſe Phyſicians; he would have contented himſelf with ſaying, that he was rather for a perfect ſincerity; but after all, he might have obſerved to his adverſaries, that with reſpect to the reſurrection and ſeveral others, they ſhould be obliged to deal with unbelievers, as he would have dealt with them as to the doctrine of the ſoul's immortality.

[H] To inculcate the doctrine of the ſoul's mortality, would prompt men to indulge in vices of every kind.] It is the laſt objection, which Pomponatius ſtarted to himſelf. He anſwers (66), that ſince mankind have naturally a love for happineſs, and bear a hatred to miſery, it is ſufficient, in order for the making an honeſt man, to ſhew him that the felicity of life conſiſts in practiſing virtue, and miſery in practiſing vice. He adds, that thoſe, who teach the doctrine of the ſoul's mortality, open a way for the attaining the moſt perfect virtue, which is that whoſe aim or view is not the meeting with a reward, or the eſcaping puniſhment. Quare perfectius aſſerentes animam mortalem melius videntur ſalvare rationem virtutis quàm aſſerentes ipſam immortalem, ſpes namque præmii, & pœnæ timor, videntur ſervilitatem quandam importare, quæ rationi virtutis contrariatur (67). He ſays alſo that the doctrine of the ſoul's immortality ought to be propoſed to perſons of a brutal caſt of mind: and that probably ſome Authors taught that tenet, though they themſelves did not believe it, and did this in the view of checking the ſenſual inclination of that kind of men. Exiſtimandum eſt multos viros ſenſiſſe animam mortalem, qui tamen ſcripſerunt ipſam eſſe immortalem: ſed hoc feciſſe ex pronitate virorum ad malum, believe what is asserted by some Authors, that the work in question was sentenced to the flames by the Venetians, and disowned by its Author [I]. The boldness and prepossession of a Lutheran Civilian is inexcusable [K], in his asserting that our Philosopher used to read publick Lectures against the soul's immortality; and that he was an infamous malum, qui parùm, aut nihil habent de intellectu, bonaque animi non cognoscentes, nec amantes, tantùm corporalibus incumbunt: Quare hujusmodi ingeniis necesse est eos sanare, sicut & medicus ad ægrum, & nutrix ad puerum ratione carentem se habent (68). But these several remarks do not remove the difficulty, and are very poor solutions. Now here follows a more rational reflection, it being grounded upon experience. He says, that a great number of knaves and wicked wretches believe in the immortality of the soul, and that many holy and just people do not believe in it (69). Neque universaliter viri impuri ponunt mortalitatem, neque universaliter temperati immortalitatem Nam manifestè videmus multos pravos homines credere, verùm ex passionibus seduci, multos etiam viros sanctos & justos scimus mortalitatem animarum posuisse. Plato namque 1. de repub. dicit Simonidem Poëtam virum divinum & optimum fuisse, qui tamen eam mortalem asseverat: Homerus quoque, ut Aristoteles 2. de anima refert, existimavit sensum ab intellectu non differre: quæ autem fuerit Homeri dignitas quis ignorat? Hippoc. quoque & Galen. viri doctissimi & optimi hujus perhibentur opinionis: Alexander Aphrodisæus, magnus Alsarabius, Abubacher, Avempace, ex nostratibus quoque Plinius Secundus, Seneca, innumerique alii hoc sensere; Seneca namque lib. 7. Epistolarum ad Lucilium epist. 54. quæ incipit, longum mihi comitatum dederat mala valetudo, manifestiusque in de consolatione ad Martiam affirmat ipsam esse mortalem: multosque alios studiosos & viros doctissimos (70) connumerat ejusdem opinionis fuisse. i. e. "Nor "do all the vicious in general firmly believe the soul "to be mortal, nor are all the virtuous persuaded of "its immortality: for we manifestly see that many "wicked men believe the latter, but are led away "by their passions; and on the other side, we know "that many holy and just men have believed the "soul to be mortal. For Plato tells us, in the first "book of his Commonwealth, that Simonides the "Poet, though a Divine and a most excellent man, "did nevertheless affirm that the soul is mortal. "Homer also, as we are told by Aristotle in his "second book on the soul, was of opinion that sen-"sation did not differ from understanding; and who "does not know how great a man Homer was? Those "very learned men, Hippocrates and Galen, were "of the same opinion: as were also Alexander "Aphrodisæus, the great Alfarabius, Abubacher, "Avempace; and among our countrymen, Plinius "Secundus, Seneca, and numberless others: Seneca, "in the seventh book of his epistles, epistle 54, to "Lucilius, which begins in the following manner, "Longum mihi comitatum dederat mala valetudo; and "he affirms still more clearly, that the soul is mor-"tal, in his consolatory address to Martia; and enu-"merates many studious and learned men, who en-"tertained the same opinion."

(66) Pomponat. de Immortal. Animæ, cap. 14. p. 120.

(67) Idem, ibid. p. 121.

(68) Pomponat. de Immortal. Animæ, cap. 14. p. 120.

(69) Idem, ibid. p. 119.

(70) It is certain that Seneca evidently supposes the soul's immortality in these two places; but I did not observe that he gives a catalogue of those who entertain that opinion.

[I] I know not . . . . whether the work in question was sentenced to the flames by the Venetians, and disowned by its Author.] This is asserted by Theophilus Raynaud. Venetos illud opus addixisse ignibus nec de immortalitate sed de mortalitate animæ fuisse inscribendum tradit Sylvester, lib. 5. de Strigimagis, cap. 5. expostulans quod à se approbatum eum librum dixisset Pomponatius, quod negat se unquam cogitasse (71). i. e. "Sylvester relates in his treatise De Strigimagis, book "5. chap. 5. that the Venetians sentenced the book "in question to the flames; and that the proper title "of it would have been, not of the immortality of the "soul, but the mortality of the soul; and complains of "Pomponatius for affirming that he gave his appro-"bation to that book, which he declares he never "intended." He had just before declared, that it is pretended Pomponatius himself condemned his book; but that people differ with regard to the motives which prompted him to it, some ascribing it to a desire he had of skreening his reputation; others, that he did it in compliance with the intreaties of his friends; and others again, from a principle of conscience, his mind being better enlightened. Pomponatius, mutata mente, opus suum de eo argumento improbasse dicitur, variantibus sententiis, an id amicorum precibus dederit, an famæ suæ ac nomini caverit, an ex animo audierit Ecclesiam, & palinodiam cecinerit, ut conscientiæ faceret satis (72). He had just before said also, that all books, which assert, that it is not possible to prove the immortality of the soul by natural reasons, ought to be condemned; he affirming, that they make way for an absolute denial of its immortality. He is much less equitable in this assertion, than where he acknowledged before, that the Philosophers, whom a Bishop of Paris condemned in 1227, and who were condemned just before, under Leo X. by the Council of Lateran, were not so absurd as to maintain, that the soul, absolutely speaking, is mortal and immortal; immortal according to divinity, and mortal according to philosophy. He explains the true sense of their doctrine; they admitting absolutely the immortality of the soul on account of Revelation, and otherwise would have thought it mortal. Animam ergo absolutè videntur agnovisse immortalem, quòd ita apertè ferant fidei scita; quamvis nisi de animæ rationalis perpetuatione fide docerentur, solaque naturali ratione consulta, negaturi fuissent immortalitatem. This he acknowledges partially in favour of Pomponatius, and cites a book in which this restriction is proved. It is that which Cardinal Contareni, this Philosopher's disciple, wrote against his master. Non absolutè ac simpliciter, mortalem animam censuisse videtur (Pomponatius) sed duntaxat si ratio nuda consuleretur, ut liquet ex opere Contareni Cardinalis, de immortalitate, conscripto adversùs Pomponatium, ipsius quondam Contareni in Philosophicis Magistrum. Nec aliud censuerim voluisse illos ejusdem ævi Philosophastros, damnatos à Lateranensi Consilio sub Leone X. & alios longè antè à Stephano Parisiensi Episcopo, anno 1277. vel potius 1227. in rescripto quod extat, tomo 5. Bibl. Margarini, pag. 1319. æque damnatos, quòd assererent, animam rationalem, secundum fidem esse immortalem; at secundum Philosophiam, esse mortalem (74). Boccalini, according to his usual custom, jests on this distinction of Pomponatius. He supposes, 1. That this impious man being sentenced to the flames by Apollo, protested that he believed the doctrine of the soul's mortality, only as a Philosopher. 2. That Apollo, having a regard to that protestation, bid the executioner burn him only as a Philosopher (75).

(71) Theophil. Raynaudus, de malis & bonis Libris, num. 43. p. m. 26.

(72) Idem, ibid.

(73) Jure libri ob doctrinæ reprobæ fermento vitiati, suffixione digni sunt habiti. Idem, ibid.

(74) Idem, ibid. num. 42. p. 25, 26.

(75) Boccalin. Ragguagli di Parnaso, centur. 1. cap. 90. p. m. 306.

The reader has seen above (76) the treatment which his book met with, and that it was not burnt.

(76) Rem. [C], citat. (28).

[K] The boldness and prepossession of a Lutheran Civilian is inexcusable.] His name is Godelmannus, and his words are as follow. Petrus Pomponatius Mantuanus philosophus & Epicureismi defensor magusque nefarius, in Academiis Italiæ publicè contra animæ immortalitatem disputavit: scripsit de fato & de incantatione libros, in quibus de verborum magicorum, imaginum, characterum, & imaginationis occulta potestate impie satis disputavit (77). i. e. "Peter Pomponatius, a Philosopher of "Mantua, a stickler for the Doctrine of Epicurus, "a wicked Necromancer, disputed publickly in the "Universities of Italy, against the doctrine of the "soul's immortality: he wrote some books concern-"ing Fate and Necromancy, wherein he disputes im-"piously concerning the occult virtue or power of "magical words, images, characters, and imagina-"tion." 1st. It is false to assert that Pomponatius disputed publickly against the immortality of the soul, in the Universities of Italy. He cannot be charged with this but by virtue of the sophism, à dicto secundum quid ad dictum simpliciter. i. e. "The under-"standing what is meant in a particular sense, in a "general one." He asserted that the hypothesis of Aristotle did not furnish any proof of the soul's immortality; and he opposed all the arguments of those who attempt to prove, by this Philosopher's doctrine, that our soul is immortal; but then he did not assert the mortality of the soul simply and absolutely. It is therefore evident, that this Lutheran Civilian was neither just nor equitable. 2d, A good Writer would never infamous Magician who vented certain impious particulars concerning the occult virtue of ſorcery and of the imagination. By the way, he uſed to apply himſelf to the ſolution of difficulties ſo very intenſely, that he never once thought of ſleeping, eating, drinking, or ſpitting. It made him almoſt diſtracted, and a laughing-ſtock to every one. He himſelf tells us this [L].

(77) Godelmannus, lib. 1. cap. 8. de Magis apud Joh. Christian. Frommannum de Fascinatione, lib. 1. part. 2. sect. 3. cap. 2. p. m 327.

(k) See the beginning of the rem. [I].

Since the firſt edition of this article, I have ſeen, in the work cited by Theophilus Raynaud (k), that Sylveſter Prierias really affirms, that Pomponatius's book was burnt in Venice (l). He adds that, could he have had his will, all nations would have treated his pernicious work in the ſame manner as the Venetians did. He had refuted Pomponatius's opinion before it was printed; but as his work had not then appeared in publick, he inſerted it in a work quoted by Theophilus Raynaud. He publiſhed it in 1521. He obſerves that two Friers had wrote with great ſolidity againſt Pomponatius's treatiſe. The name of the one was Bartholomew of Piſa, and the other Jerom Fornarius Bachalarius. This by way of Supplement (m).

(l) Silveſt. Prierias de Strigimagarum, Dæmonumque mirandis, lib. 1. (and not lib. 5. as Theop. Raynaud cites, the book being divided only into three books) cap. 5. p. 19. edit. Rom. 1575, 4to.

(m) Vide the rem. [B] and [C].

never aſſert, that Pomponatius, a notorius Magician, denied the doctrine of the ſoul's immortality. Mankind are ſo much perſuaded in general, that if there are Demons or Devils, the ſoul muſt neceſſarily be immortal, and commonly ſuppoſe ſo great a connexion between theſe two tenets, that none but a madman will ever charge a perſon with adhering to the doctrine of Epicurus, and believing in magic, without making ſome reflections on this paradox. He muſt expect that his Readers will be ſurprized at them; muſt believe that they will underſtand nothing in this connexion, but will quite puzzle and confound them. An Author who does not foreſee this muſt be quite ſtupid; and if he foreſees it, and does not attempt to clear up this vaſt difficulty, he ſcarce knows what he is about. Hence it may be concluded, that Godelmannus deſerved to be ſtrongly cenſured. 3d. He refutes himſelf; for he complains of a tract of Pomponatius, in which all the effects that are aſcribed to magic, or ſome other compact with the Devil, are aſcribed to other cauſes. Thus this Author, in the ſame period, charges Pomponatius with being a Magician, and of writing a book againſt magic. An Author who writes in this manner is inexcuſable for not taking an obſervation like the following: Pomponatius was a cheat, for he believed in magic, and practiſed it, and yet he refuted it in his books, to prevent his being reputed a Magician.

[L] He himſelf tells us this.] Not being able to reconcile ſome maxims of Ariſtotle, with our free-will, he cries out, this is what vexes me, hinders me from ſleeping, and makes me diſtracted. Iſta ſunt quæ me premunt, quæ me anguſtiant, quæ me inſomnem & inſanum reddunt (78). He ſays that, like a ſecond Prometheus, chained on mount Caucaſus, he is tortured with continual uneaſineſs; and can never eat, drink, ſleep, &c. and is become the laughing-ſtock of every body. Perpetuis curis & cogitationibus rodi, non ſitire, non fameſcere, non dormire, non comedere, non expuere, ab omnibus irrideri (79). He would better deſerve a pardon, were the ſubject of his anguiſh leſs blameable; but to ſee a man torturing himſelf to reconcile another man with reaſon, is quite inexcuſable. Should a Divine endeavour, at the hazard of his health, and even of his life, to reconcile the ſcripture and truth when they ſeem to diſagree, ſuch an attempt is laudable and heroical; for as there is ſuch an agreement, it may be preſumed that he will diſcover it. But can ſuch hopes be entertained with regard to the ſentiments of a particular perſon, who is liable to err, and who ſwallows it down as greedily as fiſhes do water?

(78) Pomponat. de Fato, lib. 3. cap. 7.

(79) Idem, ibid.

PONCET (MAURICE), Doctor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Paris (a), a Benedictine Monk of the Abby of St. Peter at Melun his native place, and Curate of St. ASPAIS in the ſame city, and then of St. Peter des Arſis at Paris (b), was one of the celebrated Preachers in the 16th Century. He preached with all the boldneſs imaginable againſt the vices which prevailed at the Court of Henry III. We have obſerved in another place (c), that he was conducted to Melun, becauſe of the invective he delivered from the pulpit March the 26th 1583, againſt the new fraternity of penitents eſtabliſhed by that Monarch. The paſſage which I have tranſcribed from Peter Matthieu is to be met with word for word in the Journal of Henry III. with the anſwer which you will find hereunder, and which Poncet is ſaid to have made to the Duke of Epernon [A]. Others pretend it was made to the Duke of Joyeuſe at another time (d) [B], which to

(a) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Biblioth. Franc. p. 862.

(b) Roulliard, Antiquez de Melun, p. 627.

(c) In the rem. [O] of the art. HENRY III.

(d) At the time of the Duke of Joyeuſe's wedding, in the year 1581.

[A] The anſwer . . . . which Poncet is ſaid to have made to the Duke of Epernon.] Poncet being arreſted, that Duke went to ſee him, " and with a ſmile, ſaid " to him, Well, our Maſter, they ſay that you make " people laugh, who come to hear your ſermons; " this is not very well done; a Preacher like you " ought to preach with a deſign to edify, and not " to make men merry. Sir, anſwered Poncet, without being daunted in the leaſt, I would have you to " know, that I preach only the word of God, and " that none come to my ſermons in order to laugh, " unleſs they be wicked men or Atheiſts. And indeed I never made ſo many perſons laugh, as you " have made men ſhed tears. A bold anſwer for a " Monk, to a Lord of the Duke of Epernon's quality; and it was indeed judged to be very much to " the purpoſe, conſidering the time when it was " made (1)."

(1) Journal de Henri III. under the year 1583. p. m. 67. See alſo Pierre Matthieu, des derniers Troubles, p. 15.

[B] . . . . Others pretend it was made to the Duke of Joyeuſe at another time.] Here follows a paſſage in which Monſieur le Laboureur relates that fact, to which he adds a Reflection which is not leſs ſmart, than the Benedictine's repartee. " There were at " that time (2), ſome Preachers who ſpoke pretty " freely in their ſermons, and who in the number of " crimes reckoned the cruel or licentious maxims of " the Politicians. Doctor Poncet, among others, an " eloquent and very zealous man, was bold enough " to think that Kings and great men were within " the province of his Miſſion; and the Sieur de " Brantome obſerves of him, that once he grew ſo " warm about that maxim, he who cannot diſſemble, " cannot reign, that he did not ſcruple to aſſert, that " ſuch a maxim was downright Atheiſm, which " would carry Kings and Princes directly to the Devil, " and make them perfect tyrants. He was, adds the " ſame Brantome, as bold a Preacher as ever got into " the pulpit. And it happened once, that Monſieur de " Joyeuſe, at the time of the great expence, pomp and " magnificence of his nuptials, met him in the ſtreet and " told him, Monſieur Poncet, I never knew you before " this time, and I am very glad to meet you, for I heard " of you, and I have been told how well you knew " to make people laugh, when you preach. He anſwered " with as much moderation as the other had ſpoken with " paſſion, Sir, it is but reaſonable that I ſhould make " them laugh, ſince you make them weep ſo much, by the " ſubſidies, and the other great expences of your fine " wedding, which the people groan under upon your " account. Monſieur de Joyeuſe was obliged to with- " draw, though he had a great mind to ſtrike him; but " if he had touched him ever ſo little, the people, who " are to me ſeems more probable [C]. Poncet feared leſt they ſhould carry him to the Caſtle of Loches as they had threatned to do ſome time before (e). He was therefore very well pleaſed when they only confined him in the Abby of St. Peter at Melun. His misfortune did not continue long, he got leave to return to Paris, and to ſerve his Pariſh of St. Peter des Arſis; but he abated nothing of his antient liberty of preaching, and continued till his death in that firm reſolution (f). He died November the 23d 1586 (g). He publiſhed ſome works [D], and it is very probable that his manner of preaching had ſomething in it of that burleſque [E], which rendered little Father André ſo famous in the next Century.

(2) That is, under the reign of Henry III.

(e) Roull. Antiquitez de Melun, p. 627.

(f) Idem, ibid. p. 628.

(g) Ibidem.

I add that the Bernardine Monk, Peter de Saint Romuald, has commended him very much for an action which deſerves no commendation at all. It was his adviſing not to tranſlate the holy Scripture into vulgar tongues [F]. The book he wrote upon that ſubject is very deſpicable, if we may depend upon Monſieur Arnauld's authority [G].

PONTIUS

" are ſtubborn and zealous for their licentious Preachers, " whom they naturally love when they talk freely, began " to flock together, and would have played him and his " attendants ſome ugly trick, for Poncet was very much " beloved at Paris. Here is a ſmart reply, which is " worth more than a Biſhoprick in hiſtory, and by " which the Duke of Joyeuſe might learn, that a " Prieſt who is an honeſt man, and who values " the good of the publick above his own private " intereſt, is an unruly horſe, who far from being " dazzled by the ſplendor of greatneſs, is rendered " more fierce by it, and muſt not be approached but " with caution, leſt he ſhould kick. That anſwer " made every one merry, and the Duke's friend did " not pity him, without blaming him alſo for thus " venturing himſelf in the ſtreet with a mere Mi- " niſter, when he had ſo many men at his devotion, " who had fat livings, and who would have looked " upon it as an honour to be ridiculed by him, from " whom they might have expected ſome farther " preferment (3)."

(3) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 58, 59.

[C]——Which to me ſeems more probable.] For it is agreed, that when he was arreſted he feared leſt they ſhould ſend him to Loches, according to the foregoing threatnings. Would that fear, which he confeſſed himſelf he was under (4), have ſuffered him to make ſuch a ſmart and diſobliging anſwer to his Prince's favourite? It is infinitely more probable that he made that anſwer, when he enjoined a perfect liberty in the open ſtreet, where he knew very well that the inhabitants of Paris would have openly defended him againſt any inſult that had been offered him. Let us therefore ſtick to Brantome's account, and obſerve by the by with how much inaccuracy the memory of ſuch events is preſerved, which produces afterwards the difference that is obſervable in the writings of the Hiſtorians.

(4) See the Antiquitez de Melun, p. 627.

[D] He publiſhed ſome works.] Three books of the Eccleſiaſtical Oration or Prayer, in the form of a contemplation, at Paris 1568 in 8vo. A remonſtrance to the Nobility of France, concerning the advantage and quiet which the King affords his people, and the inſtruction he ought to receive that he may govern as he ought to do, at Paris 1572 in 8vo. A Funeral Oration delivered the 31ſt of Auguſt 1574 in the Church of Brecy-le-Buiſſon, at the funeral of Meſſire Euſtachius de Conſtance, Viſcount of Aulchy, at Paris 1564 8vo. A diſcourſe of advice to Meſſire Peter de Gondy Biſhop of Paris, concerning a propoſal he made to the Divines about tranſlating the bible into the vulgar tongue, at Paris 1578 in 8vo. Familiar Meditations on the Hiſtory of the Incarnation, at Rheims 1574 in 8vo. (5).

(5) Extracted from Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Biblioth. Franç. p. 862.

[E] It is very probable that his manner of preaching had ſomething of the burleſque in it.] I have three reaſons to think ſo. 1. The expreſſions, which he uſed in the ſermon for which the King baniſhed him (6), have no gravity in them. That young and tender laſs, who was kept ready for the night's entertainment of the penitents, is a quite comical ſtyle. Secondly, it is unanimouſly reported, that the favourite, whoſe reproof Poncet anſwered ſo ſmartly, cenſured him for making his audience laugh. 3. Laſtly, the manner, in which his countryman and panegyriſt James Roulliard endeavours to ward off the blow, makes me think that he was to anſwer thoſe, who found it ſtrange that Poncet ſhould expreſs his thoughts in a jocoſe or bantering way. Beſides his learning and piety, which are acknowledged by all the world, thus ſpeaks Roulliard (7), he had the particular gift of preaching with a great deal of freedom againſt the vices of his time, making more account of the unqueſtionable truth of God's words, than of the threatenings of the great men, and the continual danger of his life. It is true that he uſed to expreſs himſelf with ſuch a grace, that what made unthinking people laugh as though it had been ridiculous, was by the wiſe aſcribed to a great art, by which this brave preacher uſed to render his ſevere reproofs more acceptable, and to ſupport himſelf the longer in his miniſterial functions, in which he was ſo uſeful to the Church. Whereas otherwiſe either the paſſionate courtier, or ſome other perſon of this ſilly world would have attempted to ruin him at once. You ſee very plainly, that that apologiſt does not dare to deny that people laughed when his Poncet preached. Can it then be queſtioned that his ſermons ſavoured a little of the burleſque? If he had boldly cenſured the diſorders of the Court, but in a grave manner, he would indeed have pleaſed his audience very much, but yet he would have made no man laugh.

(6) See above, quotat. (68), of the art. HENRY III.

(7) In p. 627, of his Antiquez de Melun.

[F] Peter de S. Romuald commends him for ..... adviſing not to tranſlate the holy ſcripture into vulgar tongues.] This Bernardine Monk, who extolls him upon that account, admires chiefly the argument grounded on the ill uſe that can be made of the ſcripture, of which he gives two inſtances which are very ſtrange. " Maurice Poncet, ſays he (8), was highly " eſteemed in his time for his deep learning, his emi- " nent piety, and the remarkable zeal, with which " he reproved vice, not only in his fervent ſer- " mons, but alſo in his writings againſt the Free- " thinkers, and the Hereticks, as appears chiefly by " the advice he gave the illuſtrious Peter de Gondy " Biſhop of Paris, concerning the tranſlating of the " holy Bible into the vulgar tongue; aſſerting that " it was not to be permitted, for ſeveral weighty " reaſons, and among others, in order to avoid the " danger to which the ſcripture would be expoſed of " being refuted and deſpiſed, becauſe of the ambi- " guity, obſcurity, and various expreſſions which oc- " cur in every language, which might furniſh wick- " ed or ignorant perſons with an opportunity to ruin " themſelves, as it happened in the laſt Century to " a painter in Pruſſia, who having bought a bible " tranſlated into the German tongue by Luther, and " read what Lot had done with his daughters, did " the ſame with his own: and as it was alſo the " caſe of a woman of the city of Munſter, when " that city was beſieged by the Biſhop, who is alſo " the temporal Lord of it: that woman having read " the ſtory of Judith tranſlated into her own lan- " guage, took it into her head to go and kill that " Biſhop, in order to deliver from the danger of " death thoſe of her Sect who had made themſelves " maſters of the city: but ſhe was taken, and found at " the expence of her own life, that the letter of the " holy ſcripture killeth, and that the ſpirit giveth life *." (8) Pierre de S. Romuald, Journal Chronolog. under the 23d of November, p. 575, 576.

[G] ..... The book he wrote upon that ſubject is very deſpicable, if we may depend upon Monſieur Arnauld's authority.] We have ſeen in another place (9), what his opinion was concerning a book wrote by Peter Lizet. He had no better opinion of our Maurice's work for ſpeaking of the collection, entitled, Collectio

* 2 Cor. iii. 6.

(9) In the rem. [B] of the art. LIZET.

PONTIUS (CONSTANTINE), burnt in effigy at Seville in 1559, was called Conſtantine de la Fuente, in Latin Conſtantinus Fontius. Some perſon having miſtaken a P inſtead of an F, that Doctor is much better known by the name of Conſtantinus Pontius [A], which is not his name, than by his true one. However this be, he was a man of great merit, Doctor of Divinity, Canon of Seville, and Preacher to Charles V. (a). He followed Philip III. into England, which doubtleſs was the cauſe why he imbibed the doctrine of the Proteſtants, for which he was ſeized by the Inquiſition, and ſentenced to die; but did not live till the Auto de fé, on which he was to have been publickly executed. The Spaniſh Hiſtorians generally ſay that he laid violent hands on himſelf, but others ſay that he was ſnatched away by ſickneſs; but all writers agree, that the Inquiſition exhibited an effigy that repreſented him, and which was burnt on the day of the Auto de fé (b). Several affirm that he was Confeſſor to Charles V. that he attended him when on his death-bed, and till he breathed his laſt; but we have ſhewn above (c), that he was only his preacher, and that he was impriſoned before that Emperor died. He wrote ſome books [B], which the Spaniſh Inquiſition inſerted, without exception, in their catalogue of prohibited books (d). He is mentioned in the martyrology of the Proteſtants [C].

(a) Nicol. Antonio, Bibliotb. Scriptor. Hiſpan. Tom. 1. p. 196.

(b) See Nicol. Antonio, ibid.

(c) Remark [C] of the article CARRANZA, and rem. [S], num. 1. of the art. CHARLES V.

(d) Conſtantino de la Fuente Autor condenado: todas ſus obras en qualquier lengua, y eſpecialmente la Confeſſion del Pecador, Ind. lib. prohib. p. m. 229.

Beza, lectio quorumdam gravium Authorum, qui ex profeſſo vel ex occaſione ſacræ Scripturæ, aut divinorum officiorum in vulgarem linguam tranſlationes damnarunt (10). i. e. "A collection of ſome grave Authors, "who have either occaſionally or expreſly condemned "the tranſlation of the bible, or of the Church "Liturgies into vulgar tongues:" Speaking, I ſay, of that collection, he obſerves, that "it is a mere "rhapſody of the moſt impertinent Authors who "wrote upon that ſubject, mixed with a few good "ones. . . . . It contains a book of the Preſident "Lizet. . . . . The writing of a Dominican Frier "who was Inquiſitor at Toulouſe (11). . . . . The "remonſtrance of brother Maurice Poncet . . . . the "bare title of which is enough to ſhew what may be "expected from it (12). DISCOURS DE L'AVIS donné à R. Pere en Dieu Meſſire Pierre de Gondy Evéque "de Paris. Par Frere Maurice Poncet, Docteur en "Theologie. i. e. "A diſcourſe of advice given to the "R. Father in God, Peter de Gondy, Biſhop of Paris, "by brother Maurice Poncet, Doctor of Divinity; who, "as we have obſerved already, urges as one of the "ſtrongeſt reaſons why the bible ought not to be tranſlated into French, that the French tongue is a "barbarous language, which cannot be ſubjected to "any rules of grammar (13). . . . . How will the "Archbiſhop of Paris, who has done the French "Academy the honour to be one of his members, "be able to maintain, that it was well done to publiſh at this time ſo ridiculous a judgment of the "moſt beautiful language in Europe (14)?"

(10) It was printed at the expence of the Clergy in the year 1660.

(11) Arnauld, Defenſe des Verſions, p. 160, 161.

(12) Ibidem, p. 162.

(13) Ibidem, p. 162.

(14) Ibidem, p. 162.

[A] By the name of Conſtantinus Pontius.] So he is called by Thuanus. Father Paul (1) calls him alſo by the ſame name, and was not cenſured for it by Pallavicino, though he took notice of ſome errors ccommitted with regard to our Spaniard. See the remark [C] of the article CARRANZA; and the remark [S] of the article CHARLES V. Num. I.

(1) Hiſt. du Concile de Trente, lib. 5. p. 426. edit. 1629, 4to.

[B] He wrote ſome books.] A ſummary of the Chriſtian Doctrine, printed in Spaniſh at Antwerp. Six Sermons on the firſt Pſalm of David, printed in the ſame tongue, and in the ſame city, anno 1556 (2). A Catechiſm at large. The Confeſſion of a Sinner. Commentaries on Solomon's Proverbs, on Eccleſiaſtes, on Solomon's Song, and on Job. Don Nicholas Antonio (3) ſeems to think, that theſe Sermons were not made on the firſt Pſalm, but the fiftieth; and that they are the ſame with the confeſſion of a ſinner. However, he is miſtaken, for this confeſſion is a prayer not quite ſo long as a Sermon. It is in the book of martyrs (4).

(2) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri.

(3) Bibl. Script. Hiſp. Tom. 1. p. 196.

(4) Book 8. fol. 507 verſo, & ſeq.

[C] He is mentioned in the martyrology of the Proteſtants.] We there find that Egidius, Conſtantine Fontius, and Varquias, were the firſt who, about the ſame time, diſcovered, or revealed, the darkneſs with which Spain was overſpread (5). They are called the three pillars of truth. They preached in Seville with great zeal and ſucceſs. Egidius was promoted, by Charles V. to the Biſhoprick of Tortona (6); but the Inquiſition was ſo much offended at it, that they proſecuted him with great ſeverity, and during a long time, to prevent his promotion to that See. Whilſt this proſecution was carrying on, Fontius was in the Netherlands, Preacher and Confeſſor (7) of Charles V. Returning to Seville after Egidius's death, "he reſumed his "wonted employment with great courage; and the "affection, which the people had before diſcovered "for him, and for his preaching, was no ways leſſened. Notwithſtanding the weakneſs of his body, "he nevertheleſs diſcharged the duties of his employment; invigorating himſelf with the uſual "remedies which God diſpenſes, to reſtore the body "to its ſtrength and health. He had ſeveral encounters with the Prieſts and Monks, and with "Waldeſſo Archbiſhop of Seville, Preſident of the "Conclave of the Inquiſition. And notwithſtanding that his adverſaries were ſtrongly animated againſt him, yet he ſo dexterouſly warded off all their "blows, that they could not prevail with him to "make an open confeſſion of his faith, in order to "get the better hold of him. But at laſt God forced "from him, in the following manner, an entire "declaration of his truth; putting a ſtop to all his "ſubtilties and ſhifts, which he had employed in oppoſition to his conſcience (8). The diſcovery was "made, by his prohibited books falling into the "hands of the Inquiſition, though he employed the "utmoſt endeavours to conceal them. They found "many other books, a large one written with his own "hand, in which he treated of the following doctrines, "as the Inquiſitors declared by their ſentence, which "was publickly pronounced, viz. of the State of "the Church, of the true Church, and that of the "Pope, whom he called Antichriſt: of the Sacrament of the Euchariſt, and the invention of the "Maſs, with which he ſaid the world was bewitched, becauſe of their ignorance of the ſacred writings: of man's juſtification; of purgatory, which "he called a wolf's head, and a monkiſh invention "to fill the belly: of bulls and the Pope's indulgences; of the merit of good works; of confeſſion; and ſeveral other points. This book being ſeen and produced, the Inquiſitors aſking whether it was his own hand-writing, he anſwered "them roundly, that the whole was his hand-writing, and the contents of it true. He ſaid to "them, give yourſelves no farther trouble in ſeeking for witneſſes againſt me; you have a full declaration of my faith, and therefore diſpoſe of me "as you pleaſe. He was afterwards kept in priſon "two years together, where he fell ſick, through "the ill treatment he met with (though he little "valued his having bad diet) and of the great grief "which the diſperſion of his Church brought upon "him; and alſo becauſe the burning rays of the ſun "made his priſon as hot as a furnace; ſo that at "laſt a looſeneſs, attended with the gripes, brought "him to his end, and winged his vertuous ſoul to the "Lord. . . . . They ſpread reports, that he had laid "violent hands on himſelf; he opening a vein with "a piece of broken glaſs, to avoid the ignominious "death prepared for him. Children likewiſe, after "his death, ſung ſongs on that ſubject, which were "written by the baſe agents of the Inquiſition. On "the day appointed for the triumph, his dead body "was dug up, covered with ſtraw, as though it had "been

(5) Hiſt. des Martyrs, liv. 8. folio 505 verſo, edit. of 1582, folio.

(6) It ſhould be Tortoſa. See art. CHARLES V. rem. [S], num. 2.

(7) The Spaniſh Hiſtorians declare that he was not his Confeſſor. See the rem. [S], num. 1. of the article CHARLES V.

(8) Hiſt. des Martyrs, folio 506 verſo.

Beza, who called him Conſtantinus Pontius, and ſays that he was many years Confeſſor to Charles V. and that he was burnt in Seville (e); did not recollect exactly the circumſtances which he had read in that martyrology. I have read a Latin diſcourſe containing the life and death of this Spaniard (f), and he is there called Conſtantinus Fontius. The editor of this diſcourſe declares it to have been writ by Reginaldus Gonſalvius Montanus Hiſpanus. It is there related that our Conſtantine had been pretty wild in his youth [D]; but that he afterwards reformed, and behaved extremely well: however, he did not leave off one thing, which was in ſome meaſure a fault, which was this; being of a very jovial temper, and maſter of the moſt lively wit, he took a little too much liberty in joking. A conſiderable number of his ſmart ſayings were in vogue. The Hypocrites and ſorry Preachers of that age were commonly the ſubject of his moſt ſatyrical touches. He taught himſelf in the utmoſt perfection, the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew tongues; and every part of learning requiſite to form a good preacher. He was admirably well ſkilled in all the beauties of his native language; and had ſo eloquent a talent in preaching, that he drew together a numberleſs multitude of auditors, inſomuch that people had ſcarce an opportunity of ſeating themſelves conveniently, tho' they went three or four hours before he came into the pulpit (g). He was quite free from avarice and ambition; refuſed a rich canonry that was offered him in Toledo, and could not forbear jeſting at the time that he refuſed it [E]. When after the death of Dr. Giles (b), he was appointed to preach in the Cathedral, he did it before he had recovered his health; but found himſelf ſo extremely weak in the middle of his ſermon, that he was

(e) Beza, in Icon. folio 90.

(f) It is the book entitled, Hiſpanicæ Inquiſitionis & Carnificinæ Secretiora, and publiſhed at Amberg, in 1611, per Joachimum Urſinum, Anti-Jeſuitam.

(g) Concionabatur ut plurimum octava hora, tantus erat populi concurſus, ut quarta, ſæpe etiam tertia noctis hora, vix in templo inveniretur commodus ad audiendum locus. Hiſpan. Inquiſit. Secret. p. 254.

(b) He is called Egidius in the rem. [C].

" been a ghoſt. It was then ſet in a chair, with one of " its hands lifted up, with the other on the chair, the " whole being as artificially contrived as poſſible (9)."

(9) Hiſt. des Martyrs, folio 507.

The Latin Author, whom I quote in the following remarks, acknowledges alſo that Fontius, by his ſubtile anſwers, eluded the proſecution of the Inquiſition; but that he at laſt gave over all his ſubterfuges and evaſions, when his manuſcript was ſhewn him. Raptus ad Inquiſitoriam arcem, etſi ex controverſiis præcedentibus omnium adverſariorum animos habebat vehementer exulceratos, tamen acutiſſimis ſuis reſponſis omnes eorum cavillos facilè, more ſuo, eludens, ad apertam fidei confeſſionem, ex qua periculum, ut ipſi exoptabant, crearetur, trahi non poterat: atque evaſiſſet tandem, ut ſæpè anteà, ipſorum manus, ni mirabili quodam Providentiæ ſuæ artificio rotundam confeſſionem veritatis ſuæ, Deus ab invito & modis omnibus tergiverſante extorſiſſet (10). . . . . Viſo hoc libro Conſtantinus interrogatus ab Inquiſitoribus, an propriam manum agnoſceret, quùm per multos dies, conquiſitis undique ſubterfugiis, conatus illorum eluſiſſit, agnoſcens porrò Dei voluntatem, quæ omnem tergiverſandi amplius occaſionem ſibi præcidiſſet, agnoſco (inquit) manum meam, ac proinde fateor, me iſta omnia ſcripſiſſe, quæ & vera eſſe ingenuè profiteor (11). i. e. " Being forced away by the Inquiſition, though " he had ſtrongly animated his enemies againſt him, " by his former diſputes; he nevertheleſs, by his very " ſubtile anſwers, eaſily eluded their cavils; and " could not be prevailed upon to make an open con- " feſſion of his faith, by which they hoped to have " the opportunity they had ſo long wiſhed for, of " ruining him. He even would, at laſt, as he had " frequently done, have got ſafe from them, if God, " through a ſurprizing turn of his providence, in " ſpite of all his perpetual evaſions, had not forced " from him an ample confeſſion of his faith. . . . . " This book being ſhewn to Conſtantine, and the " Inquiſitors aſking him whether he knew his own " hand writing; after he had eluded all their at- " tempts, during many days, by numberleſs eva- " ſions, perceiving now it was God's will that he " ſhould no longer employ ſubterfuges; I acknow- " ledge, (ſays he) my hand-writing; and confeſs " that all theſe particulars were written by me, and " I ſincerely believe they are all true."

(10) Hiſp. Inquiſit. Secretiora, p. m. 262.

(11) Ibid. p. 264.

[D] Our Conſtantine had been pretty wild in his youth.] The words of the Latin Author are as follow: Juventutem quidem tranſegit pro ſtudioſorum juvenum libera educatione non admodum laudatam, ſed quæ, quò minùs, quod ætatis ſubſequutum eſt, quàm laudatiſſimum extiteret, haud impedimento fuerit. Probatos enim ſatis mores, ut erat ingenio mirè feſtivo, & in jocis peracuto, una ſubinde jocandi licentia vel in provectiore ætate corrumpebat (12). i. e. " As a liberal education had " been beſtowed upon him, he did not ſpend his " youth very laudably; but this did not prevent his " paſſing the ſucceeding years in a manner worthy " of the higheſt commendation. However, being " of a very pleaſant diſpoſition, and maſter of a " great fund of raillery, he ſometimes, even in his " more advanced years, prejudiced the good charac- " ter he otherwiſe had, by his ſharp jeſts." Had he not been endued with ſhining talents, which expoſed him to envy, he perhaps would never have been accuſed for thoſe faults of his youth: but having acquired great reputation by his eloquence and learning, he could not eſcape cenſure. His friends perſuaded him to diſpute for a Canonry (13), in the Metropolitan Church of Seville; and he had a competitor, who took it into his head to raiſe perſonal objections to him; and who raked together very induſtriouſly all the ſchool-boys tricks that might reflect an odium upon him, and every thing in general that deſerved cenſure in his juvenile conduct; his marriage, and an irregularity with regard to ordination, &c. Competitor & eruditione & authoritate, & ipsâ demum gratiâ Capituli Conſtantino nullo modo comparandus, ad exceptiones perſonales conatus omnes convertens ſuſcitavit ei ineptias omnes juventutis ſuæ, contracta videlicet, antequam ſacris initiaretur, matrimonia, neque ritè ſacris initiatum, neque rectè atque ordine Magiſterii & Doctoratus inſignia accepiſſe (14). It were to be wiſhed that young perſons, who flatter themſelves with one day making a figure in the world, would remember ſuch examples. This would be a reſtraint to them they; would be afraid, in the midſt of their glory, of being upbraided with the follies of their youth. Such perſons as might excuſe thoſe faults, would ſay, at the ſame time, that it were better they had not wanted ſuch indulgence. This is a diſagreeable circumſtance, and a ſubject of mortification of which an enemy makes the greateſt advantage.

(12) Ibid. p. 253.

(13) Canonicatus Concionalis ſeu (ut vocant Magiſtralis. Ibid. p. 259.

(14) Ibid. p. 261.

[E] Could not forbear jeſting at the time that he refuſed it.] The chapter of Toledo ſent a deputation to him, by which he was deſired to accept the place of Preacher at the Metropolitan Church. Conſtantine replied, that he was greatly obliged to them for the honour they did him, and that he would endeavour to be grateful for it; but that he would do nothing that might diſturb the repoſe of his anceſtors. Cæterum parentum avorumque ſuorum oſſa ante multos annos ſepulta conquieſcere, ſe vero nolle quicquam admittere, occaſione cujus à ſancta illa quiete interturbarentur (15). To underſtand this jeſt, the reader is to know that, at this time, the chapter of Toledo had a great quarrel with the Archbiſhop Siliceus, a perſon of mean extraction, and who had been raiſed, by favour, to that exalted employment (16). The Prelate in queſtion uſed to perſecute the chief Canons, and diſgraced them publickly, upon pretence of their being deſcended from Jewiſh families (17). He cauſed ſuch enquiries to be made as were injurious to the memory of a great many perſons, who had been buried an hundred years before, and in that manner diſturbed the repoſe of the dead. Fontius's joke was forced to do a thing for which there was no precedent [F]. The director of the house of Doctrine, having there founded a theological lecture, our Constantine was raised to that employment, on which occasion he acquitted himself very well (i) [G]. The reader will find, in the remark [C], the catastrophe of his life; and in the last remark, a story he told to Cardan, concerning apparitions [H].

(15) Hiſp. Inquiſit. Secretiora, p. 255.

(16) Qui ex aratro & glebis, neque virtute, neque eruditione, ſed (ſi ita dici licet) fortunæ potius temeritate ad ſummam totius Hiſpaniæ, ſecundum regem ipſum, dignitatem convolarat. Ibid. p. 256.

(17) Ibid.

(i) Extracted from Hispan. Inquisit. Secretiora, p. 251 & seq.

joke hinted at that particular. Ea occasione neque à centum annis sepultis parcebatur, inquirente malo archiepiscopo, & quidem sub prætextu religionis, in parentes, avos, atavos canonicorum, eosque ad originum rationes pessimè è suis sepulchris revocante. Eas non minus impias quàm stultas contentiones, ex sua ipsius vocatione occasione arrepta, Constantinus tempestivè admodum illo conciso Laconismo perstringebat (18). The Reader will not be displeased to be informed, occasionally, of this part of Siliceus's history.

(18) Ibid. p. 256.

[F] He was forced to do a thing for which there was no precedent.] He ordered, once or twice, some wine and water to be brought him when in the pulpit, and drank a glass to recover his spirits. His auditors had so reverential an esteem for him, and he had acquired so great an authority over them, that they all excused this unprecedented action. Delatus in templum viribusque adeò exhaustus, ut in medio concionis filo uno atque altero limphati vini haustu vires ad pergendum in concione reficeret, novam neque unquam anteà visam licentiam summâ viri tum gratiâ, tum authoritate, quâ pollebat, excusante (19).

(19) Ibid. p. 258.

[G] He was appointed to read the theological lectures ... on which occasion he acquitted himself very well.] My Latin Author relates, that Pontius made admirable lectures on some of the books of scripture. I will quote his words, in order that the Reader may be the better informed of the circumstances of the compositions of this Protestant Spaniard. Accepit primò Solamonis libros, Proverbia, Ecclesiasten, & Cantica canticorum, atque his mirabili eruditione explicatis, librum Jobi est aggressus, quem ultra medium interpretando perduxit. Extant ipsius in hos libros prælectiones omnes manu scriptæ opera Bab. diligentissimi cujusdam ex auditoribus exceptæ, quas cum vulgaverimus, deprehenso quanto intervallo post se relinquat eos omnes, qui hactenus in eos libros quippiam ediderunt, de summa viri eruditione certius judicari poterit (20). i. e. "He first undertook "the books of Solomon, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, "and the Song of Songs, and having displayed great "learning in explaining them, he then set about the "book of Job, and went through above half of it. "All his lectures on the abovementioned books "are still extant, all writ by a very diligent hand, "as taken from some of his auditors. When these "shall be published, it will then appear how far he "surpasses all who ever wrote any thing upon the "books in question: and the better judgment may "be formed of the learning of this extraordinary "man." It hereby appears, that there was a design to publish this work, and it accordingly was published. See the remark [B].

(20) Idem, ibid.

[H] A story he told to Cardan concerning apparitions.] In case what Cardan relates is true, our Constantine spoke of Apparitions, not on hearsay, but as an eye-witness. "Vigebat olim in Hispania hæc ars (Necromantia) publicèque docebatur in Salamantica academia, nunc verò publicis legibus sublata est. Unde ibi aliqua adhuc artis experimenta supersunt. Narrabat mihi Don Constantinus Fontanus Hispanus theologus, & ab exomologesi Principis Philippi Hispaniarum, dum in Vagliadolit civitate Hispaniæ, in domo typographi, quæ male ob strepitus audiebat nocturnos, diversaretur, prima nocte incubum sensisse: sed cùm olivas nigras in cœna comedisset, naturale existimasse, cùm incubus inter morbos numeretur. Sequenti nocte super lecto videt auditque feles concertantes, quod quanquam durum videretur, quia tamen esse poterat, & hoc naturale esse duxit. Tertia autem nocte cùm nondum dormitum isset, de hisque dissereret, tubæ vocem quasi in aure audivit. Existimans sibili speciem esse, pueros videbat, qui ibi astabant ridentes: tum vox illa cubiculum circumire cœpit, perfectoque circuitu sub lecto se abdidit, ibi diu strepens, cùm nihil videretur (21). i. e. "The "art of Necromancy was formerly very much practised "in Spain, and was taught publickly in the University "of Salamanca; but it is now suppressed by the laws, "and some instances of it are still remaining in that "country. I was told by Don Constantine Pontanus, "a Spanish Divine, and Confessor to Philip King of "Spain, that whilst he (Constantine) lodged at a "Printer's house in Valladolid, which was reported to "be haunted in the night-time, he was troubled with "the Night-mare the first time he lay there: but "that having eaten black olives for supper, he "thought it to be a natural effect of that, as the "Night-mare is judged to be a disease. The night "after he saw and heard cats clawing one another on "the bed, and though this was a very disagreeable "spectacle, yet as such a thing might be, he like-"wise did not look upon it as supernatural. On the "third night, being not yet fallen asleep, and pon-"dering these several things, he heard, as it were, "a trumpet in his ear: imagining this to be a kind "of whistling, he saw a company of boys who stood "laughing there. Then that voice began to wind "about the room; and having gone quite round, "went under the bed, where it long resounded, tho' "nothing was to be seen all the time." What Cardan relates concerning the schools of magic, that had formerly been in Spain, was asserted by a Magician mentioned by Thuanus. See the article TIRESIAS, remark [K].

(21) Card. de Subtilit. lib. 19. p. 691. edit. Lugd. 1580. in 8vo.

☞ POOLE (MATTHEW), a very learned Writer in the 17th Century, was born in the city of York (a) in the year 1624 (b). He was son of Francis Poole, Esq; of that city; and his grandfather was descended of the antient family of the Pooles of Sprinkhill in Derbyshire; and being obliged to retire from thence on account of his inclination to the Reformation, he lived at Sike-house, and afterwards at Drax-Abbey in Yorkshire, near which place Mr. Matthew Poole had an estate of 100*l. per ann.* left him by his father, who married the daughter of Alderman Toppin of York (c). Our Author was educated at Emanuel College in Cambridge, under the learned Dr. Worthington, and took the Degree of Master of Arts (d), in which Degree he was incorporated in the University of Oxford, July the 14th 1657 (e). He succeeded Dr. Anthony Tuckney in the Rectory of St. Michael le Quern in London, about the year 1648 (f). In 1658 he set on foot a project for maintaining youths of great parts, studiousness, and piety, at the Universities [A], and had the approbation of the heads of houses in

(a) Calamy's Account of the Ministers, &c. ejected or silenced after the Restoration in 1660. vol. 2. p. 14. edit. 1713.

(b) He was in his 56th year, when he died in Octob. 1670. Calamy's Continuation of the Account, p. 15.

(c) Account, ubi supra.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Wood, Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 118. 2d edit.

(f) Dr. Calamy tells us, that he had continued in it about 14 years, when he was ejected in 1662. Continuation, ubi supra.

[A] In 1658 he set on foot a project for maintaining youths of great parts, studiousness and piety, at the Universities.] He gives an account of this design in the following piece: A Model for the maintaining of students of choice abilities at the University, and principally in order to the Ministry. Together with a Preface before it, and after it a Recommendation from the University; and two serious Exhortations recommended unto all the unfeigned lovers of piety and learning, and more particularly to those rich men, who desire to honour the Lord with their substance: 1658 in 4to. The Model is dated April 1 1658, and is as follows. 1. That a subscription be made. 2. That because subscriptions of this nature, though happily begun, have hitherto failed, lest it should happen so in this case (whereby the whole design would be frustrated, and youths in both of them, and ſolicited the affair with ſo much vigour, that in a ſhort time 900*l. per ann.* was procured for that purpoſe; but this deſign was laid aſide at the Reſtoration (g). He was ejected from his living for Non-Conformity on St. Bartholomew's Day 1662 (b). He was ten years employed in finiſhing his Synopſis Criticorum Bibliorum (i), the (i) Account, ubi ſupra.

(g) Account, ubi supra.
(b) Wood, ubi ſupra.

youths of excellent parts hopefully planted at the Univerſity forced to remove, beſides many other inconveniences) it is earneſtly deſired, that thoſe, whoſe eſtate will bear it, will ſubſcribe for eight years, or more, or for ever. 3. That the money collected be diſpoſed of by perſons choſen to be Truſtees, not exceeding the number of fifty, whereof thirty to be gentlemen or citizens of eminency, and twenty to be Miniſters in or within five miles of the city of London, of which number any ſeven to be a Quorum, whereof three to be Miniſters. And that theſe Truſtees do ſolemnly engage themſelves to proceed in all things without partiality, as they ſhall judge beſt for the publick good, and not be biaſſed by any favours or recommendations or reſpects whatſoever. And that when any Miniſter, who is a Truſtee dieth, or refuſeth to act further in the buſineſs, or removeth ten miles from the city of London, or by the reſt of the Truſtees is judged to deſerve diſmiſſion from this truſt, the reſt of the Truſtees, or any nine of them, (notice being given to the generality of the Truſtees of the meeting, and of the end of it) being met together, proceed to chooſe another. And that they ſolemnly engage themſelves to chooſe one, whom for piety, diſcretion, learning, fidelity, activity, publick ſpiritedneſs, ingenuity, and other neceſſary qualifications, they judge fit for the work. And that when any other of the Truſtees, to wit, gentlemen or citizens die, or refuſe to act further, or are by the reſt judged unfit to continue in this truſt; the reſt of the Truſtees or any nine of them, (notice being generally given to the Truſtees of the meeting, and of the end of it) being met together, proceed to chooſe another; and that they chooſe one of conſiderable quality, wiſdom, known integrity, and affection to the advancement of religion and learning. 4. That the Truſtees do chooſe a Treaſurer (being a perſon of unqueſtionable fidelity) from year to year upon the 21ſt day of March, to begin to exerciſe his truſt March the 25th following, who ſhall be accountable to the Truſtees once a quarter, or to any ſeven or more of them. And that the Treaſurer's diſcharge be ſufficient to any that ſhall pay the money. And that the Treaſurer ſhall not diſpoſe of any of the money, but according to the direction of the ſaid Truſtees or any ſeven of them, (whereof three to be Miniſters) met together for that purpoſe, (notice being generally given of ſuch a meeting) to be expreſſed in writing in a book to be kept for that uſe by one of the Truſtees appointed by the reſt. 5. That the Truſtees, or any five of them, (whereof three to be Miniſters) appointed by the reſt, or any nine of the reſt met together, notice ſtill being generally given to the Truſtees of the meeting, ſhall go about to ſchools in or within twenty miles of the city of London, or thereabouts; and ſhall confer with the ſchool-maſters, and out of ſix of the moſt ingenious boys being ſtrictly examined, two of the beſt be choſen. And ſo to go from one ſchool to another. And becauſe we would not have the benefit of this work confined to London, and the adjacent parts; but as we hope for help from divers perſons in the ſeveral countries; and as for the future any county is capable of enjoying ſuch Miniſters, as through God's bleſſing ſhall be ſent forth by the care of the Truſtees; ſo for the preſent we would have ingenious boys of any county to be capable of it; and therefore if any lad of rare parts from any place be recommended and found to be ſuch, that care may be taken to maintain him, and inſtruct him more perfectly in ſome eminent ſchool, where the Truſtees think fit, and ſo ſend him to the Univerſity; or that for this preſent time (but no more) the ſtudents be picked out of the moſt ingenious ſcholars of the firſt or ſecond year, that now are in the Univerſity, ſix out of twelve; and that more reſpect be had to their parts, than learning, ſeeing learning may be added. And that for ſuch as ſhall be choſen, if they have any parents or ſuch friends as have a power to diſpoſe of them, both the ſtudents and their parents, or ſuch friends, ſhall promiſe in writing, that they will ſubmit to the Truſtees for the education of ſuch ſtudents, both as to the manner of it and the time, as both are expreſſed in the model. 6. That the boys ſo choſen be ſent to the Univerſity, and be there placed under ſuch tutors as the Truſtees ſhall chooſe, who ſhall be men as near as may be, eminent both for godlineſs and learning, and care of their pupils; which tutors ſhall have for their encouragement four pounds a year for tuition for each of theſe ſtudents. That there they have ten, or fifteen, or twenty pounds a year allowed them, as the Truſtees ſhall think fit, till they be Bachelors of Arts; and, if need require, and the Truſtees ſee fit, that they be conſidered for their degree, (as alſo afterwards for their Maſter of Arts degree) and after they are Bachelors (if they have been very diligent, &c.) twenty or thirty pounds a year, as the Truſtees think fit. And that they ſhall be obliged to ſtudy to be eminent in the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and other Oriental languages, and in the ſeveral arts and ſciences, ſtill reſerving a power to the Truſtees to conſider the differences of the parts or diſpoſitions of lads, and accordingly to accommodate them as they ſee cauſe. And that over and beſides their ordinary Univerſity-exerciſes, they be tied to ſpecial exerciſes in theſe things, as ſhall be thought fit by the Truſtees, and ſuch learned men in the Univerſity, as they ſhall adviſe with, as the making of ſpeeches, verſes, epiſtles, &c. in the languages, holding diſputations, and making Lectures in the Mathematicks, Civil Law, &c. 8. That they have their allowance continued for eight years, and that they intend and direct their ſtudies towards the Miniſtry, and if contributions come in ſufficiently above what ſhall ſuffice for the yearly maintenance of twenty ſcholars at the Univerſity in order to the Miniſtry, ſome more eminently able be picked out of the reſt, (whoſe inclinations are rather to continue at the Univerſity, and who are fitter for it) who ſhall be allowed to take Fellowſhips, if it ſhall pleaſe any College to beſtow them upon them, and alſo have ſuch allowance as the Truſtees ſhall judge, (according to the excellency of their parts and learning, and the nature of their work, and their having or wanting other maintenance) upon theſe conditions: firſt, that they be obliged to take no pupils, if they are fellows, but by the conſent of the Truſtees, till they are Maſters of Arts, and then not too many. Secondly, that as every one's genius leads him, and as he is judged fit, ſo he principally proſecute ſome one kind of ſtudy, one to be the Linguiſt, and principally for Greek, and for Jewiſh and Rabbinical learning; another the Hiſtorian and Antiquary; another the Philoſopher and Mathematician; another the Polemical Divine, one or more; another the practical and caſuiſtical Divine; another the Univerſaliſt. Thirdly, that each of thoſe employ themſelves (when occaſions ſhall require, and the Truſtees ſhall reaſonably deſire) in ſuch works, as ſhall be uſeful and neceſſary. And if there be a ſufficiency of contributions above what ſhall ſuffice for thoſe before mentioned ends, the reſt be employed as the Truſtees ſhall think fit; provided always it be employed for the apparent advancement of learning and piety. And whereas divers, after they have been four years at the Univerſity, are forced through poverty to go away, before they commence Bachelors, or preſently after, and to enter into the Miniſtry, while they are raw; that a ſpecial regard be had to ſuch, as during thoſe four years have moſt approved themſelves, and are moſt eminent, both for learning and godlineſs, that they have an allowance for their degree, and alſo to ſupport them at the Univerſity three or four years more; provided it be beſtowed upon ſuch Bachelors, as do truly intend to enter into the Miniſtry. 9. That once in a year the Truſtees, or any five of them appointed by the reſt, whereof three to be Miniſters, go to the Univerſity, and there (with the help of ſome able Univerſity-man) find out their poſterity; that if any excell the reſt, &c. the Truſtees ſhall give them the two firſt volumes of which were printed at London 1669 in folio, and three more afterwards. Beſides this great work, he publiſhed ſeveral other books [B]. While he was engaged in drawing up his Synopſis and Annotations, it was his common method to riſe very early in the morning, about three or four a clock, and take a raw egg about eight or nine, and another about twelve, and then continue his ſtudies till the afternoon was pretty far advanced; then he went abroad, and ſpent the evening at the houſe of ſome friend in chearful converſation (k). When Dr. Oates's Depoſitions concerning the Popiſh Plot were printed, Mr. Poole found his name in the liſt of thoſe perſons, who were to be cut off, on the account (as was ſuppoſed) of what he had written againſt the Papiſts in his Nullity of the Romiſh Faith. But he gave not the leaſt credit to this, till one night having been at Alderman Aſhurſt's, when he went home, he took one to bear him company; and when he came to the narrow paſſage, which leads from Clerkenwell to St. John's Court, there were two men ſtanding at the entrance, one of whom, as Mr. Poole came along, cried out to the other, here he is; upon which the other replied, let him alone, them ſuch encouragement as they ſhall ſee fit; and that if there be evidence of the idleneſs, or diſſoluteneſs, or any depravedneſs of any of them, the Truſtees, either then, or at any other time after admonition and trial for ſo long time, as they ſhall think fit, may withdraw the exhibition from them, and chooſe others in their place. 10. That once in a year there be two or three picked out of the Students by the Truſtees, to come up to London (their charges being born) to do ſome learned exerciſes in the city, if the Truſtees think fit, and as they think fit; that ſo the Contributors may ſee ſome fruit of their coſt, and others may be excited and encouraged. 11. That there be an accurate method of ſtudies preſcribed for them, (with ſome latitude for the variety of their genius's) that ſo no time may be loſt that way. 12. That their Tutors be deſired to have a ſpecial eye upon them, as to their godlineſs; and to preſs them to a diligent attendance upon all means publick and private conducing thereunto. 13. That after eight years well ſpent there, the Truſtees and Contributors do by themſelves and friends endeavour to promote them to a place anſwerable to their merit. 14. That the addition or alteration of circumſtances be left to the wiſdom of the Truſtees, or any nine, or more of them, whereof four to be Miniſters; provided that notice be given to the Truſtees generally of the meeting, and of the end for which the meeting is appointed; and provided always, that the ſubſtantials remain untouched, to wit, the bringing up of eminent ſcholars at the Univerſity, in order to the Miniſtry, and (if contributions come in ſufficiently) the leaving of others at the Univerſity, according to the eighth article. 15. That there be two or three choſen out of the Univerſity, who ſhall be intreated to take ſome inſpection over them. 16. That thoſe of the Truſtees, who ſhall be choſen by the reſt for any of the publick work, ſhall have their charges born them. And that all charges incidental to the work in the management of it, ſhall be allowed out of the ſtock. 17. "And although our great aim in this buſineſs is "the bringing up of ſcholars of eminent parts and "learning, and the ſupplying the church with choice "Miniſters, and ſuch as, through God's bleſſing, "may be pillars of the Church; yet becauſe the ordinary neceſſities of the Church are alſo to be provided for, eſpecially ſeeing the deplorable conditi- "on of Ireland and Wales, and ſome deſolate parts "of England, cries loud for our aſſiſtance; the Truſtees therefore (after proviſion made for the fore- "mentioned branches of the deſign) ſhall endeavour "to take care about the maintenance of poor ſcholars "of competent abilities and good inclinations (though "it may be not eminent parts) at the Univerſity, "and ſhall allow them what they ſee fit. And ſuch "Lads, as alſo their parents, or ſuch friends as have "the diſpoſe of them, before they be admitted, "ſhall in writing engage themſelves to be willing to "be diſpoſed of by the Truſtees, and to be ſent into "Ireland or Wales, or ſome deſtitute parts of England, as the exigencies of the Church require; "provided always, that they ſhall not be ſent to any "ſuch places, unleſs there be competent encouragement "for them, of which the Truſtees ſhall be Judges. "18. For our brethren in any counties, who ſhall "be pleaſed to contribute to this work, we deſire, "that to their former favour they would add this, to "take ſome care for the payment of their monies in "London quarterly; and either to appoint ſome per- "ſons in London, from whom it may be expected "quarterly, or elſe to ſend it in to the Treaſurer."

(k) Continuation, p. 15, 16.

Then follows a Teſtimonial in favour of the model, ſigned by ſeveral Heads of Houſes in Cambridge, viz. John Worthington, John Arrowſmith, Anthony Tuckney, Benjamin Whichcot, Ralph Cudworth, and William Dillingham.

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral other books.] I. The Blaſphemer ſlain with the ſword of the Spirit: or, a Plea for the Godhead of the Holy Ghoſt, wherein the Deity of the Spirit is proved againſt the Cavils of John Biddle. Lon. 1654, in 12mo. II. A Model for the maintaining of Students, mentioned in the remark [A]. III. A Letter to the Lord Charles Fleetwood. London 1659, in one ſheet in 4to. It was delivered to Fleetwood, on the 13th of December the ſame year, in reference to the juncture of affairs at that time. IV. Quo Warranto: A moderate Debate about the preaching of unordained Perſons; Election, Ordination, and the Extent of the Miniſterial Relation, in Vindication of the Jus Divinum Miniſterii, from the Exceptions of that late piece, entitled, The Preacher ſent. London 1659, in 4to. Written by the appointment of the Provincial Aſſembly at London. V. Evangelical Worſhip, a ſermon preached before the Lord Mayor, Auguſt the 26th, 1660, London 1660, in 4to. VI. Vox Clamantis in Deſerto; a Latin piece written on occaſion of the ejectment of the Miniſters for Non-conformity in 1662. VII. The Nullity of the Romiſh Faith: or, a Blow at the Root of the Romiſh Church; being an Examination of that fundamental Doctrine of the Church of Rome, concerning the Churches Infallibility, and of all thoſe ſeveral Methods, which their moſt famous and approved Writers have uſed for the Defence thereof. Together with an Appendix tending to the Demonſtration of the Solidity of the Proteſtant Faith; wherein the Reader will find all the material Objections and Cavils of their moſt conſiderable Writers, viz. Richworth (alias Ruſhworth) in his Dialogues, White in his treatiſe de Fide and his Apology for Tradition, Creſſy in his Exomologeſis, S. Clara in his Syſtema Fidei, and Captain Everard in his late Account of his pretended Converſion to the Church of Rome, diſcuſſed and anſwered. By Matthew Poole, Miniſter of the Goſpel. Oxford 1666, in 8vo, and London 1679, in 8vo. The Epiſtle Dedicatory to Arthur, Earl of Donegal, Lord Viſcount Chicheſter of Carickfergus, is dated Sept. 1665. In the Preface he tells us, that if he "had known of any Author, "who had in ſo ſhort a compaſs and plain method "contracted and diſſolved the ſtrength of the Popiſh "Cauſe in this great point, he had willingly ſuperſeded. Nor did I, ſays he, intrude myſelf into this "work, but was invited to it by divers worthy and "learned friends, and afterwards incouraged in it by "the approbation of ſuch perſons, whoſe Judgments "I think almoſt all the learned part of England doth "reverence. Here is a new plea, viz. concerning "the ſufficiency of the teſtimony of the preſent "church, and the infallibility of the oral tradition, "not at all conſidered by Mr. Chillingworth, nor "fully diſcuſſed by any other that I know of, except "the ingenious Lord Falkland, who handles it quite "another way, and hath left room for ſome glean- "ings alone, for there is ſomebody with him. As ſoon as they were paſſed, Mr. Poole aſked his companion, whether he had heard what thoſe men ſaid; he anſwered, that he had. Well, replied Mr. Poole, I had been murdered to night, had not you been with me. This made him give heed to what he had diſregarded before, and raiſed in him ſuch an apprehenſion of his danger, as cauſed him ſoon to retire into Holland (l), where he died about the middle of October 1679 (m), in the 56th year of his age (n). Dr. Calamy tells us (o), that whether he died by a natural death, has been doubted by ſeveral; and that the ſtory above related, which came from Mr. Charley, who was Mr. Poole's companion, when he was laid in wait for, confirms the ſuſpicion. He was interred in a vault under the Church, which belongs to the Engliſh Merchants at Amſterdam (p). Mr. Wood obſerves (q), that he left behind him the character of clariſſimus Criticus & Caſuiſta, i. e. "A very celebrated Critic and Caſuiſt;" and Dr. Calamy tells us, that he was "very facetious in converſation, very true to his friend, very ſtrict in his piety, "and univerſal in his charity."

(l) Continuation, p. 16.

(m) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(n) Continuation, p. 15.

(o) Ibid. p. 16.

(p) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(q) Account, ubi ſupra.

" ings after his harveſt. Nor is it debated by Mr. " Stillingfleet, whoſe Adverſaries led him to things " of another nature. And beſides it is known to di- " vers, that this treatiſe was prepared for the preſs " before Mr. Stillingfleet's excellent diſcourſe came " out, though retarded by ſome unhappy occur- " rences, which it is needleſs here to recount." He then takes notice, that the Papiſts will pretend, that the Doctrines, which he charges upon them, and the Teſtimonies, which he alledges againſt them, are only the particular opinions of private Doctors, and not of the whole Church. His Defence is this; 1. The Authors, which are here introduced, are not pedantic Writers, but ſuch as are of prime note and higheſt eſteem in the church of Rome, and the moſt zealous and conſiderable champions of their cauſe, and ſuch, for the generality of them, whoſe writings came forth with the character of their church's approbation upon them; concerning whom it will be very difficult to perſuade any intelligent man, either that ſuch perſons did not underſtand the ſenſe of the church of Rome, as well as the Objector; or that they did knowingly contradict the Doctrine of their church, or would be permitted ſo to do, without any cenſure upon them. 2. The teſtimonies of thoſe Authors are undoubtedly ſufficient for that end, for which I alledge them; which is to ſhew the falſeneſs of thoſe doctrines, and the weakneſs of thoſe arguments, which are diſbelieved and diſproved by their own learneded and ſtouteſt champions; by which it may appear to all impartial perſons, that it is not the ignorance nor prejudice of Proteſtants, (as ſome of their Writers have the effrontery to aſſert,) which make them reject the Popiſh tenets; but merely the want of truth and evidence therein, confeſſed, (as you will ſee all along in the following treatiſe) by their own brethren; and that it is a deſperate madneſs in any Papiſt to hazard his everlaſting concernments upon ſuch principles, as ſo many of their acuteſt ſcholars do publickly diſavow. And that this is really the caſe of the unhappy Romaniſt, I refer thee to the ſubſequent diſcourſe. VIII. Dialogues between a Popiſh Prieſt and an Engliſh Proteſtant, wherein the principal points and arguments of both Religions are truly propoſed and fully examined. London 1667, in 8vo, reprinted ſeveral times afterwards. IX. A ſeaſonable Apology for Religion, on Matth. xi. 19. London 1673, in 4to. X. Some ſermons of his are publiſhed in the volumes of the Morning Exerciſe; one upon the Satisfaction of Chriſt in that at St. Giles's; another about the right method of application to the ſick, for their good, on the part of Miniſters and People, in that at Cripplegate; another upon Detraction in the Supplement to the Morning Exerciſe at Cripplegate; and another againſt an external and infallible Judge in the Church of God, in that againſt Popery. XI. He wrote a Poem and two Epitaphs upon Mr. Jeremy Whitaker; two others upon the death of Mr. Richard Vines; and another on the death of Mr. Jacob Stock. XII. He wrote a Preface to twenty poſthumous Sermons of Mr. Nalton's, together with ſome account by way of character of him. XIII. He alſo wrote a volume of Engliſh Annotations on the Holy Scripture; but was prevented by death from going farther than the 58th chapter of Iſaiah. Others undertook to complete that work. Mr. Wood (1) has miſtaken their names; for he mentions Dr. Bates, Dr. Jacomb, Mr. Clarkſon, and Mr. Alſop, as perſons concerned in it; and ſays, that he does not doubt but that Dr. John Owen alſo had his ſhare it. But we ſhall give a true liſt of the perſons who completed that work, from Dr. Calamy (2). The 59th and 60th chapters of Iſaiah were done by Mr. Jackſon of Moulſey. The notes on the reſt of Iſaiah and on Jeremiah and Lamentations were drawn up by Dr. Collinges: Ezekiel by Mr. Hurſt; Daniel by Mr. Cooper; the Minor Prophets by Mr. Hurſt; the four Evangeliſts by Dr. Collinges; the Acts by Mr. Vinke; the Epiſtle to the Romans by Mr. Mayo; the two Epiſtles to the Corinthians and that to the Galatians by Dr. Collinges; that to the Epheſians by Mr. Veale; the Epiſtles to the Philippians and Coloſſians by Mr. Adams; the Epiſtles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, by Dr. Collinges; that to the Hebrews by Mr. Obadiah Hughes; the Epiſtle of St. James, two Epiſtles of St. Peter, and the Epiſtle of St. Jude, by Mr. Veale; three Epiſtles of St. John by Mr. Howe; and the Book of the Revelations by Dr. Collinges. Theſe Annotations were printed at London 1685, in two volumes in folio. T.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 747. 2d edit.

(2) Account, p. 15.

POPE (JOAN), held the Holy See, they ſay, between Leo IV. who died the 17th of July 855, and Benedict III. who died the 8th of April 858. It is by no means probable that Anaſtaſius the Librarian, who lived in that Century, mentioned this woman-Pope [A]. Several perſons think that Marianus Scotus, who lived two hundred years

[A] It is by no means probable that Anaſtaſius the Librarian . . . . . mentioned this woman-Pope.] There are nevertheleſs ſome Manuſcripts of that Anaſtaſius, which contain the whole ſtory; but that alone is no proof; for it cannot be denied that Tranſcribers have added many things to an Author's works, which were not in the original. Panvini aſſerts, that in the old books containing the lives of the Popes, written by Damaſus, by the Librarian, and by Pandulphus of Piſa, that woman is not at all mentioned, but only in the margin, between Leo IV. and Benedict III. where that ſtory is inſerted by a later Author, written in another hand quite different from the reſt (1). Blondel, who has ſeen in the King of France's Library a manuſcript of Anaſtaſius, which contains the ſtory of the woman-Pope, has found that that paſſage is certainly an additional piece tacked to the original. Having read it over and over again, ſays he (2), I have found that the elogium of the pretended woman-Pope is expreſſed in the very words of Martinus Polonus (3), Penitentiary to Innocent IV. and Archbiſhop of Coſenza, an Author who lived four hundred years after Anaſtaſius, and who was beſides ſo credulous as to relate all ſorts of fabulous ſtories. for that no man may imagine that he tranſcribed what he has inſerted in his Chronicle, either from Anaſtaſius, or from any other Author who lived ſince the year 900, it muſt be obſerved, that the very diſcourſe, which is ſo wretchedly foiſted into Anaſtaſius's work, proves its own ſpuriouſneſs, both by its agreeing perfectly with Martinus Polonus's ſtyle, and by the very things he ſuppoſes, without fearing leſt they ſhould ſerve to convict him of impoſture. He gives ſome inſtances of theſe things, and then

(1) Onuph. in Addit. ad Plat. quoted by Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 506.

(2) Blondel, Eclairciſſement de la Queſtion, Si une Femme a eſte aſſiſe au Siege Papal de Rome, &c. p. 6 and 7.

(3) We ſhall examine this in the rem. [K].

years after, is the firſt who mentioned her. Some others imagine that he did not ſay then he adds a moſt ſolid argument, which is that the ſtory of the woman-Pope is inconſiſtent with Anaſtaſius's account of Benedict the Third's Election. " The Elogiums of Leo IV. and Benedict III. as they " are contained in the manuſcript of the Royal Li- " brary, ſwelled as it is with the ſtory of the woman- " Pope, are expreſſed in the ſame words as they are " in the edition of Mentz; whence it follows una- " voidably that (according to Anaſtaſius's intention, " violated by the bold attempt of thoſe who inter- " mixed their own dreams with his narration) it is " abſolutely impoſſible any perſon ſhould have held " the See of Rome between Leo IV. and Benedict III. " for he obſerves that after the Prelate Leo was taken " out of this world, the whole Clergy, the chief of the " men, and the people of Rome reſolved, mox, imme- " diately to elect Benedict, that they went immediately " illico, to meet him who was praying in St. Caliſtus's " Chapel, and that after they had placed him on the " Pontifical Throne, and ſigned the Decree of his " Election, they ſent him to the moſt invincible Emperors " Lotharius and Lewis, the firſt of whom (according " to the unanimous teſtimony of all the contemporary " Writers) died the 29th of September 855, 74 days " after Pope Leo (4)." Is it not true that if we read in a manuſcript, that the Emperor Ferdinand II. died in the year 1537, and that Ferdinand III. ſucceeded him immediately, and that Charles VI. ſucceeded to Ferdinand II. and held the Empire two years, after which Ferdinand III. was elected Emperor, we would ſay, it is impoſſible that the ſame Writer ſhould have ſaid all this, and that the Tranſcribers muſt have impertinently joined together what was related by different perſons? Muſt not a man be mad or drunk, or dreaming, who ſhould relate, that Innocent X. being dead, Alexander VII. was directly appointed to ſucceed him, that Innocent XI. was Pope immediately after Innocent X. and kept the See above two years, and that Alexander VII. ſucceeded him? Anaſtaſius the Librarian had been guilty of ſuch a piece of extravagancy, if he were the Author of all that is to be met with in the manuſcripts of his works, which mention the woman-Pope. Let us conclude therefore that all that relates to that woman is a ſpurious piece, which comes from another hand.

(4) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 9, 10.

Monſieur Sarrau, a zealous Proteſtant and a learned man, paſſed the ſame judgment, after he had examined the manuſcript of the King's Library with the utmoſt attention. He inferred from the account which is given there of Benedict the Third's being elected immediately after the death of Leo X. that the ſtory of the woman-Pope was tacked to it by a man who made an ill uſe of his leiſure (5) He expreſſed himſelf to that purpoſe in the letters he wrote to Salmaſius, and ſupported his opinion by ſeveral other arguments. Venio ad Papiſſam. Quicquid de Papiſſâ confidentius dicas, intricatiſſimum eſt omne id negotium. Sederit illa, nec ne, longior eſt diſquiſitio, nec unius Epiſtolæ. Jam autem quæro tantum, num Anaſtaſii Bibliothecarii legitimus ſit fœtus Vita illa, quam apud te nuper tranſmiſi. Ut eam cenſeam ὑποξολιμαῖον, præter allatas jam rationes, hæ ſuadent (6). i. e. " I " come now to the woman-Pope. Whatever you " may ſay of her with any confidence, this is a very " perplexed queſtion. It would be too long to exa- " mine whether ſhe exiſted or not, nor can it be exa- " mined in one ſingle letter. I will only enquire at " preſent, whether Anaſtaſius the Librarian be the " Author of that life, which I have ſent you lately, " or not. I am perſuaded that it was a mere addi- " tion, not only from the reaſons I have already " urged, but alſo from the following." One of theſe reaſons ſeems to me a demonſtration. The ſtory of the woman-Pope is not ſet down in the manuſcript of Anaſtaſius, as a matter of fact, the truth of which the Author warrants, but he uſes the expreſſions, it is aſſerted that, &c. it is ſaid that, &c. Would a contemporary Author ſettled at Rome, ſpeak thus of a Pope's life, the events of which were ſo ſtrange and ſurprizing, as thoſe of that pretended woman-Pope's were? Si Anaſtaſius hanc Hiſtoriam conſcripſit, rem ſua ætate, ſe vivo & Romæ degente, geſtam literis mandavit. Atque de re tamquam parum comperta, & ſibi tantùm ex famâ cognitâ loquitur hic Auctor cum ait, ut aſſeritur, ut dicitur. Qui ità loquitur, non curat ſuo teſtimonio fidem haberi, quaſi dicat, credat qui voluerit, fides ſit penes Auctores. An autem credibile eſt virum doctum & ſagacem de adeo ſingulari ſui temporis eventu, non inquiſiviſſe diligenter, ut ad poſteros res notabiles, utque maximè in dubiâ fide cum ſuis omnibus circumſtantiis, dimanaret (7)? i. e. " If " Anaſtaſius wrote that ſtory, he was giving an ac- " count of what happened in his time, during his " life, and whilſt he lived at Rome. But that Au- " thor ſpeaks of it as of an uncertain fact, which he " had only from common report, ſince he ſays, as it " aſſerted, as it is related. An Author, who ſpeaks " thus, does not care that men ſhould give any credit " to his teſtimony, as though he had ſaid, believe it, " who will, let the Authors of the report anſwer for it. " But is it probable, that a man of learning and " judgment, ſhould not have examined matters care- " fully, that the moſt remarkable events, eſpecially " thoſe which ſeem to be incredible, might be tranſ- " mitted down to poſterity with all their circum- " ſtances?" I do not think that at this time any Author, nay, though he lived in the remoteſt parts of the North, would be capable to uſe theſe expreſſions, they ſay, it is reported, if he were relating that Alexander VII. ſucceeded to Innocent X. and Clement IX. to Alexander VII. Theſe are facts, which cannot be darkened but by a long ſucceſſion of years; they are always attended with a full certainty, ſo that no man can be ſilly enough to relate them from an hearſay.

(5) Inde patet quod de ea (Joanna) ibi dictum eſt, aſſumentum eſſe hominis otio abuſi. Sarravii Epiſt. 138. p. 144. edit. ult. 1697.

(6) Idem, Epiſt. 140. p. 145.

(7) Idem, ibid. p. 146. See alſo Epiſt. 146. p. 151.

Theſe are ſuch ſtrong reaſons to perſuade us, that Anaſtaſius did not mention the woman-Pope, that if a man would refute them, it is not enough for him to urge that there are ſeveral manuſcripts which agree with that in the King of France's library (8); he would be obliged to produce the very original of Anaſtaſius: for in ſuch a caſe, rather than to argue and diſpute, men would chooſe to believe on the credit of their own eyes, that that Author made himſelf ridiculous, by relating inconſiſtent facts, and uſing moſt ſillily an hear-ſay. To object that that Writer is not accurate, and that there are variations and inconſiſtencies in his accounts (9), is not untying the knot; for it is certain that no inference can be drawn from thence with regard to thoſe things of which he was an eye-witneſs. They who write the Hiſtory of paſt ages conſult ſeveral Authors, and borrow one thing from one, and another from another. So that if they want judgment, they tack inconſiſtent facts together. But this never happens to them with regard to events which are freſh and new, and ſo remarkable as the inſtallations of the Popes. As to thoſe who aſſert, that the particles mox and illico have been inſerted into the text of Anaſtaſius by another hand (10), they muſt be anſwered, that by ſuch an evaſion a man might reject all the authorities which puzzle him, and hiſtory would be reduced to a frightful ſcepticiſm. There is another reaſon, but a very ſtrong one, which does not ſuffer us to admit the conjecture of thoſe men, and which is, that there are proofs grounded on paſſages in other contemporary Authors, from which it appears that Benedict III. was the immediate ſucceſſor of Leo IV. and that the interval between the death of the one, and the inſtallation of the other, was but ſhort (11). It is therefore reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that Anaſtaſius uſed the particles we have mentioned.

(8) See Colomies, in his Melanges Hiſtoriques, p. 56.

(9) Mareſius, in Examine Quæſt. de Papa Fœmina, p. 31, 32, 155; and Coocke, Traite de la Papeſſe, p. 106 & ſeq.

(10) Mareſius, ibid, p. 156, 176.

(11) See Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 39 & ſeq. and Father Labbe, in Cœnotaphio everſo, p. 848 & ſeq. Tom. de Script. Eccleſ.

An EXAMINATION of what Salmaſius uſed to ſay concerning the edit. of Anaſtaſius, publiſhed by the Jeſuits of Mentz.

Let us examine a fact, which has made a great noiſe, and is grounded, I think, only on the converſations of Salmaſius. " Marc Velſer, one of the chief " Magiſtrates of Augſburg, having ſent to the Jeſu- " its of Mentz in the year 1601, the manuſcripts of " Anaſtaſius, in order to have it printed; they de- " ſired Marquardus Freherus, Counſellor to his Elec- " toral Highneſs at Heidelberg, to aſſiſt them in that " undertaking: they having promiſed him that they " would faithfully publiſh all that ſhould be commu- " nicated to them, he ſent them two manuſcripts of " Anaſtaſius, which had the life of the pretended " woman-Pope. But thoſe Gentlemen got only two " copies printed with that life, and omitted in all the " reſt

" reſt of the edition, what had been ſent to them: " ſo that that Life was not printed in the other co- " pies, and Freherus has been obliged to complain, " in a kind of Manifeſto which he cauſed to be print- " ed, of the trick they had played him (12)." This is what Blondel heard Salmaſius ſay in the year 1640 (13). I was moſt particularly ſorry, continues he (14), that as no man could ſhew Freherus's Manifeſto, nor the copies which the Jeſuits cauſed to be printed for him, nor the manuſcripts which he furniſhed them with from the library of Heidelberg, which have no doubt been buried in the ruins of the Palatinate, or carried by the Bavarians whither ſoever they pleaſed, it ſhould be thus out of our power to know what they contained. Meſſieurs Rivet (15), Sarrau (16), Des Marets (17), Spanheim (18), and Boecler (19), heard Salmaſius ſay the ſame thing, and they have been ſure, on his credit, to charge the Jeſuits of Mentz with foul play in this caſe. It muſt paſs for an unqueſtionable matter of fact, that Salmaſius ſaid what is aſcribed to him; but it may be queſtioned, whether his memory, how good ſoever it was, did not miſlead him. It would be much more civil and charitable to impute that defect to him, than to accuſe him of impoſture, as Father Labbe does (20). However it be, if Salmaſius's ſtory were true, we ſhould have here the ſtrongeſt prodigy, that ever appeared in the world. The Jeſuits would have committed a notorious fraud in a point controverted between the Catholicks and the Proteſtants; Marquardus Freherus being moſt baſely impoſed upon in that affair, would have complained of it to the publick; he would have had the eaſieſt and moſt unexceptionable method, a man can wiſh for, who has a mind to load a deteſted impoſtor with infamy; he might have ſhewed all the world, how the manuſcripts agreed with the two copies, that were ſent him as a preſent, and how theſe two copies differed from all the reſt, and yet there would not have been one ſingle Author, who mentioned that notorious and publick cheat of the Jeſuits. Du Pleſſis Mornai, whoſe literary correſpondence extended over the whole Proteſtant world, and who had a moſt particular intelligence in the Palatinate, muſt have been unacquainted with that printed letter of Marquardus Freherus; for he has not mentioned it in the chapter concerning Pope Joan (21). Rivet, who of all men was the moſt curious of all books of controverſy, would not have been better informed than Du Pleſſis Mornai, when he refuted Coeffeteau who denied the ſtory of that woman-Pope. Conrad Deckher, who publiſhed a book in the Palatinate to ſupport that fable, would have known nothing of that ſtory of the edition of Anaſtaſius. One Urſinus, who took upon him the title of the Anti-Jeſuit, and who publiſhed in the ſame country ſeveral very ſatyrical works againſt the Jeſuits, would have ſaid nothing of that ſtory. David Pareus, Profeſſor at Heidelburg, who was continually diſputing with the Jeſuits, and particularly with ſome Fathers of the College of Mentz, would have ſpared them in that reſpect, though the war between them was carried on with the utmoſt bitterneſs. The controverſies between the Proteſtants and the Jeſuits were never managed with more heat and paſſion, eſpecially in Germany, than during the thirty firſt years of the 17th Century, and in the infinite number of books of controverſy and of libels, which were publiſhed againſt the Jeſuits during that time, there would not be one ſingle book, in which they are charged with the fraud committed in the edition of Anaſtaſius. Whence could ſo univerſal a moderation ariſe? Would they have made it a law to themſelves at Heidelberg, ſince the printing of the edition of Anaſtaſius in 1602, to the ruin of the Library in 1622, never to ſhew to any men the copies of which the Jeſuits had made a preſent, and to prevent their being collated with the other copies? Did all men agree to burn Marquardus Freherus's publick complaint, and even to forget it entirely? How comes it, that Salmaſius, the only perſon who had not that gift of forgetfulneſs, never mentioned that impoſtor in the works he publiſhed, and would ſpeak of it only to his friends in converſation? The queſtions one might aſk upon that ſubject are infinite: Father Labbe has urged ſome of them moſt unmercifully, and in the moſt unanſwerable manner againſt Monſieur Des Marets (22). Theſe queſtions ariſe naturally in every one's mind, and yet it does not appear that any of thoſe learned men, who publiſhed what Salmaſius told them by word of mouth, concerning the conſequences of that edition of Mentz, ever thought of propoſing thoſe queſtions to him. Spanheim, who was not unacquainted with Father Labbe's objections, did not anſwer any thing whatſoever. I wonder, and do not wonder at it in different reſpects. But though I be but a dwarf, if compared with thoſe Coloſſus's, I think, that if I had had the honour to hear Salmaſius ſay what he told them, I would have deſired him to give me ſome reaſons for that prodigious ſilence of all the Authors, who wrote againſt the Jeſuits ſince the year 1602. See the margin (23).

If an honeſt man ſhould tell me for certain, that in the year 1664 he heard Monſieur Arnauld ſay, what I am going to relate, I would anſwer him boldly thus: I believe that Monſieur Arnauld told that ſtory, ſince you aſſure me of it, as having heard it yourſelf: but I do not believe that what he told you is true; it is one of thoſe general diſcourſes held in converſation, in which things are moſt wretchedly confounded and blended together. We have a thouſand inſtances of it in the Scaligerana and in the Menagiana. Here follows the ſtory, which I frame and ſuppoſe with no other view but to make a compariſon.

In the year 1644 (24) Meſſieurs du Puy ſent from Rome to the Jeſuits a manuſcript of a Council, in which there was a deciſive paſſage in favour of the efficacious Grace. The Jeſuits had given their word of honour, that they would omit nothing that was in the manuſcript: they cauſed two copies to be printed faithfully from it, and left the deciſive paſſage out of all the reſt. They ſent the manuſcripts back to Meſſieurs du Puy, and made them a preſent of the copies, which were not falſified. Meſſieurs du Puy coming to know the impoſtor, complained of it in a letter that was printed. This is what I ſuppoſe Monſieur Arnauld told very ſeriouſly in the year 1664.

There is no man of ſenſe but ought to have aſked him, how it happened that no body ever boaſted to have ſeen Meſſieurs du Puy's letter? How comes it, that they have not called upon the Jeſuits to ſend ſome perſons to be preſent at an aſſembly in which the manuſcript ſhall be collated with the true copies they had ſent as a preſent, and with the reſt of the edition? Why have they not drawn up an authentick deed before a publick notary, that they might have a moſt unqueſtionable proof of the fraud? And you, who have wrote ſo much againſt the Jeſuits, why have you never charged them with falſifying the manuſcript of a Council? Since the controverſy about Janſeniſm produced ſo many works againſt the Jeſuits, how comes it that there is not one ſingle Author, who complained of the omiſſion of that paſſage? What head of Meduſa has ſo benumbed the hand and the memory of an infinite number of Anti-Moliniſts, that none of them ever printed the leaſt thing upon that ſubject. Is it that they entered into a confederacy together, to ſpare the Jeſuits the diſgrace which they deſerve? But why ſhould they ſpare them in this reſpect, ſince they omit nothing that can give them the leaſt advantage over thoſe adverſaries? Laſtly, is it any ways probable, that men who muſt at leaſt earneſtly wiſh that they be not ſurprized in the fact, would have impoſed upon Meſſieurs du Puy in ſo groſs a manner, that the cheat muſt unavoidably be diſcovered to the eternal ſhame of their whole ſociety?

It is impoſſible to remove thoſe difficulties; they make ſo deep an impreſſion on the mind, that unleſs a man be entirely blinded by a fantaſtical prepoſſeſſion in favour of Monſieur Arnauld's honeſty, and the certainty of his memory, he will always think his ſtory as a mere fiction.

But though Salmaſius's ſtory were true, it would ſignify nothing as to the main point. For what has been obſerved with regard to the manuſcript of the French King's Library, would be equally ſtrong againſt the manuſcript of the Palatine Library. One might prove by the ſame arguments, that ſtory of the woman-Pope has been foiſted into both thoſe manuſcripts, and conſequently that Anaſtaſius is not the Author

(12) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 3 and 4.

(13) Blondel meant Salmaſius, as Colomies obſerves, Melanges Hiſt. p. 55, 56.

(14) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 5.

(15) Rivet. Crit. Sacri, lib. 3. cap. 14. See alſo Spanhem. de Papa fœmina, p. 292.

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Mareſius, in Examine Quæſtionis, p. 178.

(18) Spanhem. de Papa fœmina, p. 292.

(19) Boecler, in Commentar. de Rebus Seculi noni, apud Spanhem. ibid.

(20) Philippus Labbe, in Cenotaphio everſo, p. 929 & ſeq.

(21) In his Myſtere d'Iniquité, printed in the year 1611.

(22) Labbe, in Cenotaphio everſo, p. 929 & ſeq.

(23) Daniel Francus, p. 145, de Indicibus Librorum expurgandorum, relates all Father Labbe's objections; and the only anſwer he makes is, his deſiring thoſe, who may have Freherus's Letter, to produce it.

(24) I ſuppoſe that time here, and then the year 1664, as the year in which Monſieur Arnauld told the ſtory; that the parallel may be more exact, there being twenty years between the edition of Anaſtaſius and the deſtruction of that library of Heidelberg.

say one word of her [B]; however it be, what he obſerves is very inconſiderable; for he only takes notice that in the year 853, Joan a woman, ſucceeded Pope Leo IV. and ſate two years, five months, and four days (a). Sigebertus, who died in the year 1113, gave a more thor of it. We ſhall ſee hereunder (25) what may be inferred from the ſilence of contemporary Authors.

(a) See Blondel, p. 17. of the Eclairciſſement de la Queſtion, Si une Femme a eſté aſſiſe au Siege Papal de Rome.

(25) In the rem. [G].

[B] Several perſons think that Marianus Scotus . . . . is the firſt who mentioned her. Some others imagine that he did not ſay a word of her.] Let us quote Coeffeteau. "Several learned men, who eſteem Marianus Scotus "a pretty good Chronologer, ſuſpect the Lutherans "of falſifying the copy from which they printed his "work. For it is certain that that ſtory is not to be "met with in the antient manuſcripts. And Miræus, "a Canon of Antwerp, a man of learning, and par- "ticularly well verſed in Hiſtory, who has lately "publiſhed Sigebertus, aſſerts that there is an old "manuſcript of Marianus, written on parchment, "which the Reverend Abbot of Gemblours, named "Ludovicus Sombechus, has ſent him, in which that "ſtory of the pretended woman-Pope has not been "inſerted, either in the text, or in the margin; "which is alſo teſtified by him, who publiſhed the "Krantzius at Cologne (26). Nay, Serrarius ſays, "that he ſaw at Francfort a manuſcript, in the hands "of Latomus, who ſhewed it him, in which the ſtory "is not related in a poſitive manner, as in that of "Baſil, which the Calviniſt Heroldus has publiſhed, "but from a common report, ut aſſeritur (27)." You muſt obſerve, that the edition of Marianus, which Heroldus procured, was made from that manuſcript of Latomus (28). Now by the Jeſuit Serrarius's own confeſſion that manuſcript does not differ from the printed edition, but with regard to the words, ut aſſeritur, as is reported. It contains therefore all the reſt; and conſequently there are ſome manuſcripts of Marianus which mention the woman-Pope, though it cannot be ſaid that the Lutherans made that addition; for it is unqueſtionable that Latomus's manuſcript was not falſified by the Lutherans. It was a Prieſt who procured it, and he took it from a Library belonging to a Church (29). But, will ſome aſk, whence comes that difference in the manuſcripts of Marianus? Why do we meet in ſome with the ſtory of Pope Joan, and why do not we meet with it in the others? I anſwer that that diverſity may be owing to an addition as well as to a ſubtraction, and that in order to know whether or not Marianus be the Author of the ſentence concerning the woman-Pope, we muſt have his own original manuſcript. If we ſhould meet with it there, he muſt have wrote it; if we ſhould not meet with it, it would be a proof that it is a ſpurious piece foiſted into the manuſcripts in which it is found. But as we have not the original manuſcript, it is impoſſible to determine any thing by that means. I may be aſked another queſtion: is it more probable that what relates to Pope Joan was omitted by ſome Tranſcribers, than it is probable that it was added by others? It is a difficult matter to anſwer that queſtion poſitively; for there are arguments on both ſides. Some pretend that it is probable that certain Tranſcribers, thinking the period concerning a woman-Pope too ſcandalous, omitted it for that reaſon; others on the contrary being ſurprized at the ſingularity of the ſtory, would not have it wanting in their Marianus, and ſo added it to it. There are readers, who are uſed to write a great many ſupplements in the margin of a Chronicle or of a Calender. If a bookſeller was to reprint that Chronicle from ſuch a copy, he would inſert all thoſe marginal notes in his new edition, putting every one of them in its proper place, nor would he always give himſelf the trouble to diſtinguiſh them from the antient text. This was more likely to happen before the art of printing was invented: books were dearer then, and men choſe rather to write in the margin of a book the ſupplements which another book could afford, than to be at the expence of buying two different works. Now theſe marginal additions were generally tranſcribed into the text when a new copy was taken. Let us put here a remark of Florimond de Remond. "Thoſe books . . . . . which like "Chronicles, are made up of incoherent or looſe parts, "are very much ſubject to the gloſſes of thoſe into "whoſe hands they fall. We meet generally with a "thouſand and thouſand chaſms in them, which are "filled up by the firſt who lights on them, and with "any thing he meets with, which proves often a "downright falſity. Every one writes under each "reſpective year, what, in his opinion, was omitted "by the Author, who could not take notice of all "that is diſperſed throughout the vaſt multitude of "books we have, and amidſt the confuſed heap of "things which happened in the paſt ages. Is there "any of us who is not commenting over and over "again the chronology of the learned Pontac, and "that of Genebrard, that great maſter of languages, "becauſe they have both omitted ſome particulars, "perhaps out of an overſight, or perhaps deſignedly? "If theſe books, thus commented upon, happen "afterwards to fall into the hands of ſome printer, "he will be ſure to make all paſs under the name "of the firſt Author, who is nevertheleſs innocent "of the blunders which the Commentator may have "made (30)."

(26) His name is Gervinus Calenius: he ſtyles himſelf Legum Licentiatus. He publiſhed the Saxonia and Metropolis of Albert Krantz, at Cologne, in the year 1574.

(27) Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 506.

(28) It is certain that John Herold. cauſed Marianus to be printed at Baſil in the year 1550, from the original which was ſent him from Francfort by John Latomus, Dean of St. Bartholomew's church in that ſame city. Flor. de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 2. num. 4. folio 366.

(29) See the foregoing quotation.

(30) Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 5. num. 3. folio 175 verſo.

We may underſtand by this how the ſtory of the woman-Pope happens to be related at length in the manuſcript of Anaſtaſius. I confeſs, that for the ſame reaſon it ſhould alſo be at length in the manuſcript of Marianus, and not in two or three words only. But it muſt be obſerved, that the practice I have mentioned was more * frequently uſed with regard to the manuſcripts deſigned for the Libraries of Univerſities and Churches. Whole Corporations or Societies had not the ſame reaſons to be ſaving, which private men had. Now it might happen that all the manuſcripts of Marianus, which were deſigned for the uſe of private perſons, were loſt, and that thoſe of Anaſtaſius paſt from the ſtudy of a private man into publick libraries. I do not urge all this as convincing arguments, nor even as unanſwerable conjectures; but what can one do better upon ſuch uncertain ſubjects, and about which we walk only in the dark? See the margin (31).

* I believe there is an error of the preſs in Bayle's French Dict. the connexion ſeems to require that we ſhould read leſs frequently.

What I ſhall now obſerve is not ſo problematical. In caſe Marianus did not mention a woman-Pope, yet what we read of her in the manuſcripts of that Author cannot be imputed to the Lutherans; for theſe manuſcripts are unqueſtionably more antient than Luther. That Reformer appeared in the world at a time when printing was common, and people did not much ſpend their time in tranſcribing manuſcripts: and upon the whole, all ſkilful judges knew very well how to diſtinguiſh whether a copy was made in the 16th Century, or a long time before. Let us ſay therefore, that if the Chronicle of Marianus was made a few lines longer, by the addition of Pope Joan's ſtory, the addition comes from the Roman Catholicks.

(31) I expatiate more on theſe conjectures, in the rem. [B] of the article POLONUS.

This you will ſay is againſt all probability; they muſt have been infinitely more inclined to blot out the ſtory of that woman, where-ever they met with it, than to inſert it where they did not find it. They were ſenſible that it was a great diſgrace to their Church. But I anſwer that this objection, which has ſomething ſpecious in it, is after all nothing but a fair phantom; for if the ſtory of a woman-Pope be a mere fable, it was forged in the midſt of Popery, and they who publiſhed it firſt were Prieſts and Monks. It has been admitted and believed by Authors who were very much devoted to Popery: as for inſtance, by Antoninus Archbiſhop of Florence, one of the Saints of the Roman Catholick Church. Numberleſs Writers have related it ſincerely, without ſo much as ſuſpecting it might do any prejudice to the Holy See; and even ſince the Sectaries of Bohemia had drawn an argument from it (32), men continued to relate it, and they did not begin to refute it ſeriouſly, till the Proteſtants pretended to urge it as a very ſtrong objection. There are many other things, which the Zealots of Popery were concerned to ſuppreſs (33), and which they have not ſuppreſſed, tho' they were infinitely more ſcandalous and diſgraceful than the ſtory of Pope Joan.

(32) See in the rem. [E] what Æneas Silvius anſwered to the Biſhop of the Taborites.

(33) See the rem. [G].

[C] Some

more particular account; but ſome perſons aſſert that the paſſage is ſpurious [C], and ground their aſſertion on ſome manuſcripts in which it is wanting. Martin Polonus, who died

[C] Some perſons aſſert that the paſſage in Sigebertus is ſpurious.] What I have obſerved concerning the manuſcripts of Marianus may be applied to the manuſcripts of Sigebertus, a Monk of Gemblours, who died in the year 1113. Here follows what we read in the Chronicle of this Sigebertus, printed at Paris in the year 1113. John Anglicus (or l'Anglois) Pope. The common report is, that this John was a woman, and that none knew it but one of her moſt intimate friends, who uſed to lye with her, and that at laſt, even whilſt ſhe was a Pope, ſhe was got with child, and was delivered. This is the reaſon why ſhe is not reckoned among the Popes, and does not encreaſe the number of the Popes of that name (34). There are ſome manuſcripts of Sigebertus, which contain nothing of that paſſage. Miræus aſſerts, that of four different manuſcripts, one of which is that which is lodged in the Library of the Abby of Gemblours, of which Sigebertus was a Monk, which manuſcript is the original, or at leaſt has been tranſcribed from the very manuſcripts which Sigebertus made uſe of to publiſh his work, none mention Pope Joan in the leaſt, not even in the margin, though there be many things in them, which have been added of late. Wherefore, ſays he, it is certain, that that fable is falſely aſcribed to our Sigebertus (35). Add to it theſe words of Florimond de Remond. "The impoſture which "we ſay was committed with regard to Sigebertus, "appears plainly by comparing his Chronicle with "an antient Author named William de Nangiac (or "Nangis) who wrote a Chronicle, which extends to "the year 1302, in which that of Sigebertus is "tranſcribed from one end to the other, without the "leaſt omiſſion; and yet the ſtory of that woman-"Pope is the only particular that is not to be met with "in it. Why would he have omitted it, ſince the "original, which he was tranſcribing, might have "diſcovered the fraud? That manuſcript is ſtill to "be ſeen at this time in the Abby of Gemblours "near Louvain, if it eſcaped the fury of the men "of this age. Our Sigebertus was a Monk in that "Abby: his work is kept there very carefully by "the Monks, in order to ſhew it as a curious book, "to the learned men who come to ſee their Convent. "It is written by Sigebertus's own hand, and contains "nothing of that new Pope. That learned Corde-"lier, Father Protaſius, declared to me upon oath, "that he ſaw it, and aſſerted that it does not men-"tion one word of that ſtory, which is alſo teſtified "by Onuphrius, Genebrard, and others. It is a "thing which may be examined, if ſome incredu-"lous perſon will take the trouble to do it. The "ſame Onuphrius writes, that the ſame ſtory is "wanting alſo in the antient manuſcripts of Sige-"bertus, which are in Italy, and were tranſcribed "from the original at Gemblours; they are to be "ſeen in the old Libraries (36)." Alexander Coocke (37) has made ſome remarks againſt that paſſage of Florimond de Remond, but they do by no means prove, that the manuſcript of Gemblours is not antient, &c. Authors muſt be ſo juſt towards each other, that if one aſſerts there is ſuch a manuſcript in a publick Library, the other ſhould not deny it, unleſs he knew for certain that it is falſe (38): for it muſt not be ſuppoſed that an Author would have the impudence to relate a falſity, when he knows that it will be eaſily and fully diſcovered (39). Could not an adverſary give ſome traveller the commiſſion to aſk, that they would ſhew him the manuſcript of Sigebertus? Is this ever refuſed? Do not the Library-keepers take a pleaſure to ſatisfy all the curious in this reſpect? I do not ſee therefore that Coocke had any reaſon to treat with contempt what Florimond de Remond aſſerts concerning Father Protaſius. I think he does only cavil, when he obſerves (39*) that Bellarmine, who aſſerts that Molanus ſaw the manuſcript of Gemblours, does not tell us to whom Molanus ſaid it, nor in what work it is written. So that, concludes he, there is not one ſolid argument urged to prove that there is one ſingle manuſcript in which that ſtory is wanting, much leſs that it has been foiſted into the copies in which it is to be found. Why did he not conſult the dialogues of a man of his own nation? He would have read there, that Molanus declared as an eye-witneſs to Alanus Copus, that the manuſcript of Gemblours contained nothing concerning the woman-Pope, and that if it was not the original hand-writing of Sigebertus himſelf, it was at leaſt a copy taken from that original. This would have rendered ſeveral of Coocke's remarks uſeleſs. Obſerve that it is aſſerted that ſeveral impertinent ſtories have been foiſted into Sigebert's Chronicle, from the work of one Walfrid of Monmouth. Read theſe words of Alanus Copus. Antiquiora Sigeberti exemplaria nullam hujuſmodi narrationem complectuntur: & ſatis præterea conſtat, illius hiſtoriæ multa aſcititia & plane vana ex, neſcio, cujus Galfridi Monumetenſis libro aſperſa (40). Let us not forget to obſerve, that Spanhemius acknowledges, that the words of Sigebertus, quoted above according to the Paris edition 1513 are a parentheſis, which may be omitted without any prejudice to the Author's narrations, or to his chronological calculations; for he aſcribes to Benedict III. immediately after Leo, the very ſame year which in the parentheſis is aſcribed to Joan (41). Spanhemius confeſſes alſo very ingenuouſly, that the parentheſis is not to be found in the manuſcript of Leyden (42): it is a very antient manuſcript, and of the year 1154, if one may believe the title of it.

Blondel does not determine any thing with regard to the controverſy about the manuſcript of Sigebertus; but he hints very plainly, that he thinks it is probable that Sigebertus did not mention the woman-Pope. One of his reaſons is as follows (43). "Vin-"cent of Beauvais, and William de Nangis (44) "(who from year to year have inſerted his own "words into their collections, and particularly what "he writes under the year 854 concerning Benedict "III. and his Anti-Pope Anaſtaſius, and under the "year 857 concerning Nicholas I.) do not tranſcribe "the clauſe which relates to the woman-Pope." This reaſon is very ſtrong, and proves at leaſt, that theſe tranſcribers made uſe of a copy, in which Joan was not mentioned. I know it is anſwered, that he ſkipped over that paſſage, becauſe Sigebertus himſelf relates, that ſome perſons do not reckon her among the Popes, and therefore ſhe does not encreaſe the number of the Popes of that name (45). That ſame Anſwer is alſo uſed againſt the argument which Blondel infers from the ſilence of ſeveral celebrated Hiſtorians, who do not in the leaſt mention the woman-Pope. It is obſerved that ſome Popes have been blotted out of the catalogue of the Biſhops of Rome (46): and Beda is quoted, who tells us that two Anglo-Saxon Kings made themſelves ſo odious, that it was thought proper to make their memory periſh, and to connect together in the Chronicles of the Kingdom, the reign which preceded and the reign which followed that of theſe two Apoſtate Princes (47). Ita referente Bedâ in Hiſt. Anglo-Saxonum *, adeo fuit exoſa memoria Regum paris, Oſrichi & Earfridi, propter apoſtaſiam, ut cunctis placuerit, Regum tempora computantibus, ut ablata de medio Regum perfidorum memoria, idem annus ſequentis Regis regno aſſignaretur. But ſuch anſwers cannot ſatisfy an unbiaſſed mind: for the very obſervation of Sigebertus ought to have engaged thoſe Authors who tranſcribed his account, to mention the woman-Pope. They ought after his example to have related that Pontif's ſtory, and then to have added, that ſhe is not reckoned amongſt the Popes, &c. But as they did not ſpeak thus, it is a proof that they did not meet with that paſſage in Sigebertus's work. Let us obſerve farther, that if there had been a decree by which it was ordered, that the woman-Pope's name ſhould be eraſed out of all the publick records, and her ſtatues pulled down, this had been one of thoſe remarkable circumſtances which the Writers of Chronicles never fail to mention. There was ſuch a decree againſt Domitian's memory, who notwithſtanding this had had a place among the Emperors in all the Hiſtories. That every Decree of the Senate is one of the circumſtances which the Hiſtorians took a particular care to tranſmit to poſterity. Spanhemius, who quotes Procopius (48), might have quoted Sueto-niu

(34) Sigebert. Gemblacenſis, in Chronico, ad ann. 854. I make uſe of the words of the French Tranſlator, Alexander Coocke, p. 80. The Latin he quotes is as follows. Johannes Anglicus, fama eſt hunc Johannem fœminam fuiſſe & uni ſoli familiari cognitam qui eam complexus eſt, & gravis facta peperit Papa exiſtens. Quare eam inter Pontifices non numerant quidam, ideo nomini numerum non facit.

(35) Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 507. He quotes Myreus, in edit. Sigeb. ad ann. 854.

(36) Flor. de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 6. num. 5. folio 376.

(37) Coocke, Traite de la Papeſſe, p. 82, &c.

(38) Compare this with what Monſieur Arnauld obſerves in the 3d vol. of the Morale Pratique, p. 472, &c.

(39) I do not pretend to deny that Authors may be ſometimes barefaced enough to do ſuch a thing; but one muſt not ground a general rule upon this.

(39*) Coocke, Traite de la Papeſſe, p. 82.

(40) Alanus Copus, Dialogo 1. cap. 8. p. 37. edit. Ant. 1573. in 4to.

(41) Spanh. de Papa fœmina, p. 53.

(42) Ibid. p. 52.

(43) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 69. In the Latin edit. of his work, p. m. 42. he adds to theſe, Albericus, a Monk of the three Fountains, Sigeberti exſcriptor, qui de Joanna ſilet.

(44) See what Genebrard obſerves, ad ann. 858. p. m. 539. Chronica Guliel. Nangiaci, in quibus cum totus Liber alioqui Sigeberti exſcriptus ſit, hoc unum deſideretur. i. e. "Though Sige-"bertus's whole "work be tranſ-"cribed in Will. "de Nangis's "Chronicle, "yet that ſtory "alone is want-"ing in it."

(45) Qui dicuntur Docto Anacritæ exſcripſiſſe Sigebertum, nec tamen Joannæ meminiſſe, ut Albericus, Vincentius Bellovacenſis, Gulielmus Nangiacus, non ideo illam omiſerunt, quod de ea tacuiſſet Sigebertus, ſed quod ipſo Sigeberto judice, verbis modo relatis, nomini numerum non faceret.

(46) See Spanh. de Papa fœmina, p. 38 & ſeq.

(47) Idem, ibid. p. 40.

* Lib. 3. cap. 1.

(48) Spanhem. de Papa fœmina, p. 40. He quotes Procop. cap. 8. Hiſtor. Arcanæ.

died about the year 1270, that is to ſay, 184 years after Marianus (b), improved the ſtory much more. He aſſerted " that the Joan mentioned by Marianus was called Anglus, " and that ſhe was a native of Mentz: that being got with child ſhe was delivered in a " full proceſſion between St. Clement's Church and the Coloſſus, and, in deteſtation of her " crime, the proceſſion going round about, never paſſed again through that Street. " Theodoric de Niem, who wrote . . . about 328 years after the death of Marianus . . . " has added of his own invention, that a ſtatue was ſet up to preſerve the memory of " that accident. William Brevin, who wrote * concerning the ſeven moſt conſiderable " Churches at Rome, and Baptiſt Platina, who died in the year 1480, 395 years after " Marianus . . . . (to improve the ſtory) have invented the particular of the cloſe-ſtool, " on which (as they ſay) the Pope is obliged to ſit in order to have his ſecret parts " handled. And above an hundred years after, others have alſo thought it proper to " contribute ſomething of their own to that ſtory, aſſerting that the pretended " Joan was a Sorcereſs, that ſhe crowned the Emperor Lewis II. &c. So that 460 years " were ſcarce ſufficient to give a complete form to that bear, of which Marianus was de- " livered (I know not how)." Thus ſpeaks David Blondel, who though he was a Miniſter, did not ſcruple to call that ſtory of the woman-Pope a mere fable, and to write books in order to refute it (c). It is a ſtory, ſays he (d), which has been entirely patched up of ſeveral pieces, and improved in time. We ſhall relate that ſtory hereunder from the account of thoſe, who have moſt carefully collected together all the particulars relating to it [D]. Men would no doubt have tacked new circumſtances to it from time to time, (b) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 17, 18.

* About the year 1470.

(c) See the rem. [I] of the article BLONDEL (David).

(d) Blondel, Eclairciſſement de la Queſtion ſi une Femme, &c. p. 17.

nius (49). What he tranſcribes from Beda the Hiſtorian confirms this. And upon the whole, it is certain, that if the Annaliſt underſtood the true deſign of ſuch a decree, and will anſwer the real intention of the Senate, who would have the memory of a tyrant obliterated, they ought to mention ſuch a diſgraceful decree. It is by no means probable, that they, who inflict ſuch a puniſhment on an Uſurper, wiſh that no man ſhould ſpeak either good or ill of him; this would be ſhewing a regard for him, and ſecuring him from the diſgrace he deſerves. Now they could not deſign this without being inconſiſtent with themſelves, and conſequently they muſt wiſh, that what they decree againſt his memory, may ſerve to make him be deteſted in all the future ages: they wiſh therefore that their ſentence againſt him may be expreſsly recorded in the hiſtory of their country.

(49) Sueton. in Domitiano, cap. ult.

Let us add, that there is a vaſt difference between blotting a man's name out of the catalogue of the Popes, and making no mention at all of him. The Anti-Popes are not in that catalogue; they who took the name of Clement are not reckoned among the Clements. And yet the Annaliſts do not omit the actions, intruſion and diſorder of thoſe falſe Popes. Monſieur des Marets * puts this queſtion; was there not in France a Charles X. whom the Leaguers ſet up againſt Henry IV? And yet no Hiſtorian has reckoned him among the King's of France (50). But this is a fallacious argument. For though the Hiſtorians do not reckon him among the Kings, yet they relate what the Leaguers did for him. The queſtion is not here whether Joan was a Pope of right (de jure): the queſtion is only about the matter of fact: did ſhe uſurp the Papal See after the death of Leo IV. or not? Did ſhe keep it during two years? Did ſhe loſe it by her death, when ſhe was delivered of a child in the ſtreet? An Hiſtorian, who looks upon her as a falſe Pope, may indeed give her no place among the Popes called John, and reckon Leo IV. for the 102d Pope (51), and Benedict III. for the 103d. But he is under a neceſſity to give an account of the interreign of that Uſurper. The French Hiſtorians begin the reign of Charles VII. at the death of Charles VI. and do not reckon Henry VI. of England a among the Kings of France, but yet they do not conceal that after the death of Charles VI. Henry VI. was proclaimed King of France. How diſhonourable ſoever ſuch particulars may be, yet they are too publick and notorious to be entirely omitted in the Annals of a country.

* In Latin Mareſius.

(50) Sam. Mareſius, in Examine Queſtionis, p. 45, 46.

(51) The number belonging to that Pope is very differently ſet down. See Blondel, in Examine, p. 17.

Let us conclude from thence, that to ſuppoſe that the remark of Sigebertus prevented the Tranſcribers from copying his account of the woman-Pope, is committing the ſophiſm à non cauſa pro cauſa, i. e. " Arguing from what is not the cauſe as though it " were the cauſe of an effect." One muſt therefore look for better anſwers than that of Des Marets is.

We have ſeen above (52), that the ſame difficulties are raiſed with regard to Martin Polonus, as with regard to Marianus and Sigebertus.

(52) In the rem. [B] of the art. POLONUS (Martin).

[D] We ſhall relate that ſtory . . . . from the account of thoſe, who have moſt carefully collected together all the particulars relating to it.] There are but few particulars wanting in that account, which I ſhall now tranſcribe from a work of John Creſpin. " JOHN " the Eighth of that name, who took upon him " the name of Anglois or Anglus, becauſe of one " Anglus, a Monk of the Abby of Fuld, whom he " loved entirely, was a Pope as to his office, but by " his ſex a woman. That girl, a German by na- " tion, and firſt called Gilberta, pretended to be " a man, dreſſed herſelf in men's clothes, and went " to Athens with her lover the Monk. Having " made there a very great progreſs in the ſciences, " ſhe went back to Rome after the Monk's death, " and ſtill continued to conceal her ſex. Now as ſhe " had a very quick genius, and ſpoke with a good " grace, and readily in the publick diſputations and " lectures, and as ſeveral perſons were amazed at her " great learning, every one loved her extremely, and " ſhe knew ſo well how to win the hearts of all, " that after the death of Leo ſhe was choſen Pope. " Being inſtalled in that office ſhe admitted others " into holy Orders (as they call them) after the man- " ner of the other Popes: ſhe made Prieſts and Dea- " cons; ſhe ordained Biſhops and Abbots; ſhe ſung " Maſs, ſhe conſecrated Churches and Altars, ſhe " adminiſtered the Sacraments, ſhe preſented her feet " to be kiſſed, and performed all the other actions " which the Popes of Rome are wont to do: and " her acts were not void at that time.

" Whilſt that woman was on the Papal See, the " Emperor Lotharius being pretty old took the " Monk's habit, and Lewis the Second of that name " coming to Rome received the Imperial Sceptre " and Crown from her hand, together with the " bleſſing of St. Peter. . . . . Now whilſt ſhe was " thus in poſſeſſion of that high dignity, ſhe was got " with child by a certain Cardinal a Chaplain of " hers, who knew very well of what ſex ſhe was: " and as ſhe was going in a ſolemn proceſſion to the " Lateran Church, ſhe was delivered of that child " thus got by fornication, between the Coloſſus and " St. Clement's Church, in the midſt of Rome, even " in a moſt publick Street, before a crowd of people, " and died on the ſpot in her very delivery, in the " year of our Lord 857. On the account of ſuch a " ſin, and becauſe ſhe was thus delivered in publick, " ſhe was deprived of all the honours, which are " uſed to be paid to the Popes, and buried without " any Pontifical Pomp. . . . . Now that the Popes " and anointed Fathers may ſeem to deteſt ſuch a " crime, they turn another way when they come to " that place; it being a very ſuſpicious place on " account of the bad omen. . . . . But that the " holy Fathers may avoid ſuch an inconveniency for time, had not the Roman Catholicks attempted at laſt to refute it, which put an end to all farther improvements. Nevertheleſs Writers, who adhered otherwiſe to Popery, have believed that ſtory. Æneas Sylvius, who was Pope in the 15th Century, under the name of Pius II. is the firſt who called it into queſtion; he did even touch but ſlightly upon it,

" the future, they have ordered that a Deacon ſhould " through a cloſe-ſtool handle the ſecret parts of " every perſon who ſhould be choſen Pope, that it " might be known whether he be male or not. But " at this time, whilſt they are Cardinals, and before " they be raiſed to the Papal Dignity, they beget ſo " many baſtards, that no man can call their virility " into queſtion, ſo that there is no longer any occa- " ſion for ſo holy a ceremony (53)."

(53) Creſpin, l'Etat de l'Egliſe, p. m. 242, &c.

Theſe laſt words allude to the following Latin lines of Joannes Pannonius, which Monſieur du Pleſſis has tranſcribed in his Hiſtory of Popery (54).

(54) Hiſtoria Papatus, p. m. 164.

Non poterat quiſquam reſerantes æthera claves
Non exploratis ſumere teſticulis.
Cur igitur noſtro mos hic nunc tempore ceſſat?
Ante probat quod ſe quilibet eſſe marem.

In French,

Prendre les cleſs des cieux perſonne ne pouvoit,
Sans monſtrer ſes teſmoins d'une couſtume ſale.
Pourquoy ceſte couſtume aujourd'huy ne ſe void?
Chacun auparavant ſe monſtre eſtre bon maſle.

" No man of old the keys of Heav'n could ſeize,
" But he, whoſe privy parts had firſt been view'd.
" What then could make that antient cuſtom ceaſe?
" That they're true men their baſtards have well ſhew'd."

Florimond de Remond is the Author who furniſhes me with that French tranſlation of Pannonius's lines: he quotes them to convict thoſe of falſity, who aſſerted that that practice was ſtill in uſe. Our adverſaries, ſays he (55), ... tells us that to prevent the Papal Dignity from coming again to the diſtaff, it is ſtill cuſtomary at this time to examine the ſecret parts of the Popes who are elected, the perſon who touches them crying aloud with great alacrity he is worthy to be made a Pope. The Centuriators, giving an account of that ſhameful cuſtom, aſſert that with great rejoicing they cry, he has got ſome, he has got ſome. On which ſubject Pannonius wrote theſe lines, which though they deſerve to be ſuppreſſed, yet ſince our adverſaries make ſome account of them, I was willing to tranſcribe them here tranſlated into our own language, that the reader may be convinced of their inconſiſtencies and calumnies, from their own Authors. Theſe lines of Pannonius prove, that that practice was not in uſe in his time. The Centuriators and Bale himſelf dare no longer maintain the contrary. But then they give immediately a fine reaſon indeed, why that practice is aboliſhed, a reaſon worthy of the religion they profeſs. That cuſtom of viſiting the Popes, ſay they, is now aboliſhed and ſuppreſſed becauſe it is no longer neceſſary; ſince their Concubines and Harlots ſhew abundantly what they are (56).

(55) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 18. num. 1. folio 410 verſo.

(56) Ibidem, folio 411.

He obſerves that (57) that John Creſpin has tranſcribed John Ballée's * expreſſions word for word. But yet we do not read in Creſpin's account this particular, which we meet with in the others, that learned and cunning woman is ſaid to have written a book of magic (58). The ſame Florimond quotes the following paſſage from James Curio's Chronicle: Benedictus III. being choſen after that proſtitute, ſucceeded to that wicked office after his ſecret parts had been handled; that there might be no miſtake, as there had been one a little before with regard to Joan (59). He gives us alſo Bocaccio's account, and does not forget to obſerve that it does not agree with that of the other Authors. " Bo- " caccio ..... in his book of the illuſtrious women " has cauſed the pictures of that monſter to be drawn " being delivered in a general proceſſion in the arms " of her Cardinals, and has got ſome lines engraved " at the bottom of the print, which being tranſlated " out of Latin into French are as follow.

(57) Ibid. chap. 3. num. 5. folio 370 verſo. edit. 1599, in 4to.

* Thus Florimond de Remond writes Bale's name.

(58) Ibid. num. 3.

(59) Ibid. num. 6.

" Jane ſçavante en dol, ſçavante aux ſainctes lettres,
" Par grand' ſubtilité, fut de nom Pape faict:
" Mais ayant enfanté au milieu de ſes Preſtres.
" Monſtra bien qu'elle eſtoit femme fine en effaict.

i. e. " Joan full of art, and well ſkilled in Divinity, " was by her dextrous wit raiſed to be Pope: but " being delivered of a child in the midſt of her " Prieſts, ſhe ſhewed that ſhe was indeed a cunning " woman.

" But he ought to have ſaid on the contrary,

" Monſtra qu'elle n'eſtoit femme fine en effaict.

i. e. " She ſhewed indeed that ſhe was no cunning " woman.

" Bocaccio relating that fine ſtory at length, aſſerts, " that ſhe was a German woman, and ſtudied in Eng- " land with a young ſcholar who was her ſweetheart, " who being dead, ſhe would not abandon herſelf to ano- " ther, but went to Rome, where ſhe raiſed every body's " admiration, both by her learning and her morals: ſo " that after the death of Leo V. ſhe was choſen Pope. " But God, ſays he, pitying his people, would not ſuffer " it to be ſo wickedly impoſed upon by a woman. So that " the Devil, who had inſpired her with ſo much boldneſs " as to undertake that wickedneſs, tempted her to commit " fornication when ſhe was raiſed to that high dignity. " She did not want opportunities to indulge her deſire, ſo " that ſhe was ſoon after got with child. Oh the great " wickedneſs! oh the unheard of patience and goodneſs " of God! But ſhe, who had enchanted all the world, " loſt her wit, and could not conceal her delivery: for " as ſhe had not time enough to ſend for a mid-wife, her " child dropped from her as ſhe was performing divine " ſervice. And becauſe ſhe had thus impoſed upon the " world, that wicked woman being all in tears was ſent " into a dark priſon by the command of the Fathers. " This Florentine does not agree with the other wri- " ters, as to the education, ſucceſſion, and death of " that woman-Pope (60)." Remond has not omitted the new particular, with which a Monk has adorned that ſtory. Being locked up in his Monaſtery he has repreſented the woman-Pope as loaded with more diſgrace and infamy than any other had done before him. I mean Baptiſt Mantuanus (61), who ſpeaks thus of her.

(60) Ibid. chap. 3. num. 1. folio 368 verſo.

(61) Lib. 3.

Je vy en un gibet ceſte fine femelle,
Qui traveſtie en homme, & faignant un ſainct zele,
Juſqu'au ſiege Papal, par ruſe eſtoit montée:
Or avoit ſur ſon chef ceſte putte effrontée,
Le triple diademe, & ſon paillard eſtoit
Aupres d'elle pendu, qui ſon mal deteſtoit.

i. e. " I ſaw on a gallows that crafty woman, who " being dreſſed in men's clothes, and affecting a " great zeal, was by her artifice raiſed to the Papal " Throne. That impudent harlot had the tripple " Crown on her head, and near her hung her gallant, " who curſed her fate."

This writer, in order to make the ſtory more pleaſant, added to it, that the head groom of the Pope's ſtables was hanged with her (62), which particular no Writer ever mentioned but him (63). Here follows a paſſage from Monſieur du Pleſſis Mornai (64). " Another Martin " (65), of the Order of the Minorites, in his Chro- " nicle, entitled, Flores Temporum, adds, that this " Joan being about to lay a ſpirit, and aſking the " Devil when he would depart from that body, he " anſwered her in theſe two lines:

" Papa pater patrum, Papiſſæ pandito partum
" Et tibi tunc dicam de corpore quando recedam *.

i. e. " Tell me when a woman-Pope will be delivered " of a child, and I ſhall tell you when I ſhall leave " that body. This was wrote about the year 1370." Coeffeteau obſerves that a Miniſter named Angelocrator

(62) Alexander Coocke, in his Refutation of Florimond de Remond's book, p. m. 31. quotes theſe three lines from Mantuanus. Hic pendebat adhuc Sextum mentita virilem
Fœmina, cui triplici Phrygiam diademate mitram Extollebat apex, & Pontificalis adulter. Tom. 3. lib. 3. Alfonſi. fol. 48. edit. Francof. 1573. He adds that Mantuanus does not ſpeak of a Groom of a Stable, but in general of one who had committed adultery with her; nor does he mention any hanging but in Hell; which is probable enough.

(63) Flor. de Remond, Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 22. num. 4. folio 426 verſo.

(64) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 162.

(65) He had juſt been ſpeaking of Martin Polonus.

* Chronic. Martini Minoritæ ultimæ. Impreſ. An. 1486.

it, and as it were with fear; but Aventine denied it positively [E]. Since that time Onuphrius Panvini (e), Bellarmine (f), Serarius (g), George Scherer (h), Robert Persons (i), Florimond de Remond, Allatius, Monsieur de Launoi, Father Labbé, and several others (k), have refuted at length that old tradition. Cardinal Baronius shewed a great esteem for Florimond de Remond's work, but he was in the wrong to assert, that it bore the Hereticks down so effectually, that they were ashamed they ever mentioned that story [F]. This is so false, that even at this time the Protestants publish books in which they assert this history of Pope Joan. I imagine, that if some traditions favourable to the Popes were refuted by such strong arguments as those that are urged against the tradition

(e) In Notis ad Platinam.

(f) De Romano Pontif. lib. 3. cap. 24.

(g) Rerum Mogunt. lib. 1.

(h) In a treatise wrote on purpose. 508.

(i) In Libro de tribus Controversionibus Angliæ, part. 2. cap. 5.

(k) See the list which Father Labbe gives of them, in the 1st vol. de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. p. 837 & ſeq.

crator asserts, that she was delivered in a procession, and that the Devil spoke those fine verses in the air (66). Let us take notice that Rivet confessed in the year 1615, that he had not yet heard any thing of Angelocrator (67); and yet he was a man who had published a chronological work in 1601, with a great pomp, and who in 1618 was sent a Deputy to the Synod of Dort (68).

Here follows another particular, which seems to have been invented to answer those who object that so artful and cunning a woman as this was would have found out some manner to keep her fault secret. "God who would not suffer that such an abominable "wickedness should go unpunished, sent an Angel "to that woman-Pope, who told her that her sin "would be forgiven, provided she were delivered in "the open street without any assistance, and without "calling to any woman to come and help her in that "urgent necessity. That this would be instead of "a penance to her, and that amende honorable as a "punishment. Which she did accordingly, to obey "God's command. That Author had heard that "story from some old woman at Rome, for they "who have been willing to take the trouble to en-"quire into that matter, have told me for instance, "that several persons do still relate, that the Angel "left it to her choice, either to be delivered privately "and without disgrace, and to go to Hell, or to be "delivered publickly and to go to Heaven (69)." Florimond de Remond gives this as a particular, which a German Author, whom he does not name, has related, and then he adds; she was then very conscientious at that rate, since she chose to be delivered in the procession, though without confessing her sin, or acknowledging how she had imposed upon the Church. The story is not thus, says Scheremberg, she was delivered at Court, being seated on her See. . . . . I do not know how Serres (70) came to take it into his head that they built a house on the spot of ground where that strange accident happened, which, says he, was pulled down some time ago, though the stool be there still. . . . . Some have still more improved the story, with a design to make her delivery the more remarkable. They assert that the last scene of that wretched woman's life was acted not only in publick, in a procession, but in that solemn procession, which we celebrate on the day, which we call Corpus-Christi-Day, or the Festival of God's Body. Gio. Saxon a German has given a loose to his imagination upon this subject. There are pictures in several places of Germany, and prints in many books, and Ecclesiastical Histories in Geneva, in which that woman is represented under a canopy, holding the holy Sacrament, with her child coming from between her legs. . . . . Ignorant men, who did not know, that in the time of that woman-Pope, whom they object to us, the Festival of the holy Sacrament was not yet established, and was not appointed for many years after (71).

(66) Coeffeteau, Reponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, p. 500. He cites the 8th book of the Chronicle of Angelocrator. in Joann. 8. Papiſſ.

(67) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, part. 1. p. 594.

(68) See Vossius, de Scient. Mathemat. p. 402.

(69) Flor. de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 23. num. 3. fol. 429.

(70) It is the Author of the Inventaire de l'Hiſtoire de France.

(71) Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, cap. 23. folio 429 verſo.

[E] Æneas Sylvius . . . . . is the first who called it into question. . . . . Aventine denied it positively.] This Sylvius "observed the 20th of August 1451 * to "Juan de Carvajal Cardinal of St. Angelo, in the "conclusion of his reply to Nicholas Bishop of the "Taborites, that in the election of that woman for "a Pope there was no error in a matter of faith, nor "de jure (of right) but only an ignorance with regard "to a matter of fact; and also that that story was not † "certain (72)." Samuel des Marets observes that this Author expresses himself very faintly, and that in some other of his works he seems to have thought that the story of that woman-Pope was true. Eo quidem recurrit, ut dicat historiam non esse certam, sed tam timidè, ut satis appareat eum non loqui ex animi sententia. Ut si quid hic putarit incerti, magis forte ad circumstantias & nomen proprium hujus mulieris spectet, quam ad rei ipsius substantiam (73). . . . . Quin ipse Doctiſſ. Anacrita (74). pag. 10. Pium II. id est, hunc Æneam Sylvium, accenset iis Pontificibus qui Johannæ Pontificatum videntur agnoviſſe, eo quod Joannæ nomen cæteris Pontificum nominibus permixtum in Dominico Senensi, scriptæ ad Joannem Carvajal epistolæ immemor vel pœnitens prostare passus est. Et quod amplius est ipse Æneas Sylvius Pontifex tandem factus hanc Historiam exscripsit in 6. mundi ætate, pag. 170. operis Historici impressi Norembergæ anno 1493. per Kobergerum, inquit Johannes Gerhardi Augustanæ Confessionis Theologorum Doctissimus, Loco de Eccl. edit. in 4. p. 1004 (75). i. e. "He goes even so far as to say, that "that story is not certain, but so faintly as to shew "sufficiently he does not speak from his heart. So "that if he imagined there was any thing uncertain "herein, it related perhaps rather to the circum-"stances of the story, and the woman's firname, than "to the story itself. . . . . Nay, the most learned "Critic himself reckons Pius II. that is to say, "Æneas Sylvius, among the Popes, who seem to have "owned the story of Pope Joan, because he suffered "her name to be placed among those of the other Popes "in the Register of Sienna, as though he did not remember his letter to Juan Carvajal, or repented of what "he wrote to him. And what is stronger still, the "same Æneas Sylvius being at last chosen Pope, "transcribed that story in the 6th age of the world, "p. 170. of his historical work printed at Nuremberg in the year 1493, as is asserted by John Gerhardi, the most learned man of all the Divines of "the Augsburg Confession."

(72) Blondel, Eclairciſſement ſur la Papeſſe, p. 11.

* Epiſt. 130.

† Neque certa Hiſtoria eſt.

(73) Sam. Maresius, Examen Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, p. 8.

(74) That is to say, David Blondel.

(75) Maresius, Exam. Quæſt. p. 13.

As for Aventine, I desire all my readers to take notice of the false reasoning of the English Doctor, who has refuted Florimond de Remond's book. Here follow his words. I grant that John Aventine (76), explodes in general that story of the woman-Pope, but he gives no reasons why he explodes it thus. And farther Bellarmine slights him as an Author who deserves but little credit *, and Baronius exposes him not only as a scabby sheep, but also as a beast tainted with heresy, and entirely destitute of piety and learning †. And several of your Popes have prohibited  his history as unworthy to be read: and therefore I do not conceive how his exploding that story of Pope Joan without any reason, can in the least prejudice the truth of it (77). You see that in order to discredit the authority of Aventine, he makes an advantage of the slanders with which two Cardinals have loaded him. But on the contrary Aventine must be looked upon as a proper witness because of these very slanders (78); for Bellarmine, Baronius, and several others cry him down for no other reason but because he took a delight in abusing the Court of Rome, and we have seen above (79) that he was a true Lutheran in his heart. We must say therefore that if he had found the least probability in the story of the woman-Pope, he would have asserted it, and taken from thence an opportunity to laugh at the expence of the Popes. Such is the wrong way of arguing into which a man will fall, when, in treating a controverted point, he cavils at every thing, and will never give up the least article whatsoever.

(76) In the 4th book of the Annals of Bavaria.

* Joh. Aventin. author parum probatæ fidei, says Bellarmin. Append. ad lib. de Sum. Pont. cap. 10.

† Infectam hæreſis Scabie beſtiam pietate & doctrina omnino deſertam. Baron. An. To. 10. ad. 996. num. 54.

 In Indicibus lib. prohibitorum.

(77) Coocke, de la Papeſſe, p. 10.

(78) See F. Labbe, de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. 2. p. 920.

[F] Baronius . . . . was in the wrong to assert that Florimond de Remond's work bore the Hereticks down so effectually, that they were ashamed they ever mentioned that story.] "He looks upon it as the best work "that was ever wrote upon that subject §; and pro-"tests he would with all his heart have inserted it "into his Annals, had not the book been a little "too large. For by that work the Author, as the "Cardina

(79) In the rem. [H] of the art. AVENTINE.

§ Præ cæteris commendandus fama nobilis Florimondus, Baron. Annal. Tom. 10. ad ann. 853. num. 62.

tion of Pope Joan, they would appear to deſerve the utmoſt contempt, even to thoſe who are the moſt ſtrenuous aſſerters of that ſtory. So certain is it, that the ſame things ſeem true or falſe to us according as they are favourable to our party or to the oppoſite party.

" Cardinal obſerves again, has ſo thoroughly con-
" founded the whole band of Hereticks, who uſed
" formerly to upbraid the Catholicks with that ſtory,
" that they are now aſhamed of what they have
" ſaid *. Poſſevinus is of the ſame opinion; for he
" obſerves, that Remond has killed the Hereticks
" quite; and that ſince the publication of that book,
" they have not one ſingle word to ſay for them-
" ſelves †: they dare no longer mention a Pope
" Joan (80)." Baronius and Poſſevinus were not well informed: Florimond de Remond's book was deſpiſed by the Proteſtants, and did not make them alter their opinion. A Miniſter of Bearn wrote againſt it. See what Florimond anſwers him in the ſecond edition of his work (81). He ſpeaks of a certain man . . . . to whom alſo he ſhall not be forced to reply no more than to that other, adds he, who under the fictitious name of Jeſſean Count of Malta, has made his cauſe worſe by his very defenſe. This man in his Codicil promiſes us many wonders, and among other things to expoſe the dreams and ſilly arguments of him, who wrote a book to ſhew that the ſtory of Pope Joan is nothing but a vulgar error (82). Monſieur du Pleſſis Mornai knew what Remond wrote, and yet he declared himſelf ſtrongly for thoſe who hold that the ſtory of the woman-Pope is true, and he urged all their arguments. It was in a book which he publiſhed in 1611 (83). Coeffeteau refuted it as well as he could (84): but he was refuted in his turn by Andrew Rivet (85), who aſſerted that there is nothing in the Hiſtory of Pope Joan capable to deprive us of our judgment, or of a good conſcience, if we hold that to be true, as we do ſtill, though the Monk (86) ſhould run mad for it, which has been tranſmitted down in writing to poſterity (87). The book in which he ſpeaks thus was printed in the year 1615: it was then but three years after Conrad Decker had publiſhed a book at Oppenheim, De Papa Romano & Papiſſa Romana quod Joannes octavus fuerit mulier & puerpera. i. e. " Of the Pope of Rome, and of the " woman-Pope, proving that John VIII. was a wo-
" man, and bore a child;" and it was but five years ſince Vignier a Miniſter of Blois, had aſſerted the ſame opinion (88). James Capel, a Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Sedan, maintained (88*) in the year 1619 that the ſtory of Pope Joan is true; it was in his anſwer to Father Coton's objections. Alexander Coocke made a book on purpoſe to anſwer Remond, and to vindicate the Hiſtory of the woman-Pope, and to anſwer all the objections of the Roman Catholicks. His work was tranſlated out of Engliſh into French, and printed at Sedan in 1633. Another Engliſhman, Profeſſor of Divinity at Weſel, publiſhed a book of the ſame kind, and about the ſame time (89). There is no man but knows that David Blondel's work was anſwered in the year 1655 by an Advocate of Rouen, and in the year 1651 by a Miniſter of Groningen, and that the great Salmaſius had promiſed to refute it (90). It is well known alſo that Hottinger wrote a treatiſe on purpoſe to ſupport the tradition of the woman-Pope; and that Zuinger, Profeſſor of Divinity at Baſil, maintained the ſame opinion in his book De Feſto Corporis Chriſti, printed in the year 1685. Mr. Megerlin, Profeſſor of Mathematicks at Baſil, had but lately aſſerted the ſame Theſis in his Diſquiſitio Chronologica de Joanna Papiſſa, (Chronological enquiry concerning Pope Joan.) Spanhemius, Divinity Profeſſor at Leyden, publiſhed a pretty large book in 1691, to ſupport the ſame opinion (91). I could mention ſeveral other Proteſteſtants (92), who ſince Florimond de Remond have aſſerted the tradition which he endeavoured to refute. Nothing therefore is more frivolous nor more falſe, than the commendation which Baronius and Poſſevinus beſtowed upon Remond, namely, that he has ſilenced the Proteſtants, and loaded them with ſhame.

We meet with the ſame extravagancy in theſe words of Father Maimbourg (93). " The moſt
" learned Miniſters of the pretended Reformed Re" ligion were aſhamed that thoſe of their own party
" ſhould admit ſuch a groſs error, which is a diſgrace
" to all thoſe who maintain it, either out of igno" rance, or out of paſſion, or becauſe they think
" themſelves under ſome obligation to aſſert it.
" Blondel, one of the ableſt men among them
" has even laboured to underceive them in a learned
" diſſertation which he wrote upon that ſubject.
" Some of the ſame Sect, as for inſtance, Samuel " des Marets, took offence at it, and attempted to " refute it, on purpoſe to aſſert ſuch a palpable falſity,
" which has now loſt all its credit. But the late Fa" ther Labbe,* a learned Jeſuit, to whom we are in" debted, among other learned works, for the great-
" eſt part of the laſt compilation of the Councils
" of the Paris Edition, has ſo effectually diſarmed
" him, and ſo well puniſhed his inconſiderate igno" rance, in his refutation (94) of that fable, which " is to be met with in the eighth volume of his Coun" cils, that I cannot think any of that Miniſter
" of Groningen's brethren will venture again to " enter the liſt, in order to defend ſo bad a cauſe,
" which is ſo abſolutely given up by all men of " ſenſe even among the Proteſtants. For they ac" knowledge at laſt ſincerely, that there was never
" any other Pope Joan but this John VIII. to whom " that ridiculous name was given, becauſe he ſhewed
" ſo little courage in aſſerting the decrees of a gene" ral Council, and of his Predeceſſors againſt Pho-
" tius." All this abounds with exaggerations and downright falſities. For ſince Father Labbé's treatiſe has been publiſhed, the Proteſtants have continued to write as they did before, in defenſe of the ſtory of Pope Joan. In the year 1662 they reprinted at Helmſtad Hiſtoria Joannis VIII. Romani Pontificis, virum primum ſimulantis, poſtea ſexum ſuum partu in publica via edito prodentis, à Jeſuitarum in primis technis vindicata. i. e. " The Hiſtory of John VIII. Pope
" of Rome, who firſt pretended to be a man, and " then betrayed her ſex being delivered of a child
" in the publick ſtreet; vindicated chiefly againſt
" the objections of the Jeſuits." To this work were added ſome collections of Berneggerus relating to the ſame ſubject (95). This being only a new edition, I do not inſiſt upon it. But to the Authors I have already mentioned, I ſhall add John Lehman, who publiſhed at Wittemberg in 1669, Infelix puerperium Joannis Pontificis. (i. e. The unhappy delivery of Pope John) and John Daniel Artopæus, who wrote a treatiſe, De Joanne VIII. Papiſſa, (of John VIII. a woman-Pope) printed at Leipſic in 1673 (96), and Mr. Maier (97), who in his treatiſe De Pontificis Romani Electione, (of the Election of the Popes) (98), printed at Hamburg in 1690, admits and ſupports the opinion, that there has really been a woman-Pope, tho' he acknowledges that the arguments of Allatius and Blondel had formerly raiſed ſome difficulties in his mind. Could I forget Monſieur Miſſon (99), who argues ſtrongly, and at ſeveral times for the common tradition, and who ſhews even a great contempt for Blondel's arguments, and acquaints us (100), that an Engliſh Doctor has lately compoſed a work upon this ſubject of the woman-Pope, which has not yet been printed, and in which he urges with a great deal of ſtrength an authority extracted from the Chronicles of the antient Monaſtery of Canterbury. He quotes (101) Monſieur le Sueur a French Miniſter as one of the aſſertors of the Hiſtory of the woman-Pope, and as one of thoſe who has alledged the ſtory of the two copies of Anaſtaſius ſent to Marc Freherus. The book in which Monſieur le Sueur does this is an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, the ſeventh part of which, which treats of the ninth Century, was printed at Geneva in 1686.

It is true that there have been ſome Miniſters, who gave no credit to what is related concerning the woman-Pope (102.) Peucer, if we may truſt to Remond's authority, did not believe it neither. He ſhewed that he was more conſcientious than the reſt, theſe are Remond's words, and though he was an enemy to the Catholick Religion and the holy Fathers, yet he judged that what was reported of Pope Joan was a mere

* Sic confecit monſtrum iſtud, ut novatores pudeat quæ ſcripſerunt vel ſomniaſſe. Idem.

† Prorſus confodit hæreticos qui commentum illud ſparſerunt in vulgus, ut amplius ea de fabula biſcere non audeant. In Apparat. Sac. verbo Florimondus.

(80) Coocke, de la Papeſſe, p. 2 and 3.

(81) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 7. num. 5. folio 380 verſo. He deſcribes him only by theſe two letters, R. T. and replies to him towards the end of his work.

(82) Ibid. chap. 2. num. 3. folio 365 verſo, and folio 366.

(83) Intitled, Myſtere d'Iniquité. See there, p. 161, &c.

(84) In his Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 504, &c.

(85) In his Remarques ſur la Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, 1 part. p. 590.

(86) That is to ſay, Coeffeteau.

(87) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 590. He held the ſame opinion when he anſwered the Jeſuit Petra Sancta, in the year 1635. See his works, p. 587.

(88) See the rem. [L].

(88*) See his Inſtruction Chreſtienne reponſive au 1 Tome de l'Inſtitution du P. Coton, p. 514 & ſeq.

(89) See the rem. [B] of the art. FRANC.

(90) See the rem. [I] of the art. BLONDEL (David).

(91) Intitled, de Papa fœmina inter Leonem IV & Benedictum III. Diſquiſitio Hiſtorica.

(94) It is the diſſertation intitled, Cenotaphium Joannæ Papiſſæ . . . everſum, which he has inſerted at the end of the 1ſt vol. de Script. Eccleſ. printed at Paris in the year 1660.

(95) See Sagittarius, Introd. in Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. 686.

(96) See Sagitt. ibid.

(97) John Frederic, Profeſſor of Divinity at Kiel, and at Hamburg.

(98) Page 244 & ſeq.

(99) In the 2d vol. of his Voiage d'Italie, p. 178 & ſeq. p. 202 & ſeq. and p. 306. edit. of 1696.

(100) Preface to the 3d vol.

(101) Page 203 of the 2d vol. SOME PROTESTANTS who did not believe the ſtory of Pope Joan.

(102) See the rem. [I] of the art. BLONDEL (David), towards the end.

(92) See the names of ſome of them in the Introductio in Hiſtor. Eccleſ. of Gaſpar. Sagittarius, p. 686, and in the rem. of the article RADULPHUS, towards the end. (93) Maimb. Hiſt. du Schiſme des Grecs, liv. 2. under the year 881. p. 202, 203. of the 1ſt vol.

party [G]. It was owing to the ſame inſtance of prepoſſeſſion, that the controverſy concerning mere fable, and would give it no place in his Chronicle. He followed perhaps Melanchthon's Memoirs, who was the moſt modeſt man of all thoſe who ſwerved from the Church (103). The Jeſuit Gretſer (104) has quoted ſome paſſages from a ſmall piece compoſed by a Proteſtant, and printed in 1588 with this title, Simplex narratio indicans et exponens meretriculam quandam Anglam nunquam Papam fuiſſe, neque unquam in rerum natura extitiſſe, et unde figmentum illud originem duxiſſe credatur. i. e. "A plain account, ſhewing that a "certain Engliſh Proſtitute was never a Pope, and "did never exiſt in nature, and explaining what is "thought to have given riſe to that ſtory." Let us not omit Curcellæus, an Arminian Profeſſor at Amſterdam, who declared himſelf for Blondel's opinion, whoſe Latin book, in which the ſtory of the woman-Pope is refuted, he cauſed to be printed. He obſerved farther in the Preface which he added to it (105); 1. That Boxhornius (106) Profeſſor at Leyden had given his approbation plainly enough to Blondel's opinion; 2. That he was told that George Calixtus (107) and Herman Conringius, both celebrated Profeſſors at Helmſtad, approved it alſo. He quoted (108) a paſſage from Nicholas Vignier, by which it plainly appears, that that learned Proteſtant Hiſtorian did not believe the ſtory of Pope Joan. I add that Geſſelius, a Phyſician of Utrecht, approved David Blondel's book (109), and that Dr. Cave and Dr. Burnet (110) think the tradition of the woman-Pope is fabulous. I add alſo that Schoockius, Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Groningen, was one among thoſe who maintained the ſtory of Pope Joan publickly and with ſome warmth, but that at laſt he acknowledged the falſity of it (111). He had declared in one of his works that he had altered his opinion, and yet, to avoid giving offence, he cut out that paſſage, and cauſed other leaves to be printed inſtead of it, according to the advice of his Collegues: but when Blondel's work was publiſhed, he did not think it proper to be ſo cautious any longer, and printed in a ſecond edition, what he had ſuppreſſed in the firſt; and he confeſſed that having compared every one of that Miniſter's arguments, with the anſwers that were made to them, he had found the anſwers were of no weight at all, and ſerved rather to confirm than to refute Blondel's opinion (112). Legi & expendi poſtea quam diligenter, quæ τῷ πάνυ Blondello ab exceſſu objecta fuerunt: Sed ingenue profiteri debeo, hæc omnia mihi videri κωφὰ βέλη. Reſponſiones minus ſolidæ adverſariæ ſententiæ firmandæ magis quam evertendæ ſerviunt (113). We ſhall ſee hereunder (114) what has been obſerved of Caſaubon.

After all, it is but juſt to acknowledge that Florimond de Remond's work is not bad in its kind, and I do not think that any perſon had better refuted the ſtory of the woman-Pope before him. But yet he has committed many blunders (115), and uſed too many digreſſions, and too many declamations. I ſhall tranſcribe here an abſtract from a letter, by which it appears that Juſtus Lipſius judged that his arguments were very convincing. De quæſtiuncula quod petis, ſuper pontifice Joanna fœmina, ut nugantur; vides, quid ſentiam cum appello nugas. Revera fabella eſt haud longè ab audacia & ineptiis Poëtarum. Vis clarè tu & conſortes illi rem videre? Adito Librum gallicè nuper ſcriptum & editum Burdigalis, Auctore Florimundo Remundo, Conſiliario Regio, qui totus eſt in hoc argumento, auctor ipſe ad me miſit & ita planè omnia exſecutus eſt, ut nobis nihil reliqui ſit, præter credere & aſſentiri (116). i. e. "You conſult me about that little ſtory (of Pope "Joan). How they trifle! You may judge what I "think of it, ſince I call it a trifle. It is indeed but "a fable, not much unlike the bold fictions of the "Poets. If you and your Collegues have a mind to "be fully acquainted with this matter, read a French "book written and publiſhed at Bourdeaux, by Flori-"mond de Remond, Counſellor to the King, which is "entirely upon that ſubject, he has ſent it to me, and "has handled his ſubject ſo well, that we have no-"thing elſe to do but to ſubmit and believe." Let us obſerve, that there are many perſons, who aſſert that the Jeſuit Richeome is the true Author of that work (117). And yet there is a prodigious difference as to the manner of writing, between Richeome's works and this; and it is by no means probable, that the blunders, which are to be met with in the book publiſhed under Florimond de Remond's name, could drop from the pen of a man, whom the Jeſuits conſidered at that time, as the beſt French Writer.

[G] The ſame things ſeem true or falſe to us, according as they are favourable to our party, or to the oppoſite party.] This maxim cannot be called into queſtion but by thoſe, who behold the things of this world without any attention, and without reflecting ſeriouſly upon what paſſes before their eyes. That diſtemper of prepoſſeſſion would not be very dangerous, if men would determine themſelves in favour of their particular inclination, in ſuch caſes only in which the arguments which affect the underſtanding are equal on both ſides: but men go much farther: the party to which they are addicted carries the ſcale, though the arguments for it be a great deal weaker, than thoſe which are urged againſt it. This is, no doubt, the reaſon why it is difficult for Judges to acquit themſelves of their duty as they ought to do. Montagne had a very juſt thought upon this ſubject. "Though a "Judge be never ſo well reſolved to do juſtice, un-"leſs he be moſt attentively cautious, which few per-"ſons care to be, his mind will be eaſily biaſſed. "His inclination for a friend, for a relation, the im-"preſſion a beautiful woman makes on his heart, a "ſpirit of revenge, and not only theſe powerful mo-"tives, but even a fortuitous inſtinct, which makes us "favour one party rather than the other, without "the concurrence of our reaſon, fixes our choice "between two ſubjects otherwiſe alike; theſe things, "I ſay, may influence his judgment, determine him "for or againſt a certain cauſe, and bear the ſcale "down (118). . . . I have heard of a Judge, who "when he met with a great oppoſition between Bar-"tolus and Baldus, on ſome point ſubject to many "controverſies, uſed to write in the margin of the "book, a queſtion for a friend; that is to ſay, that "the matter was ſo intricate, and ſo much contro-"verted, that if he had ſuch a cauſe to judge, he "might give it for the party he liked beſt. Had it "not been for want of wit and underſtanding, he "might have put every where, a queſtion for a friend. "The Lawyers and Judges of our time find means "enough to give any cauſe whatſoever ſuch a turn as "they think fit. That boundleſs ſcience, depending on "the authority of ſo many different opinions, and re-"lating to ſuch an undetermined ſubject, cannot but oc-"caſion an exceſſive variety of judgments. Nor is there "indeed a caſe ſo plain, but the Judges differ in their "opinions about it. What one Court has determined, "another Court determines quite contrarywiſe, and "even the ſame Court at different times. Of which "we ſee daily ſeveral inſtances; by that licentiouſ-"neſs, which is a diſgrace to the ceremonious autho-"rity of our Courts of Juſtice, and tarniſhes their "glory, I mean that licentiouſneſs of not adhering "to the decrees, and going from one Court to ano-"ther, for the determination of one and the ſame "cauſe (119)."

There are few perſons, who have power enough over their own heart, not to bear the ſcale down by the weight of their friendſhip, when the arguments are perfectly equal on both ſides. Friendſhip carries it generally even, when the reaſons of the party we like are the lighteſt. Hatred is more active ſtill; and Iſidorus of Peluſium obſerves very well, that if Favour is ſhort-ſighted, hatred and anger are ſtone-blind (120). Blondel obſerves, that men took a pride in making the truth of that maxim appear in their controverſies about the woman-Pope (121). Is it not well known that Bellarmine, Baronius, and many more who wrote againſt the ſtory of that woman, maintain with might and main ſeveral traditions, as ill, or even worſe grounded than that? The ſtrength of the negative argument, the ſilence continued for ſeveral ages, the inconſiſtencies, the credulity, and a thouſand other defects of the vouchers, do not hinder Baronius from taking the affirmative ſide of the queſtion, and even from falling into a paſſion againſt thoſe who are of another opinion, ſo that whilſt he is pleading his own

(103) Flor. de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 6. num. 5. folio 378.

(104) Gretſ. in Examine Myſterii Pleſſæani, p. 301.

(105) Pag. 322.

(106) In his Univerſal Hiſtory.

(107) F. Labbe, de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. 1. p. 932, reckons him among the aſſertors of the ſtory of Pope Joan, and he is in the right, for there is in Calixtus's book, de Conjugio Clericorum, a long digreſſion, in which he vindicates the ſtory of the woman-Pope.

(108) P. m. 319.

(109) Timannus Geſſelius, Hiſt. Sacra & Eccleſ. Tom. 2. edit. ult. 1661. in 4to. See F. Labbe, in Cenotaphio everſo, ad calcem Tom. 1. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 986.

(110) I have quoted their words in the rem. [B] of the art. POLONUS.

(111) Martin. Schoock. Fab. Hamel. in Præf. and in cap. 22. part. 2. edit. Gron. 1662.

(112) Idem, in Præf.

(113) Schoock. Fab. Hamer. part. 2. cap. 12. p. 124.

(114) In the rem. [L].

(115) There is a liſt of them in Blondel's works upon this queſtion.

(116) Lipſius, Epiſt. ad Aub. Miræum, inſerta in Not. Miræi ad Sigebertum, apud Gretſer. in Myſta Salmurienſi, p. 300.

(117) See the rem. [C] of the art. REMOND.

(118) Montage, Eſſais, liv. 2. chap. 12. p. m. 426, 427.

(119) Ibidem, p. m. 460, 461.

(120) Iſid. Peluſiota, lib. 1. epiſt. 310, quoted by Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 79.

(121) Blondel, ibidem.

concerning the woman-Pope was thought to be of the greateſt conſequence againſt the Church of Rome (l), but after all it would be but a mere trifle (m) : for the objections that may be grounded upon it, are not more perplexing than thoſe which are grounded on cauſe he looks upon thoſe objections to be very bad, which he urges as very ſtrong arguments when he is arguing againſt his antagoniſts. Is not this judging of things according to one's paſſion, and turning them now one way, and then another, according as one is influenced by his intereſt and prepoſſeſſion ?

(l) Coocke, de la Papeſſe Jeanne, p. 273.

(m) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 96.

Can it not be ſaid, that they, who maintain with ſo much warmth, that the ſtory of the woman-Pope is true, mind the intereſt of their own cauſe more than the weight and ſtrength of the argument ? For if they were not biaſſed, would they not remember, that the ſilence of contemporary Writers appeared often to them an invincible argument againſt a thouſand traditions, which the Church of Rome admits ? Could they ſay with a good conſcience, that if a tradition, diſhonourable to the Albigenſes, were ſupported by the ſame proofs, and refuted by the ſame objections as that of Pope Joan, they would paſs the ſame judgment on thoſe proofs and objections, as they do in the controverſy relating to that woman-Pope ? Is it not certain that in ſuch a caſe they would laugh at thoſe proofs, and look upon the objections as demonſtrative arguments ? Would they not aſſert, that thoſe arguments cannot be evaded but by downright cavils, and that the pains which ſome people might take to invent exceptions, would be in reality like the artifice of an attorney, who labours only to make a cauſe depend for ever ?

To a man void of all prepoſſeſſion the negative argument would be a ſufficient reaſon for exploding the whole romance of the woman-Pope. I do not pretend to ſuppoſe thereby, that with regard to all kinds of facts the ſilence of the contemporary Writers is a good reaſon to reject them. One cannot pretend this but with regard to remarkable events, as for inſtance Charles the Fifth's retirement into a Convent, and with regard to material and capital circumſtances of an action, which could be unknown to no man, and which it would be abſurd to hope that future ages will have not the leaſt knowledge of. I place in that rank the manner in which Henry II. Henry III. and Henry IV. died, the firſt being killed in a Tournament, the ſecond being murdered by a Monk during the Siege of Paris, and the third aſſaſſinated in his coach in the open ſtreet of the ſame city. It is impoſſible to conceive that all the Hiſtorians who lived in the 16th and 17th Century, ſhould have been obſtinately bent, or conſpired together not to ſay a word of Charles the Fifth's abdication, or of the tragical circumſtances of the death of theſe three Henry's. Take notice that I do not conſider here the ſilence of contemporary Writers in general ; I know very well that it is poſſible that the Authors of pious or moral books, who lived in the 16th or 17th Century, ſhould mention occaſionally ſeveral actions of theſe four Princes, without telling us how and where they died : I ſpeak only of thoſe, who wrote either the particular Hiſtory of thoſe Monarchs, or the Hiſtory of Spain and France, or the general Hiſtory of Europe. It were a prodigy or a monſter more ſtrange than all thoſe which Livy mention, not only, if all theſe Hiſtorians were ſilent with regard to the particulars I have been ſpeaking of, but even if ſeven or eight of the moſt conſiderable Writers had omitted them. Let us put the caſe that in the 24th Century there will be but ſeven or eight of the beſt Hiſtorians extant, who lived under Charles V. and under Henry IV. or a little after, and that they who ſhall be alive at that time, do not meet with the leaſt hint of Charles the Fifth's abdication, and of the murthers of Henry III. and Henry IV. but in ſome pitiful Annaliſt of the 19th Century ; I maintain that they would be the moſt raſh and the moſt credulous of all men, if they ſhould give credit to that Annaliſt, and to an hundred others, who had tranſcribed from him. This may eaſily be applied to the controverſy about the woman-Pope. I have prevented the objection of thoſe, who might take it into their head, that all the Annaliſts who lived in thoſe days, are not now extant. It is enough for my purpoſe, that we have ſtill ſome of the moſt conſiderable. But in order to ſhew people evidently, that it was impoſſible the Hiſtorians of the 9th Century ſhould have ſuppreſſed ſo extraordinary a particular, as the raiſing the pretended Joan to the Papal Throne, I ſhall uſe a little fiction. I ſhall ſuppoſe that an Author of the 11th Century gave us the following account.

Charles the Great wiſhed ſo paſſionately to be ſucceeded by a ſon, that he was extremely vexed to ſee that his wife was barren. She proved pregnant at laſt ; he was overjoyed at it ; but as ſhe was delivered of a daughter only, his uneaſineſs came again upon him, and not truſting much to futurity, he reſolved to make his daughter paſs for a ſon, and called her name Pepin. Six years after the Queen was pregnant again, and was delivered of a male child : but that the publick might know nothing of the cheat that was put upon them, the father and mother continued to conceal the ſex of their firſt child ; ſo that after the death of Charles the Great, his daughter, who paſſed for a man, was crowned without any difficulty. The impoſture was diſcovered the third year of her reign, after this manner. She had ſummoned her Parliament to meet, and as ſhe was going thither with all the pomp imaginable, her labour-pains came upon her, ſhe was delivered before that auguſt aſſembly, and died on the ſpot. This appeared ſo abominable, that the Parliament deteſted that place, and would no longer meet there. They alſo took the neceſſary meaſures to prevent ſuch an accident for the future, and it was ordered that before the Coronation one of the twelve Peers of the Kingdom ſhould put his hand in a proper place to know whether the perſon to be crowned were a man or a woman. This is a ſtory which reſembles that of the woman-Pope as much as can be.

Let us not urge the parallel too rigorouſly, let us weaken it : we do not want to improve all the advantage we have. Let us ſuppoſe that the Annaliſt ended the ſtory otherwiſe, and related that the ſecond year of that Pepin's reign, Prince Lewis, who was really Charles the Great's eldeſt ſon, claimed the Crown, becauſe Pepin was but a daughter, who by the Salic Law could not inherit the Crown. The Civil War which aroſe on that occaſion was very ſevere ; Pepin refuſed to ſuffer himſelf to be viſited, but the city of Paris revolting, he was taken by force in his Palace, and ſtript quite naked, and it being found out of what ſex he was, he was dethroned, and confined to a Convent, and Lewis was raiſed to the Throne in his ſtead.

This ſtory is ſo ſurprizing, whether it be related after the firſt manner, or after the ſecond, that as it is not to be met with in any Author of the 9th Century or even of the 10th, it deſerves to be exploded, as a ſtory which is much like that of John Paris, or of Peter of Provence, and the beautiful Maguelonne, or of Lancelot of the Lake, &c, for it is morally, and even phyſically impoſſible, that all the contemporary Hiſtorians ſhould omit the ſtory of that Pepin, and ſuppoſe that Lewis the Debonnair was the immediate Succeſſor of Charles the Great, and that we ſhould not meet with any deed belonging to the reign of that diſguiſed woman ; not one ſingle letter wrote nor received, not one Embaſſador ſent, no peace concluded, no war declared. See the margin (122). I had rather a man ſhould tell me, that in the year 1694, the Engliſh took Marſeilles and Toulon, putting all on fire, and to the ſword, as far as the very gates of Arles, and then retired loaded with plunder : that all this is very true, though neither the newspapers of that year, nor any other book or pamphlet on the affairs of that time mention one ſingle word of it.

(122) I make that obſervation, becauſe it does not appear, that the woman-Pope, during the two years and four months ſhe is ſuppoſed to have kept the Papal See, anſwered any letter, wrote any, or received any, or did the leaſt thing in the world, though ſhe is ſuppoſed to have had ſo much wit. F. Labbe, Cænotaphio everſo, p. 925, 926, urges that argument very ſtrongly, and in a jocoſe manner.

A REFUTATION of the objections made againſt the negative argument.

The ſtrength of the negative argument will appear more plainly, after we ſhall have refuted thoſe who endeavour to account for that great ſilence of the contemporary Hiſtorians. They obſerve that that woman's Popedom was thought to be ſuch a diſgrace to on facts and principles acknowledged by the Roman Catholicks themſelves. Beza mentioned the woman-Pope in his Oration at the Conference of Poiſſi. Somebody has aſſerted to the Church of Rome, that it was prohibited to mention her: wherefore the Authors were ſilent upon her ſubject, ſome out of fear, others out of zeal. But one may make ſuch a reply to that argument as overthrows it entirely.

I. It may be obſerved in the firſt place, that it is not true that the ſtory of that woman was looked upon as a diſgrace to the Roman Catholick profeſſion, nor as an event which did in the leaſt affect the rights of the Church of Rome: for according to her principles, thoſe rights do not depend from the perſonal qualifications of the Popes. Joan's crime conſiſted only in her not living chaſtely, but not in her being delivered in the midſt of the ſtreet. Such a delivery would have been the effect of chance, or of imprudence, and could not conſequently aggravate the moral fault ſhe had committed. She is therefore guilty only of not keeping her virginity. How then can you pretend, that for this reaſon Rome muſt acknowledge herſelf loaded with ſuch an infamy, as ought to be blotted out of the memory of man; Rome, I ſay, which does not conceal the wicked lives of ſeveral Popes, who before and after they were elected, abandoned themſelves to a ſtill more abominable diſſoluteneſs. The election of Joan was honourable to the Romans, for ſhe was a perſon eminent for her learning and her morals (123). Not to have known her ſex was an error only as to matter of fact, and an innocent error; for no man can be anſwerable for the ſecret amours of a diſguiſed woman. It is ſo true that the ſtory of the woman-Pope is no diſgrace to the Church of Rome, that Monſieur Jurieu himſelf, for all he is Monſieur Jurieu, acknowledges it. I do not find, ſays he (124), that it concerns us much to prove the truth of that ſtory of Pope Joan. Though the Papal See had been filled by a woman, the Electors taking her for a man, and though that woman had been afterwards delivered of a child in a publick proceſſion, as it is ſuppoſed ſhe was, this, in my opinion, would not be a ſtrong preſumption againſt the Church of Rome: and the advantage we might reap from it is not ſo great as to deſerve that we ſhould enter into a ſmart controverſy upon that ſubject. I find even that that ſtory, after the manner it is related, does more honour to the Roman See than it deſerves. It is reported that this woman-Pope had ſtudied very well, that ſhe had a great deal of learning, capacity, and eloquence: that ſhe was admired at Rome for thoſe noble talents, and that ſhe was unanimouſly choſen, though ſhe appeared there only as a young ſtranger, unknown, without any friends, and without any other recommendation but her own merit. I maintain, that to ſuppoſe a young man, and a ſtranger, was raiſed to that high dignity on the account of his merit only, is doing a great deal of honour to the See of Rome: for it is well known that no man was ever promoted to it but by cabals and factions. You ſee there a Miniſter, who adds weight to the following obſervation of Florimond de Remond. "But ſuppoſe the Church had been ſo "unfortunate as that a woman was raiſed to the See "of Rome, ſince ſhe roſe to it by her policy and "artifices, and impoſed upon all the world by the "ſhew and appearance of her virtue and holy life, "the blame ought to be laid upon her alone, and "not upon the Electors, who going the common way "to work, and acting with ſincerity, without cabals "and without ſecret practices, cannot be charged "with being concerned in the fraud (125)." That Author adds, that this accident, if it were true, would not be ſo monſtrous, as what has been practiſed by thoſe, who have called themſelves Reformed, Evangelicks, and Puritans, who have not only ſuffered, but even appointed, nay, forced ſome Queens and Princeſſes to ſtyle and declare themſelves Heads of the Church in their States and Dominions, diſpoſing of every thing that is holy and ſacred, and of all the Church-Preferments according to their own will and pleaſure. He had no doubt read that reflection in Alanus Copus (126), or in Genebrard (127).

II. It may be replied in the ſecond place, that it is by no means probable that Rome ever forbad to mention ſo publick and extraordinary an event as that was. Such a prohibition had been very ineffectual. Men are not uſed thus to expoſe their authority by orders of ſuch a nature as not to be obeyed, and which are more proper to give people an itch of ſpeaking, than to ſtop their mouth (128).

III. Add to this, in the third place, that if either zeal or fear had been the cauſe of the Hiſtorian's ſilence, we ſhould not find that the firſt, who publiſhed the ſtory of Pope Joan, were perſons entirely devoted to the Catholick party, and more likely to be puniſhed than any others, for they were Monks. It is certain, that moſt of thoſe who related that ſtory, were very good Papiſts, and not in the leaſt inclined to publiſh ſlanders againſt their Church.

IV. Obſerve in the fourth place, that the diſorders of the Court of Rome, infinitely more diſgraceful than that girl's exaltation to the Papal See would be, have been ingenuouſly deſcribed by many Authors, who were very zealous for the Court of Rome (129).

V. I aſſert in the laſt place, that it cannot be ſuppoſed without inconſiſtency, that there was a prohibition ever to mention the woman-Pope; for ſuch a prohibition would be utterly inconſiſtent with the chief particulars of the whole relation. Blondel has not omitted that obſervation: here follow his words. "Several perſons ..... imagined they could vindi- "cate Marianus's romance againſt the objection "grounded on a ſilence which continued above two "hundred years, by aſſerting that the Authors, who "lived ſince the year 855 to the year 1050, forbore "mentioning that ſtory, becauſe they were aſhamed "of it; wherefore they choſe rather to alter the "ſucceſſion of the Popes, by a wilful ſilence, than "by relating an odious truth, to preſerve the exe- "crable memory of that proſtitute, who (as it is "pretended) diſgraced the ſucceſſion of the Popes "by intruding herſelf into it. For not to urge now, "that the contemporary Authors (as we have proved "above) relate ſome true particulars inconſiſtent with "that ſuppoſition, which was born after their death; "they who dwelt at Rome, as Nicholas I. and Wil- "liam, and Anaſtaſius the Librarian, had been very "weak, if they had imagined, that by means of "their ſilence and their ſhame, they could bury in "oblivion that infamy, which is ſuppoſed to have "filled Rome with aſtoniſhment, indignation, and "ſcandal, to ſuch a degree, that ſhe could not be "ſatisfied but by immortalizing the effect of her "juſt reſentment, and giving perpetual proofs of it "to poſterity, by ſetting up a ſtatue repreſenting the "cauſe of her anger, by making the proceſſion march "another way, and by introducing a cuſtom unheard "of before, and not very decent (130)." Florimond de Remond had urged the ſame argument a long time before (131). And yet Monſieur du Pleſſis Mornai took no manner of notice of it. Onuphrius aſſerts, that Anaſtaſius, who lived at that time, does not mention it; nor Regino, nor ſeveral others, who came after them. To all which it may be anſwered, that to argue ab auctoritate negative, is no concluſive way of arguing. Ranulphus alſo in his Polychronicon would anſwer him, that this ſtory was omitted by them, becauſe it is diſgraceful (132). Coeffeteau's anſwer with regard to theſe words of Ranulphus is remarkable. "This would be ſomething, ſays he (133), if theſe "Authors had not filled the Roman See with a true "Pope at that time, and had left a vacant interval "long enough to make that proſtitute be delivered "of her baſtard. But farther, where is here the "conſcience of the Reformed? They pretend that "in order to ſhew how much that infamy was deteſt- "ed, and to perpetuate the memory of that ſcandal, "there was a Chapel built at Rome on the ſpot where "Joan was delivered, and a ſtatue of marble ſet up "there repreſenting the fact, and the uſe of indecent "chairs introduced, that ſuch a thing might never "happen for the future: and yet they aſſert that "the Hiſtorians did not dare to mention it out "of reſpect for the Popes. Is there the leaſt ap- "pearance or ſhadow of truth in ſuch incoherent "ſtuff?" Rivet, who refuted Coeffeteau, and followed him almoſt ſtep by ſtep, replied nothing to that paſſage. I have not yet met with any ſolution as to

(123) Cum in urbe & vita & ſcientia magnæ opinionis eſſet. Martin. Polonus.

(124) Jurieu, Apologie pour la Reformation, Tom. 2. p. 38. edit. in 4to.

(125) Flor. de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 11. num. 5. folio 391.

(126) He pretends that the Engliſh, who appointed Queen Elizabeth Head of the Church, committed a greater crime than that of the Electors of the woman-Pope would have been. See the 8th chapter of his firſt Dialogue, p. 39.

(127) Genebrard. Chron. lib. 4. ad ann. 858. p. m. 540.

(128) See Flor. de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 28. folio 442.

(129) See the ſame, ibid. chap. 15. num. 2. folio 402 verſo.

(130) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 78, 79.

(131) Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 22. num. 1. and chap. 24. num. 6.

(132) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 161.

(133) Coeffeteau, Repunſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 505, 506.

asſerted in a printed book, that the whole Papal Tribe looked with ſhame, at the bare recital of that Hiſtory (n). Florimond de Remond maintains (o), that this is falſe, and wiſhed to this particular in the writings of thoſe who vindicate the ſtory of the woman-Pope. They have imitated Homer,

(n) See Flor. de Remond, in his Treatiſe of l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 6. num. 6. folio m. 378 verſo.

(o) Ibidem.

Who what he can't improve he lets alone (134).

(134) Et quæ Deſperat tractata niteſcere poſſe, relinquit. Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 149.

A REFUTATION of an Author who endeavoured to ſolve the contradiction, which is objected.

This muſt not be underſtood as though I pretended to aſſert, that I know of no man who attempted to remove the contradiction. I know that Alexander Coocke has examined it, and imagined that he extricated himſelf pretty well out of it (135); but I know alſo, that it had been better for the cauſe he aſſerted, if he had ſaid nothing. He ſuppoſes, that there were different opinions; ſome thought it was proper to bury the ſtory of the woman-Pope in oblivion, others maintained it was neceſſary to ſet up publick monuments to perpetuate the memory of it. He quotes two inſtances of ſuch a diverſity of opinions, the one is, that there were ſome Papiſts in France who denied that John Chaſtel was inſtructed by the Jeſuits to murder Henry IV. King of France, becauſe they would not make the Jeſuits odious: and yet there were others at Paris who helped to ſet up the pyramid near the Court-hall, by which the whole is notified (136). The other inſtance is, that there were ſome perſons who judged, that the writing preſented to Paul III. concerning the reformation of abuſes, deſerved to be placed among the publick records; others thought it deſerved rather to be burnt; which appears evidently from this, namely, that the ſaid memorial is inſerted in the edition of the Council, which Crab publiſhed in the year 1551, and yet it is put in Paul the Third's Index of prohibited books . . . . and was left out of the edition of the Councils publiſhed by Dominicus Nicolinus at Venice, auſpiciis Sixti Quinti, by the authority of Sixtus V. in 1585, and alſo out of Severinus Binnius's edition, printed at Cologne in 1606 (137).

(135) Coocke, de la Papeſſe, p. 148.

(136) Ibidem.

(137) Ibid. p. 149, 150.

In order to refute this whole diſcourſe, I obſerve, 1ſt, that Coocke's ſuppoſition alters the ſtate of the queſtion. The queſtion was, whether the Authors who were ſilent during two hundred years, were influenced by their reſpect for, or fear of, the Holy See. It has been ſuppoſed, that the immediate ſucceſſors of the woman-Pope forbid to mention that ſcandalous accident, and that Anaſtaſius, and the other Hiſtorians who wrote before Marianus Scotus, ſubmitted to that prohibition, either out of zeal for the honour of the church, or for fear of coming into trouble (138). It is plain that this ſuppoſition claſhes with thoſe public monuments, which, it is pretended, were ſet up, and with the new ceremonies which were introduced at Rome, they ſay, with regard to the annual proceſſions, and the election of Popes. 2d. I obſerve in the ſecond place, that though the whole ſtate of the queſtion be altered, the abſurdity is not removed thereby; for if Anaſtaſius, for inſtance, had been one of thoſe who voted, that it was neceſſary, for the honour of the church, to conceal the ſtoryof the woman-Pope, he would nevertheleſs have mentioned it, after the contrary advice had ſo far prevailed, that the whole city and church of Rome added weight to it, by publick monuments, and by annual and perpetual regulations. What had an Hiſtorian's ſilence availed in ſuch a caſe? What a caprice, or rather, what a folly had it not been to omit, out of reſpect for the holy See, a particular, the memory of which the whole church of Rome immortalized openly, and in the moſt publick manner? I obſerve in the 3d place, that the inſtances, which Coocke urges, are nothing to the purpoſe; for they who had wiſhed that there had been no pyramid ſet up on John Chaſtel's account, and that the Jeſuit had not been diſgraced, were perſonally concerned in that affair, either on account of their friendſhip for that ſociety, or becauſe they did not think the Jeſuits guilty. But Anaſtaſius, and the other Hiſtorians, were not perſonally concerned in the buſineſs of the woman-Pope; they did not care for her honour or reputation; and they did not in the leaſt queſtion the truth of the fact. Beſides this, when the opinion for erecting a pyramid was carried, the Hiſtorians, who were the moſt devoted to the Jeſuits, mentioned it, and could not have concealed it, without making themſelves ridiculous. If the memorial preſented to Paul III. was publiſhed at firſt, and then ſuppreſſed, it was becauſe the Court of Rome did ſoon made the opinion of thoſe prevail, who wiſhed it might be ſuppreſſed. But the ſame cannot be ſaid of the monuments concerning the woman-Pope: for it is pretended that they ſubſiſted during many centuries. The compariſon would be tolerable, if ſome private perſons had ſuppreſſed the memorial, and the Court of Rome had cauſed it to be printed with the moſt authentick approbations ſhe can add to what ſhe deſigns to make publick ad æternam rei memoriam, to perpetuate the memory of an event for ever.

(138) It is true, that Anaſtaſius and the other Hiſtorians do not deny that accident, but they are ſilent about it. They ought to have mentioned it, ſays Coeffeteau: but this is the queſtion between us. We ſay on the contrary, that they were obliged to conceal it, both by the authority of the Popes who ſat, then, and by cuſtom, and by conſidering the time when they wrote. The Popes would not ſuffer that their Writers ſhould diſcover that infamy to thoſe who called their authority into queſtion, and have concealed it as much as lay in their power, that they might not expoſe themſelves to be ridiculed by the Greeks. Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, part. 1. p. 595.

Samuel Des-Marets, who calls the contradiction objected by Blondel, a little quirk (139), does not extricate himſelf out of it better than Coocke. He aſſerts, that among thoſe who omitted the ſtory of the woman-Pope, ſome did it, becauſe they did not think it proper to inſert her name in the catalogues of the Popes, and the others, becauſe as they had a great veneration for the Holy See, they were aſhamed of that ſcandalous accident: but that they did not imagine their omiſſion could obliterate the memory of an event, which was atteſted and immortalized by publick monuments. We have ſhewed above (140), that though our Joan was thought unworthy to have a place in the catalogue of the Popes, and to be reckoned among them, yet the Hiſtorians could not forbear mentioning her falſe Popedom, the fact being too notorious and too extraordinary to be omitted. And as to that veneration for the Holy See, and to that ſhame, which are ſuppoſed to have induced ſome Annaliſts not to ſay one word of an event, of which the whole city of Rome immortalized the memory moſt publickly, they are ſuch odd and ſenſeleſs paſſions, that we ought not to think thoſe Writers capable of them, who ſaid nothing of Joan Anglus's Papacy. An Hiſtorian who has any ſenſe, does not ſuppreſs a truth for the ſake of thoſe, who are pleaſed to make it publick, or when he knows that his ſilence can do no good, and will only expoſe him to ridicule, as a man ſwayed by a fooliſh ſhame. Whoever therefore takes upon him the office of a conciliator in this caſe, loſes his labour (141). The contradiction objected by Blondel is a knot that cannot be untied. Qui vetuſtiorum (de fœdo ejuſdem exitu, excitatis ad perpetuam memoriam monumentis publicè, ſi Deo placet, conteſtato) diſſimulationem pudori imputandum autumant, ἀσυγκλωστα κλώθειν merito cenſeantur. Quis enim . . . . Nicolaum primum, Hincmarum, Adonem, Anaſtaſium, Luitprandum, alioſque, quibus cum Romanis optimè conveniebat, id ſe conſecuturos ſperaſſe fingat; ut (quod famoſa ſtatuarum propalam proſtantium erectio, ſcrupuloſa in proceſſionum ſolennibus ſceleris conſciæ viæ declinatio, ſtercorariæ ſedis ad explorandum Paparum ſexum decreta in poſterum inceſſio, urbi & orbi indefinenter ebuccinabant) illatum per ſummum nefas Eccleſiæ Romanæ dedecus tacendo eluerent (142)? i. e. "They who imagine that the ſilence of the antients "(concerning her diſgraceful death, atteſted, as they "pretend, by publick monuments erected on purpoſe "to perpetuate the memory of it) muſt be aſcribed "to ſhame, may well be ſaid to connect together "inconſiſtencies. For who . . . can imagine that "Nicholas I. Hincmar, Ado, Anaſtaſius, Luitprand, "and others, who agreed perfectly well with the "Romans, hoped that they would blot out the diſ"grace caſt on the church of Rome by that moſt "wicked action, if they did but omit to mention it, "when it was continually proclaimed, not only to "the city, but to the whole world, by the ſetting up "of a publick monument, by the ſolemn proceſſions "ſcrupulouſly avoiding the ſtreet where the woman "was delivered, and by the ceremony of the cloſe"ſtool appointed to examine of what ſex the Popes "are."

(139) Valeret utcunque hæc doctiſſimi Viri argutiola. Mareſius, Examine Quæſtionis, &c. p. 51.

(140) In the rem. [C].

(141) Pergit pugnantia ſecum Frontibus adverſis componere. Horat. Sat. 1. lib. 1. ver. 102. i. e. "He goes on attempting to reconcile together things "that are inconſiſtent."

(142) Blondel, in Examine Quæſtionis de Papa fœmina, p. m. 32.

The paſſage from Monſieur du Pleſſis contains ſomething, which makes us again reflect on the great influence of prepoſſeſſion. To argue ab authoritate negative, from authority negatively, ſays he, is no concluſive way of arguing. An impertinent logick this with regard to Hiſtory, replies Coeffeteau (143). Nay, it is rather

(143) Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 505.

wiſhed the Prelates had checked Beza's audaciouſneſs, and expoſed his impoſture; but they had ſo many other ſubjects much more important to examine, that they had been to blame had they loſt their time in diſputes about a matter of fact of ſo little conſequence. And farther, it is not true that Beza adorned his Oration with that ſtory (p). He did not enter into particulars. Moreri is miſtaken when he aſſerts as a very remarkable thing, that among ther arguing affirmatively; for all theſe Authors, as Anaſtaſius, Ado of Vienna, Rhegino, William the Librarian, and the others, even the Author of Vignier, if it be him, who was lately printed under the name of Luitprand, were under an obligation, as faithful Hiſtorians, to ſet down ſo memorable an event, which happened in their time, ſince it belongs to the Hiſtory they were writing: and their not mentioning it, as much as they had aſſerted, that ſuch an event never happened: add to this, that what ſome of them relate, overthrows the whole ſtory. Pray, conſider with attention, what Andrew Rivet replied. " If this be impertinent logick " with regard to Hiſtory, why do they find fault " with this argument; St. Peter was never at Rome, " ſince neither the Acts of the Apoſtles, nor his own " Epiſtles, nor St. Paul's, mention his journey thi- " ther? I anſwer, (replies Bellarmine, and the queſ- " tion is about a point of hiſtory) that no concluſion " can be inferred, ab auctoritate negative. For though " Luke, Paul, Seneca do not ſay that Peter was at " Rome, it does not follow from thence that he never " was there: for theſe three Authors were not obliged to " ſay every thing; and three witneſſes, who affirm a " fact, are more credible, than a thouſand who ſay no- " thing of it, provided the latter do not deny what is " aſſerted by the former. Now it is certain, that A- " naſtaſius, and the others, do not deny that ſtory; " they are only ſilent about it (144)." A remarkable inſtance this, which ſhews how much the intereſt of a party is apt to miſlead us! The ſame way of reaſoning ſeems good to us when we uſe it, and bad when it is uſed againſt us. The Roman Catholicks will not admit the negative argument, when it is urged with regard to the queſtion of St. Peter's going to Rome; and they pretend it is a convincing argument with regard to the queſtion of the woman-Pope. The Proteſtants, who judge it a demonſtrative proof with regard to the former of theſe queſtions, will not hear it mentioned with regard to the latter, and in order to refute it they even urge what Bellarmine and other Jeſuits obſerve to overthrow it (145). The anonymous Author (146) of the Judicium (147) de Samuelis Mareſii Joanna Papiſſa reſtituta. i. e. " An Examination of Samuel des Maret's woman- " Pope reſtored;" made a parallel between Sibrand Lubbert's controverſy with Bellarmine, and Samuel des Marets's with Blondel. The ſubject of the former of theſe controverſies is, whether St. Peter was at Rome or not; and the ſubject of the latter, whether or not there was a woman-Pope. Whence ariſes this conſequence, if Bellarmine be a caviller, Des Marets muſt be one alſo.

(p) Flor. de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 6. num. 6. folio m. 378 verſo.

(144) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Tom. 1. p. 595.

(145) See Coocke, in his treatiſe de la Papeſſe, p. 141, &c. and Samuel Mareſius, in Examine Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, p. 44, and p. 20.

(146) It is Daniel Zwickerus. See Bibl. Antitrinitariorum, p. 152.

(147) It is a piece containing 22 pages, printed at the end of Curcellæus's Quaternio Diſſertationum Theologicarum, at Amſt. 1659, in 8vo.

(148) Jurieu, Apologie pour la Reformation, Tom. 2. p. 40.

What can be the reaſon why another Miniſter, who would not affirm that there has been a woman-Pope (148), though the ſtrongeſt arguments, which are urged againſt that tradition, very weak? Was not this owing to his prepoſſeſſions, and to a party intereſt? For he would judge thoſe arguments ſo ſtrong to confute ſome ſatyrical ſtory publiſhed againſt the Valdenſes, that he would load any Monk with reproaches, who ſhould refuſe to yield to ſuch arguments. It muſt be confeſſed, that it is chiefly with regard to matters of controverſy that a man's underſtanding is a bubble to his heart.

This produces among other bad effects a diſadvantageous opinion, which is reciprocally entertained of the oppoſite party. They look upon each other as ſtubborn perſons, who will not ſwerve a jot from the opinions they have once received, and who chooſe rather to uſe evaſions, than to ſubmit to reaſon. When a man obſerves that this ſpirit runs through the works deſigned to maintain that there was a woman-Pope, he is apt to think that the Authors act from the ſame principle, when they argue either againſt the Pope's ſupremacy, or againſt tranſubſtantiation, and that though the arguments urged to ſupport theſe two doctrines were as clear as the ſun at noon day, they would nevertheleſs contradict them, and think they have refuted them abundantly, if they can but alledge ſuch cavils as are alledged by thoſe who aſſert the ſtory of the woman-Pope. Whence it is judged, that gentle means will prove ineffectual with ſuch people, and that their obſtinacy deſerves all the ſeverity of penal laws. When on the other hand one ſees the Roman Catholicks never ceaſe writing books to ſupport the moſt ill grounded traditions, as for inſtance, Lazarus's arrival in Provence, Dennis the Areopagite's Apoſtolſhip, &c. one is inclined to think that the ſame ſpirit moves them to explode the moſt convincing arguments that can be urged againſt Tranſubſtantiation. Is there any thing more plain than the facts, by which are proved the alterations which have happened in the belief of the Church (149)? And yet the Roman Catholick Writers deny them with the utmoſt confidence, and even ſtyle them impoſſible (150). How could the Proteſtants forbear calling this a downright obſtinacy?

A very learned Calviniſt, who followed Blondel's opinion, would not ſcruple to grant what I have been obſerving here, for he remarks that by aſſerting with ſo much warmth, that there has been a woman-Pope, one gives the Roman Catholick Controverſiſts room to confirm their followers in their falſe opinions, and to make them hate the Proteſtants, as though theſe had nothing ſtronger to urge againſt the other Popiſh Doctrines, than what they urge to ſupport the ſtory we ſpeak of. Si dicere liceat, quod res eſt, Papani Doctores dum vident quoſdam ex Noſtris, pro Joannæ Papiſſæ Hiſtoria, ut vera, velut pro aris atque focis digladiari, argumentum inveniunt ad confirmandos cæcos ſuos ſectatores, eoſque ab Orthodoxa doctrina alieniores reddendos. Cum enim non difficulter, imo ſufficienter, (licet non deberent ipſi) commentum hoc deſtruere queant, facile ſimplicioribus perſuadent, ejuſdem notæ eſſe reliqua, quæ illi, quos per calumniam hæreticos vocant, adverſus dogmata ſuæ Eccleſiæ, quam ſolam contendunt eſſe Catholicam, adducere conſueverint (151). i. e. " If I " may ſpeak the truth, when the Popiſh Doctors ſee " that ſome of our people contend for the truth of " the woman-Pope, as it were for their God and " their country, it gives them an opportunity to con- " firm their blind followers in their opinions, and to " render them more averſe to the orthodox doctrine: " for as they can without difficulty, and effectually " confute that ſtory (though it does not become them " to do it) they make the unwary believe that all the " other arguments are of the ſame ſtamp, which " they, whom they ſlanderouſly ſtyle Hereticks, ob- " ject againſt the doctrines of their Church, which " alone, as they pretend, is the Catholick Church." You will ſee hereunder (152), that this is not ſaid at random; I ſhall quote a Capuchin, who in order to convict the Proteſtants of obſtinacy, urges the controverſy about the woman-Pope as an inſtance of it. I do not hink there is any reaſon to charge David Blondel with raſhneſs, becauſe the arguments urged againſt the ſtory of the woman-Pope determined him to take the negative ſide of the queſtion. But if on account of the other arguments that can be oppoſed to thoſe, it were thought he deſerved to be condemned, in ſuch a caſe the condemnation ſhould be grounded on his not ſtanding neuter. This is the courſe ſome perſons take: they leave the queſtion about the woman-Pope undetermined; they do not affirm what Martin Polonus has ſaid of her, and neither do they deny it. This ſeems to them a prudent behaviour: but do they behave thus in all other caſes? Do they ſuſpend their judgment, till ſuch arguments be offered to them, againſt which they cannot invent the leaſt reply? By no means; on an hundred other occaſions they are ſatisfied with the moſt trifling reaſons, when they happen to ſuit with their prepoſſeſſions.

The ſame defect is daily obſerved in the news-mongers. Is there any report ſpread, which is favourable to the enemy, and ſupported by a great ſhew of probability; they argue againſt it as much as they can,

(149) See among other works written by the Miniſters, the Hiſtory of the Church, which Monſieur Baſnage publiſhed (in French) in the year 1699, in two volumes in folio.

(150) The Gentlemen of Port-Royal wrote ſeveral books to that purpoſe with regard to the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation; and a Dr. of the Sorbonne named Langevin, has aſſerted it with regard to all the articles of faith. The Journal des Savans for Feb. the 6th, 1702, contains an account of his book.

(151) Martin. Schoockius, Præf. Fabulæ Hamelenſis, folio ult.

(152) In the rem. [I].

among ſo many perſons who have maintained the ſtory of Pope Joan, there is not one ſingle Frenchman (g) [H]. Let us obſerve, that the multitude of authorities cannot be looked upon as a proof, ſince the moſt antient witneſs lived above two hundred years after the fact, and ſince it is inconſiſtent with ſome unqueſtionable facts, which are reported by contemporary Authors [I]. Colomies cenſures Blondel for thinking, that the ſtory of the woman-Pope, which is to be met with in a manuſcript of Athanaſius, was ſet down in the very words of Martinus Polonus. He ſhews that an Hiſtorian who lived before that Martinus has related what we read in that manuſcript; but upon the whole that particular is and will not believe it, but when the fact is evidently unqueſtionable? I have often told them, that their reſiſtance could not be ſufficiently commended, provided it were attended with two conditions: the one that they would be content with ſuſpending their judgment without taking the negative ſide of the queſtion, the other that they would be as hard of belief when any news is ſpread abroad, which is diſadvantageous to the enemy. But in ſuch a caſe they are credulous to an exceſs; the ſtrongeſt appearances of falſity do not make the leaſt impreſſion on their minds; they oppoſe them as much as lies in their power, without remembring that there are daily much weaker appearances, which they urge as unanſwerable proofs againſt ſuch news as they do not like, and which on that account they think unworthy to be credited. They ſuffer themſelves to be taken at the firſt onſet by the Gazettes of their own country, and will undergo four or five aſſaults from thoſe of the enemies country. An exceſſive credulity in ſome reſpects, and an exceſſive incredulity in ſome other reſpects, agree ſo well together in one and the ſame man, that the one is often the cauſe of the other.

(g) Moreri, under the word Joan VII. (John VII.) Pope.

[H] Moreri . . . . . aſſerts . . . . . that among ſo many perſons, who have maintained the ſtory of Pope Joan, there is not one ſingle Frenchman.] There is in theſe words of Moreri a truth and a falſity. It is certain that numberleſs perſons have related that ſtory (153): but it is falſe that there is no Frenchmen among them. Moreri might have avoided that blunder, if he had conſulted Florimond de Remond's Anti-Papeſſe; for he would have read there the following words. "Our French Hiſtorians and Annaliſts, walking in "the old road, have mentioned ſomething of her. "For in order to adorn their works, they would in"ſert that fine piece into them. One of them aſ"ſerts, that ſhe was a beautiful maiden, of a great "GENIUS (it is his own word) that ſhe was a native of "England, and fell in love with a young ſtudent. "Then rehearſing the whole ſtory he aſſerts, that "it was her Valet-de-Chambre, who playing the "fool with her ſpoiled her ſhape, and that as ſhe "was one day riding on horſe-back thro' the city ſhe "was delivered of a child, and died on the ſpot, af"ter ſhe had held the See of Rome two years, five "months, and four days; and that after her death "Nicholas I. was choſen Pope; which happened in "the year 858. Wherein he gave the lie to all "thoſe who wrote before him. One of her Cardi"nals, according to that Author, making ſport with "his maſter's or miſtreſſes's life conſecrated her "memory in that noble line,

(153) See the rem. [B] of the art. FRANC.

"Papa pater patrum papiſſa peperit partum (154).

"i. e. The Pope the Father of the Fathers being a "woman was delivered of a child." If the Author of the Annals of Aquitain, whom he quotes, be John Bouchet, as it is very likely, he muſt have uſed an edition printed either before or after that which I make uſe of (155); for in mine I find only this. After this Pope Leo, who held St. Peter's See eight years, a woman of England was raiſed to the Papal Dignity, who was miſtaken for a man and named John. She was born at Mentz, and when ſhe was twelve years old ſhe dreſſed herſelf in men's clothes, and went to ſtudy at Athens, where ſhe made a very great progreſs; thence ſhe went to Rome in the ſame dreſs, where ſhe was ſo much eſteemed that the Cardinals, thinking ſhe was a man, choſe her Pope; ſhe held the Holy See thirteen months, or thereabout, and in the thirteenth month, being got with child by a certain Valet-de-Chambre of hers, as ſhe was going to St. John of Lateran's Church, ſhe was taken with her labour-pains, between the Theatre of Coloſſus, and St. Clement's, and died immediately after ſhe was delivered. It is ſaid that ſince that time, whenever a Pope is choſen, it is the cuſtom to aſk one of the Cardinals, whether the perſon choſen has his genitals or not (156). Florimond de Remond's quotation is perhaps wrong, and inſtead of the Annals of Aquitain he ſhould have quoted the Annals of France by Nicole Gilles (157). He complains alſo of another Writer whom he does not name, and then of the Sieur du Haillan, who would not publiſh his hiſtory in France, without inſerting the ſtory of Joan into it, of which Gaguin, or Paul Æmilius, do not make the leaſt mention. He acknowledges however, that du Haillan confeſſes that ſome deny what is related of her. He thinks Stephen Paſquier more blameable, who, in his noble enquiries, ought to have enquired after the truth, that he might not deface the beauty of his writings with ſuch an ugly ſtory (158); for after ſo many authorities, and ſo convincing proofs as I had already publiſhed, there was no room left to mention the name of Pope Joan any longer. He cenſures afterwards the Hiſtorian de Serres, who quoting only Platina's authority, has altered his paſſage, and omitted the words, they ſay, and thoſe, the ſtory has been tranſmitted to us by uncertain Authors, who deſerve but little credit. Florimond is in the right to tell him, that Authors muſt be quoted faithfully and not by halves.

(154) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 4. num. 4. folio 372 verſo.

(155) That of Poictiers, printed by Enguilbert de Marnef, 1557, in folio.

(156) Bouchet, Annales d'Aquitaine, 2 part. folio m. 60.

(157) We meet there with the ſame words and the ſame things, which Flor. relates. See thoſe Annals, folio 66 of the Paris edit. 1538, by Nicholas Conteau, in folio.

(158) Paſquier, in his Recherches, liv. 3. chap. 4. p. m. 163, and chap. 7. p. 178, and liv. 6. chap. 5. p. 465. But making a good uſe of Florimond's cenſure, he wrote a long letter (in liv. 12. p. m. 829, &c.) in which he took in ſome meaſure the negative ſide of the queſtion.

As de Serres was a Miniſter, I confeſs that he cannot be alledged as a witneſs againſt Moreri, who no doubt meant only French Roman Catholicks. But the other Writers quoted by Remond have all the qualities requiſite to afford me a good argument. I may quote, beſides them, the Author of the Arbre des Batailles (159) (the Tree of Battles,) and Martin Franc (160), and Nicole Gilles (161), and Raviſius Textor (162), and the Preſident Fauchet (163), &c. I do not know whether I might not add to them Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who relates the ſtory at length (164), without affirming or denying it: but then he ſhews ſufficiently that he thinks it very doubtful.

(159) See the rem. [B] of the art. FRANC.

(160) See the rem. [A] of his article.

[I] That multitude of authorities cannot be looked upon as a proof, ſince the moſt antient witneſſes lived above two hundred years after the fact, and ſince it is inconſiſtent with . . . . . contemporary Authors.] They who refute the ſtory of the woman-Pope prove moſt evidently, that ſhe cannot be placed between Leo IV. and Benedict III. They bring chronological demonſtrations of this, which they ſupport by very plain paſſages from the Authors who lived in the ninth Century. Whence it follows, that the firſt, who two Centuries later mentioned the woman-Pope, deſerves no credit; and that they, who have related the ſame ſtory afterwards, have only tranſcribed one another, without tracing it up to its firſt origin, and without examining the matter in the leaſt, and conſequently we ought not to lay any ſtreſs on their multitude. Blondel ſhall now obſerve the ſame to you in other words. "So that, ſays he (165), Marianus "is the firſt and only ſpring, from which the ſtreams "of the poſterior Writers are derived: and after I "have ſo plainly made out the inexcuſable defect of "that Writer, I do not think it neceſſary to exa"mine thoſe who only tranſcribed from one another, "without knowing whether the firſt was well inform"ed or not. Though the witneſſes ſhould ariſe by "hundreds, or by thouſands, to give ſuch ill con"trived diſpoſitions, no man of ſenſe would make "any account either of their number, which ought "never to outweigh truth and reaſon, or of their "diſcourſes, which in reality would be nothing elſe "but a mere echo of the firſt idle talk, which might "have been eaſily convinced of impertinence and "falſity, if they who related it had been more de"ſirous to ſtudy the hiſtory of the ninth Century, "than

(161) In the Annals of France.

(162) In Officina.

(163) In the Antiquitez Françoiſes, in the Life of Charles the Bald, folio 53, of the Paris edit. 1602, in 8vo.

(164) In the 3d vol. of his Proſopographie, p. 1667, &c.

(165) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 70, 71.

is more proper to ſupport than to refute Blondel's opinion [K]. They who wrote with a deſign to prove the falſity of that ſtory, have endeavoured to trace the origin of it, and have alledged ſeveral conjectures. Some have obſerved that Pope John VIII. acted with ſo much weakneſs in the cauſe of Photius, that it was thought he deſerved to be called a woman rather than a man (r). This was Baronius's opinion. But Aventinus imagines that the ſtory is owing to Pope John the Ninth being choſen by the credit of Theodora, a noble and haughty proſtitute (s), whoſe minion he was. Onuphrius Panvinius thinks the ſtory aroſe from Pope John XII. who uſed to carry always a whole tribe of proſtitutes after him, of whom he loved Joan Rainiera moſt paſſionately, ſo that ſhe governed him abſolutely, for which reaſon ſome banterer called her afterwards the woman-Pope (t). Bellarmine pretends the fable came originally from a report which was ſpread abroad, that a woman had been Patriarch of Conſtantinople (u). Allatius aſſerts, that one Thiota, who ſet up for a Propheteſs in Germany in the 9th Century, gave riſe to that ſtory. Blondel, having refuted theſe conjectures, declares that we ought not to exert our wit in ſuch needleſs enquiries into a ſubject, which it is not worth while to examine (x). What a laborious taſk would it be for us, adds he (y), if we were obliged to find out what vouchers and authorities the Writers of ſo many romances had, which till this day are believed by the greateſt part of mankind? He gives ſeveral inſtances of this. I do not believe he was in the right, to explode all the conjectures that have been publiſhed concerning the origin and foundation of that romance of the woman-Pope. I will be ſo bold as to aſſert, that the Proteſtants, who have ſo much exclaimed againſt him, and who have looked upon him as a falſe brother, have not done him juſtice, and did not well underſtand the intereſt of their own party. It ſignifies but little to them whether that woman exiſted or not: a Miniſter, who is none of the moſt tractable, confeſſes it (z). But it concerns them very much not to give their adverſaries room to look upon them as obſtinate men, who will not ſwerve a jot from the opinions they once entertained. They could lawfully object the ſtory of the woman-Pope as long as it was not refuted. They were not the inventors of it; they met with it in ſeveral works compoſed by very good Papiſts: but ſince it has been refuted by very ſtrong arguments, they ſhould have given it up, and not uſed their whole art and induſtry to prolong the controverſy; for it was teaching their adverſaries how to call all kinds of facts into queſtion, and ſhewing them a method to maintain the tradition that there has been a Pope Cyriacus, who abdicated his dignity in order to go and expoſe himſelf to martyrdom at the head of eleven thouſand virgins (aa). If they had followed Blondel's example, they would have ſhewn by a noble inſtance, that they underſtand reaſon,

(r) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 85.

(s) Ibidem, p. 87.

(t) Ibidem, p. 88.

(u) Pope Leo XI. teſtifies it, Epiſt. 1. cap. 23. See Blondel, ibid. p. 89. Compare this with what Father Mabillon relates in his Muſæum Italicum, Tom. 1. p. 27. and conſult Spanhemius, de Papa fœmina, p. 12 & ſeq.

(x) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. p. 92.

(y) Ibidem, p. 93.

(z) Monſieur Jurieu, you will meet with his own words in the rem. [G].

(aa) See Monſieur de Launoi, Epiſt. 8. part. 4. p. m. 356, where he compares that tradition with that concerning Pope Joan.

" than to exert that ſlanderous eloquence, which St. " Jerom in his time would have called caninam facun- " diam (a ſnarling eloquence)." Some pages lower he gives ſeveral inſtances of falſe traditions, and particularly of the Siege before Paris under Lewis the Debonnaire's reign, by the Giant Iſaurus, whoſe tomb is ſtill ſhewed in the Monaſtery of St. Germain (166); and then he concludes thus. " Let it be ſufficient " for us, that all theſe are nothing but mere ſtories: " that though all men ſhould take them for oracles, " it would not be in their power to alter their na- " ture. And on the other hand, though the truth " (oppreſſed by the tyranny of prepoſſeſſions, affront- " ed by the Romans, and betrayed by oblivion, or " by the cowardice of men) would be for ſome time " unknown, and diſdained, neither its being left " unfollowed could be a diſgrace to it, nor the endea- " vours of its enemies make it fall from its native " dignity, nor the fair appearance of fables eclipſe " its divine light (167). . . . . Since therefore it is ſo " conſiſtent with itſelf in the writings of the Au- " thors, who lived between the years of Chriſt 850 " and 1050, ſince their accounts agreeing together " compoſe a well connected body, and ſet the events, " which are controverted, in ſo clear a light, as tho' " they had wrote them down with a beam of the " ſun, and ſince the later Writers abound with con- " tradictions and incoherencies, being inconſiſtent " both with the antecedent Authors and with them- " ſelves, methinks that their opinion (of how long a " ſtanding ſoever it may boaſt) deſerves no better " treatment, than to be (by the common conſent of " all thoſe who know how to yield to reaſon) cry'd " down like baſe and uſeleſs coin (168)."

(166) Blondel, ibid. p. 93, 94.

(167) Ibidem, p. 94.

(168) Ibidem, p. 95.

The particular nature of the ſtory of the woman-Pope does very much leſſen the weight of the great number of Writers who mentioned it. The fact is uncommon, extravagant, ſingular in all its circumſtances. It is proper for thoſe who give catalogues of learned women, and of lewd women, and of women who diſguiſed their ſex. It is proper for thoſe who collect inſtances of God's judgments, and for thoſe who take a pleaſure in writing merry ſtories. Authors of all ſorts might make uſe of it. We ought not therefore to wonder that ſo many perſons inſerted it into their writings, and took it all along for granted that it was true. Men do not much examine thoſe traditions, which may ſerve as an ornament to the ſubject they treat of.

We have mentioned above (169) ſome circumſtances, which, with regard to this ſubject, add a great weight to the negative argument.

(169) In the rem. [G].

[K] Colomies cenſures Blondel. . . . . He ſhews that an Hiſtorian who lived before Martinus Polonus, has related . . . . but upon the whole, that particular is more proper to ſupport than to refute Blondel's opinion.] " Blondel was very much miſtaken, when he ima- " gined that the Life of that woman, ſuch as it is " in the Anaſtaſius of the King's library, was ſet " down in the very words of Martinus Polonus. For " how can that be, ſince Gervaſius Tilberienſis, an " Author an hundred years more antient than Mar- " tinus Polonus, in a work intitled Otia Imperialia, " (the Imperial ſports) wrote for the diverſion of the " Emperor Otho IV. which I read in manuſcript at " Mr. Voſſius's, relates the Life of the woman-Pope " in the very ſame words with the Anaſtaſius of the " King's library; adding only, that the ſtory of that " woman was to be met with in a few chronicles " only, Et in paucis Chronicis, ſays he, invenitur. If " Mr. Blondel had ſeen that Author, he would per- " haps have forbore writing; but he was not more " acquainted with him, than with Amalricus Auge- " rii, who lived in the year 1362, and wrote a Chro- " nicle of the Popes, dedicated to Urban V. wherein " he ſpeaks thus of the woman-Pope: Joannes dictus " Anglicus, natione magnanimus (I think we ought to " read Maguntinus) poſt Dominum Leonem Papam in " Romanum Pontificatum fuit aſſumptus; & poſt B. Pe- " trum Apoſtolum ponitur Papa centeſimus decimus. i. e. " John ſirnamed the Engliſhman, born at Mentz, " was raiſed to the Papal Dignity after Leo X. He is " reckoned the 110th Pope after St. Peter. The " learned Scrivenerius had that Hiſtorian in manu- " ſcript (170)." I ſhall make two obſervations on that paſſage. The firſt is that Gervaſe of Tillebery did reaſon, and that they are unjuſtly charged with obſtinacy [L]. They might have boaſted that they did not keep up the other controverſies from a ſpirit of contradiction, but becauſe no ſolid anſwer is made to the difficulties they urge (bb). Launoi and ſome other Writers, who refute ill grounded traditions, do indeed vex and offend many people, but then they do a great honour to their Church, who cannot afterwards be charged with tyrannizing did not live an hundred years before Martin Polonus; for he dedicated his book to Otho IV. (170), who was elected Emperor in the year 1198, and died in 1218. Blondel aſſerts that Martin Polonus died about the year 1270; it was in the year 1278, as Voſſius has proved it (172). My ſecond obſervation is, that if Blondel had known that Gervaſe of Tillebery mentioned the woman-Pope in the very words of the manuſcript of Anaſtaſius, this would not have hindered them (as Colomies ſuppoſes) from the refuting the ſtory of that woman; on the contrary, it would have afforded him wherewithal to confirm himſelf in his opinion. He would have ſaid that Martin Polonus tranſcribed from a very bad original, namely, from a Chronicle deſigned to divert the Emperor in his leiſure hours, and for that purpoſe filled with a thouſand ridiculous ſtories. After this manner Gabriel Naudé diſcredits all that the ſame Martin Polonus has related concerning the magical arts of Pope Sylveſter II. for it it certain that he tranſcribed all that he has ſaid of him from the chronological accounts of that Galfridus, who lived about the year 1150, and from one Gervaſe, who was Orator to the city of Arles, and Chancellor to the Emperor Otho III. (173), but for the reſt the greateſt inventor of fables, and the moſt notorious liars, who ever ſet pen to paper; as there is no room to queſtion, after the bare reading of the book which he compoſed, De Otiis Imperatoris, where all that he relates is ſo monſtrous, and ſo far from reaſon, and from the ordinary or extraordinary poſſibility of things, that Æſop's Fables, and Amadis's ſtories are infinitely more credible (174). Let us remember the Fables he related concerning Virgil's pretended Magic, and how Naudé cenſured him for it (175). Martin Polonus confeſſes, that Gervaſe, that is to ſay Gervaſe of Tillebery (176), is one of thoſe from whom he extracted materials for his Chronicle.

(170) Colomies, Melanges Hiſt. p. 57, 58. See Blondel's words in the rem. [A], quotat. (2).

(bb) Upon all this ſee the rem. [G].

(171) Theodor. à Niem, lib. 2. de Schiſm. cap. 19. p. m. 97.

(172) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 486.

(173) He ought to have ſaid Otho IV.

(174) Naudé, Apolog. des grands Hommes, chap. 19. p. m. 558, 559.

(175) See the rem. [I] of the art. VIRGIL.

(176) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 486.

[L] They are unjuſtly charged with obſtinacy.] You have ſeen in the remark [G] ſome reflections, which tend to ſhew that the controverſies about the woman-Pope give the Roman Catholicks an opportunity to ſay that the Proteſtants are ſtubborn men. Some readers might think perhaps that I ſpoke thus only by mere gueſs. This determines me to give here ſome practical proofs of what they would make paſs for mere ſpeculations. A Capuchin Preacher, who publiſhed a book of controverſy in the year 1611, aſſerted (177), that one cannot better repreſent the humour and way of dealing of our Miniſters, who pretend to write, than by applying to them what St. Athanaſius being weary to confound the Hereticks, without converting them, ſaid of thoſe of his time * ; though they be refuted, they never acknowledge it. Though they have nothing now to urge, yet they are not aſhamed; but being barefaced, like lewd women, they become impudent in their impieties againſt all (178). "A "plain and direct anſwer is made to the Miniſters, "continues the Capuchin, without leaving their "doubts and impoſtures any room to make a pertinent reply. One ſhews before their eyes, one ſounds in their ears, one makes their hands feel, "that their objections are ill grounded, that their "hiſtories are nothing but fables, that their anticipated belief is unreaſonable. No matter for "that, they repeat again their antiquated fancies, "as though they were quite new, without ſhame, "without any ground, without conſcience. If they "can but fill their books with that old ſtuff, and "impoſe upon ſome ſilly perſons, they are ſatisfied: "they ſhew that the wiſe man was in the right to "ſay †, though thou ſhouldſt bray a fool in a mortar, among wheat with a peſtle, yet will not his fooliſhneſs depart from him (179)."

(177) Sylveſter de Laval, a Capuchin Preacher, les juſtes Grandeurs de l'Egliſe Romaine, liv. 3. chap. 5. p. 68, 69.

* Athanaſ. Orat. 4. contr. Arrian. ἀτε γὰρ ἐλεγχόμενοι παύονται, ὅτε ἀποροῦντες ἐπιρέπονται, ἀλλ' ὡς ὄφις πόρπις, ἀπτναισχύν τισαν πρὸς πάντας ἐν ταῖς αἱρέσεσιν.

(178) Sylveſter de Laval, Grandeurs de l'Egliſe Romaine, liv. 3. p. 68.

† Proverbs xxvii. 22.

(179) Sylveſter de Laval, ibid. p. 69.

Now here follows the inſtance, by which he endeavours to prove that unjuſt accuſation. "It is impoſ"ſible for them to reply to the ſolid diſcourſes, evi"dent arguments, and unqueſtionable witneſſes, "which the Catholicks have a thouſand times alledged, in order to prove, that what their Fathers pre"tended to aſſert concerning Pope Joan, is a mere "ſtory, and a wicked ſlander. The Sieur Caſaubon, "the moſt learned man among the pretended Re"formed, and who by the ſtudy of polite Literature "has acquired modeſty, and won the friendſhip of ſe"veral men of learning and honour, particularly of "Thuanus, laughs at that ſtory. I have ſeen them "agree together, that after reading Onuphrius's "Annotation on the Life of John VIII. in Platina §, "it is impoſſible to believe, that this pretended Joan "was ever in being, as the ignorant imagine. Bel"larmine, Genebrard, Florimond de Remond, and "fifty other Catholicks, have written upon that ſub"ject, ſince Onuphrius, and have made the matter "out ſo evidently, that if there can remain any doubts "about it, we have reaſon never to believe any man "living. And yet after all this, little Vignier (180) "was ſure to repeat that ſilly ſtory, in order to ſwell "his ſeditious book. His theatre, which was to be "the thick foreſt of all the ſlanders of his party, "had not been complete without that falſity. What "can we do with him? What ſhall we ſay both to "him, and to thoſe who believe him, but what they "themſelves ſing at their meetings:

§ Onufr. apud Platin. annot. ad Joh. 8.

(180) In the 27th chap. of the 2d part of his Theatre de l'Antichriſt, printed in the year 1610, in folio, and reprinted in 8vo in the year 1613.

Juſques à quand gens inhumaines
Ma glorie abattre taſcherez?
Juſques à quand empriſes vaines,
Sans fruict, & d'abuſion plaines,
Aymerez-vous & chercherez (181)?

(181) Sylveſter de Laval, ibid. liv. 3. p. 99 and 70.

That is to ſay, according to T. Sternhold's tranſlation,

"O mortal man how long will ye
"My glory thus deſpiſe?
"Why wander ye in vanity,
"And follow after lies*.

* Pſ. iv. 3.

After this the Capuchin ſpends ſixteen pages in refuting the old traditions, and concludes with theſe words: "It muſt be therefore for want of ſhame "or ſenſe, and for want of true or probable objecti"ons, that the reformed Miniſters, after ſo much "certainty and evidence, dare to repeat that fooliſh "ſtory again. I think, that without wronging them, "one may very well tell them, and thoſe who reſem"ble them, that they ſhew that to be fulfilled, which "the Apoſtle foretold was to happen . The time "will come, when they will not endure ſound doctrine, "but after their own luſt ſhall they keep to themſelves "Teachers, having itching ears, and they ſhall turn away "their ears from the truth, and ſhall be turned unto fa"bles. On the contrary for that reaſon, they who "have any wit, and fear God, ought to remember "what the ſame St. Paul wrote another time to Ti"mothy †, Refuſe profane and old wives fables, and "exerciſe thyſelf rather unto godlineſs. For in conſci"ence one cannot call the Miniſter's Hiſtory of Pope "Joan, any thing elſe but a profane fable, and an old "woman's ſtory (182)."

 2 Tim. iv. 3, 4.

† 1 Tim. iv. 7.

(182) Sylveſter de Laval, liv. 3. p. 86, 87.

Theſe two quotations from the Scripture are ſufficient to ſhew, that his judgment was not extraordinary: for thoſe paſſages may be urged againſt his church, who for ſome centuries did not in the leaſt queſtion the truth of that fable. A Proteſtant, whom I have quoted above, alledges that credulity is an argument of the Church of Rome's Antichriſtianiſm. Nec quando hanc foveo ſententiam (non extitiſſe Papiſſam) patrocinor Papiſmo aut Babyloni adulor. Abſit; quicquid alii ſentiant, meam opinionem ei confundendæ, præ altera ſervire credo. Quod enim à pluribus ſeculis Papani conſtanter crediderint, Johannam Papiſſam Eccleſiæ præfuiſſe, completum eſt vaticinum Apoſtoli, 2 Theſſ. xi. minantis iis efficaciam erroris, immittendam à Deo, ad hoc ut crederent mendacio (183). i. e. "Though I aſ"ſert that there never was a woman-Pope, yet I do "not pretend thereby to flatter Popery or Babylon:

(183) Martin. Schoockius, in Præfatione Fabulæ Hamelenſis, fol. ult.

rannizing over the mind with regard to that kind of ſubjects; whereas they who will obſtinately maintain thoſe traditions diſgrace their own Church.

" God forbid! for whatever others may think, I am " perſuaded that my opinion is more proper than the " contrary opinion, to confound the Papiſts; for " ſince they have conſtantly believed, during ma- " ny ages, that a woman-Pope preſided over the " Church, they ſhew thereby that the Apoſtle's pro- " phecy is fulfilled, who threatens them (2 Theſſ. xi.) " that God ſhall ſend them ſtrong deluſion, that they " ſhould believe a lie."

I cannot forbear obſerving, that Athanaſius's words, quoted by the Capuchin, are a common topic, which all parties uſe, in order to exclaim againſt their adverſaries's obſtinacy. They might be retorted upon that Capuchin: for how many things has he aſſerted, which had been refuted an hundred times over and over again? There prevails every where, more or leſs, a certain ſpirit of contradiction, which does not ſuffer men to give up their former arguments. One would look upon them, as tho' they had received them on the ſame terms, which certain Lacedæmonian women required from their ſons, when they gave them their bucklers; ſuffer yourſelf to be killed, rather than loſe it (184). Let us make another compariſon. It ſeems they conſider them as a ſacred depoſitum, or as a talent, which they are obliged to improve upon pain of malediction, or laſtly, as an eſtate intailed, which is perpetually to deſcend from father to ſon, ſo that they muſt be as ſcrupulous with regard to the alienation of it, as Naboth was (185). However it be, there are a thouſand controverſies, in which the weakeſt arguments are continually repeated. It is to no purpoſe to refute them, they reſemble nature, which it is in vain to expel, ſhe will ſtill return (186); or they are like thoſe troubleſome inſects; the more we ſtrive to drive them away, the more obſtinately they purſue us (187). Prudent Diſputants do not act after this manner; their prepoſſeſſion is not ſo great as to hinder them from preceiving the ſtrong and weak ſide of an argument; they follow the example of wiſe warriors, who abandon thoſe poſts which they cannot defend to any purpoſe.

(184) Ἢ τᾶν ἢ ἐπὶ τᾶς, aut hanc, aut ſuper hac. " Bring " this back, or " be you brought " back upon it." ταύταν αὖζε, ἢ μὴ ἴσω, aut hanc ſerva aut peri. " Keep this or " die." Plut. in Inſtitutis Laconicis, p. 241, F.

(185) The Lord forbid it me anſwered Naboth to Ahab, who wanted to buy his vineyard) that I ſhould give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee. 1 book of Kings, chap. xxi. 3.

(186) Naturam expellas furca, tamen uſque recurret. Horat. Epiſt. 10. lib. 1. ver. 24. (187) Father le Tellier ſays this of the adverſaries of the Jeſuits, in his Defence des nouveaux Chretiens, p. 22. Add to this the following line from Horace, Sat. 5. lib. 2. ver. 83. Ut canis à corio nunquam abſterrebitur uncto.

(a) And not Poclain, as in Moreri.

POQUELIN (a) (JOHN BAPTIST) a famous Comedian, known by the name of MOLIERE, was ſon of a Valet-de-Chambre, the King's upholſterer, and was born at Paris about the year 1620. He went through the ſtudy of the Claſſics under the Jeſuits, in the College of Clermont. He was deſigned for the bar; but at his quitting the law-ſchools, he made choice of the actor's profeſſion, from the prodigious fondneſs he had for the Drama (b); his whole ſtudy and application being directed to the ſtage. His firſt Comedy was the Etourdi, which he exhibited publickly in the city of Lyons in 1653. Being ſome time after in Languedoc, he waited upon the Prince of Conti, and offered him his ſervice. That Prince favoured him with a moſt gracious reception; ſettled ſalaries upon his company; and took them into his ſervice, both for himſelf and the States of Languedoc. Having ſpent the Carnaval at Grenoble in 1658, he went and ſettled in Roan. He ſpent the ſummer there; and after taking ſome journies privately to Paris, he was ſo happy as to pleaſe his Majeſty's brother, the Duke of Orleans, who having granted him his protection, and taking his company of Comedians for his own, preſented him in that quality to the King and Queen. This Company played, for the firſt time, before their Majeſties, and the whole Court, the 24th of October 1658, on a ſtage erected for that purpoſe, in the Guard-room of the old Louvre, and had the good fortune to pleaſe, and therefore his Majeſty commanded him to ſettle in Paris. The hall of the Petit Bourbon was granted, in order for him to exhibit plays alternately with the Italian players. In October 1660 the hall of the Palace Royal was granted him (c), and a penſion of 1000 Livres was ſettled upon him in 1663. In 1665 his company was taken altogether into his ſervice, and he continued till his death to exhibit plays which were greatly applauded. His laſt Comedy was the Malade Imaginaire, which was played the fourth time the 17th of February 1673, on which day he died [A]. Theſe particulars I have extracted from his life prefixed to his

(b) See the rem. [G].

(c) See the rem. [H].

[A] On which day he died.] The chief character of Moliere's laſt comedy is a ſick perſon who pretends to be dead. Moliere played this part, and conſequently was obliged, in one of his ſcenes, to repreſent a dead man. A great number of people declare that he expired in that part of the play; and that when he was to make an end of it, by ſhewing that it was nothing but a feint, he could neither ſpeak, nor riſe up, and that he was found really dead. This unuſual circumſtance was looked upon as wonderful, and ſuggeſted to the Poets a great number of witty conceits and ingenious alluſions; which, very probably, was the reaſon why ſo much credit was given to this ſtory. Some perſons even gave a ſerious turn to their thoughts, and made many moral reflections on that incident. But Moliere did not really die after this manner; he having time enough, though very ſick, to make an end of his part. The following particulars are related in his life. " The 17th of Fe- " bruary 1673 (1), the fourth night of the repreſen- " tation of the Malade Imaginaire, he was ſo great- " ly troubled with his defluxion, that he could ſcarce " act. However, he went through it, but with great " torture, and the ſpectators were ſenſible that he was " far from being the character he acted; for indeed, " as ſoon as the play was done, he got home as quick " as poſſible; and had ſcarce got to bed, when the " continual cough, which tormented him, grew ſo " violent, that a vein in his lungs broke. The in- " ſtant he found himſelf in this condition, he de- " voted his whole thoughts to Heaven, immediately " after which he was ſpeechleſs; and was choaked, " in half an hour, by the great quantity of blood he " vomited up (2)." But not to conceal any particular, I muſt here inform the reader, that according to other writers, Moliere was not able to hold out till the play was done; and they were obliged to carry him away before. " Moliere died ..... after a " very ſurprizing manner. He had been very much " indiſpoſed for a long time, which was aſcribed to " the uneaſineſs he met with from his wife, and " ſtill more to his great application. One evening " that he was to play the Malade Imaginaire, (the " imaginary ſick man) which was then a new Drama, " and the laſt he had writ; he was very much out of " order when he began, and was going to put the " play off on account of his indiſpoſition: however, " obſerving there was a full houſe, and being un- " willing to diſmiſs the audience, he ſtrained him- " ſelf, and played almoſt to the end, not perceiving " that

(1) Correct in Moreri, 1672. I ſhall obſerve, occaſionally, that, in the ſame article, we muſt read Polixene, inſtead of Polixene.

(2) Moliere's Life prefixed to his works, printed at Bruſſels in 1694.

his works. I perhaps ſhould rather have not taken any thing from it ; that book being better known, and in more hands than my Dictionary will ever be ; and therefore, by copying from that Life, I ſhall not inform any perſon of any new particulars. A circumſtance, which I have been aſſured by many, is not related there, is, viz. that the only motive of his going upon the ſtage was, to enjoy the company of an Actreſs for whom he had contracted a violent fondneſs. I leave the Reader to conjecture, whether this particular was omitted becauſe it was not true, or from fear that it would prejudice his character. Several perſons declare, that his Comedies ſurpaſs, or equal, the moſt beautiful pieces of that kind written by the antient Greeks and Romans [B]. It is no wonder that he ſo juſtly repreſented domeſtic feuds, and the torments of jealous huſbands, or of thoſe who have reaſon to be ſo ; it being aſſured that no man ever experienced this more than Moliere [C]. Theſe circumſtances I borrow from a printed book, ſome particulars of which

" that he grew worſe : but in that part where he " acted the ſick man, he grew ſo very weak, that " the audience thought he was really dead, and thoſe " about him could ſcarce make him ſtand upon his " legs. He then was adviſed not to go on, but to " get to bed. However, he reſolved to go through " with his part, if poſſible ; and as a great part of " it was played, he thought he might proceed to the " end without doing himſelf much harm ; but the " ſtrong deſire he had to oblige the publick was at- " tended with very fatal conſequences ; for as he was " ſpeaking of Rhubarb and Sena in the ceremonial " of the Phyſicians, he vomited blood, which fright- " ing the audience and his fellow Comedians, he was " carried home inſtantly, where his wife followed " him into his bed-chamber. She pretended to take " on grievouſly, but all the endeavours that were " uſed to recover him were to no purpoſe. He died " a few hours after, having vomited up all his " blood (3)." The Poets, I obſerved before, did not let ſlip this opportunity of ſhewing their wit ; and handed about a great number of little pieces : " but " among the ſeveral pieces writ upon his death, " none were more applauded than the four Latin " verſes following, which were thought proper to be " preſerved.

(3) See the book entitled, La fameuſe Comedienne, ou Hiſtoire de la Guerin, auparavant femme & veuve de Moliere, p. 38, 39.

" Roſcius hic ſitus eſt triſti Molierus in urnâ,
" Cui genus humanum ludere, ludus erat.
" Dum ludit mortem, Mors indignata jocantem
" Corripit, & mimum fingere ſæva negat (4).

(4) Vie de Moliere, folio *3.

" Here, in this tomb, fam'd Moliere is interr'd,
" The Roſcius of his age, whoſe chief delight
" Was, in his hum'rous ſcenes, to paint mankind.
" But whilſt he mimick'd death, that cruel power
" Snatch'd him from life, and made him what he feign'd."

To theſe Latin verſes I will add the following French Epitaph (5)'

(5) It is in vol. 1. of the Mercure Gallant, of 1673. Therein are inſerted ſeveral more ſuch pieces, with a funeral oration (in a waggiſh ſtrain) in proſe.

Cy git qui parut ſur la Scene
Le ſinge de la vie humaine
Qui n'aura jamais ſon égal,
Qui voulant de la Mort, ainſi que de la Vie,
Eſtre l'imitateur dans une Comedie,
Pour trop bien reüſſir, y reüſſit fort mal ;
Car la Mort en eſtant ravie,
Trouva ſi belle la copie.
Qu'elle en fit un original.

" Here lyes a man, who on the Theatre,
" Mimick'd, with matchleſs art, our various foibles.
" But ſtriving once to imitate grim death,
" He, or ſo well or ill perform'd his part,
" That death, delighted at ſo great a copiſt,
" Seiz'd it, to make it an original."

[B] Several perſons declare, that his Comedies ſurpaſs, or equal, the moſt beautiful pieces of that kind, written by the antient Greeks and Romans.] Perrault has drawn upon himſelf a great number of adverſaries, for having ſtrongly oppoſed thoſe who aſſert, that no Authors, in this age, are comparable to Homer, Virgil, Demoſthenes, Cicero, Ariſtophanes, Terence, Sophocles, and Euripides. This diſpute has occaſioned a great number of treatiſes that contain a great number of particulars. But the anſwer to Perrault's parallel is not yet publiſhed, nor is it known when it will be. I believe I may aſſert, that with regard to the ſeveral productions of the pen, there are few things in which ſuch numbers of people have acknowledged the ſuperiority of this age, as in Comedies. The reaſon, perhaps, of this is, that all perſons are not capable of reliſhing the graces and delicate touches of Ariſtophanes, who yet are ſtruck with the wit and charms of Moliere ; for it muſt be granted that, in order to form a juſt judgment of the Greek Comic Writers, we ought to be perfectly acquainted with the imperfections of the Athenians. There is a ridicule common to all ages and nations ; and a ridicule peculiar to certain ages and nations. Some ſcenes of Ariſtophanes appear inſipid to us, which, perhaps, charmed the Athenians, becauſe they were acquainted with the imperfections which thoſe ſcenes ridiculed. It was an imperfection, which we, perhaps, do not know ; it was the ridicule, either of ſome particular incidents, or of ſome tranſient taſte or paſſion, which might have been common at that time, but may be unknown to us, though we have an opportunity of conſulting the originals. Such are the obſtacles, which will not allow us to admire the Poet in queſtion according to his merit, neither in Greek nor in Latin ; nor in the moſt faithful and politeſt tranſlations that can be made of them. Now Moliere has not this diſadvantage. We know what he aims at, and we eaſily perceive whether he deſcribes juſtly the ridicule of our age ; and nothing eſcapes us that is well drawn by him. One would even conclude, that, with regard to thoſe thoughts, thoſe delicate ſtrokes of raillery which affect all polite ages and nations, he is more copious and abundant than Ariſtophanes and Terence. This is a very conſiderable prerogative ; for the preſent age cannot be accuſed of wanting taſte for the beautiful paſſages of the Latin Poets. Shew Ladies of wit certain thoughts in Horace, Ovid, Juvenal, &c. tranſlated into old French, &c. though ever ſo flat a verſion ſhould be made of them ; yet, if it be faithful, the Ladies in queſtion will own that thoſe thoughts are beautiful, delicate, and witty. Some beautiful ſtrokes of wit are in vogue in all ages : and one would conclude that Moliere abounds more in thoſe than the Comic Poets of antiquity. There are ſome beauties which would be loſt in verſions, or in a country whoſe taſte differed from that of the French ; but a great many others may be transferred into all kinds of tranſlations, and will pleaſe Readers of all taſtes, provided they underſtand the eſſence of good thoughts. See the article AMPHITRIO (6).

(6) Rem. [B].

[C] It being aſſured, that no man ever experienced more . . . . the torments of jealous huſbands, or of thoſe who have reaſon to be ſo.] I have read in a little book printed in 1688, that (7) Moliere's wife was courted more in proportion, than he was applauded ; that ſhe was daughter to the late Mrs. Bejard, a ſtrolling Actreſs, who was engaged in intrigues with ſeveral young ſparks of Languedoc, at the auſpicious time when her daughter was born : for which reaſon, adds the Author, it would be extremely difficult, (ſhe having ſuch a crowd of gallants, to ſay who was her father ; all we know is, that her mother uſed to declare, that during the irregular life ſhe led, ſhe never admitted any but perſons of quality, Moliere excepted,) and that for this reaſon her daughter ſprung from very noble blood ; and indeed the only thing ſhe recommended to her was, to abandon her charms to none but perſons of figure. She was thought to be Moliere's daughter, though he was afterwards her huſband. However, which I ſhall tranſcribe (d). The moſt ſurprizing circumſtance is, we are told that his wife was his daughter (e). He wrote verſes with prodigious facility (f); but then he took (d) See the rem. [C].

(7) Hiſtory of La Guerin, formerly Moliere's wife and widow, p. 6.

(e) See the rem. [C].

(f) See Boileau's ſecond Satyr.

However, the truth of this is not very well known . . . . (8). Moliere married young Mrs. Bejard ſome time after he had ſettled his company at Paris; he wrote ſome dramatic pieces, and among the reſt, La Princeſſe d'Elide, in which his wife, who acted the part of the Princeſs (9), made ſo ſhining a figure, that he had but too much reaſon to repent his having hazarded her in the midſt of the gay young Courtiers. For, ſoon after ſhe was at Chambor, where the dramatick piece abovementioned was played by the King's order, ſhe grew diſtractedly fond of Count de Guiche, and Count de Lauzun of her. Moliere was told (10), that his great aſſiduity in endeavouring to divert the publick, deprived him of the opportunity of enquiring into his wife's conduct; and that whilſt he ſtrove to divert every one, every one ſtrove to divert his wife. And now jealouſy awaked, in his boſom, the tenderneſs, which the application to his ſtudies had lull'd aſleep. Immediately he flew to his wife, to whom he made heavy complaints; reproaching her with the great care with which he had brought her up; the paſſion he had ſtifled, his behaviour towards her, which was that of a lover rather than of a huſband; whilſt ſhe, in return for ſo many favours, made him the laughing-ſtock of the whole Court. His wife, burſting into tears, confeſſed to him that ſhe had had an inclination for Count de Guiche; but proteſted, with an oath, that her crime was wholly in the intention; and that he ought to pardon the firſt falſe ſteps of a young woman, who generally, for want of experience, is guilty of ſuch miſconduct; but aſſured him, that the indulgence he had ſhewed her had made ſo great an impreſſion on her mind, that ſhe ſhould never be guilty of ſuch foibles for the future. Moliere, perſuaded of her virtue by her tears, begged a thouſand pardons for his being angry with her; and told her with great mildneſs, that it is not enough for people's reputation that they were juſtified by an unblemiſhed conſcience; but that it was alſo neceſſary people ſhould not do any thing, that might make the world ſuſpect their conduct, eſpecially in an age when the publick is ſo apt to form diſadvantageous judgments, and no ways inclined to judge favourably of things (11). She began her old trade more openly than ever. . . (12). "Moliere being told, by ſome who were glad to make "him uneaſy, of his wife's conduct, repeated his "complaints with more violence than ever, and even "threatened to confine her in a monaſtery. Moliere's "wife, exaſperated at his reproaches, wept, fainted "away, and obliged her huſband, who was doatingly fond of her, to repent his having put her into "that condition. He did all that lay in his power "to recover her, by conjuring her to conſider that "love was the only cauſe of his anger; and that ſhe "might judge of the mighty aſcendant ſhe had over "him, ſince that, notwithſtanding he had ſuch juſt "reaſons to be diſſatisfied with her behaviour, he "yet was ready to forgive her, provided ſhe would "ſhew a more reſerved conduct for the future. One "would imagine, that ſo unuſually-kind a huſband "would have ſtruck her with remorſe, and prevailed "with her to reform her conduct; nevertheleſs, "kindneſs had a contrary effect upon this woman; "and the fear ſhe was under, leſt ſhe ſhould never "meet again with ſo favourable an opportunity for her "to live apart from him, made her ſpeak in a very lofty "ſtrain; ſaying to him, that ſhe knew very well "who it was that told him all thoſe falſe ſtories; that "ſhe was quite weary of being charged daily with a "thing of which ſhe was innocent; that he needed "but prepare matters for their ſeparation; and that "ſhe hated him, becauſe he had always been engaged "in a ſecret correſpondence with de la Brie (13), "who lived in their houſe, and had never left it "ſince their marriage. Notwithſtanding the utmoſt "endeavours were uſed to ſoften Mrs. Moliere, ſhe "continued inexorable; from that inſtant ſhe entertained a dreadful averſion for her huſband; and "when he had a mind to make uſe of the privileges, "which the marriage-ſtate entitled him to, ſhe treated him with the utmoſt contempt. In fine, ſhe "carried matters ſo far, that Moliere, who now began to be ſenſible of her depraved inclinations, "conſented to the ſeparation which ſhe had been deſiring perpetually ever ſince their jarring; ſo that they "agreed to part, without addreſſing the Parliament "for that purpoſe. In the mean time, it was with the "greateſt reluctance that Moliere came to a reſolution not to live with his wife; and at the ſame "time that reaſon made him conſider her as a woman, whoſe conduct made her unworthy of the "eſteem of a man of honour; tenderneſs, on the other ſide, made him ſenſible, that it would be a "grief to him, to ſee her ſpend her days without enjoying the privileges which a wife juſtly claims. "He was one day reflecting on this, in his garden "at Auteuil, when Mr. Chapelle, a friend of his, "who was come thither accidentally to take a walk, "went up to him, and found him more melancholy "than uſual, for which reaſon he enquired ſeveral "times what it was that made him ſo. Moliere, "who was aſhamed to diſcover ſo little patience, "with regard to a misfortune that was ſo much in "vogue, forbore ſatisfying him as long as he could; "but having at that time his heart full, a ſtate well "known to perſons who have been in love, he gave "way to the deſire he had to give himſelf eaſe; and "frankly confeſſed to his friend, that the behaviour, "he had been obliged to uſe towards his wife, was "the cauſe of the grief which oppreſſed him. Chapelle, who imagined that he had a ſtrength of "mind ſuperior to things of that nature, laughed at "him; ſaying, that it was ſtrange that he, who "could draw ſo happily the imperfections and foibles "of other men, ſhould himſelf be guilty of a weakneſs which he ridiculed daily; and made him ſenſible, that nothing could be ſo ridiculous as to "love a perſon who makes no return of kindneſs. "With regard to myſelf, ſays he, I own that had "I had the ill fortune to be in the like condition, "and ſhould be ſtrongly perſuaded that the perſon I "loved, indulged her favours to others, the contempt "I ſhould have for her, would be ſo great, that it "would cure me infallibly of my paſſion. Beſides, "you have one ſatisfaction, which you muſt be without, in caſe ſhe was miſtreſs; and revenge, which "generally ſucceeds to love, in an injured lover's "breaſt, may compenſate for all the uneaſineſſes "which your wife brings upon you, ſince you have "no more to do, but to ſhut her up in a monaſtery; "and this, at the ſame time, will be a ſure method "to make you eaſy in your mind. Moliere, who "had liſtened calmly enough to his friend, interrupted him, with aſking, whether he had ever been in "love? I have, replied Chapelle; but then it was "in ſuch a manner as became a man of ſenſe; but "I ſhould never have been ſo very much troubled about a thing, which reaſon had adviſed me to do, "for my happineſs ſake, and I bluſh to ſee you ſo "very wavering. I ſee plainly, replied Moliere, "that you was never in love; and that you took "the ſhadow of that paſſion for the paſſion itſelf. I "will not produce a numberleſs multitude of examples, which would make you ſenſible of the power "of that paſſion. I will only give you a faithful account of the perplexity I myſelf am under, in order to ſhew how little a man is maſter of himſelf, "when love has once gained ſuch an empire over "us, as our natural diſpoſition uſually gives. To anſwer what you obſerve, with regard to the perfect "knowledge you ſay I have of the human mind, "which you think manifeſt from the characters I "every day exhibit on the ſtage; I will own that I "have made their foibles my chief ſtudy; but if I "learnt that the danger may be ſhunned, experience "has taught me but too well, that it is impoſſible "to fly from it. This I judge daily by myſelf." He then gives the ſtory of his marriage, and, after making ſome reflections, he adds (14): I therefore am reſolved to live with her as though ſhe was not my wife: but if you knew how greatly I ſuffer, you would pity me. My paſſion is riſen to ſuch a height, that I cannot forbear being very much concerned for her; and when I conſider how impoſſible it is for me to ſuppreſs what I feel, I ſay to myſelf, ſhe perhaps finds as great difficulty to check the inclination ſhe has to be a coquet, and then I am more diſpoſed to pity than blame her. You doubtleſs will

(8) Hiſtory, &c. ibid. p. 12.

(9) Ibid. p. 13.

(10) Ibid. p. 16.

(11) Ibid. p. 18.

(12) Ibid. p. 19.

(13) This was an Actreſs belonging to the company which Moliere found ſettled at Lyons, the firſt time he played in that city. He fell in love with that woman; was beloved by her, and got her into his company. Hiſtoire de la Guerin, p. 8.

(14) Hiſt. de la Guerin, p. 28.

took too great a liberty in coining new words and expreſſions [D], and he frequently was guilty of barbariſms [E]. Baillet (g) ſhews what judgment we ought to form of his abilities.

(g) Jugemens ſur les poetes, Tom. 5. num. 1520.

Some

will obſerve to me, that no one but a Poet could love after ſuch a manner; but my opinion is, that there is but one ſort of love; and that perſons who have never been ſenſible to ſuch delicacies, have never felt a real paſſion. . . . (15). Are you not ſurprized that my reaſon ſhould only make me ſenſible of my weakneſs, without being able to triumph over it? I on the other ſide will own to you, (ſaid his friend to him) that you are a greater object of compaſſion than I took you to be; but I hope time will give you eaſe: and in the mean time exert your utmoſt endeavours for that purpoſe.

(15) Hiſt. de la Guerin, p. 30.

Such was the fate of this fine genius. In the midſt of the acclamations of the whole Court, at the ſame time that he had attained the moſt exalted reputation, and was the admiration of all France and foreign countries, he was tortured with numberleſs domeſtick uneaſineſſes. His marriage deprived him both of his honour and repoſe; he even had not the ſatisfaction to hate the thing which cauſed his anguiſh, I mean the perſon who was the cauſe of all his troubles. It was on this occaſion one might ſay, Phyſician, cure thyſelf: Moliere, you who divert the publick ſo happily, cannot you divert yourſelf? You, who laugh at every body, who give ſuch excellent advice to poor cuckolds, why do not you take advantage of it firſt? He perhaps may have ſaid a thouſand times with Horace (16), I had rather be thought the meaneſt of all Writers, and have my mind at reſt, than to be ſo great a genius, to be ſo much admired, and ſuffer theſe numberleſs uneaſineſſes.

(16) Prætulerim ſcriptor delirus inerſque videri, Dum mea delectent mala me vel denique fallant, Quam ſapere, & ringi. Horat. lib. 2. Epiſt. 2. ver. 125.

[D] He took too great a liberty in coining new words and expreſſions.] The reader will pleaſe to take notice, that only the exceſs of this liberty is found fault with; for to ſay the truth, people do not deny but that he frequently introduced them very happily, and in ſuch a manner as enriched our language. He has brought into vogue ſome phraſes and words that are of a moſt pleaſing turn; and any Grammarian who ſhould think the contrary, would deſerve the ſame treatment with him who cenſured the Poet Furius for inventing certain Latin words which ſhortened expreſſion, and did not grate upon delicate ears. Read the following words of Aulus Gellius. Non hercle idem ſentio cum Cæſellio Vindice grammatico, ut mea opinio eſt, haud quaquam inerudito. Verum hoc tamen petulanter inſciteque; quod Furium veterem poetam dedecoraſſe linguam Latinam ſcripſit hujuſcemodi vocum fictionibus, quæ mihi quidem neque abhorrere à poetica facultate viſæ ſunt, neque dictu profatuque ipſo tætræ aut inſuaves eſſe; ſicuti ſunt quædam alia ab illuſtribus poetis ficta durè & rancidè. Quæ reprehendit autem Cæſellius Furiana, hæc ſunt; quod terram in lutum verſam luteſcere dixerit, & tenebras in noctis modum factas nocteſcere, &c. (17). i.e. "I indeed am not of the "ſame opinion with Cæſellius Vindex the Gram- "marian, whom I take to be a learned man. How- "ever, he has diſcovered a great deal of preſumption "and ignorance, in aſſerting that Furius the old "Poet, deformed the Latin tongue by his new-coined "terms of that kind, which yet I take to be alto- "gether conſiſtent with poetical diction, nor harſh, "nor inharmonious when ſpoke; as certain others "are, of a grating obſolete ſound, though invented "by diſtinguiſhed Poets. Thoſe which Cæſellius "cenſures in Furius are the following, viz. his cal- "ling luteſcere, earth changed to clay; and nocteſcere, "darkneſs, after the manner of night." By the way, there is no better mint for the coining of new words than the ſtage; for if it produces any new expreſſions which are favourably received, great numbers of people learn them immediately; and by often repeating them, ſpread them among the publick. Good Writers cannot juſtly be diſputed the right of coining new words, ſince otherwiſe languages would remain jejune, barren, and flat. See what Voſſius (18) and ſeveral other Writers ſay on this ſubject (19). It ought therefore, generally ſpeaking, to be granted, that Moliere had a right to improve dramatic ſubjects with new coined words, as he had acquired ſo great a reputation by his plays: but that which may be ſaid againſt him is, that he abuſed his right or power; for it muſt be remembred, that the Writers on ſuch kind of ſubjects are not ſo ſenſible of the poverty of a language, as thoſe who write on dogmatic ſubjects. It muſt be confeſſed, ſays Arnauld (20), that perſons are more ſenſible of the want which our tongue has of certain words, when they write on learned ſubjects, than when they ſpeak or write on common things. Theſe are his words, in a preface where he accounts for the liberty he took in inventing the words philoſophiſmes, philoſophiſtes, advertance. It is certain that comic Poets are not ſo excuſable as Philoſophers who coin words, they being under an indiſpenſible neceſſity of doing this. Read the following complaint of Lucretius.

(17) Aulus Gell. lib. 18. cap. 11. p. m. 494, 495.

(18) Voſſius, Inſt. Orat. lib. 4. cap. 1. p. m. 442.

(19) Theoph. Raynaud, de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 427, p. m. 243, quotes a great number.

(20) Arnauld, Preface to the 5 Denonciation du Peche Philoſophique.

Nec me animi fallit, Graïorum obſcura reperta
Difficile inluſtrare Latinis verſibus eſſe,
(Multa novis verbis præſertim cum ſit agendum,) Propter egeſtatem linguæ, & rerum novitatem (21);
. . . . . .
Nunc & Anaxagoræ ſcrutemur Homœomeriam,
Quam Græci memorant, nec noſtra dicere lingua
Concedit nobis patrii ſermonis egeſtas (22).

(21) Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 137.

(22) Idem, ibid. ver. 830.

" I'm ſenſible the Latin is too poor,
" To equal all the riches of the Grecian ſtore:
" New matter various nature ſtill affords,
" And new conceptions do require new words.
. . . . . .
" Now let's examine with a curious eye
" Anaxagoras his philoſophy,
" By copious Greece term'd Homœomery:
" For which our Latin language, poor in words,
" Not one expreſſive ſingle voice affords."

CREECH.

The reaſon why he wanted words, was not becauſe of the laws of quantity; for thoſe who wrote philoſophical books in proſe, complained alſo of this penury. Quanta verborum nobis paupertas, imo egeſtas ſit, nunquam magis quam hodierno die intellexi. Mille res inciderunt, cum forte de Platone loqueremur, quæ nomina deſiderarent, nec haberent: quædam vero cum habuiſſent, faſtidio noſtro perdidiſſent. Quis autem ferat in egeſtate faſtidium (23)? i. e. "I never perceived in a more "ſenſible manner, than I do at this very time, the "great poverty, or rather want of words, in the "Latin tongue. A thouſand particulars occurred "(whilſt we were talking about Plato) for which no "names could be found; and ſome which had had "names, were loſt, by our ridiculous diſtaſte. But "ſurely can any thing be more abſurd than for thoſe "in want to affect diſtaſte?" We may obſerve, by the way, the double cauſe, to which Seneca aſcribes the penury of languages; the one is, that we have not yet found out certain words; and the other, that ſeveral grew out of uſe. But we ſhould alſo obſerve that the Romans at the time even when they wrote only Epigrams, complained of their not being able to find words they wanted (24); whence it may be concluded, that Moliere might have had the ſame want, and for that reaſon was obliged to have recourſe to invention. Laſtly, it may be obſerved, that the birth of one word proves commonly the death of another (25). This is true chiefly with regard to the French, whence it may be inferred that our language will for ever be poor and barren.

(23) Seneca, Epiſt. 58. init. p. m. 266.

(24) See Pliny Junior, Epiſt. 18. lib. 4.

(25) Juſt as in the productions of nature, where generatio unius eſt corruptio alterius.

[E] He frequently was guilty of barbariſms.] I could quote an hundred inſtances of this, but will confine my ſelf to two, extracted from a piece, which is prefixed to his works in ſome editions. It is a compliment of thanks to the King. He has given it a moſt delightful turn; and it is, perhaps, as good a ſmall piece as ever he wrote. Weigh well the four verſes following addreſſed to his Muſe.

Vous pourriez aiſément l'étendre (26),
Et parler des tranſports qu'en vous font éclater

(26) That is, your compliment.

Les

Some are of opinion, that Moliere cannot claim the glory of being an Inventor, and that he made a good uſe of the comedies which the Italians play'd at Paris [F]. It is falſely aſſerted, that Boileau changed his note after the death of this great comic Writer; certain ignorant Cenſors declaring, that he applauded him when living, but cenſured him when dead. The truth is, he ſtill continued to applaud him when he was in his grave. He only accuſed him of ſhewing too much complaiſance for the pit; a cenſure that was juſt in ſome reſpects, but unjuſt in the whole [G]. The verſes which Father

Les ſurprenans bienfaits, que ſans les meriter
Sa liberale main ſur vous daigne repandre.

" With eaſe you might extend it, and deſcribe
" The tranſports which, in your all-grateful mind,
" Ariſe, when you reflect that, undeſerv'd,
" His liberal hand ſtill heaps new favours on you."

The Author's meaning in theſe lines, is, that his muſe had been indulged the greateſt kindneſs, tho' ſhe was no ways deſerving of them: but they ſignify, according to the grammatical conſtruction, that tho' the King did not deſerve thoſe favours, he nevertheleſs beſtowed them on Moliere's Muſe. This is certainly a barbarous expreſſion. Here follows the other example.

Les Muſes ſont de grandes prometeuſes,
Et comme vos ſœurs les cauſeuſes
Vous ne manqueriez pas ſans doute par le bec.

" Fam'd are the Muſes for their promiſes;
" And like your pratling ſiſters, ſurely you
" Would ne'er want chat——."

The Author's meaning is, that his Muſe would be like her ſiſters, who are very talkative; but, according to the grammatical conſtruction, it plainly ſignifies nothing but this, that ſhe would be a very pratling Muſe, though her ſiſters are of a very different character. It muſt be obſerved, that by barbariſm, I do not mean words or expreſſions borrowed from other languages, and unknown to the French; but a diſpoſition of words contrary to the laws of grammar, and which are looked upon as barbarous by our beſt Grammarians.

In the ſame Poem we find Marquis repouſſable, a barbarous expreſſion. We alſo meet with prevenant amas, another barbarous expreſſion; the word prevenant being only uſed in a figurative ſenſe, and does not ſignify a man who went before or out-ſtript others.

[F] Some are of opinion, that Moliere . . . . . made an advantageous uſe of the Comedies which the Italians played at Paris.] I ſhall prove this aſſertion from an anonymous book, but no matter for that; ſince it is in print, that is ſufficient to juſtify my aſſertion; for the only circumſtance I am to prove is, that ſome perſons affirm that the Italian Comedies exhibited at Paris were Moliere's originals. Read what follows, which is ſuppoſed to be ſpoke by Harlequin. " If " the Italian players had never come into France, " Moliere would perhaps have never been the man " he is. I am ſenſible that he was perfectly well " acquainted with the antient comic Writers: but " after all, he took his firſt hints from our ſtage. " You know that his Cocu Imaginaire is the Ritratto " of the Italians; Scaramouch interrupted in his " amour, gave riſe to his Fâcheux; his Contre-temps " is only Arlequin, Valet étourdi, and ſo of moſt of " his plays; and in theſe latter times, is not his " Tartufe our Bernagaſſo? He indeed excells in his " characters: and his plays appear to me ſo very ju- " dicious, that they ought to be read to young per- " ſons, as ſo many leſſons for giving them a true " notion of the world. And yet theſe excellent " Italian originals produce nothing in this age (27)-"

(27) Livre ſans Nom, (a nameleſs book) divided into 5 dialogues, printed at Paris, and in Holland, in 1695. p. 6. of the Dutch edit.

[G] Boileau accuſed him of ſhewing too much complaiſance for the pit; a cenſure that was juſt in ſome reſpects, but unjuſt in the whole.] Moliere was dead when Boileau applauded him in one of his Epiſtles (28), as much, or more, than he had done in the ſatyr he had addreſſed to him (29). It is therefore a very unjuſt aſſertion, to ſay that Boileau applauded him merely out of policy, and for fear of being ridiculed by him publickly, if he ſhould ſay nothing to his advantage, or preſume to criticiſe him. But (will it be ſaid) he cenſured him when he had no cauſe to be under any apprehenſions, and conſequently the ſuſpicion entertained of him ſeems to be well grounded. I anſwer, that it is not. I am of opinion that had he writ his Art of Poetry during Moliere's life, he would have introduced in it the cenſure I ſhall quote hereunder. It was, as it were, eſſential to his ſubject. It includes a very juſt obſervation, which ought to be made an inviolable maxim, in caſe plays were writ only to be printed. But as they are deſigned chiefly for the ſtage, and to be played before all ſorts of people, it is not juſt to require their being writ according to Boileau's taſte. His words are as follow:

Eſtudiez la Cour, & connoiſſez la ville,
L'une & l'autre eſt toûjours en modeles fertile.
C'eſt par là que Moliere illuſtrant ſes écrits
Peut-eſtre de ſon Art eût remporté le prix;
Si moins ami du peuple en ſes doctes peintures,
Il n'euſt point fait ſouvent grimacer ſes figures,
Quitté pour le bouffon, l'agreable & le fin,
Et ſans honte à Terence allié Tabarin.
*Dans ce ſac ridicule où Scapin * s'envelope,*
Je ne reconnois plus l'Auteur du Miſanthrope (30).

* In one of Moliere's Plays.

(30) Deſpreaux, Art. Poetique, Cant. 3. ver. 391 & ſeq.

" Study the Court, and learn to know the city,
" For both, in models, are moſt fruitful found.
" Moliere, with theſe, illuſtrating his ſcenes,
" Perhaps, o'er all had triumph'd in his art,
" If, to delight the rabble, he had not drawn
" Some characters diſtorted and groteſque;
" Had not writ force; neglected pleaſing wit;
" And join'd the ſtroller's jeſts with charming Terence.
" When waggiſh Scapin's hid within the ſack,
" How far this differs from the Miſanthrope!

[" I ſhall give a little anecdote with regard to the " two following verſes cited above, from Boileau:

" Dans ce ſac ridicule ou Scapin l'envelope.
" Je ne reconnois plus l'Auteur du Miſantrope.

A perſon of good ſenſe obſerved to me, many years ſince, that they ought to be read thus;

" Dans ce ſac ridicule où Scapin s'enveloppe,
" Je ne reconnois plus l'auteur du Miſantrope.

" When waggiſh Scapin hides him in the ſack,
" How far this differs from the Miſanthrope!

" His reaſon for this correction was, Scapin does " not hide himſelf in a ſack, in Moliere's dramatic " piece entitled the Cheats of Scapin, but hides Ge- " ronte in it, which character Moliere himſelf played. " The perſon in queſtion was firmly perſuaded that " Boileau, who could not be ignorant of that cir- " cumſtance, had writ l'enveloppe, (hides or wraps him " in;) and that s'enveloppe (hides or wraps himſelf in) " was an error of the preſs. This obſervation did " not ſlip my memory, for which reaſon I began to " make that correction, thirty years ſince, in all the " editions wherein I met with this verſe. But Mr. " Broſſette, Boileau's friend, (who obliged the world " with his notes on that Poet's works) ſeeing that " correction in the margin of my Boileau, (printed " in 1716, with curious and uſeful notes by Mr. Bro- " ſette above-mentioned) aſſured me that, though this " correction was ſo very juſt and natural, yet Boileau " had always written s'enveloppe, though he knew that " it aſſerted a falſity; and that the other expreſſion, " though ſo very eaſy and natural, had never occur- " red to him *."]

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 977. col. 2.

(28) The 7.

(29) The 2.

(b) See Tom. 2. of Obſervations de Mr. Menage ſur la Langue Françoiſe, p. 15.

(i) Ibid. p. 12.

Father Bouhours compoſed in praiſe of Moliere (b), are, in the judgment of Menage, the beſt he ever wrote (i). I do not know whether the Italians approve of the Italian tranſlation of his Comedies by one of their countrymen ſettled in Germany (k). It is more difficult, in works of this kind, than in others, to transfer, into a verſion, all the beauties of the original. By the way, what I ſaid concerning the fondneſs which our Moliere had for the ſtage, is found, with ſome other circumſtances, in a work of Perrault [H]. The reader will doubtleſs be pleaſed to know what became, after Moliere's death, of the Company of Comedians over whom he had preſided [I]; a circumſtance that will greatly contribute to ſhew the merit of this great player.

(k) His name is Nicolas di Caſtelli, and he ſtyles himſelf Secretary to the Elector of Brandenbourg. He printed this tranſlation at his own expence at Leipſic, anno 1698, in 4 vol. 12mo.

Boileau blames Moliere for calculating his plays, not only for perſons of a delicate taſte and a ſound judgment, but likewiſe for the vulgar. But Moliere had his reaſons for this; and might have anſwered what Harlequin is ſuppoſed to have ſaid on the like occaſion. His words are theſe. "Thoſe humorous "ſtrokes, ſaid I, are not diſagreeable in your Co- "medies; but unhappily they are not equally good. "I own it, (replied he) but they nevertheleſs divert "certain young ſparks, who come to our play-houſe "with no other deſign but to laugh; who laugh at "any thing, and frequently without knowing why. "We frequently play to ſuch people, and we are ob- "liged to give them ſtrokes of humour and jeſts "adapted to their capacity, otherwiſe we ſhould often "play to empty benches. I am ſorry, ſays I, that "you have almoſt laid aſide your old plays; they "were applauded by all perſons of good ſenſe; ſe- "veral reflections in them were of great uſe in "morality; and your ſtage was a place where, I "may preſume to ſay, vice was ſo effectually ridi- "culed, that the ſpectators were prompted to love "virtue, merely from rational motives. Were we "to play, (continued he) none but our old plays, we "ſhould have very thin houſes; and I ſhall make the "ſame anſwer to you as Cinthio did formerly to St. "Evremont; that good players, acting excellent plays, "would be ſtarved (31)" It muſt be conſidered, that actors are at a great expence; and that plays are intended to divert the common people as well as Senators (32). They conſequently ought to be adapted to the taſte of the publick in general, that is, they ought to be written in ſuch a manner as may invite multitudes to ſee them; otherwiſe, were they a perfect compound of uncommon thoughts, and exquiſitely delicate reflections, they would ruin the actors and be of no ſervice to the common people.

(31) Livre ſans Nom, p. 4 and 5.

(32) Conſider well the following words of Terence, from the prologue to the Andria.

Poeta quum primum animum ad ſcribendum appulit
Id ſibi negotii credidit ſolum dari
Populo ut placerent quas feciſſet fabulas.

General OBSERVATIONS againſt thoſe who cenſure this Dict.

Not only thoſe who criticize Moliere may be anſwered by ſuch reflections: a great number of other books are alſo found fault with, for people's not conſidering the various uſes for which they are deſigned; and their meeting with a thouſand particulars which they would have had the Author ſuppreſs. What is this thing to me, (ſays one) what is it to me, (continues another) that ſuch a man had a bad wife; of what uſe are ſuch a number of quotations, ſo many jovial thoughts, and philoſophical reflections, &c. Such are the contiuual complaints of thoſe who cenſure this Dictionary: but thoſe perſons will permit me to ſay, that they want the moſt eſſential circumſtance neceſſary for forming a right judgment of this work. They did not know that it was calculated for all ſorts of readers; and that, had it been written agreeably to the taſte of the greateſt Puriſts (33), it would thereby have gone out of its natural ſphere. Theſe people do not conſider, that had I kept to their notions of purity, I ſhould have writ a book, which, indeed, would have pleaſed them, but then it would have diſpleaſed hundreds of other people, and have grown mouldy in the bookſeller's warehouſe. It would have been a melancholy affair for him, to have had two huge folio volumes, that had contained nothing but what affords entertainment to ſuch as pretend to gravity and an exquiſite taſte; and who would have the moſt copious ſubjects explained by monoſyllables. Let them make the ſame reflection, which Socrates did at the ſight of a fair (34). We will ſuppoſe this; but ſtill the fair will be what it ought to be.

(33) Give me leave to call by this name, the moſt ſtrict obſervers of the laws of perfection, with regard to the taſte of a few, or the choice of wits.

(34) Quam multis rebus ego non egeo! How many things have I no occaſion for? Vide Eraſmum in Apophth. p. m. 168.

[H] The fondneſs which our Moliere had for the ſtage, is found, with ſome other circumſtances, in a work of Perrault.] Moliere is one of thoſe illuſtrious men whoſe portraits Mr. Begon (35) cauſed to be engraved, and their hiſtorical elogiums to be drawn up and publiſhed. Perrault, the Author of thoſe elogiums, affirms, that Moliere was born with ſo ſtrong a paſſion for the ſtage, that no endeavours which might have been uſed could prevent his turning actor. He had no ſooner gone through his courſe of ſtudies, in which he was extremely ſucceſsful, but he joined with ſeveral young perſons of the ſame age and inclination with himſelf, and took a reſolution to form a company, in order to go and act plays in country towns. His father . . . . deſired all his friends to diſſuade him, if poſſible, from his reſolution; but not being able to make any impreſſion on him, either by the remonſtrances or promiſes they made him in his name, he ſent to him the maſter, who had educated and boarded him, during the firſt years of his ſtudies. . . . . But his maſter, ſo far from perſuading him to quit the ſtage, was prevailed upon, by young Moliere, to turn actor. . . . . Having completed his Company, he went and played at Roan, and from thence at Lyons, where having pleaſed the Prince of Conti, &c. (36). The reſt of the elogium is very curious.

(35) Intendant of Juſtice and of naval affairs.

(36) Perrault's Hommes illuſtres, p. 79.

[I] The reader will doubtleſs be pleaſed to know what became, after Moliere's death, of the Company of Comedians, over whom he had preſided.] I met with the following particulars on this ſubject, in Chappuzeau. This Company, before it was ſettled in the Palace Royal, had acted with great applauſe at Paris, on the foſſez de Neſle; and at St. Paul's in Lyons, and in Languedoc. They were juſtly looked upon as the beſt Company of country players. The two Bejars (brothers) and du Parc were ſome of his principal actors. Du Croiſi, who headed a company of country players, and le Grange a very good player joined with them. They acted for ſome time in the hall of the Petit Bourbon, by an agreement made between them and the Italian players, who were already ſettled there. Afterwards they were admitted into the Theatre of the Palace Royal, and played in it till the beginning of Lent 1673. Moliere dying at that time, four players belonging to his Company joined with thoſe of the Hotel of Burgundy; and as thoſe left there were not in a capacity to continue, his Majeſty was pleaſed to make but one Company of that of Marais (37), and the other of the Palace Royal. Mr. Colbert was ordered to pitch upon the beſt actors was ſtill continued in the Company of the Palace Royal, as well as the moſt ſkilful in that of Marais, and to make one good Company of theſe, to be called the King's Company of Comedians. It was ſettled in the Hotel du Roi, in Mazarine Street (38); and acted for the firſt time, publickly, on Sunday the 9th of July 1673. The players were forbid to act in the Palace Royal, and on the ſtage of Marais. I am to obſerve that Moliere, who was the chief ſpeaker of the Company belonging to the Palace Royal, reſigned that office to la Grange, ſix years before his death (39).

(37) It was eſtabliſhed in 1620, and called the King's Company.

(38) Otherwiſe called, des foſſez de Neſle.

(39) Extracted from a book, entitled Le Theatre Francois. It is writ by Chappuzeau.

PORCIA, the daughter of Cato of Utica, had a ſoul ſo well framed, that ſhe eſcaped the influence of the bad examples which her mother and her aunts gave her [A], and

[A] She eſcaped the influence of the bad examples which her mother and her aunts gave her.] Cato of Utica was unfortunate with regard to his relations of the fair ſex: there was in that reſpect ſomething very odd and unlucky in his fate. He had two Uterine ſiſters both named Servilia; the one was the mother of and imitated only her father's vertues. She applied herſelf very much to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, and gave ſtrong proofs of an exalted courage; for gueſſing that her huſband Brutus was making preparations for ſome conſiderable undertaking, ſhe cut herſelf with a knife in order to ſhew by her conſtancy and patience in ſuffering pain that ſhe was capable to hold her tongue, and therefore worthy that her huſband ſhould impart his ſecret to her [B]: he did it, and by that means ſhe came to know that the preparations were making to kill Cæſar. If on that occaſion ſhe raiſed herſelf far above her own ſex, ſhe found herſelf on a level with the other women on the day on which the deſign was executed. The uneaſineſs of her mind was ſo ſtrong, and diſturbed her to ſuch a degree, that it threw her into fainting fits, and it was thought ſhe was dead [C]. We are not told of Brutus, and ſuffered herſelf to be debauched by Julius Cæſar (1). She was the talk of the whole town (2): The other was married to Lucullus, and abandoned herſelf to diſſoluteneſs with ſo little diſcretion, that her huſband put her out of doors. Being thus ruined in her reputation ſhe retired to her brother's houſe, who was ſo kind as to receive her, and carry her along with him in his journeys. It was no great honour to him thus to keep in his houſe an object of infamy, and it was an inconvenient taſk for him to prevent her from continuing to lead a diſſolute life. She leſſened very much the bad reputation ſhe had before, when it was obſerved, that ſhe had of her own accord ſubmitted to be watched by Cato, and to lead the ſame auſtere life with him, following him in his flight. And yet notwithſtanding this Cæſar upbraided him with that ſiſter of his (3). Attilia Cato's wife was ſo diſſolute, that he was obliged to divorce her after he had got two children by her (4). He married her to his ſecond wife a woman, whom he yielded afterwards to Hortenſius by way of Loan; he married again when ſhe was a widow, and had inherited Hortenſius's eſtate (5). This afforded Cæſar a large ſcope to cenſure Cato's life (6). Add to this, that Cato finding himſelf of age to marry pitched upon a maiden, who had been contracted to Metellus Scipio. Her name was Lepida: the contract was broke off; and ſhe being at liberty conſented to Cato's addreſſes, and was betrothed to him. But Metellus Scipio, repenting afterwards that he had broken the match, did all that lay in his power to regain Lepida, and ſucceeded in his deſign (7). "At which Cato was "very much incenſed, and was reſolved to go to "law about it, but his friends diſſuaded him from "it. However, he was ſo moved by the heat of "youth and paſſion, that he wrote Iambicks againſt "Scipio, which had all the wit and ſatyr of Ar"chilochus, without the obſcenity and bitterneſs. "After this he married Attilia, the daughter of "Soranus, who was the firſt, but not the only wo"man he ever knew: much leſs happy in this than "Lælius, the friend of Scipio, who never knew but "one woman, namely, her whom he married firſt "(8)." The latter part of this paſſage is ſurperfluous with regard to the text I was to comment upon; but it contains ſo remarkable a particular, that I thought the reader would be obliged to me for not omitting it. Where are now a-days the perſons of Lælius's quality, and intimately acquainted with the General of an Army; where are, I ſay, the perſons who like him, during a long life, never enjoyed a woman but their own wife? Nay, where are the young men of Cato's quality, who enter maidens into the nuptial beds? Theſe are ſuch ſingular particulars, as will appear moſt extraordinary, and for the ſake of which it was proper to continue a quotation a little farther.

[B] She cut herſelf with a knife in order to ſhew ... that ſhe was capable to hold her tongue, and ... worthy that her huſband ſhould impart his ſecret to her.] If you deſign to have a complete notion of the great action ſhe performed on that occaſion, you muſt read this whole account from Plutarch. "Porcia ..... "being well ſkilled in Philoſophy, having a tender "love for her huſband, and being full of courage, "and adorned with a great deal of good ſenſe and "prudence, reſolved not to aſk her huſband's ſecrets, "till ſhe had made a trial of herſelf. She took a "little knife, with which the barbers uſe to cut "nails, and having turned all her ſervants and at"tendants out of her chamber, ſhe cut herſelf a "great gaſh in the thigh, upon which followed im"mediately a great flux of blood, and ſoon after "violent pains, and a dangerous fever, occaſioned "by the anguiſh of the wound. Brutus being in "great affliction upon her account, ſhe in the height "of all her pains ſpoke thus to him. I Brutus, "being the daughter of Cato, was given in marriage to "you, not like a concubine, to partake only in the common "civilities of bed and board, but to bear a part in all "your good, and in all your bad fortunes: and for my "part, when I look upon you, I find no reaſon to re"pent the match: but what evidence of my love, what "ſatisfaction can you receive from me, if I may not "ſhare with you in bearing your moſt hidden griefs, nor "be admitted to any of your councils, which require ſe"crecy and truſt? I know very well, that women ſeem "to be of too weak a nature to be truſted with ſecrets. "But certainly, Brutus, a virtuous birth and education, "and a converſation with the good and honourable, are "of ſome force as to the forming of our manners, and "ſtrengthening our natural weakneſs. And I can boaſt "that I am the daughter of Cato, and the wife of "Brutus; and though before, I put too little confidence "in theſe two great titles, yet now I have tried myſelf, "and find that even againſt grief and pain itſelf I "am invincible. Having ſaid this, ſhe ſhewed him "her wound, and related to him the whole trial "ſhe had made of her own conſtancy. At which "Brutus being aſtoniſhed, lifted up his hands to "Heaven, and begged the aſſiſtance of the Gods in "his enterprize, that he might live to be a "huſband worthy of ſuch a wife as Porcia; ſo hav"ing comforted her he left her, (9)" Valerius Maximus (10) gives us a much ſhorter account, and ſuppoſes other circumſtances; for he aſſerts that Porcia was acquainted with her huſband's deſign before ſhe wounded herſelf; he adds that ſhe gave herſelf the wound on the very day that Cæſar was killed, and that ſhe did it in order to try, whether ſhe ſhould have courage enough to put an end to her life in caſe Brutus's undertaking were attended with ill ſucceſs. Take notice here how the accounts of the Hiſtorians differ, even with regard to the moſt remarkable events.

[C] The uneaſineſs of her mind .... diſturbed her to ſuch a degree, that it threw her into fainting fits, and it was thought ſhe was dead.] Plutarch, in relating this particular, had no other view, but to give an inſtance of Brutus's intrepidity. Here follow his words. "In "the mean while there came one in all haſte from "Brutus's houſe, and brought news that his wife "was dying. For Porcia being extremely uneaſy a"bout the iſſue of the undertaking, and not able to "bear the greatneſs of her cares, could ſcarce keep "herſelf within doors; and at every little noiſe or "voice ſhe heard, leaping forth and ſtarting ſudden"ly, like one of the mad Prieſteſſes of Bacchus, aſk"ed every one that came from the Forum, what "Brutus was doing? and ſent continually one meſ"ſenger after another to enquire after him. At laſt, "after long expectation, the ſtrength of her body "could hold out no longer, but being overcome with "her doubts and fears, ſhe fainted away. She had "not time to betake herſelf to her chamber; for as "ſhe was ſitting among her women, a ſudden want "of ſpirits ſeized her, her colour changed, and her "ſpeech was quite loſt. At this ſight her women "made a great and lamentable out-cry, and many of "the neighbours running to Brutus's houſe, the re"port was ſoon ſpread abroad that Porcia was dead, "though ſhe recovered in a little while, and came to "herſelf again by the aſſiſtance of her women. "When Brutus received this news, he was extremely "troubled, not without reaſon: yet he was not ſo

(1) She proſtituted alſo her daughter to him. See above, quot. (1) of the art. CASSIUS LONGINUS (Cajus).

(2) Οὕτω μὲν ἦν ὁ πρὸς Καισαρα Σερβιλίας ἔρως περιῤῥύτος. So much was Servilia's love for Cæſar publiſhed abroad. Plutarch. in Bruto, p. 986.

(3) Idem, in Catone minore, p. 785 of Amiot's tranſlation.

(4) A ſon and our Porcia.

(5) See above the rem. [O] of the art. of the 1ſt HORTENSIUS (Quintus).

(6) Extracted from Plutarch. in Catone minore, p. 707, 784.

(7) Plut. ibidem, p. 726.

(8) Idem, ibid. Mr. Bayle gives here Amiot's tranſlation.

(9) Plut. in Bruto, p. 989. Mr. Bayle follows Amiot's tranſlation.

(10) Valerius Maximus, lib. 3. cap. 2. num. 15. p. m. 254.

told what she did, nor what she said, when she heard the success of the attempt, nor during the war, which her husband was obliged to carry on against Cæsar's friends; but we know that having accompanied him to the sea-shore with the greatest proofs of constancy, she could not forbear shedding tears at the sight of a certain picture [D], and that she killed herself with a great deal of courage, when she heard Brutus had done the same [E]. Observe that when she married him she was the Relict of Bibulus, by whom she had got children (a). If the President du Vair had known this, he would not have ascribed to her the answer, which he pretends she made [F], and which belongs probably to another PORCIA, who was Cato of Utica's sister, and the wife of one

(a) See the rem. [D] towards the end.

" carried away by his private grief, as to neglect " the publick concern; he did not so much as go " home to see how his wife was (11)." Cæsar was killed soon after.

(11) Plut. in Bruto, p. 990. Mr. Bayle follows Amiot's translation.

[D] Having accompanied her husband to the sea-shore . . . . she could not forbear shedding tears at the sight of a certain picture.] Plutarch's account of this contains some particulars, which are much to Porcia's honour; it is therefore proper to transcribe it here. " Brutus despairing of any good success, resolved to " leave Italy: he went by land through Leucania, " and came to Elea, situated by the sea side. From " hence it was thought convenient that Porcia should " return to Rome: she was overcome with grief to " part from Brutus, but strove, as much as was possible, " to conceal it; but in spight of all her manly reso- " lutions, a picture, which she saw there accidentally, " betrayed it. The story of it was the parting of " Hector and Andromache, when he went to engage " the Greeks, giving his young son Astyanax into " her arms, and she fixing her eyes upon him with " an earnest and affectionate look. As soon as she " espied this piece, the resemblance it bore to her " own concern, made her burst out into tears, and " several times a day she walked where that picture " hung, to gaze at it, and weep before it. Upon " which occasion Acilius, one of Brutus's friends, re- " peated out of Homer these lines, wherein Andro- " mache speaks to Hector.

" Be careful, Hector, for with thee my all,
" My father, mother, brother, husband fall.

" To which Brutus replied with a smile; but I must " not answer Porcia as Hector did Andromache,

" Mind you your wheel, and to your maids give law.

" For though the natural weakness of her body hin- " ders her from acting what only the strength of men " can perform, yet she has a mind as valiant and as " active for the good of her country, as the best of " us. This relation is in the memoirs of Bibulus, " Porcia's son (12)." This Bibulus, who was Porcia's son by her first husband, wrote a little book of the actions and deeds of Brutus (13). She had at least one child more by that husband (14).

(12) Plut. in Bruto, p. 994. Mr. Bayle follows Amiot's translation.

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 989.

(14) Idem, in Vita Catonis minoris, p. 771, A.

[E] She killed herself with a great deal of courage when she heard Brutus had done the same.] They, who do not understand Latin, will see hereunder, in the passage from Plutarch, the sense of this Apostrophe of Valerius Maximus. Tuos quoque castissimos ignes, Portia, M. Catonis filia, cuncta sæcula debita admiratione prosequuntur: quæ cum apud Philippos victum & interemptum virum tuum Brutum cognosceres, quia ferrum non dabatur, ardentes ore carbones haurire non dubitasti, muliebri spiritu virilem patris exitum imitata. Sed nescio an hoc fortius, quòd ille usitato, tu novo genere mortis absumpta es (15). i. e. " All future ages will also re- " vere as they ought your most chaste remains, O " Porcia, M. Cato's daughter; for when you knew " that your husband Brutus was vanquished and killed " at the battle of Philippi, as you could not meet " with any sword to kill yourself, you did not scruple " to swallow burning coals; imitating thus the brave " death of your father, with a woman's spirit. But " I question whether there was more courage in him " who died a common death, than in you who died " after a new and unusual manner." Plutarch relates the same particular, and quotes Valerius Maximus, and another Author. But then he observes, that there was a letter dispersed abroad under the name of Brutus, from which one might learn, that Porcia died because she was not well waited upon in her distemper.

(15) Valer. Max. lib. 4. cap. 6. p. m. 394, 395.

" As for Porcia . . . Nicolaus the Philosopher, and " Valerius Maximus write, that being desirous to " die, but being hindered by her friends who conti- " nually watched her, from killing herself, she snatch- " ed some burning coals out of the fire, and shutting " them close in her mouth, stifled herself and died. " Though there is yet extant a letter of Brutus to his " friends, in which he laments the death of Porcia, " and accuses them for neglecting her so, that she " chose to die rather than languish with her disease. " So that it seems Nicolaus was mistaken in the time; " for this epistle, if indeed it be authentick, and tru- " ly Brutus's, gives us to understand the disease and " the love of this Lady, and the manner of her death " (16)."

(16) Plut. in Bruto, in fine, p. 1009. Amiot's translation.

[F] The President du Vair . . . . would not have ascribed to her an answer, which he pretends she made.] One of the decrees, given in a solemn manner (in a red gown) by that President, relates to a cause which was tried in the Parliament of Provence, between a woman who married again nine months after her first husband's death, and the first husband's relation. By that decree she was deprived of all that had been left her by her husband's last will, and of all the matrimonial advantages, because she married within the year of her mourning (17). Monsieur du Vair quotes many beautiful sentences from the heathen Writers, and from the antient Fathers, against second marriages (18), and he asserts that our Porcia declared, that an honest woman marries but once. Æneas's Dido being pressed to marry again, wishes rather to die. . . . And yet being at last persuaded to it, she laments her fate, and cries out, & quo solo sidera adibam extinctus pudor. i. e. " That modesty is now gone, by which alone I " could be exalted to the skies," as judging very justly, that women who marry a second time, have neither shame nor happiness left: for which reason, as Tertullian tells us, fortunæ muliebri coronam non imponebat nisi univira, i. e. " no woman could put a crown on the " Goddess Fortune's head, but she who had been " married to one husband only." Which is pretty much to the same purpose with what the celebrated Porcia, Brutus's wife, said; fœlix & pudica matrona non nubit nisi semel (19). i. e. " A happy and mo- " dest matron marries but once." This Porcia could not speak thus without condemning herself; since Brutus was her second husband. I imagine that Monsieur du Vair was misled, because he did not sufficiently consider St. Jerom's words. They are not accurate; they do even contain a falsity, so that they propose to lead us into error. But after all, they do not ascribe the answer in question to Porcia the wife of Brutus. St. Jerom having mentioned Martia, Cato's youngest daughter (20), who would never marry again, adds, that Brutus married Porcia, who was a maiden (21), and that Cato married Martia who was not a maiden (22), and that accordingly, experience shewed that Martia was capable to forsake Cato and marry Hortensius, and that Porcia would not live without Brutus. St. Jerom mentions afterwards one Porcia the younger, who made the answer which you have seen in the passage from Mr. du Vair. Martia Catonis filia minor, cum quæreretur ab ea, cur post amissum maritum denuo non nuberet, respondit, non se invenire virum, qui se magis vellet, quàm sua. Quo dicto ostendit divitias magis in uxoribus eligi solere, quàm pudicitiam, & multos non oculis, sed digitis uxores ducere. Optima sanè res, quàm avaritia conciliat. Eadem cum lugeret virum, & matronæ ab ea quærerent, quem diem haberet luctus ultimum: ait, quem & vitæ. Arbitror, quæ ita virum quærebat absentem, de secundo matrimonio non cogitabat. Brutus Portiam virginem duxit uxorem, Martiam Cato non virginem: sed Martia inter Hortensium Catonemque discurrit, & sine Catone vivere Martia potuit,

(17) Oeuvres du Sieur du Vair, p. 859, edit. of Geneva, 1617, 8vo.

(18) Compare this with what is observed above, rem. [E] of the art. GONZAGA (Lucretia de).

(19) Oeuvres du Sieur du Vair, p. 820.

(20) We do not find such a daughter of Cato mentioned by the Heathen Authors.

(21) This is false, for she was the relict of Bibulus.

(22) Plutarch does not say this.

one Domitius Ænobarbus (b), and who was unqueſtionably adorned with very noble qualities, ſince Cicero (c), Lollius, and Varro, wrote her elogium. She died before Cæſar was killed.

(b) Plutarch. in Catone Utic. p. 778. F.

(c) See Cicero, Epiſt. ad Atticum, 37 and 48. lib. 13.

tuit, Portia ſine Bruto non potuit. Magis enim ſe unicis viris applicant fœminæ, & nihil aliud noſſe, magnum arctioris indulgentiæ vinculum eſt. . . . . Portia minor, cum laudaretur apud eam quædam bene morata, quæ ſecundum habebat maritum, reſpondit: Felix & pudica matrona, nunquam præterquam ſemel nubit (23). i. e. "Martia, Cato's youngeſt daughter, being aſked "why ſhe did not marry again after her huſband's "death, anſwered, that ſhe could not meet with a "man, who liked her better than her money. By "which ſaying ſhe ſhewed, that men loved riches, "rather than modeſty, in a woman; and choſe a "wife by their fingers, rather than by their eyes. "They like that beſt, which gratifies their covetouſ-"neſs. The ſame Martia mourning for her huſ-"band, and being aſked by ſome matrons, which "would be the laſt day of her grief, replied, the "ſame with that of my life. I am apt to believe, "that ſhe who lamented her abſent huſband, had "no thoughts of taking another. Brutus married "Porcia, when ſhe was ſtill a virgin; Cato mar-"ried Martia, who was not a virgin. But Martia "went from Cato to Hortenſius, and from Hortenſi-"us again to Cato: Martia could live without Cato, "Porcia could not live without Brutus. Women are "generally more fond of one ſingle huſband; and "the not knowing of any other man ties the knot "of friendſhip much faſter. . . . . As they were "commending before Porcia the younger a virtuous "woman, who was married to a ſecond huſband, "Porcia anſwered, a happy and modeſt matron ne-"ver marries but once." One cannot well underſtand what he means by this Porcia the younger, Porcia minor; for antient hiſtory does not mention two daughters of Cato of Utica; and if it ſpeaks of two Porcia's, it is to acquaint us that Cato was the brother of the one, and the father of the other. At that rate the latter muſt have been Porcia the younger, Porcia minor; but ſhe could not have declared herſelf againſt ſecond marriages, with that ſeverity, which St. Jerom mentions. Some pretend, that he means the other Porcia, Cato's ſiſter, who was married to Domitius. Meminit Hieronymus (Porciæ Domitio nuptæ) adverſus Jovinianum, qui tale ejus dictum celebrat: cum apud eam, &c (24). But for what reaſon ſhould he call her Porcia minor? It is very probable that he meant a Porcia, who was the youngeſt ſiſter of Brutus's wife, and that his notions being perhaps ſomewhat confuſed, he called the ſame perſon Porcia minor, whom he had named Martia a little before. It muſt be remembered that Martia, Cato of Utica's wife, was big with child, when her huſband yielded her up to Hortenſius (25). Nothing can prevent us from thinking ſhe was pregnant of a girl, who is indifferently called Porcia minor, or Martia (26), though it was not the cuſtom for daughters to be called by their mother's name. St. Jerom, who was not perhaps attentive enough, made two perſons out of the two names of one ſingle woman. However it be, it is certain, that the anſwer he aſcribes to Martia, is of the ſame nature with that which he aſcribes to Porcia the younger. It was of ſome purpoſe to him to diſtinguiſh them, for his deſign was only to enlarge the number of ſuch inſtances. He quotes that of Annia, that of Marcella, and that of Valeria. The firſt anſwered, that ſhe would not marry again, becauſe, ſaid ſhe, if I met with a good huſband, I ſhould be in a continual fear to loſe him (27); and if he proved a bad one, it would be a very hard caſe for me to live in that miſerable condition, after the kind uſage I received from my former huſband. As for Marcella, ſhe anſwered, I am ſo well ſatisfied with having been once married, that I do not want to have any more of it. Valeria anſwered only, that her firſt huſband was ſtill living for her (28). Anniam cum propinquus moneret, ut alteri viro nuberet; eſſe enim ei & ætatem integram, & faciem bonam: nequaquam, inquit, hoc faciam. Si enim virum bonum invenero, nolo timere, ne perdam: ſi malum, quid neceſſe eſt poſt bonum peſſimum ſuſtinere? . . . . . Marcella major rogata à matre ſua, gauderet-ne ſe nupſiſſe, reſpondit: ita valde, ut amplius nolim. Valeria Meſſalarum ſoror, amiſſo Servio viro, nulli volebat nubere. Quæ interrogata cur hoc faceret, ait ſibi ſemper maritum Servium vivere (29).

(23) Hieronym. lib. 1. adverſ. Jovinianum, p. m. 36.

(24) Glandorp. Onomaſt. p. 716.

(25) Plut. in Catone minore, p. 771.

(26) The Author of the Scholia on St. Jerom, ad locum ſupra relatum, thinks that this Martia was called thus on the account of her mother.

(27) See above, rem. [A] of the article GONZAGA (Julia de).

(28) Hieronymus, lib. 1. adverſ. Jovian. p. m. 36.

(29) An antient Author ſaid accordingly, that viduæ luctus pro marito erat. (Grief is a widow's husband;) which Lucian has ſince applied to Pompey's wife, in his encomium upon her. Perfruitur lachrymis, & habet pro conjuge luctum. (She feeds on her tears, and her grief is inſtead of a huſband to her.) Du Vair, Oeuvres, p. 820.

Obſerve that thoſe maxims afforded a moſt noble field to the Counſellors, who pleaded againſt the widow, who is meant in Monſieur du Vair's decree. She gave them another large ſcope to expatiate upon by her impatience to marry a ſecond huſband in the ninth month of her widowhood, and without waiting till Lent was over. She does not only violate that private and domeſtic mourning, ſaid they (30), ſhe does not only forget the reſpect ſhe owes to her late huſband, ſhe does not only ſlight the memory of the benefactor, but ſhe does even profane the time of publick mortification, ſhe breaks through the laws of the Church, and gives offence to all the world. The mettle of youth has perhaps carried you too far, and as Tertullian obſerves, deſpumare illis nuptiis ſanguinis fervorem oportuit, it was proper to allay the heat of your blood by that marriage. But that excuſe would hardly be allowed a young maiden in the prime of her age. Though, as St. Jerom obſerves, Libido majorem in virginibus patiatur famem, dum dulcius putat omne quod neſcit; the appetite of luſt is ſtronger in virgins, becauſe they imagine that the ſweeteſt, which they have not yet experienced. And ſhall an old woman dare to urge that excuſe, after ſhe had lived and lain twenty five years with a man, who was threeſcore and ten when he died? How then have you contained yourſelf during your huſband's life, when the name of a wife, and the cover of marriage afforded you more liberty, and the ſight of an old man could but the more provoke your luſt? They ſtruck her dumb with civil laws: but ſhe oppoſed againſt them the canon law, and the indulgence of the Pope's decrees (31). It is a ſcandalous thing, that there ſhould be civil laws, which the canon law enervates, in order to ſupport the abuſes in matrimonial affairs (32).

(30) Ibid. p. 818.

(31) Ib. p. 826, 854.

(32) See above, quotat. (42), of the art. PIENNE.

PORCIUS (MARCUS), one of the greateſt men among the Antients, known commonly under the title of CATO THE CENSOR, was born in the year 519 after the building of Rome [A], in the town of Tuſculum (a). He began to ſerve in the armies at the age of ſeventeen, and ſhewed not only great courage, but alſo a great contempt

(a) Cornel. Nepos, in Fragmento Vitæ Catonis, Plut. in Catone Majore, init. p. 336.

[A] He was born in the year 519 after the building of Rome.] Here follows the proof it. Anno poſt Conſul primum fuerat (Q. Maximus) quam ego natus ſum (1). i. e. "I was born the year after Q. Fabius "Maximus had been Conſul the firſt time." Thus ſpeaks Cato in a book of Cicero. Now the Faſti Conſulares place the firſt Conſulſhip of Fabius Maximus under the year of Rome 520. All the dates ſet down in the ſame books prove that we muſt read thus the Latin paſſage I have quoted. See Grævius's edition; you will meet there with a note of Vincent Contarin, and with another of Charles Langius which clear up this matter. Let us infer from that date of Cato's birth, that Livy and Plutarch were miſtaken, when they aſſerted, that Cato pleaded his own cauſe at the age of fourſcore and ſix, and that he impeached Sergius Galba four years after (2). He died at the age of fourſcore and five; for it was in the year of Rome 604, under the Conſulſhip of Lucius Marcius, and Manius Manilius, which was fourſcore and ſix years before Cicero's Conſulſhip, as he himſelf obſerves (3). Corradus has been ſomewhat inaccurate on this paſſage. According to him (4) Cato was born ſeven years after the Conſulſhip of Claudius Cento and Sempronius Tuditanus, which happened in the year of Rome 513, and he was in his thirtieth

(1) Cicero, de Senect. cap. 4. p. m. 392.

(2) Titus Livius, lib. 39. p. m. 762. Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 344, 345.

(3) Cicero in Bruto, p. m. 109.

(4) Corradus, in Brutum Ciceronis, p. 109.

contempt for the pleaſures, and even for what is called the comforts of life [B]. He was a man of an uncommon ſobriety, and there was no bodily exerciſe which he thought beneath him; for on his return from the army he uſed to apply himſelf to the tilling of his own lands, but yet without neglecting the improvement of his mind, eſpecially with regard to the art of ſpeaking, ſince he employed his time very much in the pleading of cauſes in the neighbouring cities, and he did it with ſo much generoſity, that he would never receive any reward for it. The diſcourſes of a Pythagorean Philoſopher (b), whom he heard at Tarentum, when that town was retaken by Fabius Maximus, in whoſe Army he ſerved, ſtrengthened very much his natural inclination for temperance. Valerius Flaccus, who had an eſtate near Cato's, was curious to ſee that young man, of whom they told him ſuch remarkable particulars; and as he found it was a good plant, which wanted only to be a little cultivated, and to be tranſplanted into a better ſoil, he perſuaded him to come to Rome. Cato was ſoon eſteemed there, and as this Valerius Flaccus proved a very kind patron to him, he was ſoon preferred. He was firſt choſen a Military Tribune by the people's votes: he was afterwards appointed Queſtor, and then from one degree to another he arrived at laſt at the Conſulſhip (c), and at the Cenſorſhip (d). No man was more proper than him to perform the functions of a Cenſor, nor did ever acquit himſelf better of the duties of that office. He exerted all his ſeverity, all the ſtrength of his eloquence, and the whole weight of his regular life, to repreſs the luxury and the other vices of the Romans (e); for which reaſon it was ſaid that he was not leſs uſeful to the Roman Commonwealth by the war he waged againſt the depravation of manners, than Scipio by his victories over the enemies (f). It was well known before hand that he would acquit himſelf of the Cenſorſhip with the utmoſt ſeverity, and this was one of the reaſons which determined the Patricians to oppoſe him, when he declared himſelf a Candidate for that employment; but that ſame reaſon determined the people to prefer him before all his competitors. This particular has been admirably well deſcribed together with his elogium by the beſt of the Latin Hiſtorians [C]. The inſcription on this ſtatue

(b) His name was Nearchus.

(c) In the year of Rome 558.

(d) In the year of Rome 569.

(e) Extracted from Plut. in Vita Catonis Majoris.

(f) See Seneca's words in the remark [B].

tieth year under the Conſulſhip of Cornelius Cethegus, and Sempronius Tuditanus, that is to ſay in the year of Rome 549. This calculation is not accurate: every one may ſee that there are but 29 years after the year of Rome of 502, to the year 549. A little lower Corradus obſerves (5), that Cato was born in the year 521, and that as he died in the year 604, he muſt have lived at leaſt fourſcore and five years. This is an erroneous computation. Some pages lower (6) he aſſerts that Cato died in the year 605, aged fourſcore and five years, being born in the year 521. This does not ſet his reckoning right. Let us obſerve however that Cato lived till that age; Cicero aſſerts it expreſsly. Annos quinque & LXXX. natus exceſſit è vita cum quidem eo ipſo anno contra Ser. Galbam ad populum ſumma contentione dixiſſet, quam etiam orationem ſcriptam reliquit (7). i. e. "He died at the age "of fourſcore and five, having that ſame year ha- "rangued the people againſt Sergius Galba with "great vehemency, which ſpeech he has alſo left "behind him in writing." Cato did not only write down his plea againſt Galba, but inſerted it alſo in his book of Origines (8), a few days or a few months before he died. Pliny ſets down the time of Cato's death in too general a manner. Circa captas, ſays he (9), Carthaginem et Corinthum . . . . . ſupremum is diem obiit. i. e. "He died about the time when Car- "thage and Corinth were taken." Theſe two cities were conquered in the year 608. I do not find that he aſſerts in his 15th book, as Glandorp pretends (10), that Cato died at the age of fourſcore and five; I find only there that he died after he had made the Senate reſolve to begin the third Punic War (11): the 29th book ought to have been quoted where we read theſe words, hic Cato DCV. anno urbis noſtræ obiit, LXXXV. ſuo (12). i. e. "Cato died in the year "of Rome 605, in the eighty fifth of his age." Velleius Paterculus's account agrees with this as to the year of Rome, ſince he obſerves that Cato died 5 years after the deſtruction of Carthage (13). Let us not cenſure Moreri for placing Cato's death under the year 606 after the building of Rome. But we may think it ſomewhat ſtrange that he ſhould not yet (14) have corrected the blunder he committed, when he ſaid it was during the ſecond Punic War.

(5) Corradus, in Brutum Cicer, p. 110.

(6) Ibid. p. 150.

(7) Cicero in Bruto, p. 149.

(8) Quam orationem in Origines ſuas retulit paucis antequam mortuus eſt an diebus an menſibus. Idem, ibid. p. 165.

(9) Plin. lib. 14. cap. 4. p. m. 124.

(10) Glandorp. in Onomaſt. p. 714.

(11) Plin. lib. 15. cap. 18. p. 197.

(12) Idem, lib. 29. cap. 1. p. 668.

(13) Paterculi. lib. 1. cap. 13.

(14) I write this in March 1701.

[B] He ſhewed . . . . . a great contempt . . . . . for the pleaſures, and . . . . comforts of this life.] I ſhould be too long if I were to tranſcribe all the particulars, which books acquaint us with upon that ſubject. I ſhall only quote a paſſage from Seneca, in which he tells us that Cato was content with one horſe for himſelf and his baggage, and uſed to look after it himſelf. M. Cato Cenſorius (quem tam reip. hercule profuit naſci quam Scipionem: alter enim hoſtibus noſtris bellum, alter cum moribus geſſit) canterio vehebatur, & hippoperis quidem impoſitis, ut ſecum utilia portaret. . . . . O quantum erat ſæculi decus, imperatorem triumphalem, cenſorium (& quod ſuper omnia hæc eſt) Catonem, uno caballo eſſe contentum, & ne toto quidem! Partem enim ſarcinæ, ab utroque latere dependentes, occupabant. Ita non omnibus obeſis mannis, et aſturconibus, et tollutariis præferres unicum illum equum ab ipſo Catone defrictum (15). i. e. "M. Cato, who had been a Cenſor (a "man born indeed for the happineſs of the Common- "wealth no leſs than Scipio, for if the latter fought "our enemies, the former made war againſt our "wicked morals;) Cato, I ſay, uſed to ride on a "gelding, on which he put a cloak-bag to carry "with him the things he wanted. O! what a "glory was it for that age, to ſee a General who "had triumphed, who had been a Cenſor, and (what "is more than all this) to ſee Cato content with one "horſe, and which was not even entirely for him! "for his cloak-bag hanging down on each ſide of "the horſe, occupied part of it. Would you not "prefer that ſingle horſe, which Cato himſelf uſed "to rub, before all your plump nags, Spaniſh hor- "ſes, and ambling mares?" He did not want for ſlaves, who might have ſpared him that trouble, but he choſe rather to ſpare it them. It was his inclination; he was ſeen tilling the ground, dreſſed like them, and afterwards ſetting himſelf down at table with them, eating of the ſame bread, and drinking of the ſame wine with them (16). Seneca might have related a particular more curious ſtill, than that which he has recorded. When Cato entered upon the Government of Sardinia, though his predeceſſors there uſed to require tents, bedding, and cloaths upon the publick account, and to charge the people with heavy taxes, for furniſhing them with proviſions and entertainments for a great train of ſervants and attendants; he, on the contrary, by his frugality ſhewed an incredible difference; for in nothing he wanted the contributions of the publick; nay, he went on foot to viſit the cities without horſe or litter, and with only one of the town officers, who carried his gown and a cap to offer ſacrifices in to the Gods (17).

(15) Seneca, Epiſt. 87. p. m. 353.

(16) Plut. in Marco Catone, p. 337. See alſo Valerius Maximus, lib. 4. cap. 3. num. 12.

(17) Idem, Plut. p. 339. Mr. Bayle makes uſe of Amiot's French Tranſlat.

[C] This particular has been admirably well deſcribed, together with his eloguim, by the beſt of the Latin Hiſtorians.] That paſſage of Livy is ſo beautiful, that I cannot

(g) Plut. in Vita Catonis Majoris, p. 347.

(h) Idem, ibid. and p. 134, B.

ſtatue which was erected to him contained a moſt glorious teſtimony of his reforming virtue [D]. He ſhewed a great indifference both with regard to the erecting of ſtatues [E], and with regard to commendations (g) : but yet he commended himſelf in the moſt lofty manner (h), and was not ſorry that the elogiums he beſtowed on himſelf ſhould be read in his books. He harangued very often, and inſerted ſome of his own ſpeeches into cannot forbear tranſcribing it entirely without omitting one word, and yet I dare not be ſo bold as to attempt a tranſlation of it. In hoc viro (M. Porcio) tanta vis animi ingeniique fuit, ut quocunque loco natus eſſet, fortunam ſibi ipſe facturus fuiſſe videretur, nulla ars neque privatæ, neque publicæ rei gerendæ ei defuit. Urbanas ruſticaſque res pariter callebat. ad ſummos honores alios ſcientia juris, alios eloquentia, alios gloria militaris provexit. huic verſatile ingenium ſic pariter ad omnia fuit, ut natum ad id unum diceres, quodcunque ageret. in bello manu fortiſſimus, multiſque inſignibus clarus pugnis : idem poſteaquam ad magnos honores pervenit, ſummus imperator idem in pace ; ſi jus conſuleres, peritiſſimus : ſi cauſa oranda eſſet, eloquentiſſimus : nec is tantùm, cujus lingua vivo eo viguerit, monumentum eloquentiæ nullum extitit. vivit imò, vigetque eloquentia ejus, ſacrata ſcriptis omnis generis. Orationes & pro ſe multæ, & pro aliis, & in alios. Nam non ſolùm accuſando, ſed etiam cauſam dicendo fatigavit inimicos. ſimultates nimio plures & exercuerunt eum, & ipſe exercuit eas. nec facilè dixeris, utrum magis preſſerit eum nobilitas, an ille agitaverit nobilitatem. Aſperi proculdubio animi, & linguæ acerbæ, & immodicè liberæ fuit, ſed invicti cupiditatibus animi, & rigidæ innocentiæ, contemptor gratiæ, divitiarum : in parſimonia, in patientia laboris periculique ferrei propè corporis, animique, quem ne ſenectus quidem, quæ ſolvit omnia, fregerit : qui ſextum & octogeſimum annum agens cauſam dixerit, ipſe pro ſe oraverit, ſcripſeritque, nonageſimo anno Sergium Galbam ad populi adduxerit judicium. Hunc, ſicut omni vita, ita tum (cenſuram) petentem premebat nobilitas : conſenſerantque, præter L. Flaccum, qui collega in conſulatu fuerat, candidati omnes, ad dejiciendum honore eum, non ſolùm ut ipſi potius adipiſcerentur : nec quia indignabantur novum hominem cenſorem videre, ſed etiam quòd triſtem cenſuram, periculoſamque multorum famæ, & ab læſo à pleriſque, & lædendi cupido expectabant. etenim tum quoque minitabundus petebat, refragari ſibi qui liberam & fortem cenſuram timerent, criminando & ſimul L. Valerio ſuffragabatur : illo uno collega caſtigare ſe nova flagitia, & priſcos mores revocare poſſe. His accenſi homines, adverſa nobilitate non M. Porcium modò cenſorem fecerunt, ſed etiam collegam ei L. Valerium Flaccum adjecerunt (18). [Though Mr. Bayle's modeſty would not ſuffer him to tranſlate that paſſage, yet for the ſake of thoſe of our readers, who do not underſtand Latin, we think it proper to attempt to give the ſenſe of it here ; though without hopes of coming up to the beauty of the original. The ſenſe is as follows. " There was ſuch a ſtrength of mind and " ſo great a genius in that man (M. Porcius) that in " what place ſoever he had happened to be born, " he would have raiſed himſelf in the world. He " wanted none of thoſe talents, whic hare neceſſary to " manage either private or publick affairs. He underſtood the buſineſs of the city and of the country " equally well : ſome arrive at the higheſt dignities " by their political learning ; others by their elo- " quence, and others by their reputation as warriors. " But his pliable genius was equally proper for all " theſe various things ; ſo that one would have " thought he was born for every particular deſign he " attempted. In the war he was moſt active and " brave, and gained a glorious reputation by many " and remarkable battles : being raiſed to high dig- " nities he proved one of the greateſt Generals. In " time of peace, if a matter of law offered, he ap- " peared a perfect Civilian ; if he was to plead, a " moſt eloquent Orator. Nor did he appear ſuch " only in his life time, as a man who left no monu- " ments of his eloquence behind him. His elo- " quence is ſtill living and in its full force, being con- " ſecrated in his writings on all kinds of ſubjects. " There are many ſpeeches of his, which he deli- " vered in his own defenſe, in the defenſe of others, " and againſt ſome. For he wearied his enemies, " not only by impeaching them, but even by plead- " ing his own cauſe. There were but too many " perſons who had a ſecret hatred againſt him, but " he knew how to be even with them. Nor is it " an eaſy matter to determine, whether the Nobility " perſecuted him moſt, or whether he vexed the " Nobility moſt. He was unqueſtionably of a ſe- " vere temper, and of a bitter tongue too immode- " rately free : but then his mind was proof againſt " all the paſſions incident to man, of a ſtrict inno- " cence, ſlighting favour and riches : ſo temperate, " and ſo patient under many labours, and in the " greateſt dangers, that one would have thought " his body and even his mind were made of ſteel, " which age itſelf, which deſtroys all, could not " alter ; for being fourſcore and ſix years old, he " pleaded his own cauſe, ſpoke and wrote in his own " vindication : and being fourſcore and ten he im- " peached Sergius Galba before the people. As the " Patricians had endeavoured to vex him all his " life time, ſo they did it particularly when he de- " clared himſelf a Candidate for the Cenſorſhip. " All the other Candidates, except L. Flaccus, who " had been his Collegue in the Conſulſhip, had " agreed together to prevent him from being pro- " moted to that dignity, not only that they might " the eaſier get it themſelves, nor yet, only becauſe " they could not bear to ſee one choſen Cenſor, who " was the firſt of his family that came to any dignity, " but alſo becauſe they expected he would be a very " ſevere Cenſor, dangerous to the reputation of ma- " ny, ſince moſt of them had offended him, and he " was but too much inclined to ſpare none. Nay, " even when he was making intereſt for the Cen- " ſorſhip, it was with threatnings, declaring that " they only oppoſed him, who dreaded a free and " ſtout Cenſor, at the ſame time he gave his vote " to L. Valerius, aſſerting that it was only with ſuch " a Collegue he ſhould be able to puniſh the new " diſſoluteneſs, and reſtore the antient manners. " Such a diſcourſe having animated the people, " they did not only appoint M. Porcius Cenſor, a- " gainſt the inclination of the Nobility, but gave " him alſo M. Valerius Flaccus for a Collegue."

(18) Livius, lib. 39. cap. 40, 41.

[D] The inſcription on the ſtatue which was erected to him contained a . . . teſtimony of his reforming virtue.] " The people were very well pleaſed with what he " had done during his Cenſorſhip : for they erected a " ſtatue to him in the Temple of the Goddeſs of " Health, on which they put an inſcription not of " his warlike deeds and triumphs, but ſuch as ſig- " nified, that this was Cato the Cenſor, who by his " good diſcipline and regulations reclaimed the Ro- " man Commonwealth when it was declining, and " ſupinely falling into vice (19)." Cornelius Nepos obſerves, that Cato's ſeverity repreſſed the luxury, which had already crept into the Commonwealth. Cato Cenſor cum eodem Flacco factus, ſeverè præfuit ei poteſtati, Nam & in complures nobiles animadvertit, & multas res novas in edictum addidit, qua re luxuria reprimeretur, quæ jam tum incipiebat pullulare (20). i. e. " Cato being choſen Cenſor with the ſame Flaccus " exerted his power with ſeverity ; for he puniſhed " many noblemen, and made ſeveral regulations by " his decree, in order to reſtrain the luxury, which " began already to prevail."

(19) Plut. in Marco Catone, p. 347. Mr. Bayle quotes Amiot's French Tranſlat.

(20) Cornelius Nepos, in Fragmento Vitæ Catonis, p. m. 384.

[E] He ſhewed a great indifference . . . with regard to the erecting of ſtatues.] Immediately after the words of Plutarch, which I have tranſcribed in the remark [D], we meet with this paſſage. " Before " this ſtatue was ſet up to him, he uſed to laugh " at thoſe who loved ſuch kind of things, ſay- " ing, they were not ſenſible, that they boaſted " chiefly in the workmanſhip of engravers and paint- " ers, and not in their own virtue ; but as for him- " ſelf, he could boaſt, that the citizens bore his moſt " noble image in their breaſts ; meaning thereby the " memory of his life and actions. When any " ſeemed to wonder that he ſhould have never a " ſtatue, when many ordinary perſons had one into his Roman Hiſtory [F]. That Hiſtory has not been tranſmitted down to us, any more than the work he wrote on the Art of War (i). He compoſed ſome books of Huſbandry (k), and valued himſelf very much on his particular ſkill in that art (l). He wrote alſo ſomething on rhetorick, and was probably the firſt Roman who wrote on that ſubject (m). He was ſeveral times impeached, and defended himſelf always with a great deal of ſtrength: he was ſo conſcious of his own innocence, that in one of the actions which were brought againſt him he offered to ſubmit to the judgment of one of his enemies [G]. He declared againſt the Phyſicians, and againſt thoſe ſtudies which were

(i) Plinius, in Præfat. Vegetius, lib. 1. cap. 8.

(k) They are extant.

(l) Plut. in Vita Catonis majoris, p. 351.

(m) See Quintilian, Inſt. Orat. lib. 3. cap. 1.

" erected to them, I would much rather, ſaid he, " be aſked why I have none, than why I have one." Ammianus Marcellinus mentions that noble anſwer (21). Obſerve, that Plutarch ought not to have ſaid in another paſſage of his works (22), that Cato would not ſuffer they ſhould ſet up a ſtatue to him.

(21) Cenſorius Cato . . . interrogatus quamobrem inter multos nobiles ſtatuam non haberet, malo, inquit, ambigere bonos, quamobrem id non meruerim, quam, quod eſt gravius, cur impetraverim muſitare. Amm. Marcel. lib. 11. cap. 6. p. m. 21.

(22) Plut. in Præcept. Reip. ger. p. 820, B.

[F] He inſerted ſome of his own ſpeeches into his Roman Hiſtory.] He compoſed it in his old age, and divided it into ſeven books. The firſt contained the actions of the Kings of Rome: the ſecond and third an account of the riſe and foundation of every city in Italy; for which reaſon it is thought he entitled the whole Origines. In the fourth book he treated of the firſt Punic War, and in the fifth of the ſecond: he gave ſummary accounts of them, referring every thing to particular heads. He wrote after the ſame manner of the following wars, to the Prætorſhip of Sergius Galba who vanquiſhed the Luſitanians *. He ſpoke of the actions, without naming thoſe who had performed them. He mentioned the curioſities, which were to be met with in Spain and in Italy. He ſhewed a great deal of learning and accuracy in that work (23). Take particular notice of theſe words of Cornelius Nepos; ab adoleſcentia confecit orationes: Senex hiſtorias ſcribere inſtituit (24). i. e. " From his youth he compoſed ora- " tions, and in his old age he began to write Hiſto- " ries." Remember alſo that Cicero aſſerts Cato was applying himſelf to that work the ſame year he died (25). This affords us a well grounded reaſon to cenſure Livy, who ſuppoſes that Lucius Valerius a Tribune of the people haranguing againſt Cato in the year 558, quoted his book of Origines againſt him (26). Cato was then but thirty nine years old; whence it muſt be inferred, that at that time he had not yet compoſed that work, and that Livy, who is no doubt the father and the creator of the ſpeeches he gives us, forgot on this occaſion to make his ſuppoſitions agree with true chronology. One may refute him by his own words, ſince he obſerves in another place (27), that the ſpeech which Cato made for the Rhodians in the year 587, had been inſerted in the fifth book of the Origines. Is not this a proof, that theſe Origines were not yet publiſhed when the Tribune Valerius harangued againſt Cato? It were to no purpoſe to ſuppoſe, that there were ſeveral editions of that work, ſome containing more than the others, ſince nothing like it is hinted by any antient Author whatſoever; and after all the firſt edition could not have been publiſhed, but when the Author was already well ſtricken in years (28). Father Noris (29) has cenſured Livy upon this account. Voſſius (30) had already ſhewn, that he thought Livy was miſtaken, which he ſuppoſes the Tribune of the people (31) borrowed from Cato's Origines. Obſerve that in the Epitome of Livy's 49th book we read, that Cato's ſpeech againſt Galba was to be met with in the book of the Origines. Now he made it the laſt year of his life. See what I have quoted above from Cicero (32). He had publiſhed above one hundred and fifty orations, which Cicero has very much commended, though not without obſerving that no man read them (33). They were uſed, no doubt, an hundred years after Cato's death, as we uſe now adays the orations that were made before the States of the Kingdom, or at the openings of the Seſſions in the 16th Century. A freed-man of Cicero made ſome ſmart criticiſm on Cato's oration for the Rhodians; but ſee in Aulus Gellius how that Critick was anſwered (34).

* Now the Portugueze.

(23) Extracted from Cornelius Nepos, in Fragmento Vitæ Catonis.

(24) Idem, ibid.

(25) See the rem. [A] quot. (7).

(26) Livius, lib. 34. p. m. 623.

(27) Livius, lib. 45. p. 880.

(28) Cornelius Nepos, in Fragmento, Vitæ Catonis.

(29) Noris, Cenotaph. Piſan. p. 4.

(30) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. 1. cap. 5. p. 21.

(31) His name was not Oppius, as Voſſius aſſerts.

(32) In the rem. [A], quot. (7).

(33) Cicero in Bruto, p. m. 114.

(34) Aulus Gellius, lib. 7. cap. 3.

Let us conſider a little theſe words of Cornelius Nepos; atque horum bellorum duces non nominavit, ſed ſine nominibus res notavit. i. e. " He has not named " the General who commanded in thoſe wars, relating only what paſt, without mentioning the " names of thoſe who acted." The Commentators on Pliny, without excepting Father Hardouin himſelf, were unacquainted with that paſſage. Here follows my proof. Pliny obſerves, that Cato, who in his Annals concealed the names of the Generals, related how a certain elephant was called. Certe Cato, cum Imperatorum nomina Annalibus detraxerit, eum (elephantum) qui fortiſſime præliatus eſſet in Punica acie, Surum tradidit vocatum (35). i. e. " Cato obſerved " that the elephant who fought moſt bravely in the " army of the Carthaginians, was called Surus." Read this note of Father Hardouin (36). Auctoris mentem aſſequi cum minime poſſent Plinii editores, hanc poſtremam vocem corruptam rati ſcripſere, cum Imperatorum nomina annalibus deſcriberet, contra fidem codicum Reg. 1, 2. ceterorumque melioris notæ, à ſcriptoris mente longiſſime aberrantes, cujus hæc ſententia eſt: Cato, inquit, Imperatorum Punicorum nomina annalibus ſuis apponere neglexit: idem tamen, quod nomen elephanti eſſet, qui tunc fortiſſime præliatus, referre operæ pretium duxit. i. e. " The Editors of Pliny not be- " ing able to find out his meaning, have imagined " that the word detraxerit (left out) was corrupted, " and have changed it into deſcriberet (related) in- " conſiſtently with the firſt and ſecond manuſcript of " the King's Library, and with all the other good " manuſcripts; miſtaking widely the Author's ſenſe, " whoſe meaning is, that Cato omitted in his An- " nals the names of the Carthaginian Generals, and " yet thought it worth while to tell the readers, how " an elephant was called, who fought moſt bravely " in the Carthaginian army." Father Hardouin imagined, you ſee, that Cato omitted only the names of the Carthaginian Generals. He would not have thought ſo, if he had called to mind Cornelius Nepos's words.

(35) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 5. p. m. 142.

(36) Hardouin. in Plin. Tom. 2. p. 253.

Obſerve that the fragments of Cato's Origines, publiſhed by Annius of Viterbo, paſs for a ſpurious work; but thoſe, which Riccoboni has collected, and which have been printed at the end of his treatiſe concerning hiſtory, are genuine. Auſonius Popma has made additions to them, and has added them with ſome notes to Cato's other works (37).

(37) At Leyden 1598, in 8vo.

[G] He was ſeveral times impeached, and defended himſelf . . . . . and offered to ſubmit to the judgment of one of his enemies.] " As he worried the others very " much, ſo neither was he himſelf always out of " danger in the adminiſtration of publick affairs; " for if he gave his enemies but the leaſt handle, he " was immediately impeached by thoſe who wiſhed " him no good: he was accuſed near fifty times, the " laſt of which was when he was fourſcore and 6 years " old; on which occaſion he ſpoke a word, which " has been much taken notice of and well remem- " bered: that it was hard for him, who had lived " contemporary with others a great while ago, to " plead now before a new race of men. Nor was " this the laſt cauſe, in which he was engaged; for " four years after, when he was fourſcore and ten, " he impeached Sergius Galba; ſo that, like Neſtor, " he lived near three ages of a man, and that in a " continual action (38)." Theſe words of Plutarch want to be corrected in ſome places: for Cato did not live ſo long; and it had been better to ſay like Pliny, that he was impeached forty four times. Cato primus Porciæ gentis, ſays he (39), tres ſummas in homine res præſtitiſſe exiſtimatus, ut eſſet optimus Orator, optimus Imperator, optimus Senator: quæ mihi omnia, etiamſi non prius, attamen clarius fulſiſſe in Scipione Æmiliano videntur, dempto præterea plurimorum odio, quo Cato laboravit. Itaque ſit proprium Catonis, quater & quadragies cauſam dixiſſe, nec quenquam ſæpius poſtulatum, & ſemper abſolutum. i. e. " Cato, the firſt of " the

(38) Plut. in Marco Catone, p. 345. Mr. Bayle quotes Amiot's French Tranſlation.

(39) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 27. p. 47.

were most in fashion among the Greeks [H]. However, he studied the Greek tongue, but

" the family of the Porcii, being raiſed to high dig-
" nities, is thought to have excelled in three things,
" ſo as to have been the beſt Orator, the beſt Gene" ral, and the beſt Senator: in all which Scipio
" Æmilianus ſhone, I think, though not the firſt,
" yet with a brighter luſtre; and what is more, he " was not hated by moſt of his fellow-citizens, as " Cato was. This then was peculiar to Cato, that " he defended himſelf forty times, and that he was
" oftener impeached than any one elſe and always
" acquitted." Aurelius Victor has uſed the ſame number forty four (40), wherein he has been more accurate, than in what he alſo obſerves, namely, that Cato being fourſcore years old impeached Galba; he ſhould have ſaid being fourſcore and five years old. See the remark [A]. Moreri has committed a moſt egregious blunder, when he ſaid, that Cato's enemies impeached him above four hundred times. Let us not omit theſe words of an antient Author. Cato ſextum & octogeſimum annum agens, dum in rep. tuenda juvenili animo perſtat, ab inimicis capitali crimine accuſatus, ſuam cauſam egit. Neque aut memoriam ejus quiſpiam tardiorem, aut firmitatem lateris ulla ex parte quaſſatam, aut os hæſitatione impeditum animadvertit. Quia omnia iſta in ſtatu ſuo æquali ac perpetua induſtria continebat. Quin etiam in ipſo diutiſſimè actæ vitæ fine diſertiſſimi oratoris Galbæ accuſationi defenſionem ſuam pro Hiſpania oppoſuit (41). i. e. " Cato being fourſcore and ſix years " old, and continuing to exert himſelf for the de-
" fenſe of his country with a youthful and lively
" mind, was accuſed by his enemies of a capital
" crime, and pleaded his own cauſe. Nor could " any one perceive that his memory was leſs ſtrong,
" or his conſtitution weaker, or that there was any " impediment in his ſpeech. For by an even and " continual care he kept all theſe things in a good " condition. Nay, towards the end of his moſt
" long life he defended himſelf by his oration for
" Spain againſt the accuſation of that eloquent Ora-
" tor Galba." There are two errors in that paſſage: for Cato was not fourſcore and ſix, when he pleaded the firſt of the two cauſes mentioned by Valerius Maximus: and it was he who impeached Galba in the ſecond of thoſe cauſes, and not he who was obliged to defend himſelf againſt Galba's accuſations. Nay, the latter was like to be brought in guilty, and would have been condemned, had he not moved the people's compaſſion (42).

(40) Galbam octogenarius accuſavit, ipſe quadragies quater accuſatus, glorioſe abſolutus. Aurel. Victor. de Vir. illuſtr.

(41) Valer. Maximus, lib. 8. cap. 7. num. 1. p. m. 677, 678.

(42) Cicero in Bruto, p. m. 165.

To conclude this Commentary on my text, it will be ſufficient to quote Valerius Maximus, who ſpeaks thus. Cato ſuperior ſæpenumero ab inimicis ad cauſæ dictionem vocatus, nec ullo unquam crimine convictus: ad ultimum tantum fiduciæ in ſua innocentia repoſuit, ut ab his in quæſtionem publicam deductus, Ti. Gracchum, à quo in adminiſtratione reip. ad multum odium diſſidebat, judicem depoſceret. Qua quidem animi præſtantia pertinaciam eorum inſectandi ſe inhibuit (43). i. e. " Cato
" the elder was often impeached by his enemies,
" but never found guilty of any crime. At laſt he " truſted ſo much to his own innocence, that being
" again accuſed by them, he deſired Tiberius Grac-
" chus might be his judge, who hated him exceed" ingly on account of their different notions about
" the manner of governing the Commonwealth.
" By this greatneſs of his ſoul he ſet bounds to the " obſtinacy, with which his enemies perſecuted him."

(43) Valer. Maximus, lib. 3. cap. 7. num. 7. p. 309.

[H] He declared againſt the Phyſicians, and againſt thoſe ſtudies which are moſt in faſhion among the Greeks.] Let us quote Plutarch, who having obſerved, that Cato was not well pleaſed, that the three Philoſophers, who were ſent Embaſſadors from Athens, ſhould be ſo well liked at Rome, and that he adviſed to ſend them back immediately (44), continues thus.
" Yet he did not do this, out of any hatred againſt
" Carneades, as ſome imagined, but becauſe he de-
" ſpiſed all Philoſophy in general, and out of a " kind of pride, laughed at the Greek Muſes and " their Literature: nay, he uſed to ſay, that old
" Socrates was only a prating ſeditious fellow. . . . . .
" And to deter his ſon from ſtudying Greek Litera" ture, he uſed a much rougher voice than his old " age ſeemed to allow, pronouncing, as it were, with
" the voice of an oracle, that the Romans would be " ruined, when they began once to be infected with
" the ſciences of the Greek. Though time ſhewed
" the vanity and falſity of his ſlanderous ſaying;
" for the city of Rome grew never greater, and
" flouriſhed never more, than when the learning and
" ſcience of Greek was in eſteem there: but Cato
" hated not only the Greek Philoſophers, but alſo
" the Phyſicians; for he was acquainted with the " anſwer which Hippocrates made when the King of " Perſia ſent for him, and offered him a large ſum
" of gold and ſilver, if he would go and live at his " Court; which anſwer was, that he ſwore he " would never aſſiſt the Barbarians, becauſe they " were enemies to the Greeks: which Cato aſſerted
" was an oath, now to be taken by all the Phyſicians:
" and therefore he commanded his ſon moſt ex-
" preſsly to avoid them; for he himſelf had written
" a treatiſe of preſcriptions, by which he uſed to " cure thoſe of his own family when they were ſick,
" and to keep them in health (45)." If you have a mind to ſee Cato's own words, read the following paſſage from Pliny. Mox à ſævitia ſecandi urendique tranſiſſe nomen in carnificem, & in tædium artem omneſque Medicos: quod clariſſimè intelligi poteſt ex M. Catone, cujus auctoritati triumphus atque Cenſura minimum conferunt: tanto plus in ipſo eſt. Quamobrem verba ejus ipſa ponemus. Dicam de iſtis Græcis ſuo loco, Marce fili: quid Athenis exquiſitum habeam, & quod bonum ſit illorum litteras inſpicere, non perdiſcere, vincam. Nequiſſimum & indocile genus illorum: & hoc puta vatem dixiſſe: Quandocunque iſta gens ſuas litteras dabit, omnia corrumpet. Tum etiam magis, ſi Medicos ſuos huc mittet. Jurarunt inter ſe barbaros necare omnes Medicina. Et hoc ipſum mercede faciunt, ut fides iis ſit, & facile diſperdant. Nos quoque dictitant barbaros, & ſpurcius nos, quam alios opicos, appellatione fœdant. Interdixi tibi de medicis (46). i. e. " From that Phyſician's (*Archa-
" gathus's*) cruelty in cutting, and burning, the name
" of Vulnerarius (a curer of wounds) was afterwards
" applied to the hangman, and the art of Phyſick it-
" ſelf, with all the Phyſicians, were become the ſub-
" ject of men's averſion, as appears moſt plainly
" from Cato, whoſe triumph and Cenſorſhip add
" very little weight to his authority, which of itſelf
" is very great. Wherefore we ſhall tranſcribe his " own words. I ſhall ſpeak of theſe Greeks in a proper " place, my ſon Mark, and ſhew what is uſeful at Athens,
" and that we may get ſome notion of their learning, but
" muſt not get horoughly acquainted with it. They are " a moſt wicked and ſtubborn kind of people; believe
" this as though a Prophet had ſpoken it. When" ever that nation ſhall introduce her literature a" mong us, ſhe will ſpoil all. The more if ſhe ſends
" her Phyſicians thither. They have ſworn among " themſelves to deſtroy all the Barbarians by the " means of phyſick: and this they do for a fee, that " people may truſt to them, and they have an oppor" tunity to deſtroy men the eaſier. They ſtyle us
" alſo Barbarians, and uſing us in a more vile man" ner than they do the others, they diſgrace us by " the name of clowns. I have forbidden you to con-
" verſe with Phyſicians." This may ſerve to refute thoſe, who ſhould pretend, that Carneades's ſpeech againſt juſtice was the chief reaſon why Cato adviſed the Senate to get rid immediately of thoſe pratling Embaſſadors. I have known a very able man, who imagined that Cato's chief reaſon was, that Carneades had attacked the very foundations of the politicks of Rome, and diſcovered a myſtery, which was the ground of the power and glory of that ambitious Commonwealth. They who were at the head of the ſtate acted in ſuch a manner, as to make the world believe that reaſon and equity were the rules of all their actions. But Carneades, in his refutation of juſtice, urged this argument among others, that the Romans ſhould be obliged to return to their cottages, if they would act juſtly, that is to ſay, if they would reſtore the eſtates they had ſeized upon (47). I am apt to think, that Cato was not well pleaſed with that obſervation, and that he perceived the conſequences of it: but I am perſuaded that there were much ſtronger reaſons ſtill, which exaſperated him againſt theſe Embaſſadors of Athens, &c.

(44) See above, the art. CARNEADES, rem. [F], at the break.

(45) Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 350. Amiot's French Tranſlat.

(46) Plin. lib. 29. cap. 1. p. 667, 668.

(47) Omnibus populis qui florerent imperio & Romanis quoque ipſis qui totius orbis potirentur, ſi juſti velint eſſe, hoc eſt ſi aliena reſtituant ad caſas eſſe redeundum, & in neceſſitate ac miſeriis jacendum. Carneades, apud Lactant. lib. 5. cap. 16. p. 341.

I must

(n) See the rem. [A].

but only, as it is ſaid, when he was very old [I]. He lived a long time (n), and enjoyed to the end of his life a great ſtrength both of body and mind. His conſtitution was ſo healthy, that he wanted women even in his old age; and as his keeping a concubine could not be kept ſo ſecret as he wiſhed, he married again [K]. The wife he took was a maiden of a lower condition than his own. We ſhall ſee hereunder (o), what he anſwered on that occaſion to his ſon's complaint. It is pretended that he did not meet in that

(o) In the rem. [K].

I muſt ſpeak in this place of a falſity told by Agrippa and by Montagne, and learnedly refuted by Monſieur Drelincourt, Profeſſor of Phyſick. Romani quondam ſub Catone Cenſorio Medicos omnes & urbe tota, & tota Italia populerunt, eorum funeſta mendacia crudelitatemque averſati (48). i. e. "The Romans under "Cato the Cenſor had formerly baniſhed all the "Phyſicians from the city and from all Italy, hating "their dangerous lies, and their cruelty." Theſe are Agrippa's words: here follow Montagne's (49). The Romans had lived 600 years, before they admitted the Art of Phyſick into their city; but after they had tried it, they baniſhed it again, by Cato the Cenſor's authority. One might quote an infinite number of moderns, who have aſſerted the ſame: John Langius, a German Phyſician, pretends that Cato the Cenſor cauſed the Greek Phyſicians to be baniſhed from Rome (50). Gaſpar à Reies, a Spaniſh Phyſician, relates, that Cato's advice, that all the Greeks and Egyptians ſhould be baniſhed, paſſed without any oppoſition; and that as all the Phyſicians at Rome were come either from Greece, or from Egypt, they were all involved in the ſame ſentence which the Senate pronounced according to that ſevere Cenſor's wiſh (51). He adds (52), that this baniſhment happened in the year of Rome 590, and continued till the time of the firſt Emperors. But all this is ſaid at random; there is not one proof, either that Cato practiſed upon the Senate or upon the People to obtain ſuch a ſentence of baniſhment, or that there ever was ſuch a ſentence in his time. On the contrary, we read in Pliny, who, of all the antient Authors, is the moſt proper to be quoted to the diſadvantage of the Phyſicians, that the Senate baniſhed them a long time after Cato's death. Et cum Græcos (antiqui) Italia pellerent, ſays he, DIU POST CATONEM, excepiſſe Medicos (53). This paſſage ſeems to ſignify, that all the Greeks were baniſhed from Italy, except the Phyſicians. In this ſenſe the learned Monſieur Drelincourt underſtands thoſe words (54); but it is certain that they muſt be underſtood in another ſenſe: they ſignify, that the Phyſicians were compriſed by name in the ſentence of baniſhment: for if they had been excepted, Pliny would have had no occaſion to urge the reaſons, which he has explained with ſo much accuracy, in order to vindicate both Cato's prepoſſeſſion, and the ſeverity of the Roman Senate. Non deſeram Catonem, thus he ſpeaks in the following page, tam ambitioſæ artis invidiæ à me objectum, aut Senatum illum qui ita cenſebat. i. e. "I ſhall not abandon Cato, whom I "have expoſed to the hatred of that haughty pro-"feſſion, nor the Senate, who was of that opinion." It appears from the Law-dictionaries (55), that the word excipere ſignifies pretty often, not to except, or exclude; but to comprehend or compriſe by name, and expreſsly. Obſerve, that Pliny was not in the right to aſſert, that the city of Rome continued ſix centuries without any Phyſicians; Monſieur Drelincourt has proved the contrary, in an oration which he delivered (56) in July 1671. It is a very good apology for the Art of Phyſick, and has been printed three times. See alſo Gaſpar à Reies (57).

[I] He ſtudied the Greek tongue . . . . only, as it is ſaid, when he was very old.] I have made uſe here of an as it is ſaid, becauſe we meet with authorities for and againſt that particular. Cato, one of Tully's dialogiſts, in his Dialogue on old Age (de Senectute), declares, that he was very much advanced in years, when he began to ſtudy the Greek tongue. Quid, quod etiam addiſcunt (Senes) aliquid? ut Solonem veſtibus gloriantem videmus, qui ſe quotidie aliquid addiſcentem ſenem fieri dicit: ut ego feci, qui Græcas litteras ſenex didici. Quas quidem ſic avide arripui, quaſi diuturnam ſitim explere cupiens (58). i. e. "What, if even old "men can learn ſomething? As we ſee Solon boaſting "in verſe, that though well ſtricken in years, he "was daily learning ſomething; and as I have done, "who in my old age have learnt the Greek tongue; "to which I applied myſelf ſo eagerly, as though it "was to quench a thirſt, which I had laboured under "a long while." Let us conſider the following paſſage from Plutarch. "It is ſaid, that he applied "himſelf very late to the Greek tongue, and when he "was already pretty old; and that by reading Thu-"cydides, and much more by Demoſthenes, he im-"proved his ſtyle, and formed his eloquence; as ap-"pears from his works, which are mixed with Greek "ſayings, maxims, and hiſtories, many of them "tranſlated word for word, and interwoven with "his own apophthegms and ſentences (59)." This does not prove much in Cicero's behalf, and ſeems proper enough to ſhew, that Cato did not ſtay ſo long, before he learnt the Greek tongue. What I ſhall now obſerve, is more ſtrong ſtill to convince us, that he ſtudied it much ſooner than is generally imagined. Plutarch refutes thoſe, who aſſerted, that there was ſtill an oration of Cato extant, which he had delivered in Greek before the Athenians. This is falſe, ſays Plutarch (60), for he ſpoke to them by an Interpreter, though he might have harangued in Greek if he had had a mind to do it. Cato was not yet forty five years old at that time. Some Hiſtorians aſſert, that whilſt he was Prætor in Sardinia, he was inſtructed there in the Greek tongue by Ennius. In Prætura Sardiniam ſubegit, ubi ab Ennio Græcis literis inſtitutus (61). Victor ſays, he conquered Sardinia; ſubegit; but this is a miſtake, which Moreri was not aware of: Sardinia was already conquered, when Cato was ſent thither as a Prætor. Moreri pretends that he conquered it in the year 556. Mademoiſelle le Fevre (62) [afterwards Madam Dacier] has placed that Prætorſhip under the year 555. Cato was therefore but thirty ſix years at that time; ſo that we muſt not ſay that he learnt the Greek tongue in his old age; otherwiſe we muſt explode Aurelius Victor's authority. I ſhall tranſcribe hereunder (63) a paſſage from Cicero, in which it is aſſerted, that Cato was unacquainted with the learning of Greece.

[K] His keeping a concubine could not be kept ſecret . . . . . he married again.] What I ſhall now tranſcribe from Amiot's Plutarch is a noble piece of hiſtory. Cato (64) "having loſt his firſt wife . . . "married his ſon to the daughter of Paulus Æmilius, "who was ſiſter to Scipio Africanus; and being now "a widower himſelf, he made uſe of a young girl, "a maid-ſervant, who uſed to go and meet him pri-"vately in his chamber. Yet ſhe could not go ſo "ſecretly, eſpecially in a ſmall houſe, where there "was his daughter-in-law, a young married woman, "but the intrigue was ſoon diſcovered: for the young "wench, paſſing by too boldly to Cato's bed-cham-"ber, the youth, his ſon, ſaid nothing; but his fa-"ther perceived that he was aſhamed of it, and "that he had looked a little angry upon her. Ca-"to finding that the new married couple were diſ-"pleaſed at his behaviour, without finding fault "with them, or ſaying a word, away he goes, as "his cuſtom was, with his uſual company to the mar-"ket; among the reſt he calls aloud to one Salonius, "a Clerk of his, and aſked him whether he had "married his daughter." The concluſion was, that Cato told him he deſired his daughter for himſelf; the match was quickly ſtruck up . . . . Whilſt they were making preparations for the wedding, Cato's ſon, taking ſome of his friends along with him, went and aſkt his father for what offence he brought in a mother-in-law upon him. But the father cried out preſently, Do not ſpeak ſo, my ſon; I am well pleaſed with all that you do, nor do I find any fault with it; I only deſire to have many children, and leave the Commonwealth more ſuch citizens as you are. . . . . He had by this ſecond wife a ſon, to whom, from his mother, he gave the ſirname of Salonius;

(48) Agrippa, de Vanit. Scientiar. cap. 83. p. m. 196.

(49) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 2. cap. 36. p. m. 788.

(50) Langius, Epiſt. Medic. 2. lib. 2. p. 482.

(51) Gaſpar à Reies, in Elyſio jucund. Quæſt. Campo, quæſt. 1. num. 13. p. m. 11.

(52) Idem, ibid. p. 12, 13.

(53) Plin. lib. 29. cap. 1. p. 668, 669.

(54) Drelincurtius, Apologia Medica, p. 47. edit. 1693.

(55) See Father Hardouin, on that paſſage of Pliny.

(56) In the Univerſity of Leyden.

(57) In Elyſio jucund. Queſtion. Campo, Quæſt. 1. num. 17.

(58) Cicero, de Senectute, cap. 8. p. m. 406. See alſo cap. 1. p. 386. And Valerius Maximus, lib. 8. cap. 7. num. 1.

(59) Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 337. Amiot's French Tranſlat.

(60) Plut. ubi ſupra, p. 343.

(61) Aurel. Vict. de Viris illuſt. p. m. 70.

(62) Anna Tanaquilli Fabri filia, in Aurel. Victor. ibid.

(63) In the rem. [U], quotat. (113).

(64) Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 350.

that unequal match with all the advantages he expected [L]. He was a kind huſband, and a tender father (p), and was as exact in keeping a ſtrict diſcipline in his own family, as he was in reforming the diſorders of the city. There are very eminent ſtateſmen, who notwithſtanding all their endeavours, cannot put their domeſtick affairs into a good order, and who meet with leſs trouble and better ſucceſs in the cares of the Government, than in the management of their own families. Cato did not reſemble them, he was not leſs capable to govern a family, than a ſtate: he knew ſo well how to regulate the conduct of his footmen, that they kept their tongues within the ſtricteſt rules of diſcretion [M]. It ſeems one might blame the liberty he gave them to lye with his maid-ſervants, provided they paid a certain ſum of money, to which he taxed them (q): but he had his reaſons for it. He deſerved to be cenſured on another account, I mean his great application to improve his eſtate, and to encreaſe his income: for he was guilty of the moſt

(p) See the rem. [N] towards the end.

(q) See the rem. [M].

nius: This was the father of Marcus Cato, who was the father of Cato of Utica. This laſt was not therefore the grand-nephew of Cato the Cenſor, as is aſſerted in Moreri (65), but his great-grand-ſon.

(65) They have corrected that miſtake in the Paris edit. of 1699.

[L] It is pretended, that he did not meet in that unequal match with all the advantages he expected.] St. Jerom, in order to prove that they, who marry a poor woman, in hopes to live peaceably at home, are often diſappointed, urges the inſtance of Cato. The ſeverity of this Cenſor was not capable to preſerve him from the ill effects of his wife's proud temper, whom yet he had choſen from a family of mean extraction. M. Cato Cenſorius habuit uxorem Actoriam Paulam, humili loco natam, vinolentam, impotentem, & (quod nemo poſſet credere) Catoni ſuperbam. Hoc ideo dico: ne quis putet ſi pauperem duxerit, ſatis ſe concordiæ proviſſe (66). We do not find that Cato was married above twice. Now this paſſage of St. Jerom cannot be underſtood of the Cenſor's firſt wife: we muſt therefore underſtand it of the ſecond, though Plutarch does not call her Actoria Paula, and though he ſuppoſes ſhe was the daughter of one Salonius. Here follows what he tells us of Cato's firſt marriage. " He married to his firſt wife a woman more noble " than rich, being nevertheleſs of opinion, that a " noble and a rich woman are both uſually haughty " and proud: but yet he thought that thoſe of noble " blood would be more aſhamed of baſe things, and " conſequently more obedient to their huſbands, in " all that was fit and decent (67)." We may therefore infer from thence, that he ſubmitted to bear with the pride of his wife, whether ſhe were noble or rich, but that he hoped he would have leſs to ſuffer from a woman of a good family, than from a rich wife. He took other meaſures in his ſecond marriage; he would have neither riches nor nobility in a wife, and yet he met in that ſecond marriage with all the inconveniencies of a proud and paſſionate temper; ſo eaſy it is to be diſappointed, and to gueſs wrong in an affair of that kind. See the remark [G] of the article AVENTINE. A famous Author has made uſe of that paſſage from St. Jerom, in one of his books, where he condemns the cuſtom of requiring from the Candidates or Miniſters, that they ſhould marry the widow, or the daughter of the late Paſtor whoſe church is offered to them. He pretends that theſe conditions are a little tyrannical, and that it were better to leave them at liberty to chooſe a wife with a pretty good fortune (68). Ut non probo, ſays he (69), illius patris inſtitutum, (videatur Plutarch. in Demetr.) qui ut perſuadere poſſet filio, vetulam locupletem uxorem ducere, ex Euripidis Phœniſſis occinebat (70): ubi lucrum ſuadet, reluctetur licet natura uxorem ducatis: ita neque conſultum paſtori, ut reſpectu unius miſericordiæ, pauperem uxorem domum ducat. Nam licet poeta Græcus exiſtimet, ſponſam ſine dote non habere loquendi libertatem: talis tamen ſæpe deprehenditur procaciſſima eſſe, atque marito ſuo quam immorigera; imo nec abſimilis Actoriæ Paulæ, quam (teſtis eſt Hieronym. lib. 1. in Jovin.) cum Cenſorius Cato, &c. i. e. " I " do not like the maxim of that Father, who to per- " ſuade his ſon to marry an old but rich woman, re- " peated to him this line from Euripides, When a wo- " man has money, you muſt marry her, though never ſo " much againſt your inclination. Nor is it proper for " a Miniſter, out of pity for one perſon only, to " marry a poor woman. For though it be the opini- " on of a Greek Poet, that a wife who brings no " fortune has not the liberty to ſpeak, yet it happens often that ſhe is very inſolent, and very diſobedient to " her huſband, and not much unlike Actoria Paula, " whom, according to St. Jerom, Cato the Cenſor, " &c." He was not, perhaps, quite in the wrong.

(66) Hieronym. adv. Jovinianum, lib. 1. p. m. 37. He obſerves here, that this wife of Cato was paſſionate, and given to drinking.

(67) Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 347. Amiot's Tranſlation.

(68) Optandum Patroni non injicerent compedes iis, quos ad miniſterium promovere laborant, obtrudendo illis, aut demortuorum Paſtorum viduas, aut filias. Quod tamen pro dolor! nimis quam frequenter in hoc ipſo Fœderato Belgio contingit. Schoockius, ubi infra.

(69) Martinus Schoockius, Exercitat. p. 259. edit in 4to.

(70) See above, quot. (4) of the art. PHILLA.

[M] He knew ſo well how to regulate the conduct of his footmen, that they kept their tongues within the ſtricteſt rules of diſcretion.] Let us relate here all that he uſed to practiſe with regard to his ſlaves. " He " purchaſed a great many ſlaves out of the captives " taken in war, but chiefly he brought up the young " ones, who were capable of being (as it were) broken " and taught like little whelps and colts. But none " of theſe ever went into another man's houſe, unleſs " they were ſent either by Cato himſelf, or by his " wife. If they were aſked, what Cato did, they " anſwered, they did not know. When a ſervant " was at home, he was obliged, either to do ſome " work or to ſleep: for indeed Cato loved thoſe " moſt, who uſed to lye down often and take a nap; " accounting them more docile than thoſe who were " naturally briſk and lively, and more fit for any " thing, when they were refreſhed with a little ſlum- " ber. Being alſo of opinion, that his ſervants " would take the greateſt pains imaginable to ſatiſ- " fy their venery, he ſet a certain price to be paid " by thoſe who converſed with his bond-women, but " would ſuffer none to be concerned with any others " abroad. At firſt, when he was but a poor ſoldier, " he would not be difficult in any thing, which re- " lated to his diet; but looked upon it as a pitiful " mean thing, to quarrel with a ſervant for the ſake " of his own belly: but afterwards, when he grew " richer, and made any feaſts for his friends and " comrades, preſently when ſupper was done, he would " with a leathern thong ſcourge thoſe who had not " waited well, or been careleſs in dreſſing the meat. " He always contrived too, that his ſervants ſhould " have ſome difference one among another, always " ſuſpecting and fearing ſomething, when there was " a good underſtanding between them. And if any " one of them had committed ſomething, which de- " ſerved to be puniſhed capitally, he tried him in the " preſence of all the reſt, and then, if he were found " guilty, he put him to death before their eyes (17)." Here are ſome particulars, which ſhew that Cato was a moſt judicious man; it was an action, much greater than one can imagine, to have been capable to prevent his ſervants from making an ill uſe of their tongue, by divulging what paſt at his houſe. This was not much more difficult, than the finding of the Philoſopher's ſtone; but then it was of a very great advantage: for what greater ſlavery can there be, than to fear continually the chattering of one's ſervants? This is being a ſlave under one's own roof. Juvenal is admirable upon this topic.

(71) Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 548.

Taceant illi, ſed prodere malunt
Arcanum, quam ſubrepti potare Falerni,
Pro populo faciens quantum Laufella bibebat.
Vivendum recte cum propter plurima, tunc his Præcipue cauſſis, ut linguas mancipiorum
Contemnas: nam lingua mali pars peſſima ſervi.
Deterior tamen hic, qui liber non erit, illis
Quorum animas & farre ſuo cuſtodit, & ære (72).

(72) Juven. Sat. 9. ver. 115.

" Art thou ſo ſtupid grown
" To think a rich man's faults can be unknown?
" Has he not ſlaves about him? Wou'd not they " Rejoice, and laugh ſuch ſecrets to betray?

" What

(r) In the rem. [B] of the artic. PRÆTEXTATUS.

most odious usury [N]. I have mentioned in another place (r) the speech he made to keep up the law by which the women were prohibited to adorn themselves. I have also hinted in the same place at a speech of his, by which it appears, that he knew how to enliven sometimes the majesty and gravity of his discourses. We should have a false notion of him, if we imagined that nothing but a sad austerity appeared in his speeches and in his conversations; he knew how to set them off with humour and ralleries; he was a man capable of witty sayings [O]; even young people would take a pleasure in his conversations: he grew sociable with his friends at table, and intermixed the conversation with lively discourses: he loved they should often speak at table of the merit of illustrious men; but he would not suffer them to say either good or ill of the wicked. We must not omit the judgment he passed on Kings, and the lesser degree of merit he allowed

" What more effectual to revenge their wrongs,
" Than the unbounded freedom of their tongues?
. . . . . .
" Let us live well, were it alone for this,
" The baneful tongues of servants to despise,
" Slander (the worst of poison) ever finds,
" An easy entrance to ignoble minds.
" And they, whose vicious lives such abject foes
" must fear,
" More mean and wretched far than their own
" slaves appear. Dryden.

Cato had less to fear, than a thousand other Romans, the indiscretion of his slaves; but after all, he looked upon their silence as something necessary for the good order in a well disciplined family. He is not to blame for hating their livelineſs; for generally speaking, the more a footman is brisk and ingenious, the greater rogue he is. When the Ministers of a Prince do not love one another, they watch each other's actions, they dread one another, so that the Master is better served, and less betrayed. We may say the same, proportionably, of private families, where there are many servants; whence you must infer, that Cato acted according to his usual prudence, when he kept his servants at variance among themselves. One cannot vindicate him so easily with regard to his giving his men-slaves leave to enjoy his bond-women, upon paying a certain price. This was a natural consequence of his prohibiting them severely to divert themselves out of doors: but at this time his regulations would be condemned; there is no honest family in which such sport would be suffered; and any maid-servant would be turned out of doors, if she did not keep within the bounds of continency, whether she diverted herself at home or abroad. And as for the men-servants, it is expected that they be continent, at least, within doors.

[N] His great application to improve his estate .... He was guilty of the most odious usury.] " At last he " was too much given to an extravagant desire of " gain, and looked upon Agriculture rather as a " pleasure than as a profit; resolving therefore to " lay out his money in lasting and solid things, he " purchased ponds, hot baths, grounds full of Fuller's " earth, pastures, and woods, whereby a great revenue flowed to him, and such, he used to say, as " Jupiter himself could not hurt. He was also given " to a most blameable usury in his traffick by sea; " and that thus: he required, that those, whom he " put out his money to, should have many partners: " now when the number of them and their ships " came to fifty, he himself would put in but one " share: for which Quintio, whom he had made " free, and who traded and sailed along with these " Adventurers, was to be his Factor; so that thus " there was no danger of losing his whole stock, but " only a little part, and that with a prospect of a " great profit. He likewise lent money to those of " his slaves who would borrow any, with which they " bought also other young slaves, whom, when they " had taught and bred up at his charges, they would " sell again at the year's end; but some of them " Cato would keep for himself, giving just as much for " them, as another had offered. And to incline his " son to be of this kind of temper, he used to say to " him, that to suffer one's estate to decay, was not " acting like a man of spirit, but rather like a weak " widow. But a farther proof of Cato's avaritious " temper, was his daring to say, that he was a God-" like man, and worthy of immortal praise, who by " his skillful management encreased his estate so, that " what he added to it, amounted to more, than what " he had inherited from his parents (73)." These are very wicked maxims; this was not giving a good education to his son; his advice and his example in that respect were good for nothing, and did but ill suit with the care he had taken in other respects to educate him as a kind father. He himself taught him Literature, though he had a slave who taught it to many other persons. He would not have his son reprimanded by a servant, or pulled, it may be, by the ears, when he happened not to learn his task well. Nor would he have him owe to a servant the obligation of so noble and great a thing as his learning: wherefore he himself taught him his grammar, law and fencing: nor did he only shew him how to throw a dart, to fight with other arms, and to ride, but even to play at fisty cuffs, to endure both heat and cold, and to swim over the most rapid and rough rivers. He says also, that he wrote his histories in large characters with his own hand, that so his son, without stirring out of the house, might be acquainted with the great men of antiquity, and learn their noble actions, whose example he might endeavour to follow, in order to become himself an eminent man. Nor did he less abstain from speaking any thing obscene before his son, than if it had been in the presence of those sacred virgins called vestals. See the margin (75).

(73) Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 149.

(74) Plut. ibid. p. 148.

(75) This was following a very noble maxim, which Juvenal expresses thus.
Nil dictu fœdum visuque hæc limina tangat,
Intra quæ puer est.
Procul hinc, procul inde puellæ
Lenonum, & cantus pernoctantis parasiti.
Maxima debetur puero reverentia: si quid
Turpe paras, nec tu pueri contemseris annos,
Sed peccaturo obsistat tibi filius infans.
Juven. Sat. 14. ver. 44. See also Plato, de Legibus, lib. 5.

[O] He was a man capable of witty sayings.] Plutarch has collected a pretty large number of them (76); I shall relate but one, and make use of Balzac's paraphrase, and the Preface with which he introduces it. " Even the Censors themselves, MADAM, " though one would think that sadness was one of " the duties of their office, did not absolutely renounce all kind of raillery. They were not obstinately determined to be eternally severe: and " that peevish unsufferable honest man, I mean, the " first Cato, ceased sometimes to be peevish and unsufferable. He had some sparks of mirth, some " intervals of good humour. He dropt some sayings " which do not want wit: and if you please, MADAM, you may judge of all the rest by this. He " had married a very handsome woman; and it is " recorded in history, that that woman was extremely afraid of thunder, and loved also her husband extremely. As these two passions prompted " her to the same thing, she always chose her husband as an asylum against thunder, and threw herself into his arms at the first noise she imagined to " have heard from Heaven. Cato, who liked the " stormy weather, and who was not sorry to be caressed more than ordinary, could not keep his " joy within his own breast; he discovered that family " secret to his friends, and talking one day of his " wife, he told them, that she had found means to " make him wish for bad weather, and he was never " more happy than when Jupiter was angry. It is " severity itself which has joked thus, it is excessive " rigour, and supreme justice (77)."

(76) Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 340, and in Apophth. p. 198.

(77) Balzac, Discours à Madame la Marquise de Rambouillet, p. m. 49, 50. of his Oeuvres diverses.

It will not be improper to observe on what occasion Cato said this; it was during his Censorship, when he degraded the Senator Manilius, who would probably have been Consul the next year, and who was degraded for no other crime but for a kiss which he gave his wife at noon day, in the presence of his daughter (78). There are some persons who think, that at Rome, and in some other countries, it is neither decent nor prudent for a husband to shew his love to his allowed to them, with compariſon to the great men who flouriſhed in a Commonwealth [P]. Nor muſt we forget to mention what he judged of thoſe women, who commit adultery; he thought they were all poiſoners [Q]. This was very ſevere, but not ſo much as the puniſhment he inflicted on a Roman Senator, for giving his wife a kiſs in the preſence of his daughter (5). He ſtruck him out of the catalogue of the Senators for that ſingle fact only. They who ſuppoſe that he would not have become young again [R], aſcribe to him a thought very becoming his good ſenſe. What he ſaid to a Nobleman, whom he ſaw coming out of a bawdy-houſe, ſavours of a looſe morality; but yet he might have excuſed it by this axiom, that of two evils we ought to avoid the greateſt [S]. They are miſtaken, who pretend he was the Author of that cuſtom, which prevailed wife in the ſight of his children: but they judge nevertheleſs that Cato was too ſevere, and ſtretched the maxims of the education of children too far. They think it unjuſt, that the Senator Manilius ſhould have paid ſo dear for ſuch a kiſs. Let us ſee Plutarch's judgment, He finds Cato's conduct too ſevere; but yet he blames Manilius. Cato deprived a Roman Senator of his dignity, becauſe he had kiſſed his wife in his daughter's preſence. This was indeed a little too hard. But if it be indecent, (as it really is) to kiſs, hug, and embrace one another in the ſight of others (79), how much more indecent and baſe is it, to ſcold and abuſe one another? To toy and ſport with his wife in private, and then to chide, blame, and abuſe her with ſharp and bitter words before the world (80).

(78) Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 346.

(5) See the rem. [O] towards the end.

(79) Εἰ δὲ αἰσχρόν ἐστιν ὡς ὄντως ἐστὶν) ἑτέρων παρόντων ἀσπάζεσθαι καὶ φιλεῖν καὶ περιέλκειν ἀλλήλους. Sed tamen ſi eſt (ut profectò eſt) turpe conjuges in præſentia aliorum blandiri, oſculari, & amplecti ſeſe invicem. Idem, ibid. See hereunder the quotations (109) and (110).

(80) Plut. in Præceptis Conjugalibus, p. 139, D. E.

[P] The judgment he paſt on Kings, and the leſſer degree of merit he allowed them with compariſon to the great men . . . . . in a Commonwealth] "King Eumenes being once come to Rome, the Senate received him with a great deal of ſplendor, and the chief citizens ſtrove who ſhould ſhew him moſt kindneſs and reſpect. Cato on the contrary ſhewed, that he did not like all that kindneſs, and would not viſit him: upon which ſome of his familiar friends ſaid to him, I wonder you ſhould thus ſhun King Eumenes's company, ſince he is ſo good a Prince, and ſo great a lover of the Romans. It may be ſo, replied Cato, but yet a King is always of his own nature a ravenous beaſt, that lives by prey. Nor was there ever a King, though never ſo much commended or eſteemed, who deſerved to be compared with an Epaminondas, a Pericles, a Themiſtocles, a Manius Curius, or an Amilcar ſirnamed Barcas (81)." This calls to my mind what I have heard ſome Engliſhmen ſay, that monarchy is of a very great expence, and that the money, neceſſary to keep up a King's ſtate, would be ſufficient to maintain a numerous army and a large fleet for the defenſe of the country. It is certain, that the expences, which Kings make for their own houſhold only, are prodigious. How many ſorts of guards, how many kinds of officers do they not pay? A whole volume would not be ſufficient to explain all the employments in the Emperor of Conſtantinople's houſhold. When a man reads l'Etat de la France, the preſent State of France (82), and finds there ſo many uſeleſs officers and ſervants, the twentieth part of which would be ſufficient to dreſs a Prince's meat, and to wait of him, the reſt being only a vain and ſuperfluous oſtentation, one cannot forbear obſerving that this alone muſt be a heavy burden to the people. The ſame ſuperfluity is to be ſeen proportionably, and with the difference only of more or leſs, in all thoſe places where the ſovereign power is in the hands of one perſon only: if it were urged, that all this is deſigned to ſtrike the inferiors with reſpect, and to give ſtrangers a high notion of the Prince's power, Cato would have anſwered, that even this ſhewed evidently that Kings are what he pretended.

(81) Plut. in Catone Majore, p. 340.

(82) It is a book, which they reprint very often. Codinus, (thus ſpeaks Vigneul Marville, p. 70. of the 3d vol. of his Melanges, edit. of Roan 1701) in the account he gives of the ceremonies that were uſed at the Emperor of Conſtantinople's table, makes me ſweat at the ſight of ſo many ceremonies.

[Q] What he judged of thoſe women, who commit adultery; he thought they were all poiſoners.] Quintilian obſerves, that this judgment of Cato is an authority proper to be urged by a Counſellor who ſhould plead againſt a diſſolute woman, charged with poiſoning her huſband. Si cauſſam veneficii dicat adultera, non Marci Catonis judicio damnata videatur, qui nullam adulteram non eandem eſſe veneficam dixit (83)? Quintilian is in the right to think that this ſentence of Cato would have great weight in the cauſes he mentions; but generally ſpeaking it is not to be admitted. If it be certain that a man died of poiſon, and that his wife committed adultery, they, who think her guilty of her huſband's death, have very ſtrong preſumptions on their ſide, and they may urge her adultery as a moſt probable argument againſt her. But if one ſhould argue without any exception, that ſince a woman is not true to her huſband, ſhe will poiſon him, the concluſion will not be well drawn. There are many ſuch women, who are kind to their huſbands, who take a great deal of care of them when they are ſick; and who, in a word, would by no means poiſon them, although they were a little ill humoured. So that Cato's maxim is carried too far.

(83) Quintil. Inſt. Orat. lib. 5. cap. 11. p. m. 244.

[R] It is ſuppoſed that he would not have become young again.] The words which Cicero makes him ſpeak upon that ſubject are admirable (84). Quo quidem me proficiſcentem (85) haud ſane quis facile retraxerit, neque tanquam Peliam recoxerit (86); & ſi quis deus mihi largiatur, ut ex hac ætate repueriſcam, & in cunis vagiam, valde recuſem: nec vero velim, quaſi decurſo ſpatio, ad carceres a calce revocari. Quid enim habet vita commodi? quod non potius laboris? ſed habeat ſane, habet certe tamen aut ſatietatem, aut modum; non lubet enim mihi deplorare vitam, quod multi & ii docti ſæpe fecerunt, neque me vixiſſe pœnitet: quoniam ita vixi, ut non fruſtra me natum exiſtimem: & ex vita ita diſcedo, tanquam ex hoſpitio, non tanquam ex domo. commorandi enim natura diverſorium nobis, non habitandi dedit. i. e. "As I am now going to the place of departed ſouls, no man could eaſily call me back, "nor would I be boiled young again, as Pelias was: "and if ſome God would grant me now to become "a child again, and to cry again in a cradle, I "would refuſe it from my heart: and now being "come to the end of life I would not go back to "the ſtarting-place. What comfort is there in this "life? Or rather how many troubles and vexations "are there not? But ſuppoſe this life as comfortable "as you pleaſe, yet we muſt be once ſatiated with "it; we muſt ſet bounds to our love of it. I have "no mind to lament the fate of man in this life, as "many, and even learned men have often done: "nor do I repent that I have lived; ſince I have "lived ſo as to have reaſon to think, I was not "born to no purpoſe; and I depart from this life as "from an inn, and not as from my own houſe. For "nature has given us a tranſitory lodging, but not a "dwelling-place." Take notice here, how that great man's maxims are connected together. He was not ſorry to have lived; he thought that the character he had acted on the ſtage of this world was glorious; and yet he would not begin his life again, if ſome God was to offer it him (87), and he does not inſiſt on the reaſon which he thought it very true; namely, that in this life we are liable to a great many inconveniencies, and enjoy but few comforts.

(84) Cicero, de Senect. cap. ult. p. m. 452.

(85) That is to ſay, to the place whither the ſouls go, when they leave the body.

(86) Concerning the miſtake that is here, ſee the rem. [C] of the art. PELIAS.

(87) Compare this with what ſhall be obſerved in the article TULLIA, rem. [R] towards the end.

[S] What he ſaid to a Nobleman, whom he ſaw coming out of a bawdy-houſe, ſavours of a looſe morality; but then he might have excuſed it by this axiom, that of two evils we ought to avoid the greateſt.] Horace is, I think, the only Author who acquaints us with this particular.

Nil medium eſt. Sunt, qui nolint tetigiſſe, niſi illas,
Quarum ſubſutâ talos tegat inſtita veſte:
Contrà, alius nullam, niſi olenti in fornice, ſtantem,
Quidam notus homo cùm exirct fornice, Macte
Virtute eſto, inquit ſententia diva Catonis.
Nam ſimul ac venas inflavit tetra libido,
Huc juvenes æquum eſt deſcendere, non alienas
Permolere uxores (88).

(88) Horat. Sat. 2. lib. 1. ver. 23.

prevailed among the Romans of kiſſing their women relations, in order to know whether they had drank any wine [T]. To conclude, he was at once both a great Orator, and a pro-

" Men keep no mean. One, when his blood boils o'er,
" Will take a matron only for his whore.
" While others all but common jades refuſe,
" They fly to ſober whores, and rake the ſtews.
" A certain noted bully of the town,
" When he did leave the ſtews, was often known
" To uſe old Cato's words; Go bravely on:
" Here our hot youths ſhould come to cool their flame;
" And never uſe the married city dame."

CREECH.

Let us ſee Monſieur Dacier's note on the Macte virtute eſto (89). " This is a ſaying of Cato the Cenſor, " who ſeeing an honeſt man coming out of a bawdy-" houſe, commended him, and exhorted him to do " always the ſame. But taking notice afterwards, " that he never ſtirred from it; Friend, ſaid he, I " commended you for coming here ſometimes, but not " for making it your uſual dwelling-place. Adoleſcens, " ego te laudavi quod interdum huc venires; non quòd " hic habitares."

[T] They are miſtaken who pretend he was the Author of that cuſtom, which prevailed among the Romans of kiſſing their women relations, in order to know whether they had drank any wine.] It is unqueſtionably certain, that the Romans made a law, by which the women were forbid to drink wine; and to prevent them from drinking any privately, they introduced the cuſtom for the men to kiſs their kinſwomen (90): but it is falſe that our Cato enacted that Law, and that he publiſhed that cuſtom. We read in Pliny (91), that one Egnatius Mecenius, having killed his wife becauſe ſhe had drank wine, was acquitted by Romulus. We meet with the ſame particular in Servius's Commentary on the 737th verſe of the firſt Æneis. That man's being acquitted ought not to be looked upon as a ſingular caſe; ſince by the laws of Romulus, the puniſhment of women's crimes was left to the diſcretion of their huſbands and relations, and the two greateſt crimes they could be guilty of, were to commit adultery, and to drink wine. When Romulus made that law, he was perſuaded, that after a woman had committed adultery, ſhe was capable of any other wicked attempt, and that the drinking of wine was the firſt ſtep to adultery. You may read all this in Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus (92). We muſt alſo think that this firſt King of Rome had the antient laws of Italy in view, and there were few of an older date, than that by which the women were prohibited to drink wine; for we find that King Faunus whipped his wife to death. becauſe ſhe had drank ſome againſt the cuſtom. Sex. Clodius in eo libro quem Græcè ſcripſit, refert Fauni hanc uxorem fuiſſe: quæ quia CONTRA MOREM, decuſque regium, clam vini ollam ebiberat, & ebria facta erat, virgis myrteis à viro uſque ad mortem cæſa (93). i. e. " Sextus Clodius in " that book which he wrote in Greek, relates, that " this was Faunus's wife; who having againſt the " cuſtom, and againſt the King's dignity, drank a " quantity of wine, and got drunk, was by her huſ-" band whipped to death with a rod made of myrtle " branches." Plutarch has mentioned this, as you will ſee hereunder, where I correct an error, which the Criticks have not obſerved, that I know of.

Infer from all this that our Cato the Cenſor did not make the law we have been ſpeaking of. There is therefore a groſs blunder in the following paſſage from Mr. Lomeier: Apud Romanos mulieres paſſim oſculo ſalutabantur à propinquis, quo explorarent, an contra legem temetum olerent. Inſtitutum hoc erat Catonis teſte Plinio, lib. 14. cap 13. (94). i. e. " It was the cuſ-" tom among the Romans for the men to ſalute their " kinſwomen with a kiſs, in order to know whether " they ſmelled of wine, which was againſt the law. " This cuſtom was eſtabliſhed by Cato, according to " Pliny." This is what Lomeier aſſerts in a diſſertation he wrote upon kiſſes. He has quoted Pliny without giving himſelf the trouble to conſult him: if he had conſulted him, he would have found that Cato was quoted there, not as the Author of thoſe cuſtoms of the Romans, but only as a Writer who had mentioned them. Cato (ſcripſit) ideo propinquos feminis oſculum dare, ut ſcirent an temetum olerent. Hoc tum nomen vino erat, unde & temulentia appellatur (95). i. e. " Cato (wrote), that the men uſed to kiſs their " kinſwomen, on purpoſe to know whether they " ſmelled of wine, which was antiently called teme- " tum, whence the word temulentia is derived, which " ſignifies drunkenneſs." I imagine that Lomeier had no other ground for what he ſaid, but what he met with in Kempius; but he did not conſider it with due attention. He has told a falſity, for want of underſtanding that Writer's words, and another, becauſe he underſtood them. Kempius aſſerts, that the women were forbidden to drink wine by Cato's authority, and that, as a conſequence of that prohibition, the men began to uſe themſelves to kiſs their kinſwomen, with a deſign to know whether they had tranſgreſſed that law. Poſtmodum ſucceſſu temporis (96), cum ex auctoritate M. Catonis vinum mulieribus interdictum eſſet, primùm viri cognatarum os cæperunt oſculari, ut odor indicium faceret, ſi bibiſſent. Affinibus & propinquis oſculari eas jus eſt, ut ſobrias comprobent, inquit Arnobius lib. 2. adverſus Gentes. Vinum enim mulierem bibiſſe perinde erat, ac ſi in adulterio ac gravi crimine deprehenſa, capitali ſupplicio plectenda eſſet, ceu Plinius habet Lib. 14. Hiſt. Nat. cap. 13 (97). [Mr. Bayle having given the ſenſe of the former part of this paſſage, we ſhall tranſlate only the laſt ſentence of it, which is to this purpoſe.] " When " a woman had drank any wine, it was the ſame " as though ſhe had been guilty of adultery, or of " ſome other great crime, and ſhe was capitally " puniſhed, as Pliny obſerves." It is plain that the quotation from Pliny, which concludes that paſſage, does not relate to the beginning of it; and yet Lomeier has employed it, in order to prove what he tranſcribed from Kempius in the beginning of theſe Latin words, which I have ſet down here.

Here follows the error, which I have ſaid was not obſerved in the text of Plutarch. This Hiſtorian, having aſked why the Roman Ladies cauſed no Myrtle to be carried into the chapel of the Bona Dea, or kind Goddeſſes, though they took a delight in putting all kinds of green boughs there, anſwers, it was becauſe that Goddeſs had been married to a man, who had whipped her with a rod of Myrtle, when he had found out that ſhe had been drinking wine. Πότερον (ὡς οἱ μυθολογοῦντες ἱστοροῦσι) Φαυλίᾳ μὲν ἦν γυνὴ τῷ μάντεως, οἴνῳ δὲ χρησαμένη κρύφα, καὶ μὴ λαθοῦσα, ῥάβδοις ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀνδρὸς ἐκολάσθη μυρσίναις (98). That is to ſay, according to Xylander's tranſlation, An credendum eſt fabulæ, quæ perhibet Faulii cujuſdam aruſpicis uxorem cùm clàm poto vino non fefelliſſet, à marito virgis myrteis fuiſſe caſtigatam. The Greek word Φαυλίᾳ, muſt be eraſed here, and Φαύνῳ put in its ſtead: for not only the Author quoted by Lactantius aſſerts that the Bona Dea had been married with Faunus, &c (99); but even Plutarch obſerves in the Life of Cæſar (100). The Latin Tranſlator might have boldly corrected that error; but inſtead of ſetting that paſſage right, he ſpoils it, and tranſlates it erroneouſly. He ſuppoſes, that Plutarch anſwers, that the Myrtle was not admitted, becauſe the wife of a certain Phaulius, a fortune-teller, had been whipped, &c. This is not following the original. Plutarch does not hint at a perſon, whom one may call with contempt, cujuſdem, one. He obſerves, that the woman who was whipped, was the ſame, whom they worſhipped at Rome under the name of Bona Dea. Amyot has very well avoided that laſt miſtake, which was the moſt conſiderable. He tranſlates the paſſage thus. It was becauſe ſome relate fabulouſly, that ſhe was the wife of Flavius a Diviner; and having drank wine ſecretly, ſhe was found out by her huſband, and whipped by him with a rod of Myrtle. Boxhornius (101) had made no remarks on Xylander's tranſlation.

What I have obſerved concerning the cuſtom of the Romans to kiſs their kinſwomen, muſt be a little better cleared up. Plutarch has explained it very well, and it appears from the account he gives of it, that the women uſed to go and kiſs their kinſmen when

(89) Dacier on this paſſage of Horace, Tom. 6. p. 130, 131. of the Dutch edit.

(90) See the paſſage from Valerius Maximus, above, quotat. (49) of the art. ERMITA; and Aulus Gellius, lib. 10. cap. 23; and Tertullian. in Apologet, cap. 6.

(91) Plin. lib. 14. cap. 13.

(92) In the 2d book of his Antiquities of Rome, chap. 26. p. m. 93.

(93) Lactant. lib. 1. cap. 22. See alſo Arnobius, lib. 5. p. 165, and Plut. in Quæſt. Romanis, p. 268, D.

(94) Lomeier, Genial. Dierum, part. 1. p. 357.

(95) Plin. lib. 14. cap. 13.

(96) The Author had juſt been quoting the Canon Law, and mentioning ſeveral things poſterior to Cato. Judge then, whether his poſtmodum, &c. is judiciouſly placed.

(97) Martinus Kempius, Diſſert. 16. de Oſculis, p. m. 637.

(98) Plut. in Quæſt. Romanis, p. 268, D.

(99) See above quotat. (99).

(100) Ῥωμαῖοι δὲ νύμφην δρυάδα Φαύνῳ συνοικήσασαν. Romani nympham Dryada Fauno nuptam. Plut. in Cæſare, p. 711.

(101) He publiſhed with notes Plutarch's treatiſe de Quæſt. Romanis, in Greek and Latin, in the year 1637, in 4to.

(t) See the rem. [U].

(u) See the rem. [K], towards the end.

a profound Civilian [U], two qualities which ſeldom meet together, any more than thoſe of an eloquent Preacher, and a learned Divine (t). You will ſee in one of our remarks (u), how Cato of Utica was deſcended from him. I have obſerved ſeveral errors in the Hiſtorical Dictionaries, and in ſome others Writers. I ſhall ſet them down in my Supplement, when they met them. Theſe are remarkable particulars, which the other Writers have not mentioned. What is the reaſon, aſks he (102), why they kiſs their kinſmen on the mouth? Is it, as moſt perſons think, becauſe the women being prohibited to drink wine, the cuſtom was introduced, that when they met their kinſmen, they ſhould go and kiſs them on the mouth, that they, who had drank wine, might be thereby found out and convinced? Or is it for the reaſon, which the Philoſopher Ariſtotle mentions (103) . . . . or rather becauſe that privilege was granted to the Ladies, as ſomething glorious and creditable to them, if it appeared thereby that they had many and virtuous relations: or becauſe it was forbidden to marry one's relations, ſo that the only token of kindneſs they could give them was a kiſs: whence that only proof of kindred has been kept up among them. For they did not formerly marry their kinſwomen, as even at this time they do not marry their aunts, nor their ſiſters; and it was a long while before they were allowed to marry their couſins. It is not much to the purpoſe, to examine whether theſe reaſons of Plutarch be well grounded or not: it is enough to have mentioned the facts he relates; they deſerve to be known. His account hints plainly enough to us this circumſtance, namely, that theſe kiſſes were given to the men by the women publickly, as they happened to meet with them, either in the ſtreet, or in any other place. It had not been polite for the men to make the firſt ſteps: for this would have looked as though they ſuſpected their kinſwomen had drank wine. It was the women's buſineſs to offer their lips; this alone was a proof that they were conſcious of their own innocence. They had brought it into queſtion, if they had not offered the kiſs boldly, and immediately upon their meeting with their kinſmen. At this time ſuch a cuſtom would occaſion a thouſand railleries; and afford an inexhauſtible ſpring of ingenious pieces of gallantry, as alſo of ſilly jokes; for couſins are apt to look very kindly on their kinſwomen. A prudent mother would not be very well pleaſed that her daughter's couſins had the right to try whether they ſmell of wine or not. Obſerve, that Propertius charges his faithleſs miſtreſs (104) with pretending falſely that many men were her relations, that ſhe might never want kiſſes.

(102) Plut. in Quæſt. Romanis, p. 265. Amiot's Tranſlation.

(103) That reaſon is, that the Trojan Ladies having burnt the Ships of Æneas, pacified their husbands by embracing and kiſſing them.

(104) Cynthia, and not Phryne, as Kempius, de Oſculis, p. 636. falſely ſuppoſes.

Quin etiam falſos fingis tibi ſæpe propinquos,
Oſcula ne deſint (105) qui tibi jure ferant (106).

(105) There is nec deſunt, in the editions; I have followed Gebhard's correction.

(106) Propert. Eleg. 6. lib. 2.

I ſhall cloſe this remark as I have begun it; that is to ſay, with cenſuring a blunder, which relates to Cato. Kempius aſcribes to him the publiſhing of a decree, by which married perſons were forbidden to kiſs each other in their daughters preſence; for which he quotes Plutarch. But it is certain that Plutarch ſays no ſuch thing. We have ſeen above (107), all that he relates upon this ſubject. Nihilominus tamen parcè inter veteres maritale oſculum, & non niſi admodum circumſpectè, ac remotis arbitris, ne liberi ſcilicet inde furtivis amorum illecebris ſtimularentur, M. Catonem Cenſorinum (108) Stoicæ diſciplinæ addictum, edicto prohibuiſſe, ne Maritus conjugem deoſcularetur in præſentiâ filiæ, Manliumque quem omnium opinio Conſulem deſignabat, Senatu ejeciſſe, quod uxorem coram filia nubili exoſculatus eſſet, Auctor eſt Plutarchus in Catonis vitâ, p. 346 (109). i. e. " However, the antient married " people uſed to kiſs each other ſparingly, with " great circumſpection, and never before witneſſes, leſt it ſhould intice their children to indulge " themſelves in the ſecret pleaſures of love: and " Cato the Cenſor, who was addicted to the Stoick " Philoſophy, enacted by a decree, that an huſband " ſhould not kiſs his wife in his daughter's preſence, " and expelled Manlius out of the Senate, (though " in all the people's opinion he was to be choſen " Conſul the next year) becauſe he had kiſſed his " wife before his daughter whow as marriageable, as " Plutarch relates in Cato's Life." It is not true that Cato made any law, or cauſed any to be made upon that ſubject; he puniſhed Manlius by the bare authority of his office; but this was not to be a precedent for the future: the Cenſors, who ſucceeded him, were not obliged to follow his example; we meet with no other inſtance of ſuch a puniſhment, and it is very probable that many perſons indulged themſelves the ſame liberty, which Manlius had taken. The laws cannot well extend ſo far as to prohibit ſuch things; all that can be done, is to give men advice, and make them fear to fall under the cenſure of a Magiſtrate. I think that Clemens of Alexandria did not condemn Cato's ſeverity. See how he adviſes married people not to kiſs one another before their ſervants (110).

(107) In the rem. [O].

(108) He ought to have ſaid Cenſorium. It is not true that Cato was of the Stoick ſect; he is miſtaken here, for his great-grandſon Cato of Utica.

(109) Kempius, de Oſculis, Diſſ. 15. p. 615.

(110) Clemens Alexandr. Pædagog. lib. 3. cap. 12. p. m. 258.

[U] He was at once both a great Orator, and a profound Civilian.] See Valerius Maximus (111), and Quintilian (112), or rather this beautiful paſſage from Tully, which ſhews us ſo well how much Cato excelled in many things. Quid Marco Catoni præter hanc politiſſimam doctrinam tranſmarinam, atque adventitiam defuit? num quia jus civile didicerat, cauſas non dicebat? aut quia poterat dicere, juris ſcientiam negligebat? at utroque in genere & laboravit, & præſtitit: num propter hanc ex privatorum negotiis collectam gratiam tardior in republica capeſſenda fuit? nemo apud populum fortior, nemo melior ſenator, idem facile optimus imperator: denique nihil in hac civitate temporibus illis ſciri, diſcive potuit, quod ille non tum inveſtigarit, & ſcierit, tum etiam conſcripſerit (113). i. e. " What did M. Cato " want beſides that moſt polite indeed, but foreign " learning, which comes from beyond ſea? Was it " becauſe he had ſtudied the Civil Law, that he did " not plead at the bar? Or becauſe he could plead, " did he therefore neglect the ſtudy of the law? Indeed he ſtudied both the Law and the Art of Eloquence, and excelled in both. Or was he more unqualified to take upon him the Government of the " Commonwealth, becauſe his ſkill in the management of private affairs had won him the people's " favour? No man had more credit with the people, " no man was a better Senator than he was, who was " at the ſame time the greateſt General. Nor was " there at that time any thing that could be learnt or " known, but he learnt it, knew it, and even wrote " about it." The number of thoſe who have been adorned at once with the moſt noble gifts of Rhetorick, and a moſt deep knowledge of the Law, has always been ſo ſmall, that we may ſay, that the enjoying theſe together, was one of the moſt eminent and moſt uncommon qualities of our Cato. I know that Cicero (114) has laboured to prove, that a man cannot be a greater Orator, unleſs he be poſſeſſed at the ſame time with all the riches of an univerſal learning. Illud eſt, ſays he (115), hujus inſtitutæ ſcriptionis, ac temporis, neminem eloquentia, non modo ſine dicendi doctrina, ſed ne ſine omni quidem ſapientia florere unquam, & præſtare potuiſſe. Etenim cæteræ ferè artes ſe ipſæ per ſe tuentur ſingulæ: bene dicere autem, quod eſt ſcienter, & perite, & ornate dicere, non habet definitam aliquam regionem, cujus terminis ſepta teneatur. Omnia quæcunque in hominum diſceptationem cadere poſſunt, bene ſunt ei dicenda, qui hoc ſe poſſe profitetur, aut eloquentiæ nomen relinquendum eſt. i. e. " Such is the na- " ture of that ſcience and of this time, that no man " can be eminent and excel in eloquence, not only if " he be not ſkilled in the art of ſpeaking, but even " if he be not adorned with an univerſal learning: " every one of the other ſciences can ſubſiſt by themſelves, without the aſſiſtance of any other ſcience: " but the art of ſpeaking well, that is to ſay, to the " purpoſe, ſkilfully and eloquently, is not confined " within certain limits. A man who pretends to be an " Orator, muſt be able to ſpeak well of every thing " that can be debated, or he muſt give up his claim to " eloquence." I know alſo that Tully has aſſerted, that Lucius Craſſus, and Mark Anthony the Orator, two of the moſt eloquent men of their time, were not ſo ignorant, as it was imagined, and that on the contrary they were both very learned (116): but he confeſſes

(111) Valerius Maximus, lib. 8. cap. 7. num. 1.

(112) Quint. Orat. Inſt. lib. 12. cap. 3. p. m. 565.

(113) Cicero, de Orat. lib. 3. folio m. 95, B. He had obſerved in the 1ſt book, folio 66, A. Quid vero ille M. Cato? nonne & eloquentia tanta fuit, quantam illa tempora, atque illa ætas in hac civitate ferre maximam potuit, & juris civilis omnium peritiſſimus?

(114) In Libris de Oratore.

(115) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. 2. init. folio m. 71, B.

(116) Idem, ibid.

Supplement, where I ſhall give the articles of the other illuſtrious Cato's.

confeſſes himſelf, that experience is againſt him (117), and if he had not confeſſed it, would not he have been eaſily convicted of his miſtake by many inſtances? Would he have dared to aſſert that Demoſthenes could paſs for a learned man, if compared to Ariſtotle? Would he have dared to maintain, that Ariſtotle was capable of compoſing as good orations as Demoſthenes? Let us ſpeak the truth: the talents of eloquence ſeldom meet with an immenſe learning. This may be obſerved at this time, as well as formerly: the moſt celebrated Preachers are, generally ſpeaking, unacquainted with the Oriental languages, and with the Art of Criticiſm, and they are not very deeply ſkilled in Theological ſubjects: conſult the Nouvelles Lettres contre l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme de Monſieur Maimbourg (118); you will ſee there what ſkillful Judges have declared upon this topic; you may, if you pleaſe, add to it the teſtimony of the Abbot of St. Cyran. You have made me ſenſible by experience, ſays he to a Jeſuit (119), of what I had heard ſometime before, namely, that it is very difficult to be at once an eloquent Preacher, and a very learned man. Doctor Huarte aſſerts, that learning and eloquence do not belong to the ſame faculty of the ſoul, the former belonging to the underſtanding, and the latter to the imagination. See the ninth and tenth chapters of his Examen des Eſprits. Imperialis refutes him as well as he can (120), but proves his own Theſis very indifferently. It is certain that Providence beſtows its gifts after ſuch a manner, that they are generally divided: ſome fall to the ſhare of one ſoul, and others to another's ſhare. They who have the gift of gaining victories, have not received the gift of improving their victory. They, who might know how to make an advantage of it, do not know how to conquer (121). They who excel in the languages, and in the knowledge of matters of fact, are not adorned with a great talent for reaſoning. See what Monſieur Simon obſerves concerning Father Morin, and concerning Petavius (122). It is very certain, that as much as Bochart excelled Monſieur Claude in learning, ſo much below him was he in what is called urging an argument home, ſolving an objection, and fitting a Philoſophical or a Theological queſtion to the bottom. Balzac was a little ſurprized when he read a judicious diſcourſe, which Father Faure, an eminent Preacher, had publiſhed (123).

(117) Et in noſtra civitate, & in ipſa Græcia quæ ſemper hæc ſumma duxit, multos & ingeniis, & magna laude dicendi ſine ſumma rerum omnium ſcientia fuiſſe fateor. Idem, ibid. C.

(118) Page 624, &c.

(119) Saint Cyran, in his Cenſure de la Somme Theologique du Pere Garaſſe, p. 8. of the Avis au Pere Garaſſe.

(120) Joh. Imperialis, in Muſæo Phyſico, lib. 2. cap. 7.

(121) See above, quotat. (7), of the article CÆSAR.

(122) Above, quotat. (12), of the art. PETAVIUS.

(123) See the Diſſertation printed at the end of his Socrate Chrétien, p. m. 12, &c.

PORSENA (CHRISTOPHER). See PERSONA.

PORTUGAL (ALFONSUS VI. OF THAT NAME, KING OF) was born the 28th of Auguſt, 1643. He was hardly ſeven years old, when it was obſerved that he had ſome beginnings of madneſs. That diſorder of his brains did by no means leſſen his ambition; it made him only ſhew it more openly; for his eldeſt brother, Prince Don Theodoſius, dying May the 15th, 1653, Alfonſus did not conceal his joy. He ſhewed that he ſpoke ſincerely, when the very firſt day of his brother's illneſs, he ſaid, he ſhould not be ſorry if it proved mortal, ſince he ſhould get a Crown by it. He came to that Crown, under his mother's regency, the 15th of November, 1656 (a). His bad qualities appeared more and more; he made no account of his Governor's counſels; he uſed to draw his ſword againſt the firſt perſons he met with, and if he did not kill them, it was not for want of good will; he ran about the ſtreets in the night-time with ſome wicked fellows, and committed a thouſand outrages, and a thouſand villainous actions in the bawdy-houſes [A], and boaſted of them the next morning, as though he had performed the moſt glorious actions. All the means that were tried to remedy theſe diſorders proving ineffectual, it was at laſt reſolved to remove from him the perſons who completed his ruin, and they were accordingly carried off with main force from his own apartment. This exaſperated him very much, ſo that he retired from Liſbon, and went to Alcantara. In order to prevent the dangerous conſequences of his evaſion, the Queen was obliged to reſign to him the adminiſtration of the Kingdom. This was done at Liſbon, with the neceſſary ceremonies, June the 23d, 1662. After that time, three or four great Lords, who had engroſſed the whole favour of that young Prince, laboured as much as lay in their power to procure the Queen's diſgrace [B], and

(a) Her name was Louiſa Frances de Guſman. Her husband, who from being Duke of Braganza, was made King of Portugal in the year 1640, died November the 6th, 1656. About that revolution conſult an anonymous book, which was publiſhed at Paris in the year 1689, with this title, Hiſtoire de la Conjuration de Portugal. It was written by the Abbé Vertot, and was not leſs eſteemed than his Hiſtory of the Revolutions of Sweden, which he publiſhed in the year 1695.

[A] He committed a thouſand outrages, and a thouſand villainous actions in the bawdy-houſes.] In the relation (1), from which I borrow this article, it is obſerved (2), that he uſed to run about the ſtreets with theſe people, that he entered into ſcandalous houſes, where he uſed the women in the moſt outrageous manner; that he never went out in the night with them, but there were an hundred tragical ſtories told the next morning: in a word, that he was dreaded every where as a wild and cruel beaſt: that though he viſited the Proſtitutes at their own houſes, yet he uſed to have lewd women brought to him in his own palace: that he even boaſted of ſuch immodeſt actions with them, that as they were by no means probable, ſo they were not credited. After the Queen Dowager was retired from Court, he form'd two companies, the one of foot, the other of horſe, which he uſed to call his low and high patrole, and which he compoſed of the moſt profligate men in the kingdom (3). He uſed to go out every night with theſe two troops, and attacked indifferently all thoſe he met with. They, who accompanied him, had generally their ſwords by their ſide without ſcabbards, that they might be the readier to execute his commands. And the better to deceive the people, they uſed to blacken their ſwords, that the brightneſs of the ſteel might not betray their deſigns. They who brought theirs back tainted with blood were highly commended by the King. "His diſſoluteneſs "kept pace with his paſſions; he either went him-"ſelf to the lewd women, or they brought them to "him, at a country-ſeat near Alcantara, where his "favourites kept up that wicked inclination in his "mind, in order to ſilence, if it were poſſible, the "report that was ſpread of his frigidity (4)."

[B] Three or four Lords . . . . laboured . . . to procure the Queen's diſgrace.] They had good ground to think, that ſhe endeavoured to raiſe her ſecond ſon to the throne: for in the arguments urged for the nullity of that marriage, printed at the end of the Relation, they have not omitted to obſerve, that conſidering King Alfonſus's incapacity and frigidity, the Queen, who was fully perſuaded of it, having ſecretly conſulted the Phyſicians about it . . . . was reſolved, during his regency, to procure the ſceptre to the Infante her ſecond ſon. Alfonſus revenged himſelf of her: he was pleaſed that people ſhould talk diſreſpectfully of all the Queen's actions before him. Some perſons uſed to meet in the night time under the Queen's windows, at the time when ſhe locked herſelf up to ſay her prayers; theſe perſons broke her windows, and gave her ſuch horrid language, that it would be a ſhame to write it (5). Once on a Lady-day, the King, in the preſence of

(1) I have given the title of it in the margin of the text of this article, quotat. (b).

(2) Page 19.

(3) Ibidem, p. 92.

(4) Ibidem, p. 95.

(5) Ibid. p. 85.

and ſucceeded ſo well in that attempt, that in March 1663, ſhe was obliged to execute a deſign, which was not perhaps ſo deeply rooted in her heart, as ſhe would make the world believe; I mean, the deſign of forſaking the world, to mind nothing but her ſalvation. After ſhe was retired into a country-ſeat, the King gave himſelf over more than ever to his wicked inclinations, even ſo far as not to make the leaſt account of the outſide of religion [C]; which ſhews that his very favourites were not capable to manage him [D]. There were three or four of them for ſome time; but at laſt Count de Caſtelmelhor ſupplanted all the reſt, and found means to ſtrengthen himſelf in the King's favour, by pretending he had diſcovered a moſt horrid conſpiracy [E]. The Infante Don Pedro (b) was ſuſpected of a deſign to make himſelf King, and was ſo ill uſed, that he retired from Court, after the King had made his publick entry into Liſbon with his new wife, the 29th of Auguſt, 1666. The Queen Dowager had departed this life the 28th of February of the ſame year. The new Queen was a French Princeſs, but of the Houſe of Savoy (c). By her entreaties, ſhe perſuaded the Infante to return to Liſbon, where he ſuffered a thouſand vexations. She experienced alſo the King's ill-temper on many occaſions. There was nothing but quarrels and complaints. The removal of Count de Caſtelmelhor, at the Infante's repeated inſtances, did not mend the King's affairs. And as Anthony de Souſa de Macedo, Secretary of State, was called back to Court, it proved ſuch a terrible ſhock to the Queen, that ſhe would no longer ſee any company but the King, who uſed to ſay nothing to her but what was uncivil and unkind. That Secretary of State having exaſperated the Queen very much, ſhe had at laſt obtained that he ſhould be removed from his place; but he got again into it in the moſt inſulting manner. The Infante was determined to drive him out again at any rate; he went to the palace (d) with ſuch a numerous attendance, that the Secretary retired, not daring to truſt any longer to the King's protection. They obliged afterwards the King to ſummon the States of the Kingdom, to meet the firſt of January 1668; but before that time was come, the Queen made uſe of a terrible device: ſhe retired into a Convent November the 21ſt 1667, ſent word to the King that ſhe was determined to return into France, and declared to the Ladies who attended her, that her marriage was never conſummated. She hinted ſomething of it in the letter ſhe wrote to her reputed huſband. Here

(b) He was the King's only brother.

(c) Her name was Frances Mary Elizabeth; ſhe was born the 21ſt of June, 1646, and was the daughter of Charles Amedée of Savoy, Duke of Nemours, by his wife Iſabella of Vendôme, the daughter of the Duke of that name, who was King Henry the Fourth's natural ſon.

(d) In October 1667.

of his whole Court, paſſed before the Queen, who was ſeated in the gallery, without paying the cuſtomary compliment (6). The day ſhe retired from Court, the King ſeemed perfectly pleaſed; and having accompanied her to the country-ſeat ſhe had choſen, he left her at the door of the firſt room, without paying her the leaſt compliment in the world. He returned at night on horſe-back, in a very good humour, going to all the litters or coaches he met on the road, to ſay ſome lewd and ſmutty words to the ladies (7). A little before the Queen died, ſhe let her two ſons know the condition ſhe was in. The Infante wept at it. But the King was ſo far from being moved in the leaſt, that he ridiculed his brother for his tender heart, and would not ſuffer him to ſet out immediately to go and ſee his mother (8). It is certain that this Queen had a thouſand vexations to ſuffer from her ſon Alfonſus. This is the fate of moſt of the ſovereign Princes; nor is this the leaſt misfortune that attends their condition. There are no perſons who want more to have children, and none who receive more diſpleaſure from them. When they have no children, they are witneſſes, either to the intrigues which are carried on for their ſucceſſion, to the exceſſive homage which is paid before hand to another family: and when they have children what jealouſies and ſuſpicions muſt they not entertain within their breaſt at the ſight of thoſe, who worſhip a riſing ſun? Happy are they yet, if men will ſuffer them to govern, till they die a natural death. It is chiefly of them one ought to have ſaid, filius ante diem patrios inquirit in annos (9). i. e. "The ſon wiſhes for his father's death before his time is come."

(6) Ibid. p. 86.

(7) Ibid. p. 90.

(8) Ibid. p. 110.

(9) Ovid. Metam. lib. 1.

[C] So far as not to make the leaſt account of the outſide of religion.] The Author, who is my original, ſpeaks thus. "He had ſo little regard for religion, "that without any reaſon, he cauſed maſs to be ſaid "on his ordinary days in his chamber, whilſt he was "in bed, and at an unſeaſonable hours. On Holy-"days he never went to Chapel till after he had "dined, ſo that maſs was ſaid in his Chapel, when "they were ſinging the evening Prayers in the other "Churches. As he could not refuſe abſolutely to "hear ſermons, he ordered the preachers to ſhorten "their diſcourſes; ſo that ſome were baniſhed for "not obeying that order, and others abſtained from "preaching. However, there were ſome bold enough "to exclaim againſt thoſe diſorders, but to no pur-"poſe, becauſe there were others, who by the flat-"teries, with which they intermixed their ſermons, "rendered that zeal ineffectual (10)."

(10) Relation, p. 97.

[D] His very favourites were not capable to manage him.] They had, no doubt, wit enough to underſtand, that on the one hand nothing could expoſe his Crown to more danger, than the contempt for the holy Ceremonies; and that on the other hand nothing was more proper to conceal his diſſoluteneſs, than an outward ſhew of devotion. It was therefore their own intereſt to inſpire him with that kind of policy: and ſince they did not perſuade him to aſſiſt with aſſiduity at the publick exerciſes of religion, ſince they did not teach him to put on an air of devotion on thoſe occaſions at leaſt, for devotion, much more than charity, covers a multitude of his ſins, we ought to think, that they could not do it. Of what ſtupidity would they not be ſuſpected, if they had ſuffered a young Prince, whom they could manage as they pleaſed, to draw upon himſelf the reſentment of the preachers, by ſo diſagreeable and mortifying an order as that to preach ſhort? Was not that wounding to the quick? There were ſome, who choſe rather to be baniſhed or not to preach, than to obey ſuch an order (11). Another thing, wherein that Prince ſhewed little regard for the preachers, was his laughing at the Comets, and even in the moſt fooliſh manner. Here follows what we meet with in the Relation. "There appeared at that time a Comet; "the King being told that it preſaged the death of "Kings, or that their dominions would be poſſeſſed "by others, abuſed it with the moſt opprobrious lan-"guage from his terraſs, gave a thouſand ſhameful "names, and ſhot even at it with a piſtol." It was an eaſy matter to draw his horoſcope, conſidering what perſons he exaſperated, and what follies he committed.

(11) See the foregoing remark.

[E] Count de Caſtelmelhor ..... found means to ſtrengthen himſelf in the King's favour, by pretending he had diſcovered a moſt horrid conſpiracy.] It is an artifice, which men are often obliged to make uſe of either to prevent conſpiracies, or to get rid of ſuſpected perſons; it is, I ſay, an artifice often neceſſary, to publiſh that a moſt deſperate plot has been diſcovered. It is no matter, if after all no man be found guilty: in the mean time, you have alarmed the world, and

Here then there was an action of impotency brought againſt Don Alfonſus [F], a Prince who had ſo much boaſted of his great exploits with the women (e). The moment he knew what the Queen wrote to him, he went to the Convent into which ſhe was retired, and would have had the gates of it broke open, had not the Infante prevented it. The next day he told his brother in a great paſſion, and with very indecent words, that he was more a man than people imagined. The Queen declared before ſeveral Counſellors of State, and before ſeveral Officers of the Crown, the reaſons for which ſhe retired from Court, and the deſign ſhe had to have her marriage declared void. She wrote to the Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Liſbon (f), deſiring them to take cognizance of that cauſe, without any delay. They talked immediately of marrying her to the Infante: nor was it long before the diſpenſation came. In a word, there was ſuch a diligent ſearch made in every reſpect, that Don Pedro took poſſeſſion of the Royal Palace on the 23d of November 1667, and on the 2d of April following he married Mademoiſelle d'Aumale, ſince Alfonſus's reputed wife was now to be called thus. The Chapter had declared the marriage taken meaſures to keep men in awe. Count de Caſtelmelhor made the King believe that there was a deſign to deprive him of his Crown; and at the ſame time he ſpread a report abroad, that he had diſcovered that conſpiracy by a divine revelation. He charged the Queen, the Duke of Cadaval, and ſeveral other perſons who were out of favour. It was therefore reſolved, that an enquiry ſhould be made about that pretended conſpiracy . . . . . That enquiry continued a great while, either becauſe it was not carried on in earneſt, or with a deſign to encreaſe the fear of thoſe who were accuſed, by exaggerating the diſcoveries, which were pretended to be made daily. Though nothing was found by thoſe enquiries againſt the perſons accuſed, yet ſome body would hint that they were nevertheleſs guilty. But the honeſty of the judges was not to be ſhaken; they all declared the accuſed not guilty. The accuſed aſked often that they would let them know of what they were accuſed; but they could never get a copy of their impeachment. And that information, which ought to have been annulled, ſince it contained no proofs againſt the accuſed, was yet preſerved by the credit of the favourites, as an armed hand, ready to cruſh the accuſed if any opportunity offered (12). This was an artful piece of policy.

(e) See the rem. [A].

(f) The See was vacant at that time.

(12) Relation, p. 100.

[F] An action of impotency brought againſt Don Alfonſus.] It was already ſome months ſince the Queen's Confeſſor had began an intrigue with Monſieur de Schomberg, and ſince he had owned to him to what perplexity that Princeſs was reduced. The King's impotency was one of the firſt articles that were declared. "The Queen not being able to live any "longer under that ſevere reſtraint, to which the "King's brutality, and his favourite's inhumanity re"duced her, diſcovered to Father de Ville, her "Confeſſor, the extreme deſire ſhe had, to declare "ſecretly all her grievances to Count de Schomberg, "and to let him know the well grounded fear ſhe "was under of ſuffering ſomething worſe ſtill: that "the Duke of Beaufort, and the Biſhop of Laon re"commended nothing more ſtrongly to her, than to "truſt entirely to him: ſo that ſhe was perſuaded, "he alone was able to mitigate her grief, and to "afford her the means to extricate herſelf out of the "difficulties in which ſhe was entangled. This Father "Jeſuit, who has been very faithful to his miſtreſs, "and who has behaved himſelf with a great deal of "wiſdom and prudence in thoſe ſtorms, and in the midſt "of all the rocks of that ſea, approved the Queen's "deſign, and communicated it to Count de Schom"berg: and as they had already a reciprocal eſteem "for each other, he gave him a particular account "of that Princeſs's misfortunes, according to the or"ders ſhe had given him, and from his own inclina"tion; he even confirmed to him that the report "which had been ſpread of the King's impotency "was but too true, and that it was to be feared leſt it "ſhould be attended with very bad conſequences; that "they had lately made a ſecret door in the Queen's "bed-chamber, and placed the bed ſo that one might "get into it through the door, without being ſeen "by any perſon in the room: that it was to be fear"ed leſt ſome man ſhould be let into the Queen's "bed that way, in order to conceal the King's diſ"grace and his weakneſs (13)." This is what we meet with in Monſieur Fremont d'Ablancourt's memoirs (14), and he was very well acquainted with the affairs of the Court of Portugal. This Confeſſor of the Queen, and the Infante Don Pedro's Confeſſor (15), contributed very much to the revolutions which happened in that country (16).

(13) Mémoires de Mr. Fremont d'Ablancourt, p. 319, 320.

(14) They were printed in the year 1701.

(15) He was alſo a Jeſuit.

(16) See the ſame Memoires, p. 322, &c.

One cannot forbear obſerving, that there were but few perſons, whoſe condition has been more lamentable than this Queen's before the revolution: for (17) after the firſt day of her marriage with King Don Alfonſus . . . it was perceived, that things did not paſs between them with ſuch a mutual ſatisfaction, as might have been hoped and expected from perſons of their age. This was obſerved at firſt by thoſe only who came neareſt their perſons: but it ſpread farther inſenſibly, and began to lay the foundation of a third party in that Court; ſo that the two weakeſt parties uniting together, as it generally happens, againſt the ſtrongeſt, conquered it at laſt . . (18). The King was not in the leaſt more good natured than before his marriage: he continued his wicked courſes, and gave daily new vexations to the Queen, ſo far that he pretended to be in love with the firſt of her waiting-women . . . . Count de Caſtel Melior, his favourite having (19), bribed one of the Queen's women, in whom ſhe put her greateſt confidence; he ſhewed no more than ſome outward civility to that Princeſs: ſo that the King and his favourite excepting a kind of regard they ſhewed her ſtill before the world, made her ſenſible when they were in private with her, that they cared very little for her. Such ſtrange uſage from thoſe who were in the wrong, gave the Queen at laſt an occaſion to miſtruſt them very much, and to ſuſpect that they were contriving ſome moſt pernicious deſign againſt her: but the more reaſons they gave her to complain, the more careful and wary ſhe was how to ſhew her reſentment, not knowing well whom ſhe could truſt to . . . . France, which ſhe had but lately left, was ſtill preſent to her mind, and being entirely taken up with a deſire to anſwer the expectations that were conceived of her, ſhe conſidered much leſs how ſhe could remedy her misfortunes, than how ſhe might conceal them. Now though ſhe was ſo unfortunate herſelf as not to want to grieve upon the account of others, yet ſhe could not behold without uneaſineſs the bad uſage, which the Infante met with, and when occaſion offered ſhe ſhewed that ſhe laboured to reſtore him to the King's favour. How many misfortunes heaped upon one another was ſhe made to ſuffer? To be married, and to be ſtill a maid; to have an huſband both impotent, and moſt brutiſh at the ſame time; to fear his wicked deſigns, without daring to complain; to ſuſpect and miſtruſt all the world; to ſee a Prince perſecuted, for whom ſhe had a great eſteem and friendſhip, and who was in love with her (20); are not theſe misfortunes accumulated together to an exceſs? The King of Portugal had particular reaſons for being civil and complaiſant to his Queen: he ought to have done like an inſolvent debtor, who by his humility and fine compliments endeavours to mitigate the ill humour of his creditors; qui nummos non geſtat in burſa, mel ſaltem habeat in bucca. i. e. "He who has no "money in his purſe, ought at leaſt to have honey "in his mouth." He ſhould have paid her at leaſt in good words; but inſtead of that he railed at her, and abuſed her, without remembring that he could not make her amends by ſubſtantial effects, for the opprobrious language he gave her. Moſt other huſbands are humble and complaiſant in ſuch a caſe; they endeavour to refute the proverb, which ſays, that

(17) Fremont d'Ablancourt, Memoires, p. 294.

(18) Ibid. p. 295.

(19) Fremont d'Ablancourt, Memoires, p. 296, 297.

(20) The Infante conſidered, that if the Queen Dowager's project had been executed, he would now be in poſſeſſion of an object, which he valued more than the Crown, and would not have the grief to ſee ſo beautiful a Princeſs (the Queen married to Don Alfonſus) ſo undecently uſed. Memoires de Fremont d'Ablancourt, p. 294.

marriage void the 28th of March immediately preceding [G]. I forgot to obſerve, that when Don Pedro took poſſeſſion of the palace, he made himſelf maſter of the King's perſon, who that ſame day ſigned a writing, in which he declared, that of his own accord he reſigned the Kingdom to his brother the Prince. The States of the Kingdom acknowledged Don Pedro as Prince Regent: if he had been willing, he might have been proclaimed King, and have added to the Royal Authority, with which he was already inveſted, a title which is of ſome uſe even to thoſe who enjoy the full power of a King. Spain made artfully an advantage of that revolution to conclude a treaty of peace (g), which the alliance concluded in 1667 between France and Portugal might have prevented, if peace had not become neceſſary to a Kingdom, which had changed its maſter by ſuch proceedings. This is what I have extracted from a book (b) printed at Amſterdam. I do not pretend to anſwer for what it contains [H]; and if I had by me ſome authentick and ſecret memoirs of the other party, I would give them here without any partiality either for or againſt Don Alfonſus, that the reader might be able to paſs a better judgment on that whole affair. That Prince, far from appealing from the ſentence, by which he was declared impotent, ſubmitted to it both by word of mouth, and in writing. The new married couple, after they had lived ſome time together, thought it fit, for their great ſecurity, to aſk for a new diſpenſation from the Pope, confirming that, which Cardinal de Vendome, Legate à Latere in France, had ſent them before they married. The Pope granted them all they could wiſh. It is certain that the Queen had urged ſtrong motives of conſcience to have her firſt marriag declared void (i) [I], and they would be very unreaſonable, (g) It was concluded the 13th of February, 1668. See Wicquefort, de l'Ambaſſadeur, Tom. 1. p. 367.

(b) Intitled Relation des Troubles arrivez dans la Cour de Portugal, en l'année 1667 & 1668.

(i) Extracted from the ſame Relation, &c.

that a misfortune never comes alone. This is alſo generally the conduct of your coquet women: by their cajolings and ſubmiſſions they make their huſbands ſwallow that tough bit, a pair of horns.

[G] The chapter had declared the marriage void the 28th of March immediately preceding.] It is obſerved in the ſentence that both parties had done reſpectively what lay in their power for the conſummation of the marriage, without being able to ſucceed, the whole blame of which ought to be laid on the male. Here follow ſomewhat at length the expreſſions, which were uſed on that occaſion. "It appears that during "that time (21) they could not compaſs their deſign, "though they endeavoured it with all the care and "diligence that is requiſite; but it was occaſioned by "the Prince's incapacity, occaſioned by an infirmity, "under which he has laboured from his infancy, "and which is at preſent abſolutely incurable. "Which is more than ſufficiently proved by ſuch "arguments as the law admits: ſo that the impediment is reckoned to be at leaſt morally certain; after which there is no longer any occaſion for an inſpection of the parts, nor for any greater trial, as "of three years, for inſtance, or of any other arbitrary term. All this being examined together with "the reſt of the acts, according to the laws, the "marriage between the ſaid moſt ſerene Prince and "Princeſs is judged to contract de facto only, and "not de jure, and is declared null and void, ſo that "the ſaid Prince and Princeſs may diſpoſe of their "own perſons as they ſhall think proper, and part "their goods between them according to their marriage articles (22)."

(21) That is to ſay, during the ſpace of 16 months.

(22) Relation, p. 218.

[H] I do not pretend to anſwer for what it contains.] Whoever hears but one ſide of the queſtion hears nothing. I ſhould be very glad to read ſome anſwer from Count de Caſtelmelhor to the Author of the Relation. There is one thing that puzzles me. If Don Alfonſus's mad actions were ſuch, as that Author repreſents them, they could not be unknown to the moſt Chriſtian King's Embaſſadors or Envoys; and if they were acquainted with them, they could not but know that that Prince was in the condition, in which private perſons are not ſuffered to diſpoſe of their eſtate. They who labour under ſuch a madneſs are ſhut up, or at leaſt put under the guardianſhip of their relations. Why then did not the Miniſters of France give notice to the King their maſter, when Don Alfonſus's marriage was negotiating, that he was a madman, whom they ſhould be obliged to chain down, or at leaſt to watch continually very ſoon, and who beſides was thought to be impotent? Somebody has obſerved that Princeſſes are victims, who are ſacrificed to the intereſt of the State. This was never more true than with regard to Mademoiſelle d'Aumale. Don Alfonſus's favourites bribed a woman, to make her declare that the King had got her with child (23). She ſwore afterwards that it was falſe. The Author of the Relation (24) inſiſts very much on that woman's oath; but he is in the wrong: one ought to lay no ſtreſs on what ſhe declared: for if ſhe was capable to tell a lie at a favourite's requeſt, ſhe was alſo capable to tell a lie againſt a Prince, who was a priſoner, and like to be dethroned very ſoon. To act juſtly one ſhould never urge ſuch a recantation as a convincing proof: for whoever ſuffers himſelf to be bribed to ſay a thing, may as eaſily be bribed to unſay it again (25).

(23) Ibid. p. 96.

(24) Page 248.

[I] The Queen urged ſtrong motives of conſcience to have her marriage declared void.] This wants a Commentary; for otherwiſe the readers might imagine, that the Queen miſtruſting the effects of her conſtitution, and not thinking herſelf ſtrong enough againſt the inclinations of nature, was determined to have recourſe to the remedy eſtabliſhed by God, which ſhe did not meet with in Don Alfonſus's perſon: in a word, one might think that ſhe had not the gift of continency, and that ſhe wanted an huſband, in order to acquit herſelf of her duty towards God with regard to Chaſtity. But this would be putting a very wrong conſtruction on the motives of conſcience, which ſhe urged. It is therefore neceſſary to explain here what theſe motives were, in order to prevent the Reader's raſh judgment.

(25) Compare this with what is obſerved above, in the rem. [T] of the article CALVIN.

In the firſt place, Don Alfonſus, notwithſtanding his real impotency, was nevertheleſs extremely diſſolute, laſcivious and obſcene: he ſinned therefore unavoidably in that reſpect, and made the Queen ſin: for the moſt remiſs Caſuiſts agree, that without ſome conditions, which were wanting in Don Alfonſus's idle ſports, and ineffectual endeavours, a man who comes near his wife is guilty of the ſin of unchaſtneſs, and the woman alſo, who ſuffers her huſband's company in ſuch a caſe. Good manners do not ſuffer us to explain the matter more plainly; and even this is a prejudice in that Queen's favour: for it is by no means probable, that, unleſs in a caſe of the utmoſt neceſſity, a perſon of her rank, whoſe actions and proceedings are expoſed to publick view, ſhould have been willing to engage in a law-ſuit, in which a thouſand things were to be mentioned, which ſhame and chaſtity would conceal.

In the ſecond place, the Queen knew, that the King and his Favourite would never conſent that Don Pedro ſhould marry: ſince therefore the King was uncapable to get children, ſhe could no longer conceal it, without expoſing the Kingdom of Portugal to the moſt fatal revolutions: which was not only inconſiſtent with her affection for that kingdom, but even againſt her conſcience.

In the third place, when the King had a mind to divert himſelf with a girl, he uſed to employ a forerunner; it was always ſome of his favourites who broke the ice, after which the King did all he could to enter the breach, whilſt it was ſtill freſh. Now he had once a deſign to uſe the ſame artifice with reunreaſonable, who ſhould put a malicious conſtruction on the great melancholy, which appeared in her countenance [K], as ſoon as ſhe was convinced of her Conſort's natural defect. The abdicated King Don Alfonſus was ſent into the Iſland of Tercera, where he continued ſeveral years: but as there were reaſons to fear leſt the enemies of the Kingdom ſhould take him from thence, in order to raiſe diſturbances in the State, he was tranſported into a more ſecure place. It was into the Caſtle of Cintra ſeven leagues diſtant from Liſbon. He died in that Caſtle of an apoplectick fit, September the 12th 1683 (k).

(k) Extracted from the Mercure Galant, for October 1683.

The Queen of Portugal, once his wife, followed him ſoon after; for ſhe died at Palhavam the 27th of December 1683 (l), in the thirty eighth year of her age. Her only daughter the Infanta of Portugal was born the 6th of June 1669, and had been married to the Duke of Savoy in 1679. This marriage was declared in the Council of State of Portugal the 5th of September; the States of the Kingdom were convened in order to ratify it, and to abrogate a law, by which the Princeſſes of the Royal Family gard to the Queen; ſo that both that Princeſs's honour and her conſcience obliged her to get out of the power of ſuch an huſband.

(l) Mercure Galant, for February 1684, p. 123.

Theſe three particulars want to be proved. Here follows what we meet with in the Reaſons for annulling (26) that marriage.

(26) Relation, p. 251.

On the firſt head we read then what follows. "Her "Majeſty's conſcience was continually prompting "her, and perſuaded her, that after an experience of "ſixteen months, long enough indeed, and but too "tedious, ſhe was obliged to part from the King, "without making a longer trial, ſince ſhe had "found ſufficiently that his impotency was incurable; "and as ſhe had ſeveral times conſulted her Father "Confeſſor about it, that ſhe might behave with a "ſafe conſcience in ſo weighty an affair, her Confeſ- "ſor, having conſidered it maturely, and examined "what he was to determine, in order to acquit him- "ſelf of his duty, declared before God, that he did "not think that her Majeſty, ſeeing what was the "caſe, could ſafely act any longer againſt her con- "ſcience, by continuing to live with the King."

As for the ſecond head, I refer to page 252 of the Relation.

What follows relates to the third head. The Queen ſaw her honour, which was always infinitely more dear to her than her Crown, and even than her life (27), "expoſed to the greateſt dangers, her fears "in that reſpect being too well grounded: whatſo- "ever neceſſity there be to ſpeak of thoſe dangers, "yet modeſty and ſhame will ſuffer us to mention only "ſo much of them, as cannot be abſolutely omit- "ted, and muſt be known to be able to judge of the "whole affair. One of theſe dangers is, that the King, "being ſenſible that he could never get children, "wiſhed yet moſt paſſionately to have ſome, in order "to reſtore himſelf (28) to the throne, by creating a "good opinion of himſelf in that reſpect, and re- "futing the contrary opinion, namely, that which "he knew all the world had of his impotency, which "grieved him more, than his impotency itſelf: "wherefore, the more impotent the felt himſelf, the "more he laboured to ſhew the contrary, abandoning "himſelf to all ſorts of women, and thinking by "that means to keep the Crown on his head, and "to make his brother the Prince die with grief, for "he hated him mortally, becauſe the Prince knew "for certain, and uſed to ſay, that his Majeſty would "never have any children, becauſe of his impotency. "The other danger was, that the Queen was not ig- "norant of what was then a ſecret, and what the "Judges came afterwards to know by the declaration "of the perſons concerned: namely, that when the "King had a mind to enjoy a girl, which he could "not do becauſe of his impotency, he made her lye "in his chamber with ſome of his favourites, and "in his own preſence, that he might the eaſier in- "dulge his inclination, after another had paved the "way for him, though in reality he could not do "more afterwards, than before, as appears by the "depoſitions of the perſons to whom that has happen- "ed, and who have ſworn it upon the holy goſpel. "Now what made the Queen fear more ſtill, that the "King, who had no other rule of his conduct, but "his great diſſoluteneſs, and the vain opinion of his "pretended ability, without any regard for this re- "putation, or for his conſcience; what made her "fear, I ſay, that the King deſigned to attempt the "ſame upon herſelf, was, that towards the end of "April 1667, he had her continually entreated by his "moſt intimate favourites, Enrigo Enriguez de Mi- "randa, Count de Caſtelmeglior, and his mother the "Marchioneſs, Lady of Honour to her Majeſty, to "paſs from her own apartment, where the King ne- "ver ſcrupled to go and meet her till that time, "into the King's, in order to lye with him (29), a- "gainſt all the antient formalities, and the common "cuſtoms of the Palace, and without any apparent "neceſſity: the Queen deſired ſeveral times to be "excuſed, though as civilly as ſhe could, urging, "not indeed the reaſons which cauſed her greateſt "fear inwardly (30): for ſhe had been willing to "make a ſacrifice for that new grievance to the "King's will, through an effect of that great ſub- "miſſion and regard which this Princeſs had for "her; but (urging) the baſhfulneſs and modeſty, "which are capable to prevent any woman of ho- "nour, and much more a Princeſs and a Queen as "ſhe was, from making, without any neceſſity, ſo ex- "traordinary an alteration, which would unqueſtion- "ably have expoſed her reputation, as well as the "King's: whereupon his Majeſty fell into ſuch a "paſſion, that the very night which followed that "day, he would by main force make her riſe out of "her bed, and follow him into his own apartment; "but after many threatnings and pretty hard words, "holding a dagger in his hand, he told her, that he "gave her but twenty-four hours to take her reſo- "lution; and if after that ſpace of time, ſhe did not "do the next night what he required of her, he "ſwore he would drag her by main force, or have "her dragged by four of his footmen; this grieved "and vexed the Queen moſt terribly: ſo that the ve- "ry next day ſhe made her complaint to the Count "by the mouth of her Confeſſor, deſiring him to "find ſome remedy to her misfortune, and pro- "teſting that ſhe would die, rather than do what "the King required, or any thing unbecoming her "dignity. This, together with the fear which was "deeply rooted in the Queen's mind, was the reaſon "why after that time ſhe did not judge herſelf ſafe, "and did not think ſhe ſhould ever be ſecure, as "long as ſhe continued to be expoſed, as ſhe would "be ſtill more for the future, to a danger, from "which it would be difficult for her to extricate her- "ſelf again another time, as ſhe had happily done "once: eſpecially, ſince the perſon to whom her "Majeſty could truſt moſt on ſuch occaſions, namely, "her Lady of honour, was the very perſon whom "ſhe had the greateſt reaſon to ſuſpect, becauſe "ſhe was the mother of the Count, who was the "King's favourite, and that ſhe ſhewed moſt openly "how paſſionately ſhe wiſhed that the Queen might "have children, in order to ſecure, by that means, "her own, and her ſon's fortune; for in the confe- "rence ſhe had with the Queen's Confeſſor upon this "ſubject, in order to find means to perſuade her in "the King's name, and in her own, to change her "bed and apartment, ſhe told him poſitively, it "would be only for five or ſix nights, after which "ſhe promiſed the Confeſſor to make the King go to "the Queen as he uſed to do."

(27) Ibid. p. 253.

(28) That expreſſion is very improper; for King Alfonſus had not been dethroned yet.

(29) Compare this with the rem. [F], towards the end, where you will meet with another device, which made the Queen uneaſy.

(30) I put here a Nota bene, becauſe the Author expreſſes himſelf with ſo much confuſion, that one cannot underſtand his meaning, unleſs one be extremely attentive.

[K] The great melancholy which appeared in her countenance.] If it be aſked how I know that the Queen

Family, who marry with foreign Princes, are excluded from the ſucceſſion to the Crown (m) [L]. Notwithſtanding all this the marriage was broke off, before the King of Savoy had ſeen the Infante. She died a maid October the 21th 1690. The Queen her mother had taken great care of her education: ſhe had written down, with her own hand, counſels for this Infanta, which were found after her death (n), and are very judicious; they are to be met with at length in the Mercure Galant for May 1684 (o). In the year 1687 King Don Pedro married a daughter of the Elector Palatine; ſhe died in the year 1699, at the age of thirty ſix years (p). We meet in Monſieur Fremont d'Ablancourt's Memoirs, printed in the year 1701, with ſeveral particulars concerning Don Alfonſus's reign, the annulling of his marriage, his being dethroned, &c.

(m) Extracted from the Paris Gazette.

(n) Mercure Galant, for May 1614, p. 21, 24.

(o) Page 25, &c.

(p) See l'Eſprit des Cours de l'Europe, for Sept. 1699, p. 480.

Since I have mentioned the Duke of Savoy's marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, it will not be beſide the purpoſe to obſerve, that the Court of France was thought to have had a great influence in that whole affair. The dablers in politicks were ſure to reaſon very much upon that ſubject, and to alledge ſeveral motives with as much boldneſs, as though they had been admitted into the ſecrets of the Cabinet Council. I ſhall not examine their reaſonings; I ſhall only refer to a book, in which one of their falſities has been refuted (q).

(q) See the 5th vol. of the Reponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial, chap. 6. N.B. This work was written by Mr. Bayle himſelf.

Queen appeared ſad, I ſhall quote my authority immediately. I find it in the Reaſons for annulling the marriage. Read and conſider what follows. "The "firſt time the King lay with the Queen, which was "three or four days after ſhe arrived in Portugal, "this Princeſs was ſoon ſo well acquainted with his "impotency, notwithſtanding her innocence, and "though ſhe was quite ignorant of thoſe matters, "that her Confeſſor found her very melancholy, and "as he had but too much reaſon to fear the common "report was true, he took the liberty to aſk her, "not as a Father Confeſſor, but with all the modeſty, "decency and confidence which his office would allow him, whether there was any foundation or appearance of truth, in what had been reported, or "whether ſhe had any hopes to ſee very ſoon ſome "fruits of her marriage; ſhe anſwered him, as "may be ſeen in the proceedings, but in ſuch a manner, as gave him ſufficiently to underſtand that ſhe "had already formed a true judgment of the con"dition of her marriage, and of the King's incapaci"ty to get children (31)." I long to ſee a book which has been juſt publiſhed (32).

(31) Relation, p. 250.

(32) I have been told juſt now, that the Hiſtory of this Queen, written by F. d'Orleans the Jeſuit, was publiſhed at Paris ſince May 1696. Thus I ſpoke in the 1ſt edit. of this work. I muſt add now, that that Hiſtory has been reprinted at Amſterd. and yet I have been ſo ill ſerved, that I have not yet been able to ſee it, tho' this article is now reprinting.

[L] And to abrogate a law by which the Princeſſes . . . . . who marry with foreign Princes, are excluded from the ſucceſſion to the crown.] It is called the law of Lamego. It was made by Don Alfonſus Henriquez, firſt King of Portugal, in the Aſſembly of the States-General, which he called together at Lamego, after the Victory he gained over five Kings of the Moors, at the battle of Urica, in the year 1139. It is enacted by that law, that the Princeſſes of the Royal Blood, who marry ſtrangers, are uncapable to ſucceed to the Throne. It is in conſequence of that law, that the Dukes of Parma were excluded from the Crown of Portugal, though they be deſcended from Princeſs Mary, eldeſt ſiſter of Catharine, Don Pedro's grand-mother (33).

(33) I have extracted this from the Paris Gazette, for the year 1679.

☞ POTTER (CHRISTOPHER), a learned Engliſh Divine in the 17th Century, was nephew of Dr. Barnabas Potter, Biſhop of Carliſle [A], and was born within the Barony of Kendal in Weſtmorland (a) about the year 1591 (b), and became Clerk of Queen's College in Oxford in the beginning of the year 1606 (c). April 30th 1610 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts (d), and July the 8th 1613 that of Maſter (e); and the ſame year was choſen Chaplain of the College, and afterwards Fellow of it. He was then a great admirer of Dr. Henry Ayay, Provoſt of that College, ſome of whoſe works he publiſhed, and who was a zealous puritanical Lecturer at Abingdon in Berks, where he was much reſorted to for his preaching (f). March the 9th 1620 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity (g), and February 17 1626-7 that of Doctor (h), having ſucceeded his uncle Dr. Barnabas Potter in the Provoſtſhip of his College on the 17th of June 1626 (i). "Soon after, ſays Mr. Wood (k), when Dr. Laud became a riſing "favourite at Court, he, after a great deal of ſeeking, was made his creature, and "therefore by the preciſe party he was eſteemed an Arminian." March the 15th 1628 he preached a Sermon on John xxi. 17. at the Conſecration of his Uncle to the Biſhoprick of Carliſle at Ely-houſe in Holborn; which was printed at London 1629 in 8vo. [B]. In 1633 he publiſhed his Anſwer to a late Popiſh Pamphlet, entitled, Charity miſtaken

(a) Lloyd's Memoirs, p. 544. edit. 1668, in folio. Fuller's Worthies in Weſtmorland, and Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 85. 2d edit.

(b) Wood ſays, that he was 15 years of age in 1606.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 285.

(e) Idem, ibid. col. 194.

(f) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(g) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 216.

(h) Idem, ibid. col. 234.

(i) Idem, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. p. 116.

(k) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 85.

[A] Dr. Barnabas Potter, Biſhop of Carliſle.] He was born within the Barony of Kendal, in the County of Weſtmorland, and became a Student of Queen's College in Oxford, in the beginning of the year 1594, aged 15 years; where after he had taken the Degree of Maſter of Arts, he was elected Fellow of that College, and entering into Holy Orders, became, ſays Mr. Wood (1), not only a puritanical Preacher in theſe parts, but at Totneſs in Devonſhire, where he was much followed by the preciſe party. In 1615, he took the Degree of Doctor of Divinity, and the year following was choſen Provoſt of his College; which place he held about ten years, and then reſigned it, (being at that time one of the King's Chaplains,) and his intereſt, got his Nephew, Dr. Chriſtopher Potter, to ſucceed him. In 1628, he, though a thorough-paced Calviniſt, ſays Mr. Wood (2), was made Biſhop of Carliſle, by the endeavours of Biſhop Laud; to which See he was conſecrated at Ely houſe in Holbourn, on the 15th of March. He died at his lodgings in the Pariſh of St. Paul's Covent-Garden, London, in the beginning of January 1641, and was interred in the Church of that Pariſh, on the 6th of that month. He left a widow named Elizabeth. He wrote Lectures on the 16th chapter of Geneſis. Lectures on the 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 17th, 18th chapters of Geneſis. Mr. Wood cannot inform us, whether theſe lectures were ever printed. He wrote likewiſe lectures on the plagues of Egypt from Exodus, and on the Beatitudes from part of St. Luke; but theſe Mr. Wood thinks not to be extant. He publiſhed ſeveral ſermons, viz. 1. The Baronet's Burial: Or, a Funeral Sermon at the Solemnities of that honourable Baronet, Sir Edward Seymour's Burial, on Deut. xxxiv. ver. 5. Oxford 1613, in 4to. 2. A Sermon on Eaſter Tueſday at the Spittal, &c.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 12. 2d edit.

(2) Ibid.

[B] Printed at London 1629, in 8*vo.*] Mr. Vicars, a friend of our Author, having peruſed this ſermon, diſliked ſome paſſages in it, and therefore wrote a letter to him, in which he expoſtulated with him concerning his change of opinion, as he conceived. Upon this Dr. Potter wrote a vindication of himſelf, by way of letter to Mr. Vicars, touching the points of God's free grace and man's free will, printed at the end of Mr. John Playfere's Appello Evangelium for the true doctrine of the divine predeſtination concorded with the orthodox doctrine of God's free grace and man's free will. London 1651, in 8vo. The paſſages in Dr. Potter's Sermon, which Mr. Vicars excepted againſt, were as follow: " For our controverſies, firſt " let mee profeſſe, I favour not (I rather ſuſpect) " any new inventions; for ab antiquitate non recedo " niſi invitus; eſpecially renouncing all ſuch as any " way favour or flatter the depraved nature and will " of man, which I conſtantly believe to be free " only to evill, and of itſelfe to have no power at " all, merely none, to any act or thing ſpiritually " good; moſt heartily embracing that doctrine, " which moſt amply commends the riches of God's " free grace, which I acknowledge to be the whole " and ſole cauſe of our predeſtination, converſion, " and ſalvation, abhorring all damned doctrines of " the Pelagians, Semipelagians, Jeſuites, Socinians, " and of their ragges and reliques, which helpe onely " to pride and prick up corrupt nature, humbly con- " feſſing in the words of S. * Cyprian, ſo often re- " peated by that worthy champion of grace S. † " Auguſtine, in nullo gloriandum eſt, quandoquidem noſ- " trum nihil eſt. It is God that worketh in us both the " will and the deed; and therefore let him that glo- " rieth, glory in the Lord. But for the points in queſ- " tion, they might ſure be debated with leſſe edge " and ſtomach, as they are at this day in the very  " Church of Rome; and it were happy, if we could " ſuffer charity to moderate in all our diſputations. " If it be truth wee ſeeke, and not victory, " why take we not the counſell of St. Paul, ἀλη- " θεύειν ἐν ἀγάπῃ, to ſeeke and ſpeake truth in love. " Since the matters queſtioned are clogged and per- " plexed with ſo many inſuperable difficulties, that " the greateſt wits and ſpirits of all ages have here " found themſelves entangled in a maze, and at " length after all vexing diſquiſitions ſeeing no eva- " ſion, no iſſue out of this labyrinth, no banke or " bottome in this ocean, were forced to checke their " reſtleſſe repining underſtandings with St. Paul's, " O Altitudo! ſince on all hands they (3) confeſſed " to be not fundamentall, not eſſential to the faith; " ſince our own Church (as the (4) primitive) in great " wiſdome hath thought mene here to walke in a " latitude, and to be ſparing in her definitions; why " ſhould wee not all be wiſe unto ſobriety, and let " God alone with his ſecrets? Why may not our (5) " hearts be united, though our heads doe differ? " Why doe wee not deſire rather ſafely and ſweetly " to compoſe theſe differences, than raſhly and with " (6) danger to define them, and forbeare all capi- " tall cenſures either way, which muſt needs involve " many holy ſoules now at reſt with God, many (7) " Catholique Biſhops of the antient Church, many " learned and godly Doctors of our owne, nay, en- " tire Reformed Churches, all which have varied in " theſe opinions, though moſt neerly linked in their " affections? The faire and moderate carriage of " theſe controverſies between theſe reverend men, " (whoſe memoryes wee juſtly honour) †† John Cal- " vin and Philip Melanchon, eaſily perſwades mee, " that their violent followers at this day are not " more learned, but more uncharitable. And it ap- " pears by that, which maſter  Fox hath recorded, " that our bleſſed Martyrs in the days of Queen Mary, " in their very priſons, freely diſputed and diſſented " in theſe opinions. And Biſhop Hooper hath left " his judgment to poſterity in the Preface to his " Expoſition of the Decalogue, which haply hee learnt " at Zurich of H. Bullinger, his intimate friend and " familiar." Dr. Potter's letter to Mr. Vicars in vindication of himſelf againſt the exceptions to theſe paſſages is dated July 7 1629; and in it he writes thus (8): In divine truths my conſcience cannot ſerve men, or any other maſter beſides him, who hath his chaire in Heaven. I love Calvin very well; and I muſt tell you, I cannot hate Arminius; and for my part I am verily perſuaded, that theſe two are now where they agree well, in the Kingdome of Heaven; whilſt ſome of their paſſionate Diſciples are ſo eagerly brawling here on earth. I ſhould honour truth, if I heard it out of the Pope's mouth or the Devil's; nor can I believe a falſity, though publiſhed by an Angell. I prize my ſoule ſo dearly, that I dare not venture it upon any man's credit, or take upon truſt any opinion, which may endanger it; nor can the worth of all this world perſwade me, in matters of faith, to maintaine or believe any concluſion, which I finde not to iſſue from premiſſes of ſcripture and reaſon. But moſt eſpecially I tremble to think or ſpeak any thing of God Almighty, which hath not expreſſe warrant in his owne word; and ſo much the more, if it ſeeme injurious or diſhonourable to that moſt glorious and gratious Deity. For my life I cannot obtaine of my conſcience to declame, and revile, and cry downe an opinion, when I cannot ſee any ſolid ſatisfying anſwer to many contrary ſcriptures and reaſons. It is a very eaſie way, which many people walke, and if it were as ſafe, I would be content to walke it with them. Blind-folded they follow their leaders, and ſparing their own eyes, they preſume their guides ſo learned, ſo holy, ſee clearly enough. Therefore they beleeve all their dictates, as if they were divinely inſpired and ſpake oracles, without examining, which eaſes them of much trouble and difficulty in ſifting and judging. For my part, I ever thought a thing unworthy of a Chriſtian, and yet more of a Miniſter and full of danger, to invaſſal his underſtanding to any man or any men; or to embrace and eſpouſe opinions in religion, without judgment, out of fantaſie and prejudice, becauſe they are recommended by ſome great names, which we have in admiration. He then ſhews the pains, which he had taken in examining controverſies about grace and free will, and obſerves (9), that " finding upon this (9) Page 423. " ſerious ſearch, that all doubts are not clearly de- " cided by ſcripture; that in the antient Church, " after the age of S. Auguſtine, who was preſently " contradicted by many Catholiques (as you may ſee " in the epiſtles of Proſper and Fulgentius to him " upon that very occaſion) they have ever beene " friendly debated, and never determined in any " Councill; that in our age whole Churches are here " divided, either one from another, as the Lutherans " from us, or amongſt themſelves, as the Romaniſts, " amongſt whom the Dominican family is wholly for " the Remonſtrants; that in all theſe ſeveral Churches " ſome particular Doctors vary in theſe opinions; " out of all this I collect for my part, that the points " are no neceſſary Catholique verities, not eſſential " to the faith, but meerely matters of opinion, pro- " blematical, of inferior moment, wherein a man " may erre or be ignorant without any danger to his " ſoul; yet ſo ſtill, that the glory of God's juſtice, " mercy, truth, ſincerity, and divine grace, be not " any ways blemiſhed, nor any evil to God's decree " or providence. Wherein I can aſſure you, I doe " not depart from my antient judgment, but doe well " remember what I affirmed in my queſtions at the " act, and have confirmed it, I ſuppoſe, in my ſer- " mon:

An { " Efficacia Gratiæ pendeat à libro influxu arbitrii? Negat. " Chriſtus divinæ juſtitiæ, vice noſtrâ, propriæ & integrè ſatisfecerit? Aff. " Ipſe actus fidei (τὸ credere) imputetur nobis in juſtitiam ſenſu proprio? Negat."

Quæſtiones Inceptoris Chriſtophori Potteri, 1627.

With reſpect to the objection, that the Arminians agree with the Romaniſts, he remarks (10), that the Church of Rome makes more againſt the Arminians than for them. The prime controverſie (on which all the others are but appendices) is that touching the abſolute irreſpective degree; in which point, if you collect and number the ſuffrages, ten for one againſt the Arminians. Tho. Aquine, you know, was a great ſchool-maſter, and had many ſcholars. Obſerve and ſee, whether they all (and many more) doe not ſtrongly ſwim in the ſtreame after Auſtine. And the truth is, our firſt Reformers did herein but ſay over againe theſe leſſons, which they had learned in the Roman ſchooles, and the hardeſt paſſages, that have fallen from Calvin or Piſcator, may eaſily be parallelled with others as rigorous in many Romiſh Doctours. Eſpecially of late yeares the whole Dominican familie have been zealous and voluminous in theſe queſtions, which they call de Auxiliis; wherein though they ſweat to ſever their opinions from the Calviniſts (as they call us) yet ſome Jeſuites tell them (and very truly) that their labour is very vaine and ridiculous. Among the Jeſuites themſelves, the more antient, Tolet, Bellarmine, Valentia, Suarez, doe not in effect diſſent from the Dominicans; onely ſome few new ones, Molina, Leſſius, take up the bucklers againſt them, and bid them battell, but in very faire and friendly manner; for they in

(10) Page 431.

* Teſt. ad Quir. lib. 3. cap. 4.

† Contra duas Epiſt. Pelag. lib. 4. cap. 6.

 Inter aliquot Jeſuitas & Dominicanos.

Epheſ. iv. 15.

(3) Pareus in iren. Frid. 3. Palat. in Confeſſ. ad fin. Admont. Neuſtad.

(4) Cœleſt. in Ep. R. ad Epiſco Gall. cap. ult.

(5) Rom. xiv. 1. Phil. ii. 3. —— iii. 15. 2 Tim. ii. 22. 1 Cor. xiii. 47. See Perkins in Gal. i. 2. and Gal. iii. 15.

Vide inſignem S. Cypr. erga diſſentientes a ſe modeſtiam Epiſt. 73. ad Jubaian. in fine, & in præf. Concil. Carthag. laudat. ſæpe ab Aug. de Bap. contra Donat. lib. 2. cap. ult. & lib. 3. cap. 3. & lib. 4. cap. 84, &c.

(6) Aug. Enchir. ad Laurent. cap. 59.

(7) Bez. Annot. major. in Rom. ii. 35. and Calv. Inſt. lib. 3. cap. 22. ſect. 1. and ſect. 8. P. Melanc. in Rom. ix. Sixt. Sen. lib. 6. ann. 251.

†† Vide eum in præf. ad Loc. Com. Melanc. Gallice à ſe verſos, & Epiſtolas à μειλαίας.

 Exam. of John Careles.

(8) Page 413.

miſtaken [C], which he wrote by ſpecial order of King Charles I. whoſe Chaplain he was. In 1635 he was promoted to the Deanery of Worceſter (l), having before had a promiſe of a Canonry of Windſor, which he never enjoyed. In 1640 he was Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, in the execution of which office he met with ſome trouble from the Members of the Long Parliament. Upon breaking out of the Civil Wars, in a manner conflict, not as we doe, with paſſionate and mutual revilings, but with reaſons and arguments, and ſalvâ ſemper charitate, for ſo they are commanded by their great Dictator at Rome, who indeed dares not otherwiſe decide the doubts, leſt the grieved partie raiſe another more dangerous queſtion, Whether his judgment be infallible? In like manner the Council of Trente, if you marke it, cunningly here declines the deciſion, and lurks in ſuch generall terms (like him that was called Δοξίας in the old Oracle) that both ſides confidently avow the ſentence to be given for them, when indeed it is given for neither.

(l) Le Neve, Faſti Eccleſ. Anglican. p. 301.

[C] In 1633, he publiſhed his anſwer to a late Popiſh pamphlet, entitled, Charity miſtaken.] A Jeſuit, who went by the name of Edward Knott, but whoſe true name was Matthias Wilſon (11), had publiſhed in 1630, a little book in 8vo, called, Charity miſtaken, with the want whereof Catholickes are unjuſtly charged, for affirming, as they do with grief, that Proteſtancy unrepented deſtroies Salvation. Dr. Potter publiſhed an anſwer to this at Oxford 1633, in 8vo, with this title: Want of Charitie juſtly charged on all ſuch Romaniſts as dare (without truth or modeſty) affirme, that Proteſtancie deſtroyeth Salvation: Or, an Anſwer to a late Popiſh pamphlet, intituled, Charity miſtaken, &c. The ſecond edition reviſed and enlarged, was printed at London 1634, in 8vo. Prynne obſerves (12), that Biſhop Laud having peruſed the firſt edition, cauſed ſome things to be omitted in the ſecond. It is dedicated to King Charles I. and in the dedication Dr. Potter obſerves, that it was undertaken in obedience to his Majeſty's particular commandment. In the preface he tells us, that "this Anſwer had been publique ſome "moneths agoe, if it had not been delayed, partly by "ſickneſſe, and the indiſpoſition of my body, (and "of my minde alſo, which was ever averſe from con-"tentions in Divinity, and now rather deſirous to "ſpend in devotion the few and evil days of my "life that remaine,) and partly of the hope I had to "ſee a ſecond edition of the Miſtaker's work, which "the ſtrong report of that part promiſed, or rather "threatened. But that hope failing, and being loath "to ſeeme to faile in my obſervance, I now com-"mend it, ſuch as it is, to the bleſſing of God, and "to the uſe and judgement of the Church. My An-"ſwers, without further affectation, are true and mo-"deſt. I ſpeake to the cauſe, not to the perſon. "Whoſoever the Miſtaker be, he hath my pitty and "my prayers. He thinkes unworthily of truth, that "believes it to have need of our paſſions." In the firſt ſection our Author ſhews, that ſome Roman Catholics judge charitably of the Reformed. That the Jeſuits are furious and deſtructive in their cenſures againſt all, who are not of their faction. That this faction, which is infamous for its cruelties, is charged with want of charity, and not the Catholic Church. That the Catholic Church and the Roman Church are ignorantly or cunningly confounded. That the Catholic Church is truly and really charitable; and ſo the Engliſh, but not ſo the Roman, not even to her own children, eſpecially not to Proteſtants; of whom the Miſtaker and others ſpeak and think no better than of Infidels, though we, ſays the Doctor, intirely profeſs and embrace the Catholic faith in all the parts of it. In the ſecond ſection he treats of the Unity of the Church, and ſhews wherein it conſiſts, and obſerves (13), that it is nothing hindered by diverſity of opinions in doubtfull matters. It is a great vanity to hope or expect, that all learned men in this life ſhould abſolutely conſent in all the pieces and particles of divine truth. The light, whereby we ſee in this ſtate of mortality, is very feeble and very different, in regard of the good ſpirit's illumination, the capacities of men, and their diligencies in ſtudy, prayer, and other means of knowledge. So long as the (14) faith once delivered to the ſaints is earneſtly contended for and kept intire, that is, the (15) common faith of Chriſtians, containing all Catholique and neceſſary verities; ſo long as men (16) walk according to this rule charitably, though in other things they be otherwiſe minded, the Church is but one, her unity no way violated. For this unity conſiſts in the unity of faith, not of opinions; and in an union of men's hearts and affections by true charity, which will eaſily compound or tolerate all unneceſſary differences. Factions and fiery ſpirits kindle and fly aſunder on ſmall occaſions; but among wiſe men, each diſcord in religion diſſolves not the unity of faith or charity. Points of religion are well diſtinguiſhed by (17) Thomas and (18) Stapleton. Some, ſay they, are primitive articles, of the ſubſtance of religion, eſſential in the object of faith. Diſſention in theſe is pernicious, and deſtroys unity. Others are ſecondary, probable, accidental, or obſcure points; wherein the oppoſitions and diſputations of learned men proceeding modeſtly are tolerable, and ſometime profitable for finding out the truth. Unity in theſe matters is very contingent and variable in the Church, now greater, now leſſer, never abſolute in all particles of truth. And therefore thoſe antient Worthies, the Fathers of the Church, as they were the moſt zealous to defend, even with their blood, to the leaſt jot or title, the rule of faith (as they called it) or the Creed of Chriſtians, or (as the ſcripture calls it) the (19) form of wholeſom words, the (20) principles of the oracles of God, or of the doctrine of Chriſt; ſo againe, they were moſt charitable to allow in other things (beſides or without the faith) a great latitude and liberty. As in a muſical conſort, a diſcord now and then (ſo it be in the deſcant, and depart not from the ground) ſweetens the harmony; ſo the variety of opinions, or of (21) rites in parts of the Church, doth rather commend then prejudice the unity of the whole.

He then ſhews how far the communion of the Church is neceſſary. In the third ſection, he ſtates the true difference between the Roman and Reformed parts of the Church; and obſerves, that Proteſtants have rejected nothing but Popery, that is, corrupt ſuper-additions to the faith, confeſſed by learned Romaniſts to be doubtful and unneceſſary novelties; and that they have reformed the errors and abuſes of Rome without ſchiſm. He ſhews likewiſe how and to whom thoſe errors are damnable. "For though, "ſays he (22), in themſelves they be not damnable, "to them, which beleeve as they profeſſe; yet for "us to profeſſe (and to avow by oath, as the Church "of Rome injoynes) what we believe not, were "without queſtion damnable. And they with their "errours, by the grace of God, might go to hea-"ven, when we for our hypocriſy and diſſimulation, "without repentance, ſhould certainly be condemned "to hell. It is the doctrine of the Roman ſchoole, "that veniall ſinnes to him that commits them, not "of ſubreption or a ſuddain motion, but of preſump-"tion that the matter is not of moment, change "their kinde and become mortall. The like may be "ſaid of errours. To him, who in ſimplicity of "heart beleeves and profeſſeth them, and withall "feareth God and worketh righteouſneſs, to him they "ſhall prove veniall. Such an one ſhall, by the "mercy of God, either be delivered from them, or "ſaved with them. But he that againſt faith and "conſcience, ſhall go along with the ſtreame to pro-"feſſe and practiſe them, becauſe they are but little "ones; his caſe is dangerous; and without repen-"tance deſperate. We hope and thinke very well "of all thoſe holy and devout ſoules, which in for-"mer ages lived and died in the Church of Rome. "For though they died in many ſinfull errours, "yet becauſe they did it ignorantly through unbelief "(23), not knowing them to bee either errors or "ſins, and repenting in generall for all their un-"knowne treſpaſſes; we doubt not but they obtained "pardon of all their ignorances. For it were an "unreaſonable incongruity to imagine, that the God "of Mercy ſhould not be as ready to pardon errours "of underſtanding, as wilfull impieties. Nay, our "charity reaches further to all thoſe at this day, who "in (11) See Southwell's Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jeſu, p. 185. edit. Romæ 1676.

(12) Canterbury's Doom, p. 251, 252.

(13) p. 38, 39.

(14) Jud. 3.

(15) Tit. i. 4.

(16) Phil. iii. 15, 16.

(17) Aquin. 2. 2. q. 2. art. 5. q. 2. 9. art. 3. ad. 2.

(18) Staplet. Dupl. lib. 3. c. 12. n. 3. & Rel. cap. 1. q. 3. art. 6. notab. 3. Licet, & utile eſt de rebus difficilibus in Eccleſia aliter putare; neque hoc unitatem violat, ſed veritatem illuſtrat.

(19) 2 Tim. i. 13.

(20) Heb. vi. 1. and v. 12.

(21) Firmilianus apud Cyprian. Epiſt. 75. num. 5. Auguſt. Epiſt. 86. Socrat. Hiſt. lib. 5. cap. 21.

(22) p. 77, 78.

(23) Cypr. Epiſt. 63. Pam. num. 13. Si quis de Anteceſſoribus noſtris vel ignoranter vel ſimpliciter non hoc obſervavit & tenuit, quod nos Dominus facere exemplo & magiſterio ſuo docuit, poteſt ſimplicitati ejus de indulgentia Domini venia concedi; nobis vero non poterit in ſec. qui nunc a [illegible] admoniti [illegible] ſtructi [illegible]

Wars, he ſent all his plate to the King, and declared, that he would rather, like Diogenes, drink in the hollow of his hand, than that his Majeſty ſhould want; and he afterwards ſuffered much for the Royal Cauſe (m). In conſideration of this, upon the death of Dr. Walter Balcanqual, he was nominated to the Deanery of Durham in January 1645-6; but was prevented from being inſtalled by his death, which happened at his College March the 3d following. He was interred about the middle of the Chapel there; and over his grave was a marble monument faſtened to the North wall, at the expence of his widow Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. Charles Sonibanke, ſome time Canon of Windſor, afterwards wife of Dr. Gerard Langbaine, who ſucceeded Dr. Potter in the Provoſtſhip of Queen's College (n). He was a perſon eſteemed by all that knew him to be learned and religious; exemplary in his behaviour and diſcourſe, courteous in his carriage, and of a ſweet and obliging nature, and comely preſence. But he was more eſpecially remarkable for his charity to the poor; for though he had a wife and many children, and expected daily to be ſequeſtered, yet he continued his uſual liberality

(m) Lloyd, ubi ſupra.

(n) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 86, 87.

" in ſimplicity of heart beleeve the Roman religion, " and profeſſe it; but we underſtand onely thoſe, " who either have not ſufficient meanes to finde the " truth, or elſe ſuch as after the uſe of the beſt " meanes they can have, all things conſidered, finde " not ſufficient motives to convince their conſcience, " that they are in errour. But they that have un- " derſtanding and meanes to diſcover their errour, and " neglect to uſe them, wee dare not flatter them " with ſo eaſy a cenſure; and much leſſe them, that " dare profeſſe the religion of the Church of Rome, " when they do not beleeve it; or onely beleeve it, " becauſe ſome carnal or worldly reſpect doth blinde " or miſleade their underſtanding." He afterwards treats of the diſſentions of Proteſtants among themſelves; and proves, that they do not differ in any point fundamental. In the fourth ſection he treats of the nature of Hereſy, and obſerves, that the Church may declare an hereſy, but cannot make any doctrine heretical properly, unleſs it be ſuch in the matter of it. All neceſſary truth, ſays he (24), is contained in ſcripture, which is the rule, according to which the Church is to judge (25) of truth and errour. Her declaration is only to fetch out that truth, which is in the ſcripture; her expoſition of the text muſt not be an addition to it: it is a faulty and erroneous declaration, which inſtead of declaring, gives another and a contrary ſenſe. Neither is any doctrine neceſſary or true, becauſe the Church declares it ſuch, but becauſe it is ſuch in itſelfe by warrant of ſcripture. He then obſerves, that the words Hereſy and Heretick are very ambiguous, and ſhews how they were commonly uſed by the antient Fathers; and makes ſome remarks on their catalogues of Hereticks. He tells us what conſtitutes a Church, and obſerves (26), that " it ſeemeth to " ſome (27) men of great learning and judgment " (but herein I had rather leave the Reader to his " judgment, than interpoſe mine own) that all, who " profeſſe to love and honour Jeſus Chriſt, (though " it be in much weakeneſs and with many errours, " yet) are in the viſible Chriſtian Church, and by " Catholiques to be reputed brethren. Or to the " ſame purpoſe; whereſoever (ſay they) a company " of men do joyntly and publiquely profeſſe the ſub- " ſtance of Chriſtian religion, which is, Faith in " Jeſus Chriſt the ſonne of God, and Saviour of the " world, with ſubmiſſion to his doctrine in minde and " will; there is a Church, wherein ſalvation may " bee had, notwithſtanding any corruption of judg- " ment or practice; yea, although it be of that na- " ture, that it may ſeeme to fight with the very " foundation, and ſo hainous, as that in reſpect there- " of, the people ſtained with this corruption, are " worthy to be abhorred of all men, and unworthy " to be called the Church of God." He adds ſeveral illuſtrations and proofs, which are brought by thoſe learned men, to aſſert the ſaid poſition, viz. that to beleeve in Jeſus Chriſt the ſonne of God and Saviour of the world, with ſubmiſſion to his doctrine in minde and will, is ſufficient to conſtitute a Church, wherein ſalvation may be had. In the fifth ſection he ſhews, that divine revelation is the principal motive and laſt object, into which faith ſupernatural is reſolved; and that the teſtimony and miniſtry of the Church is of great uſe for the begetting of faith; but that the Church hath not an authority unlimited and abſolutely infallible in all her doctrines, as ſome Romaniſts pretend, though others of them reaſonably and fairly limit the Church's infallibility. That the Church Univerſal is infallible in fundamental doctrines, but not ſo in points of leſs moment. That general Councils are not abſolutely freed from all error. Such a Councell, ſays he (28), is but an aſſembly of men, and thoſe ſometimes not of the moſt able and ſufficient. The Church Univerſall may have many more able members out of the Councell, then ſhe hath in it. For though that repreſenting body have all the legall power or binding ſtrength of the whole; yet it hath not all the natural power or wiſdom, which is in the whole. The Catholique Church cannot poſſibly communicate her ſtrength or power in that kinde to any Councell. Yet ſuppoſe the beſt men to be in that meeting, even they are but men, when all is done; neither all of them equall in the endowments of nature or grace, nor any of them perfect, being every one ſubject to all the infirmities and paſſions, which attend our nature. Their meeting then cannot make them infallible in all things, though the act, that is hammered out by ſo many heats, muſt needs in reaſon be perfecter, then that which is the iſſue of one man's ſufficiency. But happily they are infallibly aſſiſted! No doubt the holy infallible ſpirit aſſiſts at all ſuch holy meetings; but how far, or in what manner, is all the doubt. The good ſpirit ever aſſiſts the endeavours of the devout and diligent, ſo far as is neceſſarie, and is ready to guide them that are deſirous to be guided by him. But his guidance is not a violent rapture, or a wilde enthuſiaſme; but in ſearches of truth he ever directs to the infallible rule of truth, the ſcripture. And it is poſſible, that a general Councell may miſapply, or miſunderſtand, or neglect that rule weakly or wilfully, and ſo erre, notwithſtanding the ſpirit's aſſiſtance. He then treats of the Pope, whom the Romaniſts call the Church virtuall; and obſerves how his flatterers ſpeak of his authority; and ſhews, that no Roman Catholick can be aſſured of his infallibility, which is, at the moſt and beſt, but problematical by their own principles. In the ſixth Section he remarks, that the diſſentions in the Church of Rome are of greater importance than any among the Reformed. That the Roman Catholicks differ not only in opinion, but in matters of their faith, as about the Pope's authority; and that the Popes themſelves differ about their vulgar Latin bibles. That the diſcords among them are uncharitably purſued. That implicit faith in ſome points and in ſome men is admitted; and what it is which Proteſtants diſlike in that reſpect in the doctrine of the Romaniſts. " We will yeild, ſays he (29), that in " matters of great difficulty, and not of ſuch abſolute " neceſſity, a general, infolded, or virtuall beleefe " may ſuffice to ſome perſons, who either want capa- " city or means of better inſtruction, ſo as they dili- " gently and conſcionably endeavour to encreaſe " their knowledge, not affecting ignorance, and " withall carry an humble preparation of minde to " beleeve diſtinctly and particularly any truth, when " it is cleered unto them out of the word of God. . . " The things we diſlike in the doctrine of implicite " faith, as it is delivered by ſome Roman Doctors, " are ſpecially two. 1. They teach, that implicite " faith alone and of itſelfe may ſuffice to ſalvation, " without any diſtinct knowledge, or explicite faith, " of any article in the Creed. . . . 2. They make " this implicite faith to reſt itſelfe, not on the Scrip- " ture, the onely foundation and rule of faith, but

(24) p. 99.

(25) Κριτὴν ἁμαρτοῦν ὁ Κανὼν, Ariſt. lib. 1. de Anim. See the learned Anſwer to Fiſher's Relation of his three Confer. p. 9.

(26) p. 113.

(27) Mr. Hooker, lib. 3. § 1. Thomas Morton, Of the Church, cap. 1. § 4. & cap. 7. § 10.

(28) p. 165, 166, 167.

Matt. xviii. 20.

(29) p. 198, & ſeq.

lity to them; having on hearing Dr. Hammond's ſermon at St. Paul's, experimented the truth of the Doctor's aſſertion, that charity to the poor was the way to grow rich (o). He tranſlated into Engliſh from the Italian, Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Quarrels of Pope Paul V. with the State of Venice, printed at London 1626 in 4to; and he had lying by him at his death ſeveral manuſcripts fit to be printed; among which was one entitled, A Survey of the Platform of Predeſtination; which coming into the hands of Dr. William Twiſſe of Newbury, was anſwered by him, as alſo three Letters of our Author concerning that ſubject.

(o) Lloyd, ubi ſupra.

" on the Church, ſtill meaning by the Church, (not " the Church Catholique, or any ſound member of " it, but) onely to the Church of Rome, that is, the " Pope aſſiſted with ſome few of his Cardinals and " Prelats." In the ſeventh and laſt Section he ſhews, that the diſtinction between doctrines fundamental and not fundamental is moſt neceſſary, and is grounded in reaſon and ſcripture. By fundamental doctrines, ſays he (30), we meane ſuch Catholique Verities, as principally and eſſentially pertaine to the faith; ſuch as principally conſtitute a Church, and are neceſſary in ordinary courſe to be diſtinctly beleeved by every Chriſtian, that will be ſaved. Other points of truth are called not fundamental, becauſe they are not of ſuch abſolute neceſſity, and doe not primarily belong to the Unity of Faith, or to the eſſence of a Church, or to the ſalvation of a Chriſtian. Such as, for their ſubtilty and profoundneſſe, are very diſputable in themſelves, and happily by plaine ſcripture indeterminable; ſuch finally as may admit an ἐπίχω, or a non liquet; both ignorance, if it be not affected, and errour, if it proceed not from negligence or wilfulneſſe, without perill. He then obſerves, that the Creed of the Apoſtles, as it is explained in the latter Creeds of the Catholic Church, is eſteemed a ſufficient ſummary or catalogue of fundamentals by the beſt learned Romaniſts and by antiquity. " For " how can it be neceſſary, ſays he (31), for any " Chriſtian to have more in his Creed, than the " Apoſtles had, and the Church of their times? " May the Church of after-ages make the narrow " way to Heaven narrower than our Saviour left it? " Shall it be a fault to ſtreiten and encomber the " King's highway with publique nuiſances; and is " it lawfull, by adding new articles to the faith, " to retrench any thing from the latitude of the " King of Heaven's highway to eternall happineſſe? " The Yoke of Chriſt, which he ſaid was eaſie, may " it juſtly be made heavier by the Governours of the " Church in after-ages? The Apoſtles profeſſe, they " revealed to the Church the (32) whole Councell of " God, keeping back nothing needful for our Salvation: " what tyranny then to impoſe any new unneceſſary " matters in the faith of Chriſtians, eſpecially (as " the late Popes have done) under that high com- " manding forme, Qui non crediderit, damnabitur? . . " All that can be replyed to this diſcourſe is this, " that the whole faith of thoſe times is not contained " in the Apoſtle's Creed; which is all one, as if a " man ſhould ſay, This is not the Apoſtle's Creed, but a " part of it. For the Apoſtles and the Church of " their times in giving it this name, doe they not " plainly tell us, that the ſumme and ſubſtance of " their Credenda is comprized in it? For to call it a " Creed, and to leave out of it any neceſſary article " of faith, what had it been but to deceive the world? " The antient Church appointing her infants to be " inſtructed (for matter of beleefe) (33) onely in the " Creed; and admitting her Catechumens, upon " their profeſſion of the Creed, to Baptiſme, and into " the number of the Faithfull; and exacting of " ſtrangers the ſame profeſſion, before they could be re- " ceived into the communion of the Catholiques; did " ſhe not by all this evidently declare her judgment, " that the profeſſion of this Creed, and theſe articles " alone, was an abſolute profeſſion of the Catholique " faith?" He next anſwers the exceptions of his antagoniſt againſt the confeſſion of the Church of England. This book of our Author was replied to by Mr. Knott in 1634, in a treatiſe intitled, Mercy and Truth. Or Charity maintayned by Catholiques. By way of reply upon an anſwer lately framed by D. Potter to a treatiſe, which had formerly proved, that charity was miſtaken by Proteſtants: with the want whereof Catholiques are unjuſtly charged, for affirming, that Proteſtancy unrepented deſtroyes Salvation. Divided into two parts. Mr. Chillingworth undertook to anſwer that reply, which he did in 1637 in his celebrated book, entitled, The Religion of Proteſtants, a ſafe Way to Salvation: Or an Anſwer to a Booke, entitled, Mercy and Truth; or Charity maintained by Catholiques, which pretends to prove the contrary. T.

(30) p. 211, 212.

(31) p. 221.

(32) Acts xx. 27.

(33) De conſecr. diſt. can. Ante viginti, & Symbolum, & Baptizandos, &, Non liceat.

☞ POTTER (FRANCIS), a learned Engliſh Divine, ſon of Mr. Richard Potter, a native of Oxfordſhire, and Vicar of Meyre in Wiltſhire, was born in the Vicarage-houſe there on Trinity Sunday 1594, and educated in grammar learning in the King's ſchool at Worceſter under Mr. Henry Bright. He became a Commoner of Trinity College in Oxford under his elder brother Hannibal Potter in the latter end of the year 1609 (a). July the 8th 1613 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts (b), June the 26th 1615 that of Maſter (c); and July the 8th 1625 that of Bachelor of Divinity (d). He continued a cloſe ſtudent in his College till the death of his father in 1637; and then ſucceeding him in the Rectory of Kilmington, left the Univerſity, and retired to his living, where he lived in a very retired manner till his death (e). In 1642 he publiſhed at Oxford in 4to, a treatiſe entitled, An Interpretation of the number 666. Wherein not onely the manner how this number ought to be interpreted is clearly proved and demonſtrated; but it is alſo ſhewed, that this number is an exquiſite and perfect character truly, exactly, and eſſentially aeſcribing that State of Government, to which all other Notes of Antichriſt do agree. With all knowne objections ſolidly and fully anſweared, that can be materially made againſt it [A]. It was afterwards tranſlated into French, Dutch, and Latin; and the Latin Verſion was done by ſeveral hands. One copy was all or moſtly

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 612, 613. 2d edit.

(b) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 394.

(c) Id. col. 202.

(d) Id. col. 232.

(e) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

[A] In 1642 he publiſhed at Oxford in 4*to, a treatiſe, entitled,* An Interpretation of the Number 666, &c.]

There is prefixed to it the following judgment of Mr. Joſeph Mede upon the treatiſe: " This diſcourſe " or tract of the number of the beaſt is the happieſt, " that ever yet came into the world, and ſuch as " cannot be read (ſave of thoſe that perhaps will not " beleeve it) without much admiration. The ground " hath been harped on before, namely, that that " number was to be explicated by ſome ἀντιστοιχίαι " to the number of the Virgin-company and new " Hieruſalem, which type the true and Apoſtolical " Church, whoſe number is always derived from XII. " But never did any worke this principal to ſuch a " wonderfull diſcovery, as this Author hath done, " namely, to make this number not onely to ſhew " the manner and property of that ſtate, which was moſtly performed by Mr. Tho. Gilbert, of Edmund Hall in Oxford, and printed at Amſterdam 1677, in 8vo; part of the Latin tranſlation is inſerted in the ſecond part of the fourth volume of Poole's Synopſis Criticorum. Our Author's treatiſe was attacked by Mr. Lambert Morehouſe, Miniſter of Preſtwood, about ſix miles from Kilmington, who aſſerts, that 25 is not the true, but propinque root of 666. Mr. Potter wrote a Reply to him. Mr. Morehouſe gave a manuſcript copy of this diſpute to Dr. Seth Ward, Biſhop of Sarum, in 1668. Our Author, while he was very young, had a good talent at drawing and painting, and the Founder's picture in the Refectory of Trinity College is of his copying. He had likewiſe an excellent genius for Mechanicks, and made ſeveral inventions for raiſing of water, and water-engines; which being communicated to the Royal Society, about the time of its firſt eſtabliſhment, were highly approved of, and he was admitted a Member of that Society. Mr. Wood likewiſe obſerves (f), that about the year 1640, "he entertained the notion of curing diſeaſes by "transfuſion of blood out of one man into another; the hint whereof came into his head "from Ovid's ſtory of Medea and Jaſon. Which matter he communicating to "the Royal Society about the time of its firſt erection, it was entered into their books. "But this way of transfuſion having (as it is ſaid) been mentioned long before by Andr. "Libavius, our Author Potter (who I dare ſay never ſaw that Writer) is not to be "eſteemed

(f) Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

"to be that beaſt, but to deſigne the city, wherein "he ſhould reigne; the figure and compaſſe thereof; "the number of gates, Cardinall titles or Churches, "St. Peter's Altar, and I know not how many more "the like. I read the book at firſt with as much "prejudice againſt the numerical ſpeculation as might "be, and almoſt againſt my will, having met with "ſo much vanitie formerly in that kinde. But by the "time I had done, it left me poſſeſt with as much "admiration, as I came to it with prejudice." In the Epiſt. to the Reader dated at Kilmington Mar. 27 1642, our author obſerves that he had not publiſhed this treatiſe haſtily, and unadviſedly, but upon mature, or at leaſt upon long deliberation; and divers yeares, ſays he, have now paſſed, ſince ſome chiefe ſubſtantial points of it were publiquely declared and defended in the divinity ſchoole at Oxford; and neither then nor at any time ſince, could I ever heare or learne any reaſon, that could be brought againſt it, which might cauſe me to doubt of the probability or truth of it..... Concerning the interpretation itſelfe, it ſuppoſeth this number 666 to be an image and typicall repreſentation of the whole body of Antichriſt, that is, of the whole body of his Kingdome, State, and Hierarchy; and thus much is generally acknowledged by many writers, and eſpecially by Cotterius, who layeth this as a certaine ground, by which the true interpretation of this number ought to be tried and examined. Now if this number be an image and type of the whole body of Antichriſt, then no man ought to imagine, that the whole image of Antichriſt is like unto any one particular member or part of the body of Antichriſt; for as the whole image of Cæſar is not like unto the hand of Cæſar, nor like unto the head of Cæſar; ſo neither is this number, being conſidered wholly, applicable to any particular times, names, perſons, places, or other individuall things or circumſtances belonging unto Antichriſt, as divers interpreters have endeavoured to apply it. But he that deſireth to know Cæſar by his image, muſt compare head to head, face to face, eye to eye, hand to hand, and foot to foot; and ſo conclude a likeneſſe in generall from an induction of particulars. In like manner he that deſires to know Antichriſt by this number, muſt firſt finde in this number, being conſidered as an abſolute number, ſuch things as are moſt eſſential and remarkable in it, and ſuch things, by which this number is diſtinguiſhed from all other numbers; and theſe being found out, muſt be compared with thoſe things, that are moſt eſſentiall and remarkable in that State or Government, which is Antichriſt, and with thoſe things, by which Antichriſt is diſtinguiſhed from all other States and Governments whatſoever. Now the root and figure of every number are thoſe things, which are moſt eſſential and remarkable in it; and by one or both of theſe every number is diſtinguiſhed from all other numbers. In theſe doe the eſſentiall properties of all numbers conſiſt; and upon theſe chiefly doe all the myſteries depend, which S. Auguſtine, and divers other ſacred and profane Writers have obſerved to be in numbers. "And concerning thoſe things, which are moſt eſ- "ſential and remarkable in the Kingdome of An- "tichriſt, to and with which the root and figure of "this number being found out, is to be applied and "compared; the ſcriptures themſelves doe infalli- "bly guide and direct unto them by an actuall appli- "cation of the root and figure of an oppoſite number "unto ſuch particulars, as are moſt remarkably an- "ſwerable and oppoſite to them. As for the find- "ing out of the root and figure of the number 666, "this cannot be done but by a kinde of calculation "or computation of the number itſelfe; wherefore it "is ſaid in the text, ὁ ἔχων τὸν νοῦν ψηφισάτω τὸν ἀριθμὸν "τοῦ θηρίου, Let him that hath underſtanding, count the "number of the beaſt, that ſo he may finde out the "root and figure of it, by which the root and "foundation of Antichriſt's Hierarchie, his originall, "his city, ſtate, doctrine, and many other particulars "are manifeſtly revealed. And this is the effect of "the following interpretation, which dependeth "chiefly of the extraction of the root of the number "666, as the words of the text doe neceſſarily im- "ply, that the right interpretation ſhould doe." This work contains the following particulars. 1. The probability of the following interpretation, briefly and generally propoſed; the opinion of numeral letters being almoſt wholly rejected. 2. That the myſtery of the number 144, which is the number oppoſed to 666, conſiſts in the ſquare root of it, which is 12; and that therefore the myſtery of 666 muſt be in the ſquare root of it alſo. 3. The manner of the interpretation more clearly yet curſorily propoſed; with an introduction to the true interpretation of the number 144, and the meaſures of the new Jeruſalem. 4. A diſquiſition concerning the interpretation of the 16th and 17th verſes of the 21ſt chapter of the Revelations, and a new expoſition of the meaſures of the new Jeruſalem. 5. A farther confirmation of the preceding interpretation of the new meaſures of the new Jeruſalem. 6. The interpretation of the meaſure of the wall of the new Jeruſalem, or of the 144 cubits. 7. A farther confirmation of the ſolid and ſquare meaſures abovenamed, ſhewing that the like meaſures are uſed in other places of ſcriptures. 8. The reaſon why the new Jeruſalem is meaſured by the ſolid and ſquare meaſures only. That the meaſure and ſtructure of the wall, and the number, by which it is expreſſed, both typically repreſent the Hierarchy of the Church of Chriſt. The concluſion of this digreſſion concerning the meaſures and numbers of the new Jeruſalem. 9. That thoſe Writers, who make the myſtery of the number 144 to conſiſt in the root of it, ought alſo to have extracted the ſquare root of the number 666. That the extraction of the ſquare root is an antient and uſeful invention, by which many famous myſteries have been found out. 10. What the counting of the number is. What is meant by the firſt beaſt, the ſecond beaſt, and the image of the beaſt mentioned Revel. chap. xiii. That by counting the beaſt's number, ſome other number ought to be found out beſides the number 666. 11. What it is to extract the ſquare root of a number. That 25 is the number, that is the root of 666, and remarkably oppoſed to 12. Some objections concerning the fractions of the root of

"esteemed the first Inventor of that notion, nor Dr. Richard Lower, but rather an Ad-"vancer." He fell blind before his death, and died at Kilmington about April 1678, and was buried in the chancel of the church there. His memory is preserved in Trinity College by a dial, which he made and set up on the north side of the old quadrangle.

of 666. 12. That the number 25 hath been conceived to be a fatal and unfortunate number by such as knew no relation that it had to Antichrist, or to the number 666. 13. Of the nature and quality of those particulars, in which the root and the figure of the beast's number is to be applied to the Papacy. 14. That Rome is answerable to Jerusalem, and the Pope's Cardinals to Christ's Apostles. 15. That the first number of Cardinals, according to their first institution and foundation, is chiefly to be considered as that, which most remarkably characterizes Antichrist in his original. 16. A disquisition concerning other particulars, to which the number 12 is applied in the description of the new Jerusalem, and particularly of the 12 gates, 12 tribes, and 12 angels. 17. Of such particulars in the mystical Babylon as are ἀντιστοίχα to the gates, tribes, angels, and foundations of the new Jerusalem. 18. Of such things as are answerable to the measure of 12000 furlongs, and the 12 kinds of fruits growing on the tree of life. The conclusion of all, that hath been said concerning the antithesis of things in general, as it is distinguished from that antithesis of numbers, which is next to be proved. 19. That the first decreed and limited number of Cardinals and Parish Priests in Rome was 25; and that the first number of churches for baptism, and parishes, was 25 also. 20. That the number of the gates of Rome was 25. 21. That as 12000 furlongs are the solid measure of a cube, whose perimeter is equal to the compass of the new Jerusalem; so 25000 furlongs are the solid measure of a cube, whose perimeter is equal in compass to the city of Rome. 22. That the Popish creed consists of 25 articles, as the Apostles creed doth of 12. 23. The conclusion, which follows upon the chief part of the application above proved, and some necessary and remarkable observations concerning it. 24. A brief and cursory recital of some other less remarkable particulars, in which the number 25 is remarkably applicable to the city and Church of Rome. 25. That the number 25 is remarkable in divers things pertaining to St. Peter's Church in Rome. Of the measures of St. Peter's altar, and the characters imprinted upon it and other Popish altars. 26. That the number 25 is an affected symbolical device among the Papists. Of the mass of Christ's five wounds five times multiplied and repeated. Of their jubilees, and affectation of the twenty-fifth day of the month. 27. Objections answered concerning the fractions of the root 666. That the root of 666 is more exactly applicable to the Papacy, than the root of any square number could have been. 28. A farther and full answer to all objections about the root of 666, drawn from the consideration of the figure of that number, by which the figure of the city of Rome is exactly expressed. 29. Objections answered, and difficulties cleared, (even to such as have no knowledge of Arithmetick) concerning those solid figures and numbers, by which the several measures of the compass of Rome and the new Jerusalem may be found out. Some other objections also briefly answered. T.

(a) Euseb. in Chron.

(b) And by contraction Dicarchia. The Latin Poets have called it by that name, even after it was called Puteoli.

(c) Strabo, lib. 5.

(d) Livius, lib. 24.

(e) Livius, lib. 33. and 34. See also the Inscription transcribed by Andrew Schot in Itinerario Italiæ, part. 3.

POZZUOLO, in Latin Puteoli, a city of the Kingdom of Naples, has nothing left of its antient splendor, but a few inconsiderable remains. It was built by the Samians in the 4th year of the 64th Olympiad, which was the 232d year after the building of Rome (a). It was called Dicæarchia (b). It belonged for some time to those of Cumæ, who made their port of it (c). The Romans conquered it during the second Punick war, in the year of Rome 538, and put a strong garrison there (d). Twenty years after they erected it into a colony, and changed its name into that of Puteoli (e) [A]. It was one of the best ports they had on that sea [B]. It became very considerable by the beauty of the publick buildings, that were raised there (f), I mean, by its temples, by its rings, by its theatres, and by its amphitheatres. The country-seats, which the richest citizens of Rome, and Cicero among others, built in the neighbourhood of that city, contributed more still to raise its fame (g). Some assert, that its people were more esteemed than those of Tyre [C]. I say nothing of its baths; all the world knows that they were very much celebrated [D]; and so they are still. Augustus (b) and Nero (i) sent new colonies thither. That city was burnt to ashes by Alaric, in the year 410 of the Christian Æra, (f) See the Antiquities of Pozzuolo, written by Scipio Mazzella.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(b) Frontinus, de Colon.

(i) Tacit. Annal. lib. 14.

[A] Into that of Puteoli.] Either because of the great number of wells, or on account of the bad smell of the hot waters (1).

(1) Strabo, lib. 5.

[B] It was one of the best ports the Romans had on that sea.] This was the staple town of the ships that came from Alexandria. Read these words from Seneca. Subito hodie nobis Alexandrinæ naves apparuerunt, quæ præmitti solent & nunciare secuturæ classis adventum: tabellarias vocant. Gratus illorum Campaniæ adspectus est: omnis in pilis Puteolorum turba consistit. . . . . In hoc omnium discursu properantium ad littus, magnam ex pigritia mea sensi voluptatem (2). i. e. "The ships "from Alexandria have appeared to us to day all on "a sudden, they are sent before to bring advice of "the fleet's coming. They call them advice-boats. "Their sight is very acceptable to the inhabitants of "Campania. The whole mob of Puteoli is got to-"gether. . . . . In that great concourse of people "who run to the sea-shore, I am very well pleased "with my laziness, which keeps me at home."

(2) Seneca, Ep. 77. init. Compare this with what Suetonius observes, in Augusto, cap. 98.

[C] Some assert that its purple was more esteemed than that of Tyre.] Scipio Mazzella pretends it, and quotes Pliny for it; and yet it is certain that Pliny does not speak of this purple, but of a kind of vermilion, in which purple was one of the ingredients. Here follow Mazzella's words. Fù da gli antichi tenuta in gran stima la purpura, che si faceva in Pozzuolo, che per la bontà & eccellenza sua avanzava quelle di Tirio, de Getulico, e del Laconico, ch'erano purpure pretiosissime. Di che Plin. nel 35. lib. al. 6. capo della purpura parlando così scrive. Quare Puteolanum potius laudatur, quàm Tyrium aut Getulicum, unde preciosissimæ purpuræ (3). He ought to have considered, that the word Puteolanum must be referred to purpurissimum à creta argentaria, which Pliny had been just mentioning. The women used it to paint their fans with (4).

(3) Scipione Mazzella, Anticbita di Pozzuolo, p. 6 and 7. edit. Napol. 1606, in 8vo.

[D] Its baths . . . . . were very much celebrated.] See John Elisius the Physician's treatise de Balneis Puteolanis, corrected and improved by Scipio Mazzella: it is printed at the end of the Antiquities of Pozzuolo. We meet there with some Latin verses written by Alcadinus, in praise of those baths. This Alcadinus was born at Siracusa, and was sent by his father to Salerno to study there. He made such a progress in Philosophy and in Physick, that from a scholar he was soon raised to the condition of a Professor of these two sciences. The reputation he gained in physick made several Princes wish to have him at their Court. He cured the Emperor Henry IV. who was fallen dangerously ill in the Kingdom of Naples. From that time he was very much beloved by that Emperor, who loaded him with presents. After Henry's death he applied himself to the Emperor Frederic II. and at his request he composed the verses I have men-

(4) Quiaque istas buccas tam belle purpurissatas habes. Plautus, in Trucul. Act. 2. scen. 2. ver. 35. See the same also in Mostell. act. 1. sc. 3. ver. 101.

Æra, and by Genſeric in the year 455 (k): fourſcore and ten years after, or thereabout, it was taken by Totila, who cauſed the walls of it to be pulled down, and who ſacked and plundered it in ſo furious a manner, that it continued ſixteen years uninhabited. The Greeks having rebuilt it, it began to be peopled again by degrees, ſo that it was a pretty good Town, when Romauld II. of that name, Duke of Benevento, took it in the year 715, and laid it waſte with fire and ſword. It was plundered by the Hungarians in the tenth century. After having often changed its maſter, it fell at laſt under the dominion of Alfonſus of Aragon, King of Naples, in the 15th century. Earthquakes have made a ſtrange havock in that city at ſeveral times, and eſpecially in the year 1538 (l). The paſſage, in which Gaſſendi has mentioned it, gives me an opportunity to take notice of a miſtake of his Epitomizer [E]. I ſhall alſo ſpeak of a blunder of Benjamin of Tudela [F]. There is a reference in Moreri, which ought to have been corrected (m).

(k) Scip. Mazzella, Antiquit. de Pozzuolo.

(l) Extracted from the ſame Scipione Mazzella.

(m) Puzzole, ſee Puzzole. It ſhould have been, See Ponzol, or Puzzuolo.

tioned. He flouriſhed in the year 1191, and lived fifty two years (5). Thomas Bartholin has omitted him in his liſt of the Phyſicians who were Peots at the ſame time.

(5) Extracted from Scipione Mazzella, de Balneis Puteolani, p. 260.

[E] A miſtake of his Epitomizer.] Gaſſendi relates, that earthquakes produce ſometimes mountains in the continent and iſlands in the ſea. With regard to the mountains he relates what happened near Pozzuolo in the year 1538. Mirabilius videri poteſt, ſays he (6), *enaſci ex oppoſito non modo in Continentibus montes, ſed etiam in medio mari inſulas. Nam de Montibus quidem facit fidem Puteolanus ille, quem Simon Portius * ita deſcribit, ut fuerit una nocte ad pluſquam M. paſſuum altitudinem, ex pumicibus, cineribuſque congeſtus; id nempe ſub finem Septembris anni* M.D.XXXVIII. Though Monſieur Bernier was a learned man, yet he miſtook in this paſſage a thing which is very plain: he did not obſerve, that Puteolanus muſt be referred to terræ motus, and made an Author of it. What is not leſs ſurprizing, ſays he (7), is to ſee mountains ariſe in one night, which are made up of Pumice ſtones and aſhes, in the midſt of the continent, as Puteolanus relates. This puts me in mind of the Hexameron ruſtique, in which it is obſerved that Du Pinet . . . . . made two Roman Gentlemen out of two kinds of marbles (8), and that Coeffeteau (9) wrote the Captain Corſinius inſtead of the city of Corſinium.

(6) Gaſſendus, Phyſicæ ſect. 3. membro 1. lib. 1. cap. 6. p. 50. Oper. Tom. 2.

* Epiſt. de conſt. agri Put.

(7) Bernier, Abrege de la Philoſophie de Gaſſendi, Tom. 5. p. 227. Edit. of Lyons 1684.

(8) See above, quot. (26) of the art. PINEL.

(9) In chap. 18. of the 3d book of his tranſlation of Florus.

[F] I ſhall . . . . ſpeak of a blunder of Benjamin of Tudela.] He aſſerts, not only that the city of Puteoli was antiently called Surrentum, but alſo that it was built by Tſintſan Hadar-Ezer, who dreading King David, had made his eſcape. Ulterius profectus fui Puteolos quondam Surentum dictam, urbem magnam, quam olim condidit Tſintſan Hadar-Ezer, quum metu Davidis regis (in pace quieſcentis) aufugiſſet (10). Theſe two falſities had already been obſerved by Mazzella (11), and by Conſtantine l'Empereur (12), and afterwards again by Pinedo (13), who obſerves that this Tſintſan Hadar-Ezer is mentioned in the third verſe of the eighth chapter of the ſecond book of Samuel, and that the ſpurious Joſephus ſon of Gorion relates the ſame ſtory in the third chapter of his firſt book. You ſee there the genius of the Jewiſh nation, and even of all others. Every nation imagines, that their great men have been the cauſe of numberleſs events in the remoteſt countries. David, whoſe name was unknown in Italy till the Romans read Joſephus, and who lived about three centuries before the building of Rome, ſtruck Romulus with ſuch a terror, if we may believe Benjamin, that this founder of Rome dug a road fifteen miles long under the mountains of Pozzuolo, in order to hide himſelf. Hinc per milliaria quindecim ſub montibus iter conficiter. Operis author eſt Romulus, qui Romam condidit, atque hæc omnia fecit, cum ſibi à Davide Iſraëlitarum rege & Joabo exercitus duce metueret. Alia etiam cum ſupra, tum infra montes urbis Neapolis exſtruxit (14). Here follows Conſtantine l'Empereur's note: it contains an exclamation, which is not too ſtrong conſidering that Rabbi's impertinence. " Who would " not be angry at this, ſays he, and how would the " Jews abuſe us if we were guilty of ſuch miſtakes!" Quis ad tantum ſtuporem non obſtupeſcat? coætaneos facit Davidem & Romulum, quum trecentis circiter annis poſt Davidem regnare cæperit. Quod in dubium vocari non poteſt; ſed ex diverſis hiſtoricis conſtat, & paſſim à Chronologis obſervatum, quorum verba repetere neceſſe non eſt in tanta luce. Huic parallelum eſt, quum Romulum talparum more in terram ac longiſſimas ſpecus ſe recepiſſe fingit, ſive eas metu Davidis, qui ante aliquot ſecula mortem obierat, excavaſſe ſcribit. Quis ad hujuſmodi non ſtomachetur? ſi nos ita aberraremus, quàm ſuperbe nobis Judæi inſultarent (15).

(10) Benjam. Itiner. p. 14. edit. Lugd. Bat. 1633.

(11) Mazzella, Antichita di Pozzuolo, p. 4, 5.

(12) L'Empereur, Notis in Benjam. Itiner. p. 159.

(13) Pinedo, in Stephanum Byzantium, Voce Δικαιάρχεια, p. 236.

(14) Benjam. Itiner. p. 15.

(15) L'Empereur, Notis in Benjam. Itiner. p. 159.

PRADILLHON (JOHN BAPTIST), born in the Limouſin, " retired very " young into the ſolitude of Feuillans, an Abbey, ſituated in the dioceſe of Rieux, and " on which ſeveral others depend. The Monks were ſoon acquainted with his merit; " he was but twenty-five, when he had already a ſhare in the Government of the con- " vent, and at the age of forty he became the Arbiter and Head of it. He was four " times choſen for that poſt; and the eſteem and inclination the Monks had for him, " would have continued him always in that employment, had it not been inconſiſtent " with their laws (a). . . . He died at Paris in his monaſtery in the ſtreet of St. Ho- " noré, September the 25th, 1701 (b)." I ſhall obſerve ſomething concerning the works he has publiſhed [A].

(a) Mercure Galant, for October 1701, p. 253.

(b) Ibid. p. 263.

PRÆPOSITUS

[A] I ſhall obſerve ſomething concerning the works he has publiſhed.] " The intimate and free corre- " ſpondence he had at Rome with the learned Fag- " nanus, when he was Attorney General at that " Court, has procured us a book of the practice of " the Canon Law, which not only the Monks, but " even the other Clergymen often conſult, to deter- " mine the queſtions which relate to the diſcipline " of the Church. It is no eaſy matter to collect in- " to a large volume ſo many important ſubjects, with " ſo much order and clearneſs, as this ſmall volume " contains. The Nuns of the Order of St. Bernard at " Toulouſe are obligated to him for the diſcovery of " the ſecret and almoſt incredible auſterities of their " firſt Abbeſſes. The publick has approved his re- " lations (1)." He is the Author of a book entitled, La Conduite de Dom Jean de la Barriere, Premier Abbé de Feuillans, durant les troubles de la Ligue & ſon attachement au ſervice du Roy Henry III. i. e. " The " conduct of John de la Barriere, firſt Abbot of the " Feuillans, during the troubles of the league, and " his zeal for King Henry the Third's ſervice." This work was printed in the year 1699. The Journal des Savans for the 13th of September 1700 contains an account of it. Don Pradillhon took ſeveral journies for the ſervice of his congregation, which gave him acceſs to the moſt celebrated Records of the ſeveral Provinces of the Kingdom. As he was a very good judge of antient writings, and ſo honeſt as to be proof againſt any private intereſt whatſoever, the learned depended entirely on his bare extracts. The character, which the illuſtrious Monſieur Baluze gives him in his Popes of Avignon, is worth an whole elogium. The Nobles were willing to truſt him with the examination of their titles; which he had made his ſtudy during his leiſure hours: he was ſo modeſt, that he would never conſent that his manuſcripts on that ſubject ſhould be printed (2).

(1) Mercure Galant, for Octob. 1701. p. 255, 256.

(2) Mercure Galant, for Octob. 1701. p. 259, &c.

[A] He

PRÆPOSITUS (NICHOLAS), was a Physician of Tours, and wrote a dispensary, which is nothing but a downright Plagiarism, if we may credit the Author I shall quote hereunder [A]. Konig (a) styles him a Physician of Salerno, which is a mistake.

(a) In Bibliotb. vet. & nova, p. 661.

[A] He wrote a dispensary, which is nothing but a downright Plagiarism, if we may credit the Author whom I shall quote hereunder.] That Author's name is John de Renou; I have given his article. He tells us (1), that there have been four Physicians named Nicholas, and who wrote each of them a dispensary; that one of them named Præpositus, formerly a Physician at Tours, "did not scruple to rob "the other three of their reputation and labour, "by transcribing word for word, and pretending to "be the Author of the Antidotary of a certain antient Pharmacographer, named James des Parties (2), which was first compiled and transcribed by "Nicholas Myrepsus, and by other Antidotariographers, and has besides maliciously concealed the firname of the said Nicholas's, the better to hide "his manifest Plagiarism, prefixing only to the prescriptions he robbed from them the name of Nicholas, without mentioning the firnames of Nicholas Alexandrinus, Nicholas Florentinus, or Nicholas of Salerno, from whom he has extracted "(as they extracted from James des Parties) what he "falsely ascribes to himself." He has imposed upon many persons; for most of the Apothecaries look upon him as the true and genuine Author of all the barbarous and course physical compositions, which are contained in a certain common and trivial dispensary, to which he has prefixed his name and firname. But he has been so wicked as to prefix his own name only to one composition, to make the world believe that he is the Author of it, though the contrary be very well known. This may be of use to those writers, who will undertake to continue the catalogue of Plagiaries which Thomasius has begun.

(1) John de Renou, in the 6th book of the Antidotaire, ch. 5. p. 741. edit. de Lyons 1637. See also his Introduction à la Pharmacie, chap. 17. p. 489, and in his Preface, and in the 38 chap. of the 5th book of the Antidotaire, and in sundry other places.

(2) The Author of the Lindenius renovatus observes, p. 490, that Jacobus de Partibus, a Novice of Tournai, was Physician to Charles VII. K. of France, and to Philip Duke of Burgundy, and died, being a Canon of Tournai, about the year 1465. See the art. PARTS.

The Author of the Lindenius Renovatus (3) gives, from the Chronology of the Physicians written by Wolfgang Justus, that Nicholas Præpositus seems to be the same with Nicholas Myrepsus firnamed Alexandrinus, and that it is said he practised physick at Lyons towards the year 1364. Now this Wolfgang Justus said (4), that Nicolaus Myrepsus Alexandrinus, Præpositus alias dictus, lived among the modern Greeks about the year 1198, and (5) that Nicolaus Alexandrinus lived before Ægineta, that is to say, before the year 420 (6). Judge therefore whether that Author considered with attention what he wrote. We find in the Lindenius Renovatus (7), that the Dispensatorium Nicolai Præpositi ad Aromatarios, sive Introductiones in Artem Apothecariatus, was printed at Lyons in the year 1505, and in the year 1536 in 4to, and at Paris in the year 1582 in 4to.

(3) p. 842.

(4) Apud Lindenium renovatum, p. 840.

(5) Ibid. p. 820.

(6) Ibid. p. 865.

(7) p. 842.

PRAT (ANTHONY DU) Chancellor of France, and afterwards Cardinal, in the reign of Francis I. was born at Issoire in Auvergne. It is agreed, that he was a man of great abilities, but not that he was an honest man. He is blamed, among other things, for the concordate, made between Leo X. and Francis I. anno 1516. It is said that he thereby introduced into the Kingdom a pernicious custom [A], whereby the

[A] It is said that he . . . introduced by the concordate . . . . . a pernicious custom.] It being my design to collect some testimonies on this subject, I shall begin with the following words of a Jansenist (1). "The Chancellor Anthony du Prat, Cardinal, Archbishop of Sens, Bishop of Alby, Valence, Die and "Gap, and Abbot of Fleury, assembled (2), in the "convent of the great Austin Friers in Paris, the "Bishops of his province who attended the Court, and "there caused some ordinances to be read, made by "him for the explication of the Christian doctrine, "and for the discipline of the church, in opposition "to the errors of Luther, which at that time made a "great noise in Europe. . . . (3). This Prelate never "resided in any of his dioceses; nor ever performed "any of his episcopal functions, but that ordinance "against Martin Luther, Philip Melancthon, Oecolampadius, Zuinglius; for Calvin and Beza did "not make any noise yet. To this good Prelate is "ascribed the abolishing of the pragmatic sanction, "that is, the exact observation of the antient Canons in the Church of France; and of making "the concordate between Francis I. and Leo X. "which has destroyed all the apostolical discipline "in France; abolished the canonical elections, and "reduced the Church of France to a deplorable state "of captivity." The Archbishop of Ambrun sided with this Chancellor, and endeavoured to make the Jansenists odious at Court, as though, by disapproving the concordate, they envied his Majesty the advantages which accrued to him from it. They endeavoured, says he (4), to deprive the Crown of a singular advantage: they inveigh (p. 10.) of the first libel, against the concordate which was made between King Francis I. and Pope Leo X. To this good Prelate, say they, speaking of Chancellor du Prat, Cardinal and Archbishop of Sens, is ascribed the taking away of the pragmatick sanction, that is, the exact observation of the antient canons, &c. . . . . They bear an ill will to that great man, because that he, in a council held by him in his province of Sens, anno 1528, forbid the translation of the Bible into the vulgar tongue. These words were censured by one who was surprized (5) to hear him speak of the concordate in a manner so unworthy of his character. "He ought to have learned "from the most celebrated Historians, and the enquiries of the Clergy of France, with what eye "the Bishops, the Parliaments, and all persons of "probity have ever looked upon that treaty. He "ought not to have been ignorant, that, for a long "time, publick prayers have been long offered up "in several Churches, to beseech God that they "might be abolished, and the canonical elections "restored (6); as appears by various rituals, such as "that of Vannes, printed at Lyons, and by another "of Clermont, printed in 1608, by order of the late "Cardinal of Rochefoucaut. Lastly, since he, doubtless sets a great value upon the authority of the "Archbishop of Paris, he ought, at least, to have "spoke of him in the same terms as this Prelate "does in the life of Henry IV. where he relates, "page 229, that the general assembly of the Clergy, "held at Paris in 1599, made a strong remonstrance to "the King, whereby the Prelates entreated him not to "burthen his conscience with the nomination to Bishopricks, Abbies, and other benefices, with cure of souls. "And he should not have appeared less knowing than "such a Prince as Henry IV. who, though educated "in heretical principles, and in the field, did nevertheless answer this remonstrance of the Clergy, as "the Archbishop of Paris relates afterwards, viz. "that he was sensible, that the particulars they had observed to him, with regard to the nomination to "Bishopricks, were true, but that he was not the Author of that abuse." Let us also add the following passage (7). It is false to assert, that the Gentlemen of Port-Royal had reason to be disgusted at Chancellor du Prat, as though he had forbid translations in the vulgar tongue, in the Council of Sens anno 1528, "because he never made any such prohibition; he "only forbidding the printing of the sacred books "without leave first obtained from the ordinary; "which does not concern, in any manner, the translation of Mons, that being approved of by the ordinary of the place where it was printed. It is "also false to assert, that Cardinal du Prat ought to "be called a great man; and that the Author of the "Dialogues is to blame for speaking of him in the "manner he does; since that person must be altogether unacquainted with our History, who should "not know that no man was more inveighed against "by the Authors, his Contemporaries. Belcarius,

(1) Dialogue entre deux Parroissiens de St. Hilaire du Mont, sur les Ordonnances contre la Traduction de Mons, p. 37 of Tom. 1. of the pieces relating to that Translation.

(2) In 1528.

(3) Ibid. p. 38.

(4) Requete presentee au Roi par l'Archeveque d'Ambrun, p. 270, of the abovementioned volume.

(5) Remarks on the Requete of the Archbishop of Ambrun, p. 271, of the same volume.

(6) Quintin, making a speech for the Clergy, in the General Estates of the Kingdom, anno 1561, spoke in very strong terms for the restoring of elections. See President de la Place, Hist. de l'etat de la Religion & Repub. folio m. 143 verso & seq.

(7) Remarques sur la Requete de l'Archeveque d'Ambrun, p. 271.

the choice of Biſhops was transferred to the Court, which was the ready way for mitre to be beſtowed on perſons who were more of a worldly diſpoſition, than adorned with the knowledge and virtue requiſite in thoſe who are to have the care of ſouls: but to this it may be anſwered, that in the time when Biſhops came into the Church by election, the Church had as bad Paſtors as under the Concordate [B]. I can ſcarce prevail upon myſelf

" Biſhop of Mets, calls him the worſt of men: Bi
" pedum nequiſſimus; and charges him with cauſing
" the Sieur de Semblance to be ſentenced to die, by " corrupt judges. In all probability, it is of him * Lib. 3. " that Budæus makes the ſtrange elogium, * in the " beginning of his book entitled, Forenſia."

It is certain that moſt abominable abuſes were introduced into the collation to benefices, by means of the concordate; and hence it is, that, on the complaints of the three Eſtates of the Kingdom, aſſembled at Orleans in 1560, an ordinance was made, which, had it been obſerved, might have again ſettled things upon a very good foot. It runs thus. " All Arch-
" biſhops and Biſhops ſhall henceforward, immedi" ately upon the vacancy of a See, be elected and no" minated, viz. the Archbiſhops by the Biſhops of " the Province, and the Chapter of the Epiſcopal
" Church: the Biſhops by the Archbiſhop, and the " Biſhops of the Province, and the Canons of the E-
" piſcopal Church; together with twelve conſidera-
" ble Gentlemen, who ſhall be elected by the Nobi-
" lity of the dioceſe, and twelve conſiderable Citizens,
" who alſo ſhall be elected in the Town-houſe of the " Anti-epiſcopal or Epiſcopal City. Who being all
" convened, on a certain day, by the Chapter of the " vacant See, aſſembled, in manner aforeſaid, ſhall
" pitch upon three perſons, duly qualified according " to the holy Canons and Councils, and thirty years
" of age, at leaſt, whom they ſhall preſent to us; in " order for us to promote, to the vacant Archbiſhop-
" rick or Biſhoprick, one of the three, at our plea-
" ſure." In order that my Readers may know the evils, which it was thought would be remedied by this ordinance, I ſhall cite the words of a Commentator (8). " If the laws, both divine and human,
" had been obſerved by thoſe who profeſs them, or
" whoſe buſineſs it is to ſee them put in execution,
" this article might juſtly be conſidered as ſuperflu-
" ous; for the particulars mentioned in it, were regu" lated by holy ordinances, in the ſame manner as they " are here; but the calamity of the times, the bold-
" neſs of mankind, avarice, the credit of great men,
" had changed and depraved all things, which were " growing worſe and worſe, had not the good and
" ripe judgment of our Monarch, or his Council,
" prevented it. Ignorant and ſtupid wretches, by fa" vour, friendſhip, or money, got poſſeſſion of rich
" benefices, of the moſt exalted dignities in the " Church, and the richeſt Sees. And as theſe had " not the capacity nor experience to diſcern good
" from evil, but, ſo far from it, not to diſtinguiſh
" vice from virtue, they acted according to their lit" tle knowledge; nay, generally, ſome were choſen
" Biſhops, before they were completely formed in their " mother's womb, the ſad effects of which have been " felt throughout every part of Chriſtendom. The " poor afflicted people could not refrain from heavy
" murmurs, to ſee themſelves governed by ſuch men,
" their Vicars, or Suffragans, of the ſame ſtamp
" with themſelves; who raſhly laid upon God's " people intollerable burthens, which they them-
" ſelves would not touch with the top of their fin" gers; until the Lord opened the eyes, hearts and " mouths of the poor people, to ſee, ſpeak and
" complain, of the Princes to hear, and of the King
" to judge with juſtice and uprightneſs. Methinks
" we may juſtly form the ſame expectations of
" Charles IX. our King, as the Augurs or Sooth-
" ſayers did of Auguſtus; under whom the Monar" chy was ſo well governed, was ſo happy, and its " limits ſo greatly extended. It is manifeſt, from " this article, that perſons of virtue, integrity, and
" learning, will receive the reward of their labours;
" the ignorant will be rejected, and young people ex-
" cited to ſtrive to raiſe themſelves to the noble
" ſtage of virtue. Children ſucking at the breaſt
" will no longer be raiſed, as formerly, to the high-
" eſt dignities in the Church, which are too heavy
" for their weak ſhoulders; and are too heavy a
" digeſtion for their Stomachs, eſpecially in matters
" relating to religion, which requires that none
" ſhould be made choice of but perſons of the great-
" eſt worth, probity, chaſtity and piety, and whoſe
" fleſhly luſts are mortified and extinguiſhed either
" through age, or the love of God; for to commit
" the Government of the Church to ignorant per-
" ſons and children who are not able to govern
" even themſelves, is a ſtrange and extraordinary
" circumſtance; and no leſs contrary to laws both
" divine and human, than the appointing one pupil
" to be guardian of another, or for the blind to lead
" the blind. . . . . This good King Lewis XIII. ob-
" ſerving this fault to prevail among the Clergy in " his time, ſaid that aſſes were happier than horſes;
" for horſes (ſaid he) are obliged to ride poſt for be-
" nefices, whilſt many aſſes are preſented to them
" without having the leaſt trouble. For this reaſon
" people could not forbear rebuking them in a thou-
" ſand paſquinades and libels; and the following ver-
" ſes were writ on account of the loſs of the electi" ons, againſt thoſe who uſurped them, and ſuch as " unworthily poſſeſſed church preferments.

" Au temps paſſé l'Eſprit Saint eliſoit
" Ceux, dont ſouloit l'Egliſe eſtre ſervie.
" En ce temps-là, vertu fruit produiſoit:
" Car les eleuz eſtoyent de ſainte vie.
" Mais maintenant les mondains par envie
" Ont uſurpé la ſainte election,
" Dont s'en enſuy humaine affection:
" Et par ainſi tous vices procedez
" Sont des Paſteurs: qui nous ſont concedez
" Par les chevaux, par la poſte, & par dons.
" Trop mieux vauldroit les elire à trois dez:
" Car à l'hazard ils pourroyent eſtre bons."

(8) Joachin du Chalard, Advocate in the grand Council. Sommaire Expoſition des Ordonnances du Roi Charles IX. folio 7 verſo, Paris edit. of 1568.

In antient times, the holy ſpirit choſe
Such Paſtors as might edify mankind:
In thoſe bleſt ages virtue ſhone conſpicuous,
And none elected but whoſe life was pure.
But now the worldlings baſely have uſurped
The choice in all elections, whence proceeds
Endleſs injuſtice, and a round of woes,
Since only worthleſs men may wear the gown.
The perſons, now, to benefices raiſed
Owe all to bribery, and naught to virtue.
Henceforward, then, let box and dice decide;
Thus fickle chance may, haply, give ſome good ones.

If I ever write the article of Genebrard, as I hope to do, I ſhall not omit ſpeaking of the book he publiſhed, to ſhew the neceſſity of reviving canonical elections (9). He uſed to call the concordate a myſtery of iniquity.

[B] In the time when Biſhops came into the church by election, the church had as bad Paſtors as under the concordate.] We have ſeen, in the preceding remarks, the joke which Lewis XIII. paſt on that occaſion; which ſhews that many abuſes were committed under the pragmatick ſanction, and before the concordate. The Archbiſhop of Ambrun aſſerts (10), that the concordate has put an end to the abuſes, the ſimonies, and intrigues which formerly prevailed in elections: but an Abbot Commendatory expatiates very much on theſe diſorders. " I have been told by a Lady of great " quality, that ſhe heard the great King Francis ſay,
" that the circumſtance, which chiefly prompted him
" to make the concordate with Pope Leo, for aboliſh-
" ing the elections of Biſhops, Abbots, and ſome
" Priors, and to have the nomination of them, was,
" becauſe of the great abuſes found among the " Monks, in thoſe elections; for without having " any regard to abilities, and learning, which were
" ſeldom found in monaſteries . . . . they general" ly elected the merrieſt fellow; who was moſt fond " of

(9) It was burn by the hangman See the 11th Diſſertation of Natalis Alexander, in Selecta Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ capita. Seculi 15 and 16.

(10) In his petition to the King, againſt the tranſlation of Mons, p. 272, 273. Tom. 1. of the tracts relating to that verſion.

myſelf to believe what is related by ſome Hiſtorians, viz. that Cardinal du Prat ſhewed a ſtrong deſire to be raiſed to the Pontificate [C]. Some Authors relate, that he pretended " of whores, dogs and hawks; who was the beſt to-

" per; in a word, the greateſt debauchee, in order
" that he, when created their Abbot or Prior, might " afterwards indulge them, in like manner, in all
" their debauches, and licentious pleaſures; they
" firſt engaged them, for this purpoſe, by an oath,
" and obliged them, either by ſelf-love or force, to " obſerve it. The worſt circumſtance was, when they " happened not to agree in their choice, they uſed to " fight, box, and wound one another; nay, murther
" was often committed on thoſe occaſions; in ſhort,
" there uſed to be more tumults, intrigues and ca-
" bals, than there is in the creation of the Rector or " Principal of the Univerſity of Paris, which I have
" ſeen formerly, but do not know whether it is ſo
" ſtill. Beſides, ſome would elect ſome ſilly Monk,
" who durſt not ſay his ſoul was his own, conſequent-
" ly not order any thing but what was pleaſing to " them, and menaced him whenever he pretended to " ſeverity. Others elected, out of mere pity, ſome
" poor creature of a Monk, who uſed privately to
" rob them, make up a purſe, and ſtarve his Friers,
" which occaſioned great complaints, and at the ſame
" time impoveriſhed the Abbey. . . . In a word, a
" numberleſs multitude of abuſes uſed to be commit-
" ted in theſe elections and creations, which I ſhall
" now omit. Farther, the great Monarch in queſtion,
" conſidering the good ſervices which his Noblemen
" generally did him, and not being able to reward
" them from the revenues of his own demeſnes, and
" the monies ariſing from his taxes, (he being obli-
" ged to employ the whole, to defray the great ex-
" pences of his long and mighty wars,) he thought
" it more prudent to recompence thoſe who had ſerved
" him faithfully, with ſome abbies, and other church
" preferments, than to leave them to cloiſtered Monks,
" a ſort of men (would he ſay) fit for nothing but
" eating and drinking, gaming, making bow-ſtrings
" and ferret-bags; catching rabbits, and whiſtling to
" linnets; ſuch were their exerciſes, and the diſſo-
" lute manner in which they ſpent their idle hours;
" and indeed it was then a proverbial expreſſion, he " is as idle as a Prieſt or Monk; and likewiſe, as " covetous and lecherous as a Prieſt and a Monk; or
" as the Italians ſay, Pretri fratri, Monachi & pulli,
" mai non ſon ſatulli (11). i. e. " Prieſts, Friers,
" Monks, and chickens, are never ſatisfied." Now
" it is to be obſerved, that as there were abuſes in
" the elections of Friers, thoſe of Biſhops were as ir" regular; for the Biſhops, in order to procure the " votes of the Canons, and ſuch as poſſeſſed the chief
" dignities, uſed to win them over, and bribe them
" with money; and corrupt the reſt by preſents, and
" the promiſe of future favours: ſo that this was " called a real Simony, rather than a juſt and holy
" election; in imitation of many Popes in that age,
" who procured, in this manner, the votes of the " Cardinals. There alſo were frequently tumults,
" mutinies, intrigues and cabals in their chapters, on
" which occaſion they would fight, wound and kill
" one another, as formerly happened in Germany, as " I have been told; for the Canons were a bluſter-
" ing, quarrelſome ſet of people, as they are at this " time; and employed the ſword no leſs than the " breviary. The Biſhops having attained, in this " manner, the moſt exalted dignities, uſed to lead
" ſtrange lives. They indeed were much more reſi-
" dent in their dioceſes than they are now, for they " never ſtirred from them; but then, what did they " do there? They only led the moſt diſſolute lives,
" being for ever a hunting, hawking, feaſting at " weddings, carouzing and whoring, they having " ſeraglios of ſuch creatures. I was told that one
" of theſe uſed to go in queſt of little beautiful girls
" of ten years old; and that they diſperſed and ſet-
" tled them up and down their pariſhes and villages,
" as Gentlemen do puppies, to make uſe of them
" when they ſhould be grown up. Such was their " conduct, for no perſon durſt cenſure them, ſo
" much they were dreaded. I could ſay more, but will " not give any farther ſcandal. Our preſent Biſhops,
" ſaid a great man to me, are more prudent, or at
" leaſt wiſer hypocrites, and have a better knack at " concealing their dark vices. God forbid that " what I have related both of antient and modern
" Biſhops, and the abuſes committed by them, ſhould
" be applied to all; for there have been antiently, a " great many worthy ones, both regular and ſecular,
" who led very holy lives; as there are now, and " will be afterwards, great numbers, with God's " bleſſing, who loves and never abandons his people
" (12)."

(11) Brantome, Memoires, Tom. 1. in his Diſcourſe on Francis I. p. 251 & ſeq.

(12) Idem, ibid. p. 255.

[C] Cardinal du Prat ſhewed a ſtrong deſire to be raiſed to the Pontificate.] The Gentlemen of Port Royal did not fail to repreſent to the Archbiſhop of Ambrun, the particulars which Laurence Capelloni relates concerning Anthony du Prat's death. " Cle-
" ment VII. ſays that Author, being dead, Cardinal
" du Prat had ſuch an extravagant deſire to be Pope,
" that he preſumed to wait upon the King, to tell
" him, that it was then in his power to raiſe him
" to the Holy See. The King being willing to hear " what lengths he would go in his ambition, let him " go on. The Cardinal then added, that if his
" Majeſty would employ his credit and authority
" with the College of Cardinals, in order to raiſe
" him to the Pontificate, he himſelf would be only
" nominally Pope, but that the King ſhould be ſo in " effect. The King perceiving the extravagant am" bition with which this man was fired, and reflect-
" ing on the extreme difficulties of ſuch a deſign,
" which could not be completed without employing
" large ſums, anſwered: in good faith, Mr. Chan" cellor, the Cardinals are ſo extremely greedy, that " I have no manner of inclination to ſatiate it. The " Cardinal replied, that if the King entertained any
" ſuch deſign, he would find four hundred thouſand
" crowns to put it in execution. The King anſwer-
" ed, you very probably (Sir) may have the ſum you
" ſpeak of; but as for myſelf, I have no mind to " engage in that deſign. This anſwer of the King
" brought the Cardinal to himſelf, and made him
" ſenſible of the fault he had committed; not ſo
" much for ſhewing his ambition, as for diſcovering
" his wealth. This afflicted him to ſuch a degree,
" that he fell ſick upon it; and his indiſpoſition,
" which was ſlight at firſt, encreaſed prodigiouſly
" upon his being told that the King, knowing he " was confined to his bed, had given orders for the " ſeizing his moveables and money; adding to " thoſe who complained to him about it in the " Cardinal's name, that he dealt with him as he had " adviſed him to deal with others: ſo that (ſays this " Hiſtorian) the Cardinal died, God knows how,
" (Dio ſa come) extremely diſſatisfied and uneaſy
" on that account (13)." I will not omit, that the Gentlemen of Port Royal obſerved to this Prelate, that he could not doubt the truth of this ſtory, ſince he had given his approbation to the book in which it is related. In this manner, ſay they (14), this great man died, of whom one cannot give an ill character without offending the Biſhop of Ambrun. And yet it is obſervable, that this Hiſtory is related in Auberi's lives of the Cardinals, printed by Soli in 1645; together with an authentick approbation of MESSIRE GEORGE D'AUBUSSON, wherein he declares, that the Author has written with the truth required in an Hiſtorian; and therefore it is pretty ſurprizing, that the high preferments to which he is raiſed ſhould have made him ſo ſoon forget his firſt ſtudies.

(13) Remarques ſur la Requete de l'Archeveque d'Ambrun, p. 272.

(14) Ibid.

Varillas (15) gives us Capelloni's relation, but without citing him; and obſerves that du Prat grew ſo corpulent, that a hollow was cut in his table, to make room for his belly. He adds (16), that this Cardinal, " after lying in a languiſhing condition ſix months,
" died the ninth of July 1535 (17); and, in order
" to make ſome ſort of ſatisfaction to his Cathedral
" at Sens, which he had never gone into once, tho'
" he had been a long time Archbiſhop, he deſired
" to be buried there, though he had neglected it
" his whole life time." Another ſtory is related much more injurious to the memory of Francis I. than Capelloni's relation. I ſhall cite it, to ſhew the little credit that ought to be given to ſuch accounts; for (15) Hiſtory of Francis I. lib. 7. p. 241. 2d edit. (Dutch).

(16) Ibid. p. 242, 43.

(17) The Author of Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Auguſt 1684, art. 8. p. 629. mentions the year 1534, on the authority of the 1ſt edit. (Dutch) of Varillas's Francis I. It appears from this Chancellor's epitaph, mentioned by Frizon, p. 574, 575, of Gallia purpurata, that he died the 9th of July 1535, aged 72 years.

ed to have the ſtrangury, in order to extricate himſelf from a dangerous affair [D]. It is not probable that he was ſo very ignorant of the Latin tongue as Jonſton affirms [E]. It has for there are ſcarce any more ſure marks of certain ſtories being falſe, than the different ways in which they are told, being ſometimes ſaid to happen at ſuch a time, and to ſuch perſons, and ſometimes to others. " It was a peccadillo of the Court, like to " that which Francis I. employed, in order to poſſeſs " himſelf of Cardinal Marcellus's wealth (a). The " King was in want of money. Melanchthon, who " ſays that he knew the Cardinal intimately, relates " it thus. The King ſpread a report, by the diſpatches " which his Courier brought him from Rome, that Pope " Paul was dead there. He then ſent for this Cardinal, " whom he knew to be ambitious, and that he wanted " to be raiſed to the Pontificate, and informed him of " this falſe report. The reſult of it was this. He re- " preſented to the King, how greatly it concerned him " and his Kingdom, to have a perſon elected who was " his firm friend. You ſay very true, ſays the King. " Now ſuppoſe we ſhould get you elected? The Cardinal " was exceedingly pleaſed with the motion. But, " ſays the King, money will be wanted to do this, and " I have none now. The Cardinal then preſented " him with two tuns of gold. There is enough, ſaid the " King, I will put ſome of my own money to it. By " the next letters which came from Rome, it ap- " peared that the Pope was ſtill living, and had not " even been ſick. The Cardinal informed the King " of this, and deſired to have his money back again. " The King anſwered, I will reprimand my Embaſſa- " dor for writing falſe news: with regard to the " money, he ſaid, if the Pope is not dead, he will die. " This repartee ended this affair, which was ſo melancholy " for the Cardinal (18)." The Author, from whom I borrowed theſe particulars, quotes a book of Melanchthon which I have not by me (19). I therefore cannot anſwer for its accuracy; but I have found, in another work of Melanchthon's, an incident that ſeems to be a medium between this and that of Capelloni. Here follows the whole paſſage: Rex Galliæ, pater Franciſci, indigebat ſubitò pecunia. Itaque per alium quendam ad ſuum Cancellarium ex Roma, & per poſtam mittit ei literas, ſignificans Papam eſſe mortuum. Lectis literis, mox properat Cancellarius ad Regem, ei nunciaturus tanquam aliquid novi. Rex legit literas, ſimulans ſe neſcire, & interrogat quid ſibi ſit faciendum? Reſpondit Cancellarius, conſultiſſimum eſſe mittere Romam Legatum, & aliquem conſtituere Papam, qui ſit à partibus regis Galliæ. At Rex: ad eam rem opus eſt pecunia, ſicut dicitur: Nulla pecunia eſt ſatis magna, aſpiranti ad Pontificatum. Cancellarius dicit, ſe adhuc habere duas thonnas auri; utrum ſufficerent? Reſpondit Rex: Bene eſt, & ego aliquid pecuniæ addam. Cura igitur unam thonnam auri perferri ad me. Poſtquam eam Rex acceperat, ſubornat alium nuntium afferentem ei literas, Papam adhuc vivere, & non eſſe mortuum. Egregium ſanè inventum, quo quaſi cornicum oculos confixit, & avarum per ſuam avaritiam decepit (20). i. e. " The King of France, father to Francis, " was in immediate want of money. He thereupon " cauſed a letter to be ſent, by another hand, from " Rome, to his Chancellor, by which he informed " him that the Pope was dead. The Chancellor " having read the letter, waited immediately upon " him, to inform him of the news. The King " having read over the letter, pretended ignorance, " and aſked what he could do in that affair? The " Chancellor replied, that the moſt prudent courſe " would be to ſend an Embaſſador to Rome; and " raiſe ſome perſon, who was a friend to his Gallic " Majeſty, to the Papal Throne. Said the King, " before this can be done, money muſt be procured; " but no ſum of money is conſiderable enough, with " regard to one who aſpires to the Pontificate. Says " the Chancellor, I have two tuns of gold; is that " ſufficient? The King replied, very well: I myſelf " will add ſome money to it, and therefore ſend one " of the tuns of gold to me. His Majeſty having " received this money, he got another meſſenger to " bring him a letter, informing him that the Roman " Pontiff was ſtill living. This was a moſt admira- " ble device, to deceive a covetous man merely by " his own covetouſneſs." In this paſſage it is not Francis I. who tricked his Chancellor out of money, but another King, father to Francis. Now, as the father of Francis I. was not a King, we muſt ſuppoſe that Melanchthon ſpeaks of Henry II. father of Francis II. but can Francis I. be denoted by the name of Francis, without any other numerical diſtinction? Manlius did not do honour to his maſter, to publiſh a relation in which the names of perſons are ſo imperfectly expreſſed. I leave it to the reader to conſider, how variouſly the three ſtories abovementioned have been told.

§ (a) In the margin (19) is cited Dom. p. fol. 171. an Author or book, which Bayle ſays he had not. The ſame ſtory is found in Alexander's Joco-ſeria, n. 34. Tom. I. of the Francfort edition 1615. It is there quoted from D. Pezelius, Poſtill. Mel. Part III. pag. 170. In all probability Cardinal Marcellus mentioned above is du Prat himſelf, of whom much the ſame ſtory is told; and whoſe Latin name Pratellus, perhaps in Melanchthon, was changed into Marcellus by the German bookſellers. REM. CRIT.

[D] Some Authors relate, that he pretended to have the ſtrangury, in order to extricate himſelf from a dangerous affair.] " On the other ſide, how many might " we name, whoſe lives were ſaved merely by their " being ſick, as antiently happened to Auguſtus? " And how many have eſcaped death, merely from " a ſuppoſition that, becauſe of their extreme infir- " mity they were very near it *? Multorum mortem " diſtulit morbus, & ſaluti illis fuit videri perire. Car- " dinal du Prat got releaſed out of priſon, in the " reign of Francis I. from the fear ſome perſons " were under leſt he ſhould die of a pretended " ſtrangury, by which he impoſed on his Phyſicians, " he drinking privately the urine he made. And " we ſaw a favourite of Henry III. act ſo well the " dying man, in order to keep off ſome impending " danger under Henry IV. that he ſince lived thirty " years under the late King, in perfect health (21)." I am almoſt of opinion, that La Mothe le Vayer miſtook one man for another. No Author, I believe, relates that our du Prat was impriſoned; but it is related that Cardinal de la Balue drank his own urine, in order that Lewis XI. upon the ſuppoſition that he had the ſtrangury, might ſet him at liberty (22). Theſe are La Mothe le Vayer's words. He quotes the life of Lewis XI. written by Peter Matthieu, which quotation is exact (23). And though it may happen, that two Miniſters of State may employ, at different times, the ſame ſtratagem to ward off an impending evil; I yet am of opinion that the two ſtories related by that Author are not true: it is much more probable, that he confounded times and perſons. Many other writers have done this, and will do it hereafter.

[E] It is not probable, that he was ſo very ignorant of the Latin tongue as Jonſton affirms.] This Author wrote a little piece, entitled, Naturæ conſtantia, wherein he endeavours to prove that the world does not grow worſe. Among other inſtances of the ignorance of paſt ages, he mentions our du Prat, who imagined that moloſſus ſignified a mule; and that a mule, in Latin was muletus. Placet hic adjicere, ſays he (24), & exemplum du Prat Epiſcopi & Cancellarii Galliæ; qui cum in literis ab Henrico VIII. Angliæ Rege ad Franciſcum I. Galliarum Regem ſcriptis, iſta verba, Mitto tibi duodecim moloſſos, offendiſſet, mulos per moloſſos intelligi exiſtimabit; & poſt animadverſo errore, moloſſos ſe pro muletis accepiſſe, duplicata inſcitia ſubjunxit. I am to obſerve, that Jonſton quotes no perſon, though, on other occaſions, when he ſpeaks of the moſt trifling particulars, he cites with great accuracy the book whence he borrows. Some perſons aſcribe this ſlander to Beza. Read what follows. " The ſame may perhaps happen with reſpect to " Cardinal de Birague's ignorance, as of that of " Cardinal du Prat, who as Beza relates, when King " Francis I. had received from Henry VIII. a dozen " of Engliſh maſtiffs (it being duodecim moloſſos in the " letter) he aſked him for one of the mules which " he had received from that country; and the King " himſelf telling him that they were maſtiffs, he " excuſed

* Sen. Epiſt. 79.

(18) Jeremie de Pours, Divine Melodie du Saint Pſalmiſte, lib. 5. p. 1090.

(19) He quotes Dom. p. 3. folio 171.

(20) Joannes Manlius, in Locorum communium Collectanies ex Lectionibus Philippi Melanchthonis excerptis, p. 175. edit. Franc. 1568. This book might, in ſome meaſure, be intitled Melanchthoniana.

(21) La Mothe le Vayer, Diſcours de la Sante & de la Maladie, in Tom. 8. of his works, p. 185, 186.

(22) La Mothe le Vayer, Lettre 42. Tom. 10. of his works, p. 319.

(23) Here follow the words of Peter Matthieu, book 10. num. 3. p. m. 524. He uſed to piſs, and then drank his urine ſo ſecretly, that it was thought he would die of the Strangury. The King gives order for the Phyſicians to viſit him, and they give him over, &c.

(24) Jo. Jonſtonus, de Naturæ conſtantia, p. 73. edit. Amſtel. 1632.

has been obſerved, that he was a great lover of the fleſh of young aſſes [F], and made others love it.

He was a violent perſecutor of the Proteſtants, ſome of whom declare, that, as a puniſhment from God, he died mad [G]. A famous Hiſtoriographer ſuppoſes, that he was dreadfully tortured by remorſe, from a conſciouſneſs of his having introduced innovations whereby the people were grievouſly oppreſſed (a). Here follows the epitaph that Beza made upon him, the wit of which turns upon his corpulence. Antonio Pratenſi, Cancellario Galliarum, inter obeſos obeſiſſimo. Ampliſſimus vir hic jacet (b). [" Where " Bayle obſerves, that it is agreed that Chancellor du Prat was a man of great abilities, " but not that he was an honeſt man, he ſhould have called to mind the law-maxim which " he himſelf admits, (Politian, n. 11.) Quilibet preſumitur bonus, donec probetur malus. " (Every man is ſuppoſed to be honeſt till he is proved otherwiſe.) Bayle, in the note " [A], quotes ſeveral paſſages from an obſcure Janſeniſt, &c. But is even one of thoſe " Writers juſtly unexceptionable? Might we not oppoſe to theſe teſtimonies thoſe of " ſeveral Writers, who declare Chancellor du Prat to have been a man of great probity. " The Calviniſts inveighed againſt him, becauſe he was ſo zealous a Catholic. The " advocates for Janſenius have written with great virulence againſt him, becauſe he had, " anticipately (if I may uſe that expreſſion) condemned their doctrine: and the enemies " to the Concordate acted in the ſame manner merely out of animoſity, &c. *"] The Proteſtant Reader will obſerve, that this paſſage, copied from the remarks added to the Paris Edition of Bayle's Dictionary, is written by a Roman Catholic, who does not enforce his criticiſms by one ſingle authority. Rem. by the Tranſl.

(a) Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. Tom. 4. p. m. 584. ad ann. 1535.

(b) Beza, Poem. p. 94. edit. tert.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 978. col. 1.

" As " excuſed himſelf with ſaying that he imagined he " had heard it read duodecim muletos. But after all, " Mr. Auberi, who has writ a very faithful and ac- " curate hiſtory of the Cardinals *, ſhews, that this " ignorance, which Beza aſcribes to du Prat, is a di- " rect calumny; and proves it very clearly by the " teſtimony of Feron, who calls him a very learned " and famous Civilian; of Sadoletus, who made " choice of him to be the cenſor of his Latin works; " and of Auton, who applauds the very eloquent La- " tin ſpeech he made to the Emperor Maximilian " (25)."

* Tom. 3. p. 355.

(25) Naudé, Dialogue de Maſcurat, p. 426. See alſo Father Garaſſe, p. 641, of la Doctrine Curieuſe.

I do not know whether Beza ſpeaks of this in ſome of his works; but am ſure that this ſtory is related at length in a book of Henry Stephens (26).

[F] It has been obſerved, that he was a great lover of the fleſh of young aſſes.] In this he reſembled Mecænas, who firſt brought that kind of food into vogue. Pullos earum (aſinarum) epulari primus Mecænas inſtituit, multum eo tempore prælatos onagris: poſt eum interiit auctoritas ſaporis (27). But after Mecænas's death, people no longer reliſhed the fleſh of young aſſes, ſo that it fell to its former price. Meibomius obſerves, that the ſame riſing and falling happened in the time of Anthony du Prat (28). Simile quid de Antonio Pratenſe, Galliæ Cancellario refert Johannes Bruyerinus. lib. XXIII. de re cibaria, cap. XX. Ætate noſtra, inquit, Antonius Pratenſis, Galliæ Cancellarius, imitator exſtitit Mecænatis in eo genere eſcæ (carnis nempe aſininæ) quàm avidiſſimus; verum & cum ipſo gratia quoque illius carnis ſepulta eſt (29). As the work in queſtion of Meibomius is pretty ſcarce, I flatter myſelf that it will not be taken amiſs, if I obſerve, that there are, in that book, ſeveral examples of the ſlavery to which men reduce themſelves, with regard to their palates. Many will alſo be very well pleaſed to read the incident themſelves here, which ſhews, that men, out of flattery, bring their palates into ſlavery; and that a favourite has credit enough, not only to bring into faſhion ſuch dreſſes as they themſelves are pleaſed with, but alſo ſuch aliments as they reliſh (30). Potuit vero (Mecænas) & gulæ tantum aut peculiaris ſibi appetitus gratia cibo iſto veſci cœpiſſe familiarius: quem deinde ob ipſius auctoritatem alii, quaſi aſſentatione quadam, cariorem & in pretio habuere, donec ab obitu Mecænatis rurſum vileſceret, quod uſu venire in ejuſmodi rebus fere ſolet. Sic acipenſerem Plinius refert, lib. IX. cap. XVII. nullo in honore fuiſſe ſuo, id eſt, Trajani tempore: quem tamen Serenus Sammonicus apud Macrobium Saturn. lib. III. cap. XVI. docet, tum apud antiquos fuiſſe in pretio, tum poſt Plinium ſuo ævo gratiam ejus ad epulas quaſi poſtliminio rediiſſe. Sic Horatius rhombum & ciconiam nullo in cibis uſu fuiſſe ſcribit, antequam id docuiſſet vir prætorius, ſive is fuerit, dubitantibus Acrone & Porphyrione, Aſellius, ſive Rufus, aut Sempronius. Et addit, mergos, vile alias cibi genus, ſi quis aſſos dixerit futuros ſuaves, juventutem Romanam pravi docilem id facile crediturum. Verſus ſunt Serm. lib. II. Sat. II.

Tutus erat rhombus, tutoque ciconia nido,
Donec vos auctor docuit prætorius. Ergo
Si quis nunc mergos ſuaveis edixerit aſſos,
Parebit pravi docilis Romana juventus.

Nec diſſimile quid contigit ſuperiori ſeculo Romæ. De Hadriano VI. enim Pontif. Max. narrat Paulus Jovius (31), &c. i. e. " Poſſibly Mecænas might eat often of " that diſh, becauſe he had a particular gout for it; " and that others might ſeem to diſcover a fondneſs " for it, out of flattery to him; till at laſt, after " Mecænas's death, it again ſunk to no value, as com- " monly happens to things of this kind. Thus Pliny, " book 9. chap. 17. relates, that in his time (under " the Emperor Trajan) ſturgeons were not eſteemed; " which nevertheleſs Serenius Sammonicus, book 3. " cap. 16. of Macrobius, informs us was greatly " reliſhed by the antients, and in his time, (which " was after that of Pliny) it regained as it were its " place in entertainments. Thus Horace relates, that " the turbot and ſtork were never introduced in them, " till a perſon of diſtinction brought them into vogue, " whether this was Aſinius, Rufus, or Sempronius; " Acron and Porphyry being in doubt about that " circumſtance. He adds that, ſhould any perſon " ſay that coots, though ſo inſipid a diſh, would be " a tid-bit when roaſted; the Roman youth are ſo " credulous that they would eaſily believe ſo. Ho- " race's verſes, in Satyr II. Book II. are as follow:

" Safe ſwam the turbot, ſafe the ſtork could reſt,
" Unclaim'd by nicer palates, in her neſt,
" Till a rich glutton ſerv'd them at his feaſt.
" Nay, were it ſaid, a cormorant when ſtew'd,
" Becomes, by dreſſing, moſt delicious food,
" The youth of Rome their taſte would thence re-
" fine,
" And each young Lord upon a cormorant dine.

" ſomething like this was ſeen at Rome in the laſt " age: Paulus Jovius relating as follows of Hadrian " VI. &c."

(30) Meibomius, in Vita Mecænatis, cap. 26. p. 165, 166.

(31) Meibomius relates, in this place, what I cited in the rem. [R] of the art. HADRIAN VI.

[G] Some . . . . declare that, as a puniſhment from God, he died mad.] Henry Stephens, ſpeaking of a Lieutenant Criminal, who died diſtracted, after having ſeveral times denied and blaſphemed God, adds (32). " Chancellor du Prat (the Legate) met with the like " ſad fate, notwithſtanding his noble hoſpital, (Hotel " Dieu) of which Francis I. uſed to ſay, that it was " not large enough to lodge all thoſe whom du Prat " had reduced to a ſtate of poverty. He died at his " country-ſeat at Nantouillet; his ſtomach being " eaten by worms, during which he vented blaſphe- " mies againſt God, being extremely impatient, (32) Henry Stephens, Apologie d'Herodote, chap. 26. p. 310.

" As to Bayle's ſaying, that Chancellor du Prat . . is blamed among other things, for the " Concordate, &c. What proof has he that this Chancellor cauſed this Concordate to be " made, and that it was in his power to get it made, or to prevent it. Were we to " reckon up thoſe who are for and againſt the Concordate, I am perſuaded that many " more will be found who approve, than cenſure it : and therefore when Bayle ſays that " du Prat is blamed for it, &c. he alſo might as juſtly have ſaid that he is applauded for " it, &c. The Concordate, with regard to the nomination to Biſhopricks and Abbies, " is one of thoſe particulars about which many things are ſaid pro and con, &c. If we " conſider it only with reſpect to abuſes, I believe it cannot poſſibly be denied, but that " elections occaſioned many more intrigues, greater ſimony, and other abuſes, than are " found in nominations, as ſettled by the Concordate *."

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. ubi ſupra.

" cauſed by the grievous pain he felt ; and likewiſe " (as ſome relate) from the vexation he felt, to ſee " his coffers ſealing up, which extorted the following " words from him ; Behold what it is to ſerve a " King both with body and ſoul ! This du Prat was " the firſt who thought it requiſite that the Parlia- " ment ſhould take cognizance of hereſies, becauſe " (as he ſaid) they are intermixed with blaſphemy. " He alſo iſſued out the firſt commiſſions for putting " to death all ſuch as oppoſed the Romiſh Church, " after being quite tired out with the dilatorineſs of " Berquin's trial." [It is ſurprizing Bayle did not obſerve, that Henry Stephens is greatly miſtaken, in applying to Chancellor du Prat, what was ſaid of Rollin or Roulin, Chancellor of Burgundy, concerning the Hoſpital of Beaune which he cauſed to be built in 1443 *.

* From the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 978. col. 1.

PRÆTEXTATUS (PAPYRIUS), made himſelf famous at Rome in his childhood, by his keeping a ſecret which his mother would fain have extorted from him. This is mentioned in the Supplement to Moreri, but the Author of that ſtory has left out all the wit of it, for which reaſon I think it incumbent on me to relate it more faithfully [A]. I ſhall even point out the Author of that ſtory a little better than the Writer of that Supplement has done ; a circumſtance that is of ſome importance on the preſent occaſion [B].

PRICE

[A] To relate it more faithfully.] The Senate not having an opportunity to conclude an affair of great importance, which had been under debate, put it off till next day, and ordered it to be kept ſecret till ſuch time as the decree ſhould be paſt. Young Papyrius, who, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, had followed his father into the Senate, was aſked by his mother what matters had been tranſacted in the Senate. The youth anſwered, that he was ſtrongly exhorted not to reveal it, and conſequently that he ought to be ſilent on that head. This anſwer excited the Lady's curioſity the more, which prompted her to importune her ſon ſtill more ; ſo that he was forced to tell an untruth, in order that he might be no longer teazed, and not diſobey the order of the Senate. He told his mother, that the following queſtion had been debated in the Senate, whether it would be more important to the ſtate, for one huſband to have two wives, or one wife two huſbands. The Lady being ſurprized at what ſhe heard, flew out of the houſe in order to alarm the reſt of the married women ; ſo that, the next day, a great crowd of them came to the door of the Senate, and with tears in their eyes, humbly begged that the decree might paſs for one woman to have two huſbands, rather than one man two wives. The Senators could not gueſs the reaſon, why the women in queſtion were crowding together and making ſuch an uproar ; but young Papyrius explained the affair to them, by informing them how he had been reduced to the neceſſity of eluding his mother's curioſity. The Senate admired him for it ; and it was ordered, that thenceforwards, no other youth but he ſhould be admitted into the Senate. Such is the origin of the word Prætextatus (1). We are obliged to Aulus Gellius for this relation, whoſe words I only borrow : Secretum rei & ſilentium deberi puer affirmans animum ejus ad inquirendum everberat. Quærit igitur compreſſius violentiuſque. Tum puer, matre urgente, lepidi atque feſtivi mendacii conſilium capit. Actum in ſenatu dixit, utrum videretur utilius magiſque è republica eſſe, unuſne ut duas uxores haberet, an ut una apud duos nupta eſſet. Hoc illa ut audivit, animo compaveſcit : domo trepidans egreditur : ad cæteras matronas defert quod audierat. Perveniunt ad ſenatum poſtera die matrumfamilias caterva, lacrymantes atque obſecrantes orant una potius ut duobus nupta fieret, quàm ut uni duæ. Senatores ingredientes in curiam, quæ illa mulierum intemperies & quid ſibi poſtulatio iſthæc vellet, mirabantur. Puer Papirius in medium curiæ progreſſus, quid mater audire inſtitiſſet, quid ipſe matri dixiſſet, rem, ſicuti fuerat, denarrat. Senatus fidem atque ingenium pueri deoſculatus conſultum facit, ut poſthac pueri cum patribus in curiam ne introeant, niſi ille unus Papirius (2). Macrobius has copied theſe particulars almoſt verbatim, but has added one circumſtance, which is not inſerted in Aulus Gellius. He relates that the Senators looked upon this bare-faced impudence of theſe women, as an ill-boding prodigy, which ſurprized them greatly (3).

(1) Ei puero poſtea cognomentum honoris gratia inditum prætextatus, ob loquendi tacendique in ætate prætextata prudentiam. Aulus Gellius, lib. 1. cap. 23.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Ut non parvæ rei prodigium illam verecundæ ſexus impudicam inſaniam paveſcebant. Macrob. Saturn. lib. 1. cap. 6. p. m. 211.

The Author of the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary has made two miſtakes here. 1ſt, He ſuppoſes (4) that Papyrius told his mother, that the Senate had decreed that every man ſhould have two wives. But that Author ſhould have ſaid, that Papyrius pretended the Senate had debated, whether this would be more advantageous to the Commonwealth, than to decree that every wife ſhould have two huſbands. 2d, He ſuppoſes that the Roman Ladies in queſtion beſought the Senate, that women might have the ſame prerogative, which had been granted the day before to men, and that every one of them might be permitted to marry two huſbands. But this way of telling the ſtory makes it quite flat, and deprives it of all its beauty : nay, it makes theſe Ladies quite blind to their own intereſt; for what advantage could they reap by making ſuch a requeſt ? Is it not plain, that all things duly conſidered, ſhe would have been in a worſe condition than before, had every huſband had two wives, and every wife two huſbands ? The beſt thing they could have hoped for, would have been, to be upon the ſame terms as before ; for if every woman could ſay, I have two huſbands, ſhe alſo might ſay, I ſhare them with another. Are two halves more than a whole ? I am ſenſible that we may ſuppoſe ſeveral caſes, in which it would be advantageous to them ; but upon other accounts, and in ſeveral other caſes, which may eaſily be ſuppoſed, the diſadvantage would equal, and perhaps exceed the advantage.

(4) Under the word Papyrius.

[B] I ſhall even point out the Author of that ſtory . . . a circumſtance that is of ſome importance on the preſent occaſion.] Notwithſtanding the authority of Aulus Gellius, I yet ſhould think this ſtory a mere fiction ; but I cannot think ſo, when I reflect that it was ſpoke in an oration by grave Cato the Cenſor. In order, therefore, that the Reader may be the better enabled to form a judgment of this matter, it is not enough to inform him, that it is related by Macrobius (5). Such a Compiler as he is of ſmart ſayings and tales, does not deſerve much credit. Smart ſayings and pretty ſtories are frequently invented in an Author's ſtudy. The Inventors of them, not being willing to loſe their labour, ſpread them abroad ; and to make themſelves the merrier with them, and give them the

(5) In the Supplement to Moreri, Macrobius only is quoted.

PRICE (JOHN), called in Latin Pricæus, flouriſhed in the 17th Century. He was born in England, and a man of vaſt learning and great judgment. After having travelled many years, he retired to Florence, and there turned Roman Catholic (a). . . . He died at Rome in 1676 (b). He had publiſhed ſeveral books, in which he diſplayed a vaſt fund of erudition [A]. He left behind him a Commentary on Pliny's Epiſtles, which will ſoon be the greater currency, they aſcribe them to certain places and perſons, accompanying them with all ſuch circumſtances as may make them appear moſt credible. When ſtories thus invented are of a diverting caſt, and give a handle for laughter, they take root in the memory, and are eaſily ſpread. Collections are made of theſe, which are frequently printed; but perſons of taſte and judgment content themſelves with applauding the wit (if any) in them, without taking them for matter of fact. Such is the judgment we are to form of ſeveral ſtories and witty conceits read in Macrobius. His authority therefore is not to be much depended upon with regard to the tumultuous aſſembly of the Roman Ladies. Aulus Gellius, whom he copied, deſerves more credit. He lived pretty near the time when this particular happened; but all thoſe, who content themſelves with quoting him on that occaſion, do not ſhew much judgment. Cato ought to be cited, that Author having borrowed this ſtory from Cato. He does not quote the very words of that Cenſor, he not having the original at that time, but then he gives the ſenſe of it. Hiſtoria, ſays he (6), de Papirio Prætextato dicta ſcriptaque eſt à M. Catone in oratione, qua uſus eſt ad milites contra Galbam, cum multa quidem venuſtate atque luce atque munditia verborum. Ea Catonis verba huic prorſus commentario indidiſſem, ſi libri copia fuiſſet id temporis, quum hæc dictavi. Quòd ſi non virtutes dignitateſque verborum, ſed rem ipſam ſcire quæris, fermè ad hunc modum eſt. i. e. " This ſtory, relating to Papyrius Prætextatus, is told " by M. Cato, in a clear and elegant ſpeech made by " him againſt Galba. I ſhould have copied Cato's " words in this Commentary, had I poſſeſſed the " original at the time when I wrote it. But if you " are deſirous of reading the ſtory itſelf, abſtracted " from all the graces of diction, it is as follows." It is ſomewhat probable that this adventure is true, ſince a man of ſo much dignity as Cato (that is ſaying all in one word) told it in an oration that was publiſhed. I am not inſenſible that the Cenſor in queſtion uſed to joke now and then (7); but at ſuch a time, and on ſuch an occaſion, a perſon of his character would not have joked. It may perhaps be objected to me that Livy, who does not omit another tumult raiſed by the Roman Ladies, takes no notice of this; but this objection may be eaſily anſwered, by ſaying that it perhaps was mentioned in thoſe books of his hiſtory which are loſt. I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that the other tumult was raiſed on occaſion of the law which forbid women the uſe of ornaments in their apparel. There was a deſign to ſuppreſs it. Some Tribunes were for having it continue in force, whilſt others required it to be annulled. Our Cato, who was Conſul that year (8), made a ſtrong ſpeech (9) in defenſe of that law; and againſt the liberty which the women had taken of crowding together, and making an uproar in every ſtreet: nevertheleſs the law was annulled. The Tribunes who oppoſed this were obliged to ſubmit, upon ſeeing their houſes beſieged by theſe female mutineers (10). Capitolium turba hominum faventium adverſantiumque legi complebatur. Matronæ, nulla nec auctoritate, nec vetecundia, nec imperio virorum, contineri limine poterant: omnes vias urbis, adituſque in forum obſidebant: viros deſcendentes ad forum orantes, ut florente republica, creſcente indies privata omnium fortuna, matronis quoque priſtinum ornatum reddi paterentur. Augebatur hæc frequentia mulierum indies; nam etiam ex oppidis conciliabuliſque convenerant. Jam & conſules prætoreſque, & alios magiſtratus adire & rogare audebant. Cæterum minime exorabilem alterum utique conſulem M. Porcium Catonem habebant; qui pro lege, quæ abrogabatur, ita diſſeruit. . . . . (11). Hæc quum contra legem proque lege dicta eſſent, aliquanto major frequentia mulierum poſtero die ſeſe in publicum effudit, unoque agmine omnes tribunorum (12) januas obſederunt, qui collegarum rogationi intercedebant: nec ante abſtiterunt, quam remiſſa interceſſio ab tribunis eſſet. Nulla deinde dubitatio fuit, quin omnes tribus legem abrogarent, anno vigeſimo poſt abrogata eſt, quam lata. i. e. " The capi- " tol was quite filled with people who favoured and " oppoſed the law. The married women could not " be kept at home, either by authority, by modeſ- " ty, or the power of their huſbands. They crowded " every ſtreet, and thoſe which led to the Forum; " beſeeching all ſuch Senators as paſſed that way, " that as the Commonwealth was in ſo rich and daily- " flouriſhing a condition, they would pleaſe to " permit the married women to be adorned as for- " merly. Theſe crowds of women increaſed per- " petually by the great numbers who flocked to them " from towns and factious places. They now were " ſo bold as to go and petition the Conſuls, Prætors, " and other Magiſtrates. However, M. Porcius Ca- " to, the other Conſul, was no ways to be moved in " their favour; but ſpoke as follows for the law " which was going to be annulled. . . . . Theſe " things being ſaid in favour of, and againſt the " law, a ſtill greater concourſe of women was ſeen " in the ſtreets; and they beſieged, in a body, the " doors of all ſuch Tribunes as oppoſed the motion " of their Collegues; nor could be prevailed upon to " depart, till thoſe Tribunes had given their words " to ceaſe their oppoſition. Upon this the law, twen- " ty years after its being enacted, was annulled by all " the tribes."

(a) Colomiés, Bibl. Choiſie, p. 142. Amſt. edit. 1699.

(b) Ibid. p. 143.

(6) Aulus Gellius, lib. 1. cap. 23.

(7) See Balzac, Oeuvres diverſes, in the Diſcours de la Converſation des Romains, p. m. 49. I quoted his words in citat. (77) of the article PORCIUS.

(8) This was the year of Rome 558.

(9) See his ſpeech in the beginning of Livy's 34th book.

(10) Livy, lib. 34. init. p. m. 621.

(11) Idem, Ibid.

(12) i. e. of Marcus and Publius Brutus, Tribunes of the people, who oppoſed the motion made by their Collegues, viz. of having the law Oppia repealed.

I alſo will obſerve by the way, that ſo many errors are committed in the way of citing Authors, that it would be proper to lay down ſome rules on that head. The moſt inconſiderable things may be brought into a method or art; and if this was done with regard to the citing of Authors, it would put a ſtop to ſome abuſes. In laying down theſe rules, I wiſh notice was taken how far Authors might extend the liberty of adding ſome particulars of their own, to the particulars related by them. The Reader has ſeen in what manner Macrobius enlarges a litte the ſtory told by Aulus Gellius. A Spaniſh Jeſuit has enlarged it much more; he affirming, that on the day in queſtion, the Senators came later than uſual from the Aſſembly, and that this was the reaſon why Papyrius's mother aſked what affair had employed the Senate ſo long. Como el negocio era peſado, y los votos no ſe concertavan, ſalieron aquel dia los Senadores algo mas tarde de ſu conſejo de lo que ſolian: lo qual fue occaſion para que la madre del Papyrio le preguntaſſe, porque cauſa ſe havian detenido tanto en el Senado (13). He ſuppoſes that young Papyrius anſwered his mother, that the affair which had been debated upon was to be kept in the deepeſt ſecrecy, till it ſhould be determined another day. Now theſe circumſtances are not mentioned either by Aulus Gellius or Macrobius. However, I believe, that if there is any fault in advancing them, it is very inconſiderable; and I take the Spaniſh Author to be more inexcuſable, for quoting, not only the two antient Authors abovementioned, but likewiſe Alexander ab Alexandro, Volaterranus, and Charles Stephens.

A REMARK with reſpect to the manner of quoting Authors.

(13) Juan de Torres, primera Parte de la Philoſophia Moral de Principes, lib. 1. p. 59. Barcelona edit. 1598.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books, in which he diſplayed a vaſt fund of erudition.] He publiſhed at Paris in 1635, A defenſe for or apology of Apuleius, with notes in 4to. and in 1646 Annotationes in Evangelium Matthæi, in 4to. & Annotationes ad Epiſtolam Jacobi, in 8vo. and in 1647 Acta Apoſtolorum ex Scriptura, Patribus, Græciſque ac Latinis Scriptoribus illuſtrata, in 8vo. His notes in Pſalmos & in pleroſque alios Libros Novi Teſtamenti, were printed at London in 1660. folio. His Commentary on Apuleius's Metamorphoſes was printed at Tergou in 1650, 8vo. " He deſigned " to reprint his apology for Apuleius, with the ad- " dition of a great number of notes; to publiſh Au- " lus Gellius, on whom he had writ many remarks; " Avienus de oris maritimis, and ſome corrections upon " Heſychius, the index of which he had annexed " to the Metamorphoſes of Apuleius; I mean the " index of the Authors mentioned by Heſychius: but " his be ſent to preſs (c). He had been applauded by perſons of very great learning [B]. He reſided ſome years in Paris, and even publiſhed ſome books there; but did not leave it till the year 1646, when he returned to England (d). Sarrau (Sarravius) declares, that he had reaſon to leave France in anger (e). This Author ſays alſo, that he deſerved juſtly to be admired on account of his learning, and the patience and conſtancy with which he ſuſtained adverſe fortune (f).

(c) Colomiés, &c. ibid.

(d) Sarravius, Epiſt. 169. p. 173.

(e) Ille in Angliam heri repatriavit erga Galliam noſtram peſſime, nec immerito, animatus. Idem, ib.

(f) Idem, Epiſt. 157. p. 162.

" his ſight growing very weak, he ſays ſomewhere in " his notes, that he did not think he ſhould be able " to finiſh his pieces (1)." This Author's notes on the golden aſs, or Apuleius's Metamorphoſes, are ſo copious, that the text takes up only 262 pages, whereas the notes fill 734 pages, and are in a ſmaller letter than the text. The Author declares, that he intended to introduce ſome exact and new particulars into his notes, which was no very eaſy matter, as ſo many Commentators had writ before him (2). He adds, that he therein obſerves what Apuleius had borrowed from Tacitus, Suetonius, Saluſt, from Virgil chiefly, and from other Writers; and thoſe particulars which Ammianus Marcellinus, Sidonius, St. Jerom, and St. Auſtin, had borrowed from him; that he had been particularly careful to publiſh the text as near the original as he could poſſibly; and had endeavoured, in near 300 places, to reſtore the true reading merely by conjecture. He informs us, that he had made uſe of but one manuſcript, which was that he had preſented to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and which this Prelate had beſtowed on the Bodleian library. He had had Colvius's edition with Caſaubon's notes, written in his own hand, and the edition of Vicenza printed in 1488. He looks upon it as the moſt antient edition next to that of Rome of 1472; and he often chooſes to follow it rather than the later editions. There are two antient editions of Apuleius not taken notice of by Fabricius (3). The oldeſt taken notice of by him is that of Venice 1493.

(1) Colomiés, Bibl. Choiſie, p. 142. Amſt. edit. 1699.

(2) Dedimus operam ut & appoſita & nova afferemus: rem poſt tot alios haud adeo in proclivi ſitam. Jo. Pricæus, in Præfat.

(3) John Alberto Fabricius, in Bibl. Lat. p. 137.

[B] He has been applauded by perſons of very great learning.] " Price is praiſed by Sarravius, in his let- " ters; by Archbiſhop Uſher on St. Ignatius's epiſ- " tles; by Heinſius, in an epiſtle to Carlo Dati; " by Selden more than once, in the ſecond book de " Synedriis Ebræorum; by Voſſius, in his Harmonia " Evangelica; by Morus, in his notes on the New " Teſtament; by Redi, in his treatiſe on the Genera- " tion of Inſects; but eſpecially by Axenius on Phœ- " drus (4)." Sarravius obſerves, that Price complained of his having been treated with contempt by Salmaſius; but, to pacify him, Sarravius gave him a copy of one of Salmaſius's works: Unicum quod ſupererat (exemplar) donavi doctiſſimo viro tuique ſtudioſiſſimo Jo. Priceo, ut eum placarem aliquo modo conquerentem, quod in Miſcellis Defenſionibus contemptim a te eſſet habitus (5).

(4) Colomiés, Bibl. Choiſie, p. 143, 144.

(5) Sarravius, Epiſt. 144. p. 150.

PRIDEAUX (JOHN), Biſhop of Wincheſter, and a very great Divine, was born in 1578, at Stafford, a town in Devonſhire. In 1596 he was admitted into Exeter College in Oxford, were he improved greatly in his ſtudies in a very ſhort time. His vigorous conſtitution enabled him to apply himſelf very intenſely to his ſtudies, and his happy memory made him reap ſpeedily the fruit of his labours. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſubtlety in diſputing, and was choſen Fellow of the above-mentioned College in 1602. He ſucceeded Dr. Holland in the maſterſhip of that College, and took his Degree of Doctor of Divinity. He was appointed Regius Profeſſor of Divinity upon Dr. Abbot's being promoted to the See of Saliſbury. He behaved in his maſterſhip with ſo much prudence, and his carriage was ſo engaging, that he drew a very great number of ſtudents to his College; and they made ſo great an improvement by his wiſe counſels and his judicious choice of tutors, that many of them were able to ſerve both the Church and State, and were the ornament of them. He exerciſed his employment thirty two years or thereabouts. He was no leſs careful to diſcharge the duties of his other employment, I mean, his Profeſſorſhip of Divinity. He therein gained great reputation by his learning; and his inviolable attachment to the King and the Church of England. He continued in that Profeſſorſhip a little above twenty ſeven years. He was five times Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, and was nominated Biſhop of Wincheſter in 1641. He died the 29th of July 1650, aged ſeventy two years (a). He publiſhed ſeveral works [A]. It may not be neceſſary to inform my readers, that he muſt not be miſtaken for another PRIDEAUX [B] who publiſhed a ſecond edition

(a) Extracted from Paul Freherus, Theatre p. 550. He quotes Wood's Antiq. Univerſit. Oxon.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral works.] He publiſhed an apology for Caſaubon, contra Andream Eudæmon-Johannem, printed at Oxford in 1614, 8vo. His Hypomnemata Logica, Rhetorica, Phyſica, tyrocinium ad ſyllogiſmum legitimum contexendum, &c. Heptades Logicæ, &c. were printed in the ſame city, as likewiſe Lectiones decem in totidem Religionis capita: Lectiones 22, Orationes 13, Conciones 6, & Oratio ad Jacobum Regem: Orationes 9, in inaugurales in promotione Doctorum: Faſciculus Controverſiarum Theologicarum: Theologiæ Scholaſticæ Syntagma, & Conciliorum Synopſis: Manuductio ad Theologiam Polemicam: Iſagoge ad omnigenæ Hiſtoriæ lectionem, and ſeveral more. I take no notice of his Engliſh works.

[B] Another PRIDEAUX . . . publiſhed a ſecond edition of the Marmora Arundelliana.] His Chriſtian name is Humphrey, and he ſtyles himſelf ædis Chriſti alumnus. He has ſhewn a great deal of learning in the work publiſhed by him at Oxford in 1676, folio, under the title of Marmora Oxonienſia ex Arundellianis, Seldenianis, aliiſque conflata. He has inſerted in this work in queſtion that which Selden publiſhed in London in 1628, and which under the title of Marmora Arundelliana, contained an explication of part of the marbles which the Earl of Arundel ſent for from the Levant. Prideaux likewiſe inſerted ſome of the notes which Lydyat had writ on ſome of thoſe marbles; but what he wrote of his own forms the moſt conſiderable part of the work; he having reviſed and illuſtrated with notes, recenſuit & perpetuo Commentario explicavit, not only the inſcriptions of the Earl of Arundel's marbles, but alſo thoſe of ſeveral other monuments of the ſame kind which have been given to the Univerſity of Oxford. It muſt be obſerved, that Selden had explained the inſcriptions of only twenty nine Greek marbles, and ten Latin ones. He ſelected ſuch of them as he thought the principal, from among a very great number; I ſay, a very great number; there being 250 Arundelian marbles. They were carried to London in 1627, placed in the gardens of Arundel Houſe. Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, had been at great pains and expence to procure them, he having ſent Mr. William Petty, a very learned Gentleman, into the Levant for that purpoſe. Ea (marmora) illuſtriſſimus Comes, dum in Italia degerat, (quæ ei altera patria erat) ex antiquarum Aſiæ, Græciæ, & Italiæ urbium ruinis, operâ Doctiſſimi viri Gulielmi Pettæi in hac re uſus, ſummis impenſis conquiſivit. Græcorum pleraque è Smyrna habuit, ei ibi * Gaſſendus (ſi fides ipſi edition of the Marmora Arundelliana.

* In Vita Peireſkii, lib. 4. ad ann. 1629.

ipſi hac in re habenda ſit) narrat operâ Peireſkii ſui primo detecta erutaque fuiſſe, perſolutis quinquaginta Aureis per Sampſonem quendam illius negotia Smyrnæ procurantem ; ſed cum inde convehenda eſſent, Turcarum fraude Sampſone in carcerem conjecto, ibi detenta erant, donec ea illuſtriſſimus Arundelliæ Comes majori pretio per Pettæum redempta cum aliis, quæ per eundem procuratorem collegerat, Londinum in hortos Palatii Arundelliani, anno Dom. noſtri 1627 curavit tranferenda (1). i. e. " The moſt illuſtrious Earl, during his abode in " Italy, which he was extremely fond of, procured " thoſe marbles, at a vaſt expence, taken out of the " ruins of the antient cities of Aſia, Greece, and " Italy ; on which occaſion he was aſſiſted by the " very learned Mr. William Petty. He got the " greateſt part of the Greek marbles from Smyrna ; " Gaſſendus, (if he may be credited) informs us, " that they were firſt diſcovered there, and dug up, " by the care of his friend Peireſk, who got one " Sampſon (a perſon that managed his affairs in the " above-mentioned city, to pay fifty piſtoles for them. " But when they were to be conveyed from thence, " Samſon being impriſoned by the treachery of the " Turks, the marbles in queſtion were detained " there, till the illuſtrious Earl of Arundel having " redeemed them, with ſome others, which the " ſame perſon had procured him at a higher price ; " ſent them to the gardens of Arundel Houſe in " 1627." The Lord Henry Howard, his grandſon, gave them to the Univerſity of Oxford, which prompted ſuch perſons as poſſeſſed the ſame kind of marbles to devote them to the ſame place. Quæcunque Vir immortalitate digniſſimus Thomas Arundelliæ Comes, legatione quaſi ſolenni eam ob rem inſtitutâ, infinitis impenſis, & repetito ſæpius capitis periculo eruditiſſimi Viri Gulielmi Pettæi, cui procuratio ea demandabatur, Europâ Aſiâque excuſſis, in Britannias noſtras deduxerat, Nepos ejuſdem tanto Avo non inficiandus, æternitati & Muſis hic loci demum conſecrabat : reliquiſque quotquot fuere eruditæ antiquitatis Patronis autor extitit, ut ad tanti Auſpicis morem, quæcunque apud ſe laterent ex temporum naufragio Tabulæ, ibidem appenderent (2). i. e. " The grandſon of the immortal Thomas Earl of " Arundel, a man highly deſerving ſuch an uncle, " gave to this ſeat of the muſes (our Univerſity) all " the marbles the Earl had procured of this kind. " He had collected them, at an infinite expence, and " at the frequent hazard of the life of the moſt " learned Mr. William Petty, who got them from " all parts of Europe and Aſia, and brought them " into England. The noble Donor was imitated in " this particular, by all the patrons of antient learn- " ing ; they depoſiting in the ſame Muſæum all the " like monuments they poſſeſſed which had eſcaped " the dire ſhipwreck of time." The reader muſt not be miſled by the firſt word of this paſſage, which implies, that the grandſon beſtowed on the Univerſity of Oxford all the marbles which his grandfather had brought to London ; but this is not true, he not beſtowing ſcarce above half of them ; the reſt being unhappily loſt, after that Arundel Houſe had been abandoned by the owners, in the time of the Civil Wars, during which they were forced to go into baniſhment. Dr. Prideaux informs us of this in his preface ; ſo that his miſtake may be corrected by his own words (3). Arundelliana (marmora) plura quam centum & triginta numerantur ; hæc tamen vix ultra dimidiam partem eorum conficiunt, quæ inſigniſſimus Arundelliæ Comes collegerat ; cætera, cùm tempore nuperrimi belli civilis incendii in hortis Arundellianis Londini, pulſis inde dominis, diu neglecta jacuerint, aut furtim ſurrepta, aut ſervorum negligentiâ corrupta, aut à Lapicidis (4) ad reficiendas ædes adhibita in magnum rei literariæ damnum amittuntur. i. e. " There are upwards of one " hundred and thirty Arundelian marbles ; which " nevertheleſs are ſcarce above half of thoſe which " the moſt noble Earl had procured ; the reſt, during " the late Civil Wars, having lain long neglected, " in the gardens of Arundel Houſe at London, at " the time when the owners of it were driven away ; " were either ſtole, or defaced by the careleſsneſs of " ſervants, or employed by maſons in the repairing " of houſes, and ſo are loſt, to the great detriment " of learning." This ſhews that Vigneul Marville does not go upon a falſe report, when, after mentioning theſe Arundelian marbles, he adds ; " A de- " plorable circumſtance is, that during the troubles " in England, moſt of thoſe marbles were employed " in mending doors and repairing chimnies. This is " fine encouragement for the curious to put them- " ſelves to ſo much expence (5)." I could have expatiated ſtill more on the importance of theſe marbles, had I not called to mind that they form an article in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary, and the Journal des Sçavans, of the 25th of April 1678. Humphrey Prideaux is alſo the Author of a Latin tranſlation of a tract of Maimonides, De jure pauperis & peregrini apud Judæos, printed with notes by him in Oxford, anno 1672, 4to. He alſo is Author of the life of Mahomet, cited by me ſo often in the article MECCA. I am told that he is a Canon of Norwich.

(1) Humphridus Prideaux, Præf. ad Marmora Oxonienſia.

(2) Idem, Epiſt. Dedicator. init.

(3) Idem, in Præf.

(4) The Author ſays, two pages after, that he had read all the inſcriptions of theſe marbles except one. This is a marble of which only the half is now remaining, and the letters of which are defaced ; the other half was employed by a maſon. Altera à Lapicida quodam ad reficiendum focum in Palatio Arundelliano adhibita.

(5) Vigneul Marville, Melanges, Tom. 2. p. 301, 302. Dutch edit. This Author has committed ſome errors in the titles of the Earl of Arundel, and his grandſon.

☞ PRIDEAUX (JOHN), a learned Engliſh Biſhop in the 17th Century, was born at Stowford in the Pariſh of Harford near Ivy-bridge in Devonſhire, on the 17th of Sept. 1578, and was the fourth of ſeven ſons of his father (a), who being in mean circumſtances, and having a great family, our Author, after he had learned to write and read, having a good voice, ſtood Candidate for the place of Pariſh Clerk of the Church of Ugborow near Harford [A] ; but being diſappointed, a Gentlewoman of the Pariſh, mother of Sir Edmund Towel, maintained him at ſchool till he had gained ſome knowledge of the Latin tongue, when he travelled to Oxford, and at firſt lived in a very mean ſtation in Exeter College, doing ſervile offices in the kitchen, and proſecuting his ſtudies at his leiſure hours, till at laſt he was taken notice of in the College, and admitted a Member of it in Act-Term 1596, under the tuition of Mr. Will. Helme, B. D. (b). January the 31ſt 1599 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts (c), and in 1602 was choſen Probationer Fellow of his College (d). May the 11th 1603 he proceeded Maſter of Arts (e) ; and ſoon after entered into Holy Orders (f). May the 6th 1611 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity (g) ; and the year following was elected Rector of his College in the room of Dr. Holland (h) ; and June the 10th the ſame year proceeded Doctor of Divinity (i). In 1615, upon the advancement of Dr. Robert Abbot to the Biſhoprick of Sarum, he was made Regius Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Oxford ; by virtue of which place he became Canon of Chriſt Church, and Rector of Ewelme in Oxfordſhire (k) ; and afterwards diſcharged the Office of Vice-

(a) Prince's Worthies of Devon, p. 510.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 156. 2d edit.

(d) Prince, ubi ſupra.

(e) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 165.

(f) Prince, ubi ſupra.

(g) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 189.

(h) Prince, ubi ſupra.

(i) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 192.

(k) Idem, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 130.

[A] Stood Candidate for the place of Pariſh-Clerk of the Church of Ugborow near Harford.] Mr. Prince tells us (1), that " he had a Competitor for the Office, " who had made great intereſt in the pariſh for him- " ſelf, and was likely to carry the place from him. " The Pariſhioners being divided in the matter, did " at length agree in this, being unwilling to diſ- " oblige either party, that the Lord's day following " ſhould

(1) Worthies of Devon, p. 510.

Vice Chancellor of the Univerſity for ſeveral years. He publiſhed ſeveral works [B]. In the Rectorſhip of his College he behaved himſelf in ſuch a manner, that it flouriſhed more than any other in the Univerſity, many foreigners coming thither for the benefit of his inſtruction. And in his Profeſſorſhip he exerted himſelf with great zeal againſt the Doctrines of the Socinians and Arminians. November the 22d 1641 he was elected to the Biſhoprick of Worceſter, to which he was conſecrated December the 19th following; but the troubles were at that time ſo far advanced, that he received little or no profit from it, to his great impoveriſhment. For adhering ſtedfaſtly to his Majeſty's cauſe, and pronouncing all thoſe of his Dioceſe, who took up arms againſt him, excommunicate, he was plundered, and reduced to ſuch ſtraights, that he was obliged to ſell his excellent library (l). He died of a fever at Bredon in Worceſterſhire, at the houſe of his ſon-in-law Dr. Henry Sutton, July the 20th 1650, leaving to his children no legacy but pious poverty, God's bleſſing, and a father's prayers, as appears from his laſt will and teſtament. His body was attended to the grave by perſons of all ranks and degrees, and was interred in the Chancel of the Church of Bredon (m). He was a man of very extenſive learning; and Nath. Carpenter (n) tells us, that "in him the heroical wits of "Jewel, Rainolds, and Hooker, as united into one, ſeemed to triumph anew, and to "have threatened a fatal blow to the Babyloniſh Hierarchy." He was extremely humble, and kept thoſe leathern breeches, in which he came to Oxford, in the ſame wardrobe, where he lodged his Rochet, in which he left that Univerſity (o). He was exemplary in his charity, and very agreeable in converſation. By his firſt wife, Mary, daughter of Dr. Taylor, burnt for the Proteſtant Religion in the reign of Queen Mary, he had ſeveral children, viz. William, a Colonel in the ſervice of King Charles I. and ſlain at the battle of Marſton-Moor in 1644; Matthias, a Captain in the army of that King, who died at London 1646; and three other ſons, who died in their infancy, and were buried in Exeter College; and two daughters, viz. Sarah, married to William Hodges, Archdeacon of Worceſter, and Rector of Ripple in Worceſterſhire; and Elizabeth, married to Dr. Henry Sutton, Rector of Bredon in Worceſterſhire. Our Author had for his ſecond wife, Mary, daughter of Sir Tho. Reynel of Weſt Ogwell in Devonſhire, Knight (p). Cleaveland the Poet wrote an Elogy upon his death.

(l) Idem, ibid. and Walker's Attempt, part 2. p. 78.

(m) Prince, p. 515.

(n) Geography delineated, lib. 2. c. 15.

(o) Lloyd's Memoirs, p. 536.

(p) Prince, p. 514, 515.

"ſhould be the day of trial; the one ſhould tune "the Pſalm in the forenoon, the other in the after-"noon; and he that did beſt pleaſe the people, "ſhould have the place. Which accordingly was "done, and Prideaux loſt it, to his very great grief "and trouble. Upon which, after he became ad-"vanced to one of the firſt dignities of the church, "he would frequently make this reflection, ſaying, "If I could have been Clerk of Ugborow, I had never "been Biſhop of Worceſter."

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral works.] 1. Tabulæ ad Grammaticam Græcam introductoriæ. Oxford 1608, in 4to. 2. Tyrocinium ad Syllogiſmum contexendum. 3. Heptades Logicæ, ſive Monita ad ampliores Tractatus introductoria. Theſe two laſt pieces were printed with the Tabulæ ad Grammaticam Græcam, &c. Mr. David Lloyd obſerves (2), that our Author's Greek Grammar and Logick were both but a fortnight's work. 4. Caſtigatio cujuſdam Circulatoris, qui R. P. Andream Eudæmon-Johannem Cydonium ſoc. Jeſu ſeipſum nuncupat, oppoſita ipſius calumniis, in Epiſtola Iſaaci Caſauboni ad Frontonem Ducæum. Oxford 1614, in 8vo. 5. Alloquium ſereniſſ. Reg. Jacobo Woodſtochio habitum, 24 Aug. 1624. In one ſheet in 4to. 6. Orationes novem inaugurales de totidem Theologiæ apicibus, prout in promotione Doctorum Oxoniæ publicè proponebantur in Comitiis. Oxford 1626, in 4to. 7. Lectiones decem de totidem Religionis Capitibus, præcipuè hoc tempore controverſis, prout publicè habebantur Oxoniæ in Veſperiis. Oxford 1625, in 4to. 8. Lectiones 22, Orationes 13, Conciones 6, & Oratio ad Jacobum Regem. Oxford 1648, in folio. Among which are contained the preceding lectures, orations, and ſpeeches to King James at Woodſtock. 9. Concio ad Artium Baccalaureos pro more habita in Eccleſiâ B. Mariæ Oxon. in die Cinerum in Act. ii. 22. Ann. 1616. 10. Faſciculus Controverſiarum ad Juniorum aut occupatorum captum colligatus, &c. Oxford 1649, 1651, in 4to. 11. Theologiæ Scholaſticæ Syntagma Mnemonicum. Oxford 1651. 12. Conciliorum Synopſis, printed with the Faſciculus. 13. Epiſtola de Epiſcopatu, in folio. 14. Manuductio ad Theologiam Polemicam. Oxford 1657, in 8vo. publiſhed by Mr. Tho. Barlow, afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln, with a Latin Epiſtle before it in the name of the Printer. 15. Hypomnemata Logica, Rhetorica, Phyſica, Metaphyſica, &c. Oxford, in 8vo. 16. Several Sermons, as 1. A Sermon at the Conſecration of Exeter College Chapel, on Luke xix. 46. Oxford 1625, in 4to. 2d. Perez Uzzah: A Sermon before the King at Woodſtock, on 1 Samuel vi. 6, 7. Oxford 1625, in 4to. Both theſe Sermons are printed with another volume, entitled, 17. Twenty Sermons. Oxford 1636, in 4to. The two firſt are entitled, Chriſt's Counſel for ending Law-caſes, dedicated to his kinſman Edmund Prideaux, Eſq; 18. Nine Sermons on ſeveral Occaſions. Oxford 1641, in 4to. 19. A Synopſis of the Councils, ſubjoined to an eaſy and compendious Introduction to Hiſtory, publiſhed in the name of his ſon Matthias Prideaux, but ſuppoſed to be written by the Doctor, or at leaſt for the moſt part. 20. Hiſtories of Succeſſions in States, Countries, or Families, &c. Oxford 1653. 21. Euchologia: Or, The Doctrines of practical praying; being a Legacy left to his daughters in private, directing them to ſuch manifold uſes of our common prayer book, as may ſatisfy upon all occaſions, without looking after new lights from extemporal flaſhes. Dedicated to his daughters, Sarah Hodges, and Elizabeth Sutton. London 1655, in 8vo. 22. The Doctrine of Conſcience, framed according to the form in the Common Prayer; left as a legacy to his wife, containing many caſes of conſcience, and dedicated to Mrs. Mary Prideaux, Relict of the Right Reverend Father in God John, late Lord Biſhop of Worceſter, by T. N. London 1656, in 8vo. 23. Sacred Eloquence: Or, The Art of Rhetoric, as it is laid down in Scripture. London 1659, in 8vo. T.

(2) Memoirs, p. 536.

☞ PRIDEAUX (HUMPHREY) (a), was third ſon of Edmund Prideaux of Padſtow in Cornwall, Eſq; by Bridget daughter of John Moyle of Bake in the ſaid County, and ſiſter to Sir Walter Moyle, father of the late learned and ingenious Walter Moyle, Eſq; He was by both parents deſcended from ancient and honourable families; that of his father having flouriſhed in many places in Devonſhire and Cornwall, as at Prideaux, Orcherton, Addeſton, Thuborough, Tolden, Netherton, Ford Abbey, Padſtow, Gurland, and Nutwell, and being mentioned with great honour by many Writers (b). Our Author was

(a) For the particulars of this article, we are obliged to our Author's ſon, Edmund Prideaux, of Padſtow in Cornwall, Eſq;

(b) Leland, Camden, Carew's Survey of Cornwall, Fuller's Worthies of Devon, Riſdon's Devon.

was born at Padſtow May the 3d 1648, and being a younger brother, was by his parents intended for the Church, and ſent to ſchool, firſt at Leſchard, afterwards to Bodmyn in Cornwall, and from thence to Weſtminſter under Dr. Buſby, where he continued three years. He was then removed to Chriſt Church in Oxford, and entered a Commoner December the 5th 1668, and on the 26th following admitted ſtudent by Dr. Fell, Dean of that College. June the 22d 1672 he commenced Bachelor of Arts; and as ſoon as he had taken that Degree, he was employed by Dean Fell in publiſhing an edition of Lucius Florus, the notes, which he was ordered to put to it, containing only references to the other Hiſtorians, who treat at large of what Florus mentions only in Epitome. After this he had a deſign of publiſhing Johannes Antiochenus Malela, from a manuſcript in the Bodleian library; but as he was ſoon after engaged in publiſhing the Marmora, this work was upon that, as well as other accounts, laid aſide by him, but afterwards publiſhed by Dr. Hody, Profeſſor of Greek in the Univerſity of Oxford. The Lord Henry Howard, then Earl of Norwich, having given to that Univerſity the Arundell marbles, which were the collection of his grandfather, Thomas Earl of Arundell, it was thought proper to have them publiſhed with a comment to explain them; and Mr. Prideaux, though then only Bachelor of Arts, was appointed to it, who publiſhed this work at Oxford in folio under the title of Marmora Oxonienſia ex Arundellianis, Seldenianis, aliiſque conflata, cum perpetuo Commentario [A], in May 1676, he being then one year Maſter of Arts, having taken that degree April 29. 1675. Having been ordered to preſent one of the copies to the then Lord Chancellor Finch, afterwards Earl of Nottingham, this introduced him to the Patronage of his Lordſhip, who in the beginning of the year 1679 preſented him to the Rectory of St. Clement's near Oxford. In the ſame year he publiſhed at Oxford in 4to. two tracts out of Maimonides in Hebrew, with a Latin Verſion and Annotations, under the title of De Jure Pauperis & Peregrini apud Judæos. As he was appointed Hebrew Lecturer of Chriſt Church, he publiſhed this book for the ſervice of that Lecture. About Midſummer 1681, Dr. Aſtley, Dean of Norwich dying, Dr. John Sharp, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, was appointed Dean in his room; and his Prebend in that Church being void, and in the gift of the Lord Chancellor, his Lordſhip wrote a very kind letter to Mr. Prideaux, then at Oxford, to let him know, that he beſtowed it upon him; and accordingly he was inſtalled in it Auguſt the 15th following. On the 15th of November 1682 he was admitted to the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity; and on the 17th of February 1682-3 inſtituted into the Rectory of Bladen cum Capella de Woodſtock in Oxfordſhire [B], on the reſignation of Dr. Marſhal Rector of Lincoln College, and Dean of Glouceſter. In the year 1686 at the public act in Oxford Mr. Prideaux proceeded Doctor of Divinity; and having exchanged his living of Bladen for that of Saham-Tony in Norfolk, as ſoon as the act was over, he left Oxford [C], and ſettled upon his Prebend of Norwich. Soon after this he was engaged in a controverſy with the Papiſts at Norwich concerning the validity of the orders of the Church of England, which produced his book upon that ſubject printed in 1688 in 4to [D]. December the 21ſt 1688 he was inſtalled in the Archdeaconry of Suffolk, to which he was collated by Dr. Lloyd, then Biſhop of Norwich. In the Winter of the year 1689, a convocation being called, he publiſhed his thoughts concerning the matters then in diſpute there in a pamphlet printed in 4to without his name, and entitled, A Letter to a Friend relating to the preſent Convocation. In 1691 upon the death of Dr. Edward Pococke, the Hebrew Profeſſorſhip at Oxford being vacant, it was offered to Dr. Prideaux, but he refuſed it, though he afterwards regretted his refuſal. After the act of toleration many people imagining themſelves at full liberty either to go to Church, or ſtay at home, as they thought proper, by which means the Churches were much deſerted, the Doctor drew up a circular letter directed to the Miniſters of his Archdeaconry, to inform them how that affair ſtood, and that thoſe, who did not ſerve God in ſome place of religious worſhip then tolerated, were liable to the penalties of former ſtatutes. He diſperſed this letter in print through his Archdeaconry, and afterwards publiſhed it at the end of his directions to Church-wardens in 1701. In Eaſter-Term 1697 he publiſhed his Life of Mahomet [E]; and June the 8th 1702 was inſtalled

[A] Publiſhed this work at Oxford in folio under the title of Marmora Oxonienſia, &c.] This book ſuffered by reaſon of the many typographical errors, through the neglect of Mr. Bennet, the public corrector of the preſs; ſo that it was publiſhed with all the faults as it came from the preſs; as likewiſe on account of the Author's being obliged to furniſh a ſheet every week, whether he was ſufficiently prepared or not.

[B] Inſtituted into the Rectory of Bladen cum Capella de Woodſtock in Oxfordſhire.] This living was in the gift of the Lord Keeper Guildford. Mr. Prideaux held it with his place of ſtudent of Chriſt Church, by virtue of his being library keeper, to which there being no other ſalary, except forty ſhillings per ann. to a deputy, the library keeper has the privilege to hold a living with his ſtudent's place.

[C] As ſoon as the act was over he left Oxford.] The laſt thing he did there was to attend the funeral of his great maſter Biſhop Fell, who died on the Saturday of the act, and was buried on the Tueſday following. As ſoon as the Doctor ſaw him put into the ground, he left Oxford, and never went thither more.

[D] Which produced his book upon that ſubject, printed in 1688, in 8vo.] It was entitled, The Validity of the Orders of the Church of England made out againſt the Objections of the Papiſts; in ſeveral Letters to a Gentleman of Norwich, who deſired ſatisfaction therein. It was reprinted in 1715.

[E] His Life of Mahomet.] There were three editions of this printed in the firſt year. Our Author inſtalled Dean of Norwich, on the death of Dr. Henry Fairfax; and on the 3d of December following he preached a Thanſgiving Sermon for the ſucceſs of the expedition to Vigo [F]. In Eaſter Term 1703 he publiſhed his Tract for the vindicating of the juſtice of the preſent eſtabliſhed Law, which gives the ſucceſſor in any Eccleſiaſtical Benefice or Preferment all the profits from the day of avoidance. He wrote this on occaſion of an Act of Parliament, then intended to have altered the preſent Law. It was afterwards reprinted in 1716. About the ſame time he publiſhed an award made by King Charles I. and paſſed under the Great Seal, for ſettling two ſhillings in the pound out of the rents of all grounds, buildings, and edifices, within the city of Norwich, for the ſettled maintenance of the Parochial Clergy; to which he annexed a diſcourſe in vindication of it. This he publiſhed at a time, when an attempt was made to procure an Act of Parliament for that purpoſe; and it was reprinted in 1716. In 1709 he publiſhed his Treatiſe of the original Right of Tythes [G]. In the ſpring of the year 1710 he was cut for the ſtone; which was attended with ſuch circumſtances as interrupted his ſtudies for more than a year; but as ſoon as he returned from London, he reſumed them, and reviſed his book of directions to Church-wardens, the bookſeller having ſignified to him his intentions of publiſhing another edition. He afterwards proceeded with his Connection of the Hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament [H]; which he had begun, when he laid aſide the deſign of writing the Hiſtory of Appropriations: but by the time that he had finiſhed the firſt book, his diſtemper came upon him. He finiſhed the firſt part in 1715, and it was publiſhed in Michaelmas Term that year; and in Hillary Term 1717-18, he publiſhed the ſecond part; both which went through eight editions at London, beſides two or three at Dublin, before the end of the year 1720. The Author of Cato's Letters printed in the London Journal (c) ſtyles this work "a "body of univerſal Hiſtory, written with ſuch capacity, accuracy, induſtry, and honeſty, "as intended to have written an Hiſtory of the Saracen Empire, and with it the decay and fall of the Chriſtian Religion in the Eaſt. He deſigned to have begun it from the death of Mauritius, the Greek Emperor, A. D. 602. The reaſons of his deſiſting from purſuing this deſign are repreſented in the Preface to the Life of Mahomet; and therefore he publiſhed only that part, which contained the Life of that Impoſtor.

(c) See that Journal, No. 121. for Nov. 18. 1721.

[F] Preached a thankſgiving ſermon for the ſucceſs of the expedition to Vigo.] He preached it at the Cathedral of Norwich, and publiſhed it at the requeſt of the Mayor and Aldermen of that City. This was the only ſermon which he ever publiſhed; and could he have followed his own inclinations, it would have been one of the laſt, which he would have choſen for that purpoſe, it containing, according to the nature of ſuch ſermons, little more than an harangue upon the occaſion of the day.

[G] His treatiſe of the Original Right of Tythes.] His firſt intention was to give the Hiſtory of Appropriations; and this book was to have been only an introduction; but it growing too large, he reſolved to publiſh it by itſelf as the firſt part of the work. He had for many years made collections of the Common-Law and Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; notwithſtanding which, he was at a loſs for many things, which he could not have recourſe to without going to London, and conſulting the publick Records there. Beſides, he was about this time ſeized with the calamitous diſtemper of the ſtone; ſo that he was forced to lay aſide that deſign. At the end of this book he publiſhed likewiſe the bill, which he had drawn up for the remedying of the inconveniency, which the Church ſuffers from the holding pluralities; the occaſion whereof is repreſented at the beginning of the treatiſe.

[H] His Connection of the Hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament.] In the preface dated at Norwich Auguſt the 1ſt, 1715, he writes thus: The calamitous diſtemper of the ſtone, and the unfortunate management I fell under being cut for it, having been driven out of the pulpit, in wholly diſabling me from that duty of my profeſſion; that I might not be altogether uſeleſs, I undertook this work, hoping that the clearing of the Sacred Hiſtory by the Profane, the connecting of the Old Teſtament with the New by an account of the times intervening, and the explaining of the Prophecies that were fulfilled in them, might be of great uſe to many. He obſerves afterwards, that ſo little mention having been made of Zoroaſtres by the Weſtern Writers, whether Greek or Latin, the Reader may perchance be ſurprized to find ſo much ſaid of him in this Hiſtory, and his time placed ſo much later, than is vulgarly reckoned. But how ſparing ſoever the Greeks and Latins may have been in ſpeaking of him, what hath been wanting in them, hath been ſufficiently ſupplied by the Perſians and Arabs, who have given us large accounts of him, and have placed his time where truly it was, that is, in the time of Darius Hyſtaſpes King of Perſia. For it was not till after the time of Mahomet, that the Arabs had any literature among them; but the Perſians had it long before. For we find in ſcripture (1), that the Perſians had books and regiſters, in which the actions of their Kings, and the Hiſtories of their reigns were carefully recorded; and Cteſias (2) tells us the ſame, and that it was out of thoſe books and regiſters, that he extracted his Hiſtory, which he wrote of the Aſſyrian and Perſian affairs (3), in twenty-three books. And Perſia being the country which was the ſcene of all Zoroaſter's doings, there it is, that we may moſt likely expect the beſt account of him. And ſince he was there the Founder and great Patriarch of the religion, which was received, and reigned in that country from the time of Darius Hyſtaſpes to the death of Yazdeyerd, for near eleven hundred and fifty years, and conſequently was among them (as he ſtill is among the remainder of that Sect) in the ſame eſteem and veneration, that Mahomet is among the Mahometans, no wonder that much hath been ſaid of him by their Writers. And if thoſe Writers have been as antient, as thoſe of the Greeks and other Nations, I know not why they ſhould not have the ſame authority. I acknowledge many fabulous things have crept into their writings concerning him, as there have into the Roman Legends of their Saints, and for the ſame reaſon, that is, to create in vulgar minds the greater veneration for him. "What "I have out of the latter, I am beholden for to Dr. "Hyde's book De Religione Veterum Perſarum; for I "underſtand not the Perſian language. All that "could be got out of both theſe ſorts of Writers, "concerning him or his religion, that carry with it "any air of truth, is here carefully laid together, as "alſo every thing elſe, that is ſaid of either of them "by the Greeks, or any other authentic Writers. "And out of all this put together, is made up that "account, which I have given of this famous Im-"poſtor. And if the Life of Mahomet, which I have "formerly publiſhed, be compared herewith, it will "appear hereby, how much of the way, which this "latter Impoſtor took for the propagating of his "fraud, had been chalked out to him by the other. "Both of them were very crafty knaves; but Zoroaſ-"tres being a perſon of the greateſt learning of his "time, and the other ſo wholly ignorant of it, that "he could neither write nor read, he was by much "the more eminent of the two, though the other "hath had the greater ſucceſs in the propagation of "his

(1) Ezra, iv. 15, 19. v. 17. vi. 1, 2. Eſther vi. 1.

(2) Apud Diodorum Siculum, lib. 2.

(3) Photius, in Excerptis.

" as make it one of the beſt books that ever came into the world, and ſhews him to be " one of the greateſt men in it: no book was ever more univerſally read and approved. " It is indeed a great publick ſervice done to mankind, and entitles the Author to the " higheſt publick gratitude and honour. But though I never ſaw any great work to " which I found fewer objections; yet as a memorable proof how inſeparably miſtakes " and prejudices cleave to the mind of man, the great and candid Dr. Prideaux is not " without them. I therefore do not upbraid him with them, but rather admire him " for having ſo few. There are however ſome of his theological obſervations, which " ſeem to me not only ill grounded, but to have a tendency to create in his readers wrong " notions of the Deity, and to encourage them to miſtake the common accidents of life, " and the common events of nature, for judgments of God, and to apply them ſuper- " ſtitiouſly as ſuch." There are ſome letters between the Dean and Mr. Walter Moyle relating to ſome paſſages in this work publiſhed in the Miſcellaneous Works of the latter. He died on Sunday November the 1ſt 1724, in the 77th year of his age, after an illneſs of ten days; and was interred, according to his own direction, in the body of the Cathedral

" his Sect, the Magians ſcarce having ever inlarged " themſelves beyond the preſent bounds of the King- " dom of Perſia, and ſome parts of Meſopotamia, A- " rabia, and India; whereas the Mahometans have " overſpread a great part of the world; for which " they have been beholden to the prevailing power " of two mighty Empires erected by them; that is, " that of the Saracens firſt, and next that of the " Turks, who having extended their conqueſts over " many Countries and Kingdoms, have by the power " of the ſword ſubjugated the inhabitants to their " religion, as well as to their Empire." We ſhall ſubjoin here a letter of our Author relating to ſome obſervations upon his book communicated to him.

To John Chamberlayne, Eſq; at Petty-France.

" SIR,

" I have received the favour of yours. I am ſor- " ry to find by your Letter from Carolina, that that " Plantation is under ſo great difficulties, eſpecially " when our difficulties at home will not give us leiſure " to help them. As to what is wrote therein about cir- " cumciſion uſed by ſome in that country, it can in- " fer nothing. They that would have the ten Tribes " of the Kingdom of Samaria to have gone into Tar- " tary, and America to have been planted from that " country, may ſerve themſelves from this particular. " But that conceit will not hold. Thoſe of the ten " Tribes, that continued in their religion, came under " the name of Jews; and thoſe that did not, were ab- " ſorbed among the nations, to whom they joined them- " ſelves. And ſince now the names of the Moabites, Am- " monites, Edomites, and Midianites are utterly loſt, " why ſhould we think the ten Tribes may not in " the ſame manner be loſt alſo? Time wears off all " things in this world, men, families, and alſo na- " tions; and new ones come up in their ſtead. " Sometimes there are diſeaſes that require circum- " ciſion. There is what the Phyſicians call the " Philbert-Prepuce, that is ſo long as to hinder ma- " king water. And we are told, that it was upon " this occaſion that firſt circumciſion came among " the Arabians; that is, their Prepuces were ſo long, " that they were forced to cut off ſome part of them, " that they might conveniently make water.

" As to the obſervations made upon my book by " that Gentleman you mention; I am glad ſo learn- " ed and diſcerning a perſon can find no more than " four particulars, to except againſt in ſo large a " work. As to the firſt of them, it is impoſſible No " Amon could have been Alexandria. Till Alexan- " der built that city, there was nothing there but a " very ſmall village. If we ſuppoſe ſo great a city " ſtood there till deſtroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, there " muſt neceſſarily have been ſome ruins of it left, " when Alexander built his city upon that place; " and if there had, ſome notice muſt have been ta- " ken of them. But none of thoſe Writers, that tell " us of the founding of this city by Alexander, give " the leaſt intimation of any ſuch, but ſome of " them write of it what plainly infers the contrary. " The Prophet Nahum ſpeaks of No Amon to be a " city of better note than Niniveh; but no city in " Egypt could pretend to this, but Thebes, which " had 100 gates, had 700000 inhabitants, and was " 50 miles in compaſs. The place where Alexandria " ſtood, being ſurrounded by the ſea on one ſide, " and by the Lake Maraotis on the other, could not " afford room enough for ſo large a city to ſtand on " it; and yet it muſt be of ſo large extent, if equal " to Ninive. The extent of that city is deſcribed in " my book. The Prophet Nahum deſcribes No A- " mon to be ſituated among the rivers. That Thebes " was, for it was ſurrounded on both ſides by branches " of the Nile. But Alexandria had no river near it. " That which was neareſt, was the branch of the " Nile, that diſcharged itſelf into the Mediterrane- " an at Canopus, which was at the diſtance of 25 " miles from Alexandria. A canal was indeed after- " ward drawn thither from that branch; but this " was the work of the Ptolomies. But that which " makes it moſt probable, that No Amon was The- " bes, is the name, for No Amon in the Coptic " languague ſignifieth the ſame with Dioſpolis, " which is the Greek name of the Egyptian Thebes. " The authorities, which your friend brings, are built " only upon conjecture, and therefore can be valid " no further than the reaſons on which they are " founded. As to the interpolations, it cannot be " ſaid, but Proverbs xxv. 1. there is an interpolation. " And if it may be admitted in one part of ſcripture, " why not in another? Nothing, that has been ſaid " againſt it, carries weight enough to overthrow the " neceſſity of allowing thoſe other interpolations, " which I have mentioned. What is argued for the " antiquity of the points from Matth. v. 18. is the " weakeſt argument that is brought for it. For " what we render tittle, is the Greek original κεραία, " i. e. one corner; and means no more than that, " whereas ſome letters differ only by corners, one ha- " ving a round corner, and another a ſharp corner, as " Daleth and Reſh, theſe ſhall not be changed the " one for the other. As to what he quotes Bux- " torf for, that doth not evince what is ſaid to the " contrary. However, I follow neither party; only " I recite as fairly as I can the arguments on both " ſides; and I declare my opinion different from " both, with which both what he argues from Buxtorf, " and what from Jerom, may well conſiſt. I write " this with a ſick hand, having been confined to my " chamber above a month by a fever, which I can- " not get thoroughly free from. I am, Sir, July 16th, 1716. " Your moſt obliged humble ſervant,

" H. Prideaux.

This letter being communicated by Mr. Chamberlayne to the late Dr. John King, Rector of Chelſea, near London, the latter wrote to him the following letter (4).

" SIR, Decemb. 21. 1716.

" I thank you for communicating to me the learn- " ed Dean of Norwich his letter concerning circum- " ciſion uſed by the Americans in Carolina. And " give me leave to add my ſudden thoughts upon the " matter. Circumciſion was uſed, not as a religious " rite, among the Egyptians in Africa, Arabians, and " divers other people of Aſia, in old time, and ſince " by

(4) Communicated by his ſon-in-law, John Martyn, F.R.S. and Profeſſor of Botany in the Univerſity of Cambridge.

Cathedral of Norwich. He was taken ill about a year before his death, ſo as to be wholly confined to his chamber: he had for ſome time before been very feeble, with paralytic ſhakings in his hands, and rheumatic pains, which were occaſioned by his loſs of blood, in being cut for the ſtone, and the ill management which he fell under afterwards, complained of in the Preface to the firſt volume of his Connection. He was tall of ſtature, and of a ſtrong conſtitution, very regular in his manner of life, ſeldom being out of bed after ten at night, and uſually in his ſtudy by four in the morning.

" by the Saracens, Turks, and Mahometans through" out their dominions upon a religious account. This " Mahomet took from the Jews. Now we know the " Saracens poſſeſſed Barbary, and a conſiderable part
" of Spain, for many ages before the diſcovery of " America. Wherefore if it be neceſſary to think,
" that the Americans muſt have this uſage from
" ſome other people, it is a more probable conjecture
" to think, that ſhips from thence might be driven
" upon the coaſt of America, and ſo have brought
" this cuſtom among them, than by the ambageous
" way of Tartary, where circumciſion is not practi-
" ſed, and which (for ought we know) is not joined " to any part of America. But it cannot be inferred
" from the uſe of circumciſion, that thoſe parts
" were planted by the ten Tribes, or any of them,
" in that round-about way; nor is it neceſſary to con" ceive it, becauſe circumciſion was uſed (as the " Dean obſerves) for removing a natural impediment.
" Herodotus (in Euterpe) obſerves, that the Egyptians
" uſed circumciſion, in order to keep themſelves
" clean; which is exactly the Dean's reaſon. For " it was a difficult matter for thoſe Eaſtern people to " diſcharge nature freely, who had prepuces (accord" ing to ſome Anatomiſts) ſix times as big as the " Europeans. Beſides, the length of theſe prepuces
" was looked upon as an impediment to the ſeminal
" emiſſion, and ſo an hindrance to generation, which " all nations were fond of removing. The Egyptians
" very probably to this end uſed circumciſion to their " male children, and ſomething like it to their females.
" Strabo (Lib. 17.) delivers it as a laudable cuſtom
" among them. Τὰ παιδία περιτέμνειν, καὶ τὰ θήλεα
" ἐκ τέμνειν.
" As to thoſe remarks I made, I am not willing " to inſiſt any farther on them, or give that excellent
" perſon any interruption in his learned labours. I
" muſt own I value and admire his book, and I
" look upon it as written with great knowledge and
" ſound judgment; and it is (I preſume to ſay) one " of the learneſt pieces this age has produced. I
" impatiently expect the ſecond part, which I hope
" will not be long before it be made publick. In " the mean time I deeply lament the ill health of " that learned Dean; I heartily pray for the better
" ſtate thereof, and wiſh him a long life for the " benefit of the learned world." T.

PRIERIAS, or DE PRIERIO (SILVESTER), a Frier of the Order of St. Dominic, was ſo called from his being born in a village of Prierio in Italy (a). He flouriſhed in the beginning of the 16th Century; was looked upon as a learned Divine, an eloquent Preacher, and publiſhed a great many books. He was maſter of the ſacred Palace under Pope Leo X. and ſome ſay that he was promoted, from this employment, to that of General of the Dominicans; but then they do not take notice of the time when he was raiſed to the laſt mentioned dignity. The circumſtance, which makes me think they are miſtaken, is [A], that an Author, who has beſtowed prodigious applauſes on him, takes notice, that he was appointed Vicar-general of the Order of the Dominicans; and would have been promoted ſtill farther, had not envious death prevented him (b). The Senate of Venice had honoured him with a Profeſſorſhip in the Univerſity of Padua (c), whence he had been invited to Rome to the like employment, with a publick ſtipend; and was afterwards appointed maſter of the ſacred Palace (d). He was no ways ſucceſsful in writing againſt Luther [B]. It is ſaid he was the firſt who took up the pen againſt him. Onuphrius Panvinius (e), and many other Writers are of this opinion; nevertheleſs, ſome aſſert that the Divines of Louvain, and certain others have diſputed this priority with him (f). I have read in Antonius Senenſis, that the firſt book he wrote againſt Luther was printed at Rome in 1520, and entitled, Errata & Argumenta Martini

(a) In the territory of Monferrat, according to ſome, or the Aſtezan, according to others; but to point out juſtly the ſituation of this place, I muſt obſerve that it is in the Montferrat of Savoy; between the Marquiſate of Ceve and that of Final, and very near the city of Ceve.

(b) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. 1. p. 209.

(c) Du Pin, Tom. 14. p. 115, affirms, that he was a long time Profeſſor of Divinity in Bologna.

(d) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. 1. p. 209.

(e) Onuph. in Chron. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1521. apud Anton. Senenſem, in Bibl. Prædicat. p. m. 223.

(f) Labbe, Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 374.

[A] The circumſtance which makes me think they are miſtaken.] Beſides the reaſon given by me in the text, I ſhall obſerve here, that Auguſtin ab Eccleſia, who wrote the hiſtory of the Prelates of Piedmont, has joined to it a long liſt of all the Eccleſiaſticks of the Dominions of the Duke of Savoy, on both ſides the Alps, who were Generals of the Order; but he makes no mention of Silveſter Prierias (1). He nevertheleſs had heard of him; for he obſerves, in his Corona Regia Sabaudica, that Prierias was born in Prierio, a village of weſtern Liguria, in the Marquiſate of Ceve (2).

(1) This rem. was communicated to me by Mr. Minutoli.

(2) See Oldoini, in Athenæo Liguſtico.

[B] He was no ways ſucceſsful in writing againſt Luther.] The firſt thing which this Reformer combatted was the Doctrine of Indulgences. He oppoſed them with arguments drawn from reaſon; but Eckius and Prierias who anſwered him, not being able to ſuſtain the attack, had recourſe to common anſwers, and laid down as the foundation or principle, ... the authority of the Popes, and the authority of the Schoolmen; concluding, that indulgences ought to be conſidered as an article of faith, ſince they proceeded from the Pope, who could not err in any manner in matters of faith, and had approved the Doctrine of the Schoolmen (3). Here follows Father Maimbourg's judgment on this method of anſwering. " Silveſter Prierias, inſtead of refuting
" ſolidly, as he might have done, the anſwer which " Luther had made to his piece, drew up another, in " which he amplified in a prodigious degree, the Pa-
" pal power and authority, which he raiſes infinitely
" higher than that of all Councils, of which he ſpeaks
" in ſuch expreſſions, as even the Court of Rome
" would not approve; a circumſtance that gave Lu" ther an opportunity of rendering this authority
" odious to the Germans; and of making a diver-
" ſion, by ſticking cloſe to ſo nice a point, which " then was not the matter in diſpute. So very ne-
" ceſſary it is, in combating Hereticks, not to deviate
" ever ſo little from the maxims of the faith, with" out medling unſeaſonably, and with a prejudiced
" mind, with litigious queſtions; in which a perſon
" gives his opponent the advantage of being able to " maintain his opinion, with as much right as he " has to combat it (4)." No circumſtance can better ſhew the ill ſucceſs of Prierias's writings, than his being ordered by the Pope, not to write any more on thoſe controverſial ſubjects. Reſpondit Sylveſter Prierias tam feliciter, ut ipſe pontifex indixerit illi ſilentium (5).

(3) Fra. Paolo, Hiſt. of the Council of Trent, lib. 1. p. 6. See alſo Pallavicino's Hiſtory of the ſame Council, lib. 1. chap. 6. num. 3.

(4) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de Lutheran. lib. 1. p. 30, 31. Dutch edit.

(5) Eraſm. Epiſt. 71. lib. 19. p. m. 887.

[C] The

tini Lutheri recitata, detecta, & repulsa, &c. (b); but this is a false assertion [C]. The reader may see in the answer to Questions d'un Provincial (b) an error of Moreri copied by Du Pin. Prierias, in his answer to Luther, boasts his having refused a Bishoprick (i). He was very loose in point of morality; he affirming that it is not even necessary, in order to be justified in the sacrament of penance, to have attrition; and that it is sufficient, if a person is sorry for not having it, or even desirous to be sorry for it (k). His doctrine against equivocations is not much better [D].

(g) Anton. Senensis, in Bibl. Prædicat. p. 223.

(b) Page 619. Tom. 1.

(i) Seckend. Hist. Lutheran. lib. 1. n. 39. col. 1.

(k) Journal de Trevoux, Sept. 1703. p. 1623. French edit.

[Prierias was named Mozolini. He was born about the year of our Lord 1460; had published a book in 1496; and was carried off by the plague at Rome in 1523 *.]

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 978. col. 2.

[C] The first book he wrote against Luther . . . . . was not printed in 1520.] Luther, as early as the year 1518, published a treatise or answer to a dialogue which Prierias had writ against him (6). Prierias answered him, by a work entitled, de juridica & irrefragabili veritate Romanæ Ecclesiæ Romanique Pontificis, Liber tertius, index quidem longissimus, sed brevissimum Epitoma (7). Luther refuted this answer the same year 1518. I do not pretend to assert, that Prierias's first book against Luther was not printed at Rome in 1520, as Antonius Sinenses and du Pin (8) affirm: all I assert is, that it had been printed before that year. By the way, I am of opinion, that John Eckius, a learned Divine, wrote his Obelisks, in opposition to Luther's Theses on Indulgences, before Prierias took the pen in hand; but he did not intend to publish that piece; and I am of opinion, that it was Luther who published it jointly with his refutation. He had procured a manuscript copy of this little work of John Eckius (9). Let it be observed, that John Tezel, a Dominican Frier, and Inquisitor in Germany, and the first Commissioner for the promulgating of Indulgences, first began to write against Luther; for, in a publick disputation at Franckfort on the Oder, he offered a Theses, in which he attacked that of Luther; and had before published a little piece, in the German tongue, in opposition to a sermon preached by Luther against Indulgences (10).

(6) See Seckendorf, Hist. Lutheran. lib. 1. p. 31. col. 1.

(7) Seckend. ib. p. 39. col. 1.

(8) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. 14. p. 115. Dutch edit.

(9) See Seckend. Hist. Lutheran. lib. 1. p. 30. ad ann. 1518.

(10) Seckend. ibid. p. 25 and 26. See also Du Pin, Tom. 13. p. 33.

[D] His doctrine concerning equivocations is not much better.] I shall quote this particular, as we find it in the Anti-Coton. "This Andrew Eudemonojohannes "Cydonius, page 40, builds on the authority of Sylvester, in the 5th accusation or charge, question "13, where he says, When the Judge does not proceed "judicially, because the party accused is not simply subject "to him, or for some other reason; in this case, though a "lie be unlawful it yet is not a mortal sin; because "it is not contrary to the dictates of justice, nor given in "just judgment, but usurped. A lie will not even be a "venial sin, if, in answering craftily, and, as we say, "sophistically, he advances something which is false, "as the Judge understands it, but true, according to "him: because in this case, not being his subject, he is "not obliged to speak the truth *. We must understand, "that by this judgment which is not truly so, but "usurped over those who are not subject to him, he "means the authority which Civil Magistrates have "over the Clergy, and chiefly over the Jesuits, who "even are not subject to Bishops (11)." Eudæmon Johannes, the Jesuit, had quoted these words of Prierias, in his apology for Garnet. His answer to the Author of the Anti-Coton is as follows. Sylvestri verba profers non infideliter . . . . . sed Gallice pervertis potius quam vertis: quero enim ex te ubi illa legeris in verbis Sylvestri, Voire le mensonge ne sera pas meme peché veniel? Imo, inquit ille, non erit etiam veniale si respondendo, &c. Tu ut mendaciis totus scates, de tuo verbis ejus mendacium addidisti, cum ita verteris mendacium non erit peccatum veniale. Nunquam somniavit vir ille mendacium ullum esse posse, quod peccatum minimum veniale non sit; sed negavit peccatum esse veniale cum injusto judice æquivocationibus agere, quod ipsum S. Gregorius docuit (12) i. e. "You cite Sylvester's words "faithfully, but then you pervert, rather than translate them into French; for I would ask where "you read the following words in his book, Voire le "mensonge ne sera pas meme peché veniel (a lie will "not even be a venial sin). What he says, it will "not even be a venial sin, if in answering, &c. You, "(as you utter nothing but lies) have added to his "words a lie of your own, in your translating it "thus; a lie will not be a venial sin. That Author "never imagined, that there could be such a thing "as a lie, which is not a venial sin; but he declared "that it was not a venial sin, to employ equivoca-"tions, in presence of an incompetent Judge, which "very thing was taught even by St. Gregory." It is very probable, that by these words he means the authority of Magistrates; the Author of the Anti-Coton hints at our Sylvester, and not Eudæmon Johannes. In this case he is guilty of a blunder; for the book whence the passage was taken, quoted in Garnet's Apology, was writ long before the Society of Jesus appeared in the world. It was dedicated to Pope Leo X, who died in 1521. Eudæmon Johannes (13) did not forget to criticise the Author of the Anti-Coton upon that head. He censures him (14) also for not understanding that V. Accusat. signifies, Voce Accusatio (under the word accusation,) and not the fifth accusation or charge.

* Quando juridice non procedit, vel quia accusatus ei non est subjectus simpliciter, vel in hoc casu, aut quacunque alia de causa, tunc licet mendacium sit illicitum, non tamen est mortale, quia nec contra debitum justitiæ, nec est in judicio vero, sed in usurpato. Immo non erit etiam veniale, si respondendo cautelose & ut aiunt sophistice dicat aliquid falsum apud sensum judicis & apud suum verum.

(11) Anti-Coton, p. 24.

(12) Eudæmon Joannes, Anti-Coton. Confutat. cap. 3. p. 113.

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 114.

(14) Ibid. p. 112.

PRIEZAC (DANIEL DE), Counsellor of State in Ordinary, born in the Castle of Priezac in Limosin (a), was chosen in 1639 to fill the only seat that was vacant, to complete the number forty in the French Academy (b). He wrote several books [A], and died in 1662.

(a) Pellisson, Hist. de l'Acad. Franc. p. 229.

(b) Idem, ibid.

[A] He wrote several books.] Pellisson's words shall serve as a Commentary on this (1). "His printed "works are, Observations against Melrose's books, intituled, Philip the Prudent. Vindiciæ Gallicæ. Three "volumes concerning the Privileges of the Virgin. Disceptatio legitima, in controversia mota inter Apostolicæ "Cameræ cognitorem, Actorem: & Eminentissimos Cardinales Barberinos, excellentissimumque urbis Romæ "Præfectum; Defensores. A volume, in 4to, of Political Discourses. He is now (2) writing a second vo-"lume." I am to observe, that the Vindiciæ Gallicæ is an answer to the Mars Gallicus of Jansenius.

(1) Pellisson, Hist. de l'Acad. Franc. p.m. 354.

(2) Pellisson wrote this in 1652.

PRIOLO (BENJAMIN), in Latin Priolus, Author of an History of France from the death of Lewis XIII. to the year 1664, was born at St. John d'Angeli the 1st of January 1602. He descended from the Priuli, or Prioli, an illustrious family, some of which were Doges of Venice [A]. He was but fifteen when his father and mother died; a circumstance that no doubt increased the difficulties he had to struggle with in the course of

[A] He descended from the Priuli or Prioli, an illustrious family, some of whom were Doges of Venice.] ANTHONY PRIOLI, nephew of LAURENCE and JEROM PRIOLI, brothers, and successively Doges of Venice, came very young into France, in the reign of Henry II. with an Embassador of the Loredano family, his uncle by the mother's side. He fell in love with the daughter of a Gentleman of Saintonge, who was come to Paris about a considerable law-suit. He married the young Lady; and taking her to Venice, met with so ill a reception there from the Republick and his relations, that a resolution was taken to annul their

of his ſtudies, and which nevertheleſs did not abate the paſſion he had for learning; a paſſion ſo ſtrong, that he frequently uſed to paſs whole days and nights in ſtudy (a). He ſtudied at Orthez, next at Montaubon, and afterwards at Leyden. He profited by the Lectures of Heinſius and Voſſius, in the laſt mentioned city; and during three years application he got perfectly well acquainted with the Greek and Latin Poets and Hiſtorians. He went to Paris, prompted ſolely by the deſire of ſeeing and conſulting Grotius; and went afterwards to Padua, invited by the exalted reputation of Cremoninus and Licetus, under whom he completely learnt the opinions of Ariſtotle, and thoſe of the other Philoſophers of antiquity. He returned to France, whence he went again into Italy, there to get himſelf recognized by the houſe of Prioli, as one of their relations [B]. He their marriage. It would have been annulled accordingly, purſuant to the laws, if the Embaſſador, who repreſented in France the whole republick, had not ſigned the marriage contract, for which he was cenſured by a decree in 1554; and it was reſolved, that Anthony and his poſterity ſhould be excluded from all the poſts and employments of the Senate. Upon this ill ſucceſs he left Venice; and having ſecured his effects, he returned to France, and ſettled in his wife's native place, at St. John d'Angeli. He had a great many children: the eldeſt ſon, named MARK, was the father of JULIAN, who was the father of BENJAMIN, whoſe article I am now writing. Julian ruined himſelf by his four marriages, and by the great ſums he expended in war, being the firſt Officer of the regiment de la Force. Benjamin was brought him by his fourth wife. He put his father's name under the copper-plate engraved by the famous Pitau, prefixed to his Hiſtory of France, and ſtill ſold at the Print-ſellers. The inſcription runs thus, Benjaminus Priolus Santo. Juliani F. Eques Venetus, Rerum Gallicarum Scriptor florentiſſimus. This ſhews Sorbiere's miſtakes with reſpect to the father of Benjamin Priolo.

(a) Tanta fuit in illo diſcendi intemperies, ut noctes diebus continuaret evolvendo quidquid volumi-num edidit Romana aut Graia vetuſtas. Johannes Rhodius, de Vita Benjamini Prioli, p. 3.

This family increaſed conſiderably, and was naturalized under Charles IX. as foreign Nobility; and, under Henry IV. they all turned Proteſtants. Several eminent Proteſtant Miniſters ſprung from them (1). They were ſolicited, by a letter (2) written by Leonardo Donato, the Doge, to return to Venice; but did not care to accept of the invitation, they being well ſettled in France. They did not trouble themſelves any more about Venice; but it may be proved, that they always pretended to have come originally from that city; this, I ſay, may be proved, by a paſſage in the Recherches de la Nobleſſe, printed at Montaubon in 1616. The Author, one Mr. de Roque, a Gentleman of Bearne, affirms, that the Prioleau (for thus he ſpells it) (3) of Saintonge and le Pais Rochelois, did not come originally from Venice, as ſome of them pretended, in a great number of records in the reign of Henry III; but that they are Gentlemen deſcended from remote anceſtors, who were deſirous of deriving their pedigree from the Venetians, from the ſimilitude of their names to that of the family of the noble Prioli, from whom two Princes ſprung. This paſſage, though it contains a falſity, refutes palpably the Sorberiana. The falſity I ſpeak of appears evidently by the good ſucceſs of Benjamin Priolo, in proving his extraction from the Prioli of Venice. The genealogical memorial preſented by him having been examined, the Republick decreed that a patent ſhould be iſſued, which he received accordingly from the hands of Mr. Grimani, Embaſſador of France in 1660, with a gold chain, and a gold medal of three hundred piſtoles value. By that patent the Senate recognized him as a noble Venetian Knight. The arms of the family of Prioli are blazoned, and added to the ſeal, and round about, Non data, non conceſſa, ſed adnata, ſenatus decreto. The title is alſo in Latin, but the reſt in Italian. At the ſame time Priolo received a congratulatory letter from Laurence Prioli, Proveditor of the ſea, and who, at that time, was the head of the family.

It muſt be obſerved, that the Commonwealth of Venice is the country where the baſtards of the Nobility are moſt rejected, and have the leaſt notice taken of them. Their fathers even won't own them, and utterly abandon them; it not being the cuſtom of the noble Venetians to have, reſpectively, private miſtreſſes; but go to proſtitutes, and join for the maintaining one of them between them. By this means they avoid being jealous of one another; but if their miſtreſs proves with child, they all diſown it (4).

(1) A nephew of Benjamin was the Proteſtant Paſtor of the Church of Niort.

(2) Dated the 15th of April, 1608.

(3) I know from perſons of credit, that ſome Miniſters of that country wrote their name Prioleau. But the Reader muſt obſerve, that as there is little difference in the pronunciation throughout all parts of France, whether we write Priolo, or Prioleau, and the French not being very accurate, it is no wonder the pronunciation ſhould have varied in that family.

[B] He went again into Italy, where he got himſelf recognized by the houſe of Prioli, as one of their relations.] In this manner I paraphraſe the following Latin words of John Rhodius, In Italiam reverſus eſt, quærendis apud Venetos originis ſuæ primordiis (5). It is added, that the Senate of Venice gave Benjamin Priolo a very gracious reception, and knighted him, but without admitting him to the prerogatives of his family; this not being allowed by the laws of the Republick, becauſe he deſcended from Anthony Prioli, who had married a foreign woman, out of the Venetian territories. Blande acceptus à Senatu, factus eques, ſed excluſus generis ſui prærogativa, quoniam Antonius Priolus ejus avus paternus, qui Princeps fuit Reip. Venetorum, non potuit legitimum matrimonium extra urbem & cum extera contraxiſſe ſalvis patriæ legibus (6). This Author ſhould not have ſaid that Anthony Prioli was Doge; and he ought to have called him Benjamin's great-grandfather, not his grandfather. He likewiſe is miſtaken with reſpect to the time; the patent iſſued by the Senate, by which Benjamin was acknowledged to be of the Prioli family, being dated in 1660. As to what he ſays at the end of his Elogium (7), that Priolo turned Eccleſiaſtick after his wife's death; this is an arrant falſity.

(4) Extracted from a manuſcript.

(5) Johannes Rhodius, de Vitæ Benjamini Prioli, p. 4.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Ipſe pater ſe ſacris addixit, rerum humanarum & ſæculi pertæſus, pervicacis, ingrati. Idem, ibid. p. 7.

Here follows two paſſages, which will confirm the particulars I advanced in the preceding remark. Priolo, ſpeaking of the town of St. John d'Angeli, makes the following ſhort digreſſion: Ibi mea infantia vagiit, hic aerem primum hauſi. Hæc terra, mihi atavis Venetis, iiſque illuſtribus, neſcio quo caſu, primum tacta. Si decora meæ gentis à me intermiſſa ſunt, forſan nepotibus inſtaurabuntur; & Sant Angelium olim me alumno gaudebit (8). "It was there I firſt drew breath, and "my infant cries were heard. It was there, by I "know not what chance, that I was brought into "the world, my anceſtors being illuſtrious Venetians. "If the honours of my family are loſt with regard to "me, they perhaps may be reſtored to my poſterity; "and St. Angeli may one day boaſt of having educated "me." It is plain that he glories publickly in being deſcended from a noble family of Venice. He does the ſame in the dedication of his work to the Commonwealth of Venice. O patria! ſays he, ô vaſti pelagi dominatrix! agnoſce tuum civem, vel ſolo nomine Prioli tibi dilectum. i. e. "My native country! thou So-"vereign of the boundleſs ocean! acknowledge thy "Citizen, dear to thee by the ſingle name of Prioli."

(8) Priolus, de Rebus Gallicis, lib. 6. num. 38. p. m. 283.

ADVERTISEMENT to the Reader once for all.

By the way I muſt intreat my Readers to be very attentive to what follows. There is a ſingle difference between other hiſtorical dictionaries, and this. I do not, like the Authors of thoſe dictionaries, barely draw the out-lines, as it were, of perſons lives; but collect, as far as the few books I have will permit me, the moſt ſingular and remarkable paſſages; the judgments which have been formed of the perſons I write upon, and the errors which have been committed concerning them. I examine, diſcuſs, prove, and refute, as occaſion may offer. But when I have not any proofs to refute a falſity, I am obliged to leave it unrefuted; and my ſilence in that reſpect is not a ſign that I warrant the truth of the facts mentioned by me. Thoſe whoſe words I quote, and whoſe works I cite, muſt be anſwerable for what they advance. It is ſufficient for me to refute the falſities, which I know to be ſuch; and to be always ready to refute thoſe which may be pointed out to me, or ſuch as my own reſearches may diſcover daily to me. This I am ever extremely ready to do; and no perſon can do me a greater pleaſure, than to communicate to me proofs and illuſtra-

He devoted himſelf to Duke de Rohan [C], then in the Venetian ſervice; and inſinuated himſelf ſo much into his favour, that he become one of his moſt intimate confidents during the remainder of his days. He ſent him twice to Spain on important negotiations, and left to him the management of all particular affairs, all the time that he commanded the troops of France in the Valteline, and the territory of the Griſons. Priolo was in all the engagements, and fought both on foot and on horſeback (b). Uncertain of what his fate would be after this Duke's death, he retired to Geneva, having married, three months before, Elizabeth Michaeli, a Lady of a very noble family (c). He purchaſed a country-ſeat at Saconnet, near Geneva, and there repoſed himſelf after all the toils and fatigues he had before gone through. The Duke de Longueville drew him from this retirement, upon his being appointed Plenipotentiary from the Court of France, for the treaty of Munſter; for that Nobleman being deſirous of taking him thither, as a perſon whoſe genius and counſels might be of great advantage to him, our Priolo reſolved to leave Geneva and ſettle in Paris [D]. He ſtaid ſix months in Lyons, and there had frequent conferences with Cardinal Francis Barberini, on controverted doctrines. The effect of theſe conferences was, that himſelf, his wife, his children and ſervants, abjured the Proteſtant religion, and immediately received the communion from the hands of that Cardinal. However, he was not long eaſy at Paris; for the civil war breaking out ſoon after, he joined with the Malecontents, which proved the ruin of his fortune (d). All theſe particulars I extracted from a Latin piece written by John Rhodius, and printed at Padua in 1662. The following particulars come from another hand. Dazzled with the glory of the Prince, with whom he had ſided, he could not be prevailed upon to pay a due regard to the favours which the Queen-mother beſtowed upon him, nor liſten to the mighty promiſes made him by Cardinal Mazarine. This plunged him into ill fortune, he being obliged to retire to Flanders, upon which his eſtate was confiſcated, and his family baniſhed. Being afterwards reſtored to the favour of his Sovereign, he was reſolved to lead a retired life; to devote himſelf to ſtudy; and to ſupport himſelf on the wrecks of illuſtrations neceſſary for the rectifying of errors (9) of other Authors, inſerted in this work on their credit and authority. I ſhall ever be ready to do every thing that juſtice and truth require. I can be poſitive on this article; having ſounded my own mind, and can give proofs of it. For inſtance, I was extremely well pleaſed at having an opportunity to prove the Author of the Sorberiana guilty of fraud, or a miſtake, with reſpect to Benjamin Priolo's father, &c. I have another obſervation to offer. A falſity reflecting on an honourable family would be deſpiſed, were it publiſhed only in ſome pamphlet, or ſuch like piece, that ſoon ſinks into oblivion; but if it be inſerted in a voluminous work, and particularly in thoſe folio volumes called Dictionaries, it gives greater pain. For this kind of works ſhorten ſo much, by their being writ in an alphabetical order, the reſearches of the curious, that men will have them, in ſmall as well as large libraries, even when they are ill digeſted. Hence there is reaſon to fear, that the particulars they contain may ſpread univerſally, and laſt to lateſt poſterity. But it ought to be conſidered, at leaſt as to my work, that my bare relating of any incident does not increaſe the number of authorities. Did I cite them without quoting any perſon, I ſhould ſet up myſelf as a new authority or evidence; but as I quote the expreſs words of the ſeveral Authors, whoſe names I ſet down in the margin, what I ſay is grounded wholly on their authority. A looſe ſheet or pamphlet, one of the ana volumes, a heap of ſeveral incoherent collections, found in Sorbiere's ſtudy, and containing random diſcourſes that happened in converſation, do not become more weighty and conſiderable becauſe they are cited in a large work. They are the individual things they were, and nothing more. And it may be obſerved, that of all particulars which form the ſubject of converſation, none are leſs to be depended upon than ſuch as relate to the origin of families. For the inſtant any man riſes in the world, envy on one hand, or flattery on the other, ſoon invent falſities advantageous or diſadvantageous to him. Theſe are ſoon ſpread, but with this difference, that ſatyrical falſities ſpread faſter, and are ſooner believed, than flattering falſhoods.

(b) In Rhætia & Tellina valle, cum Gallicis armis præeſſet Rohanius, Priolus omnia pro nutu verſavit. Prœliis variis illic cum Germanis & Iberis certatum: ubique interfuit: pugnavit eques, & pedes. Johannes Rhodius, de Vita Benjamini Prioli, p. 4.

(c) Cum ante trimeſtre uxorem duxiſſet Elizabetham Michaeliam, illuſtri genere, ſcilicet atavis editam principibus Lucenſis Reip. & Michaeliis patriciis Venetis, unde Principes non pauci. Idem, ib.

(d) Extracted from Rhodius, de Vita Benjamini Prioli.

(9) This ought alſo to be underſtood of ſuch errors as I myſelf commit.

[C] He devoted himſelf to Duke de Rohan.] The expreſſion of John Rhodius, incidit illic in infelicem Rohanii Ducem (10), ought to be corrected. It ſeems to imply, that chance firſt brought Priolo acquainted with the Duke de Rohan. The firſt is, that Priolo's family had devoted itſelf to the houſe of Rohan, and that he was godſon to the Duke de Soubiſe, brother to the Duke of Rohan. It is to be obſerved, that he did not enter into that Duke's family in quality of Phyſician, nor was afterwards his Secretary (11), as is affirmed in the Sorberiana. I have been informed, that he lived under no other character with the Duke, but that of being his Fac totum; and that he had no more ſkill in phyſic than what may be attained by a general ſtudy of philoſophy.

(10) Johannes Rhodius, de Vit. Benjamini Prioli, p. 4.

(11) Patin declares he was. See citation (17) hereunder.

[D] Our Priolo reſolved to leave Geneva, and ſettle in Paris.] All ſuch as read this narrative with attention, will find it incoherent; and be no ways ſatisfied with a relation, where there are ſo many chaſms, and ſo little connexion. They might cenſure me on that account, did I not take care to point out Rhodius's error, and correct it. This Author has ſhewn on this occaſion, that it is eaſier to write in good Latin the compendious hiſtory of a famous man, than to prevent great chaſms aud omiſſions in the relation of an affair. Is it not a very incoherent way of relating a ſtory, to ſay, that a man went and ſettled in Paris, becauſe the Duke de Longueville would take him to Munſter, and not mention whether he accepted that Duke's propoſals? Longavillanus Dux ad conventum Monaſterienſem cum ſumma poteſtate de pace Legatus iturus, eò Priolum invitavit, ejus operâ & conſilio uſurus in tam arduo negotio. Hinc illi decretum Geneva relicta irrevocabilem pedem Lutetiæ figere, quò totam familiam. . . . . deduxit. Lugduni ſex menſes remanſit. . . . . Non diu tranquillè Lutetiæ egit, cum derepentè ſtudia partium exarſere, & bella civilia cœpta (12). i. e. "The Duke de Longueville being ſent to "the congreſs at Munſter, with full powers to treat "of a peace, invited Prioli to that city, being deſirous "of making uſe of his counſel and aſſiſtance in ſo "difficult a negotiation. Upon this Prioli, leaving "Geneva, went to Paris, with his whole family, "fully determined to ſettle there for life. He re"ſided ſix months in Lyons. . . . But did not enjoy "much quiet at Paris; party rage ſoon breaking out, "and the horrors of Civil War." To fill up the chaſm left by this Author, I muſt inform the reader, that Priolo left Geneva, and ſet out for Munſter, in compliance with the Duke de Longueville's requeſt. He ſtaid there about a year, and afterwards returned to Geneva, whence he went to France in order to ſettle in Paris. In Munſter he contracted a very intimate friendſhip with Chigi the Nuncio, who was afterwards Pope Alexander VII. He wrote him a congratulatory letter in Latin, as ſoon as he heard of his being raiſed to the Pontificate; and received a very devout anſwer from the Pontiff, with ſome medals, &c. The of the Storm by which he had been buffetted. It was at this time, and to divert his melancholy, that he wrote [E], without the leaſt flattery or partiality, a Hiſtory [F], which has borne ſeveral impreſſions, and the beſt edition whereof is that of Leipſick, printed in 1686 [G]. However, he was again employed in negotiations; ſince, in 1667, he was appointed to go to Venice, upon a ſecret affair. This circumſtance was known by the credentials found among his papers, and drawn up by Mr. Lionne. He did not go to the end of his journey, being ſeized with an apoplectick fit, of which he died, in the Archbiſhop's palace in Lyons. I had declared in the firſt edition merely upon hearſay, that he died in the Hoſpital; but I now correct this error; and proteſt ſincerely, that I related this upon the authority of thoſe who told me this particular in Geneva; people whom I had reaſon to believe were well acquainted with this particular, and who, having a great eſteem for this Author, mentioned this circumſtance only as an inſtance of the ill fate of men of letters. It was in pity to him, and to ſhew the caprice and injuſtice of the age in which he lived, that they mentioned this, on occaſion of Prierius Valerianus's work De Infelicitate Litteratorum, which ſome of the company had mentioned. I alſo ſtrike out the paſſage I had cited from the Sorberiana; I having been informed, by perſons

(12) Rhodius, de Vit. Benjamini Prioli, p. 4 and 5.

Duke de Longueville was ſo well ſatisfied with his ſervices, that he aſſigned him a penſion of twelve hundred Livres on the principality of Neufchâtel (13); and a little before his death, he made him a preſent of twelve hundred crowns, as the laſt token of his affection (14).

(13) It was paid till that Prince died.

(14) Extracted from the above-mentioned Memoir.

[E] It was . . . . to divert his melancholy, that he wrote a Hiſtory of France.] He repreſents himſelf as a man who had met with great misfortunes; and declares, that the only motive of his attempting to write hiſtory was, to divert his melancholy, he being oppreſſed with ill fortune. Inter maximas ærumnas natus eſt hic fœtus, quem lincturus eram, ſi licuiſſet. Paſſim notabuntur veſtigia minus alacris animi. Quid reſpondeam, non habeo. Humanæ imbecillitatis ingens patrocinium neceſſitas. Non fama, ſed requies mihi quæſita: fallendis innumeris tædiis, ipſe me damnavi in hanc arenam (15). i. e. "This embrio was brought "forth in the midſt of calamities; and had it been "in my power, I would have ſhaped it into ſome "form. The reader will perceive, every now and "then, ſtrokes which denote a mind no ways at eaſe. "I know not what anſwer to make on this occaſion. "The grand plea for human weakneſs is neceſſity. I "did not thirſt after fame, eaſe being the only "thing I ſought for; and I ſet myſelf this taſk, "to divert the numberleſs gloomy reflections which "brood over my mind." We ſhould have had a particular account of his troubles, were his life, written by himſelf, publiſhed. This is one of the books he promiſed to the publick, as the reader will find hereunder (16).

(15) Benjam. Priolus, Lectori ad calcem Hiſtoriæ.

(16) In the rem. [I].

[F] He wrote . . . . without the leaſt flattery or partiality a hiſtory.] The particulars I related from it in the article of Marſhal de GUEBRIANT's Lady, plainly ſhew, that the Author was not afraid of publiſhing things, which might diſpleaſe the Great. What he has told concerning the Ducheſs of Longueville proves his great boldneſs in that particular. Patin went upon a fallacious probability, when he wrote as follows. Mr. Priolo, formerly Secretary to the late Duke de Rohan, wrote the Hiſtory of France in Latin, from the death of the late King, in gratiam Mazarini. His work is entitled, Conatus Hiſtorici. There muſt be a great deal of flattery in it; but that is eſſential to the age for which God was pleaſed to reſerve us (17).

(17) Patin, Letter 200. p. 190. Tom. 2. It is dated the 14th of Sept. 1660.

Sorel did not form ſuch a judgment, but rather was of a contrary opinion (18). The Author was ſo far from baſe flattery, that having obtained the King's licence, he thought it would be proper, before he made uſe of it for printing his whole work, to ſee what the principal Courtiers would ſay of the liberty he took. Accordingly he firſt publiſhed (19) an epitome of his hiſtory in one book, in which he ſoftened his pen; and yet ſome Miniſters thought him too bold, and let him know, that they would not ſuffer it to be printed, unleſs his book ſhould be caſtrated by ſuch examiners as they might appoint. Priolo made his remonſtrances to the King, who gave him leave to print his hiſtory in Charleville (20), which was accordingly done in 1665, and the work was allowed to be ſold publickly in France (21). This edition is in quarto, and is not entitled Conatus Hiſtorici, but Benjamini Prioli ab exceſſu Ludovici XIII. de Rebus Gallicis Hiſtoriarum libri XII. It was thrice reprinted in foreign countries; once in Utrecht (22), and twice at Leipſic.

(18) See Sorel's Bibl. Franc. p. 366, 367. Paris edit. 1667.

(19) Paris, by Cramoiſi, 1662.

(20) A city belonging to the Duke of Mantua, and ſtanding on the Meuſe, between Sedan and Charlemont.

(21) From the above-mentioned Memoir.

(22) In 1669, 12mo.

I muſt not omit, that this work of Priolo is cited in Auberi's life of Cardinal Mazarine; in the Prince of Conde's life, and in ſome other books. I am certain that, had it been written in French, with all the fire and vivacity that is ſeen in the Latin, it would have borne above ten impreſſions. It would be infinitely pleaſing to thoſe who are fond of the modern taſte, which took place ſince our Author's death; it being filled with thoſe characters and pictures, which are now ſo much in vogue. Tacitus's phraſeology is ſeen in almoſt every part of it, and is introduced very happily and naturally. I take no notice of ſeveral ſecret intrigues our Author reveals, and which he had from the firſt hand. We find, by the works of Count Galeazzo Gualdo Priorato, and by the particular memoirs of the Regency, that he was employed in negotiations.

[G] The beſt edition is that of Leipſick, printed in 1686 (23).] It contains ſome letters, which the Author had ſuppreſſed in the edition of Charleville; ſome very good alphabetical tables or indexes, and likewiſe ſome curious and very inſtructive notes (24). It alſo includes a Latin verſion of the particulars mentioned, concerning this work, in the Journal des Savans (25). Mr. Gallois gave ſo ingenious a turn to the opinion he entertained of it, that the Author had reaſon to be diſſatisfied, and at the ſame time had no good pretence to complain; ſo true it is, that ſome jokes are offenſive, and yet the perſon levelled at by them does not dare to ſhew his reſentment: ſuch jokes are very perplexing (26). The Latin Tranſlator has not preſerved all the delicacy of the rallery: I will even be ſo bold as to ſay, that he has not only enervated the laſt period, but alſo altered the ſenſe of it, of which the Reader may judge. The Journaliſts words are as follow: Had I not propoſed to forbear giving my opinion of the books mentioned in this Journal, the ſtyle of this Hiſtory is, perhaps, the circumſtance I ſhould leaſt cenſure (27). Now compare this with this Latin: Ita ut niſi omnino propoſitum eſſet abſtinere à librorum judicio, de quibus in his Ephemeridibus nonnullæ (28) ſolent proferri, diceretur fortaſſe, ſtylum hujus hiſtoriæ ejus eſſe generis, in quo vix quicquam occurrat quod correctionem mereatur. This Tranſlator ſuppoſes, that Mr. Gallois had ſaid, that Mr. Priolo's ſtyle is ſo good, that it ſcarce wants any correction. But he is far from having ſaid this. His thought is, that the Hiſtory he ſpeaks of does not deſerve to be cenſured ſo much with regard to the ſtyle, as for other particulars. He therefore ought to have tranſlated it thus: In ſtylo hujus hiſtoriæ pauciora quam in cæteris omnibus fortaſſe reprehenderem. I am to obſerve, that the Author was not ſurprized to find that the ſpecimen of his work gave offence to ſome perſons of a ſevere turn of mind, and even to thoſe of a devout caſt; he looking on this as a mark of the merit of his work: Procul tetrici & moroſi, ſays he (29), immo devoti. Tales me carpſerunt lecto primo meo libro. Eorum flagello patientiam indulſi, Boni argumentum talibus diſplicere. i. e. "Avaunt ye ſevere and moroſe, "and even ye devotees. Theſe cenſured my firſt "book, and I ſubmitted with patience to their rod, "as it is an argument of merit to diſguſt perſons of "that

(23) It is in 8vo, and the 2d edit. printed in that town.

(24) See rem. [I], of the art. GUEBRIANT.

(25) Of Feb. 22, 1666.

(26) Heu quam miſerum eſt, ab eo lædi de quo non poſſis queri! Publ. Syrus.

(27) Journal des Savans, 22 Feb. 1666. p. m. 159, 160.

(28) We don't know what this adjective refers to; and what ſenſe ſoever he gives it, it cannot be that of the original.

(29) In his advertiſement to the Reader, at the end of the work.

perſons of undoubted credit, that Sorbiere was groſly miſtaken, as is manifeſt from the remarks I point out (e). I would have refuted him, in the firſt edition (f), had I then known the particulars requiſite for that purpoſe. Priolo left ſeven children, who, by their father's death, loſt the penſions ſettled on him; but his name ſupported them, and they ſupported it in their turn; and have been in very flouriſhing circumſtances for theſe many years [H]. I know not whether the books he intended for the preſs will be publiſhed [I]. It is pity they were not printed. I ſhall cite ſome of his maxims [K], and the judgment he formed of Cicero, Livy, and the moſt celebrated Authors of ancient Rome [L].

(e) The remarks [A] and [B] of this article.

(f) See the cloſe of the rem. [B].

PRIOR

" that ſtamp." He confeſſes that he never was at any ſchool or univerſity (30). Wherefore then (will it be aſked) does he acknowledge in his dedication to the Doge and Senate of Venice, that he is obliged, for his beſt inſtructions, to the univerſity of Padua? Illa veſtra Antenorea altrix mei, dulcis Artium parens . . . me ſuis præceptis imbuit . . . . hæc me docuit à celſa mentis arce deſpicere errantes, & ex veris cauſis ſcire, ſub quantis tenebris jaceret mortalium dies. i. e. " In " your univerſity of Padua which nouriſhed me, " (the fond mother of arts,) I imbibed my firſt inſtruc- " tions. . . . It was ſhe taught me to ſurvey, from " the lofty ſummit of the mind, mortals wandering " below; and to diſcover the true cauſes, why their " ſteps are overſpread with ſo deep a gloom." I anſwer, that he does not contradict himſelf; his meaning is, that he had taught himſelf the Latin tongue, without the aſſiſtance of a maſter; but he does not ſay the ſame of the ſciences; he owning that he had been taught by the Profeſſors at Padua.

(30) Etſi nullas ſcholas nec Academias unquam viderim, & nullo niſi me præceptore uſus ſim, nemo tamen me temere debet arbitrari niſi Latini ſermonis bene peritus. Ibid.

There ſeems to be a more real contradiction between him and Rhodius: and yet they may be reconciled, by ſuppoſing (31) that Priolo was indeed ſent to Orthez and Montauban to learn the Claſſicks; but that he could not be prevailed upon to follow his maſter's rules, and learned the Latin tongue by a method different from theirs.

(31) I have been aſſured that it was ſo.

[H] Priolo left ſeven children, who . . . . loſt the penſions ſettled on him . . . . but they have been in very flouriſhing circumſtances for theſe many years.] Cardinal Mazarin had left him, by his will (32), a penſion of fifteen hundred livres, aſſigned on the entire legacy of Duke de Mazarin; and the King, when he gave him a licence for printing his Hiſtory, in 1661, ſettled a yearly penſion of two thouſand livres. This appears from the then preſent State of France, in the liſt of the Literati. Though his family loſt this glorious income by his death, they found other helps, the Court taking care of them. Mr. Colbert placed the eldeſt ſon in the Finances, and he has raiſed himſelf conſiderably. The younger ſon, though under twenty, was admitted into the Life-guard. He is now Exempt in the firſt troop (33). Three of his five daughters are Nuns; and the two others hold the chief rank among the Gentlewomen belonging to two of the moſt conſiderable Ducheſſes of the Court. The eldeſt of the Nuns was Prioreſs in the royal monaſtery of Chaillot; and, in 1692, was appointed, by his Majeſty, to go and eſtabliſh the rule now obſerved by the Ladies of the royal houſe of St. Cyr, near Verſailles. She is the ſpiritual Foundreſs of it (34).

(32) It is in print.

(33) I writ this in April 1701.

(34) Extracted from the above-ſaid Memoir.

[I] I know not whether the books he intended for the preſs will be publiſhed.] The following words are found in the laſt page of his Hiſtory: Opera Benjamini Prioli brevi edenda. Vitanda in vita, ſeu de ſtultitia humanæ gentis, Lib. 4. Quæſtionum naturalium, ſeu de re plantaria veterum & recentiorum, Lib. 3. Opus Emunctum, triginta annorum Meditatio, quod jam celebratur ſub apertiori titulo, & falsò nonnulli ſibi aſſcripſerunt. De Vita & Geſtis Henrici Rohannii Ducis. De Vita & Moribus Cæſaris Cremonini. Vita Benjamini Prioli. Judicium de Scriptoribus Græcis & Latinis. Epiſtolarum Senilium ad Maximos Europæ Proceres Centuria ſingularis.

It is very probable, that the Life of this Author will be publiſhed, prefixed to a work (35) drawn up from the maxims found among his papers, and which form a natural image of the heart of man, according to the various events of life.

(35) By his ſon.

[K] I ſhall cite ſome of his maxims.] Man, did he uſe to ſay, poſſeſſes but three things, the ſoul, the body, and wealth. Theſe are expoſed continually to three ſorts of ambuſcades or enſnaring attacks; the ſoul to that of Divines, the body to that of Phyſicians, and wealth to that of Counſellors and Lawyers. Rhodius expreſſes this as follows: Cùm tribus tantùm homo conſtet, anima, corpore, & bonis: tres inſidiatores illis perpetuò imminere: adulterinos Theologos animæ per laqueos conſcientiæ injectos, nihil ad bonos mores, & ſolidam pietatem: medicos corpori, per pharmaca noxia, cùm ruſticatio, diæta, & mens hilaris, ſola morbis opitulentur: bonis rabulas forenſes, per litium articulos & formulas, cùm per arbitros idoneos amputandæ ſint radices, creſcentibus ſine fine familiarum malis (36). " Divines " enſnare the ſoul by lulling aſleep the conſcience, " and uttering things which are far from promoting " true piety and virtue: Phyſicians enſnare the body, " by their hurtful medicines; whereas a country " life, proper food, and a chearful mind, beſt cure " diſeaſes. Lawyers enſnare our wealth, by their " quirks and chicane; whereas the only way to put " an end to conteſts is to chooſe proper arbiters." A wiſe man ought not to be too forward, if he is deſirous of ſucceeding at Court; the only way to obtain one's deſires, is to uſe patience, judgment, and ſubmiſſion. A man muſt not be over familiar with any perſon; i. e. ſuch a man muſt reveal no more than what he is willing ſhould be made publick; for what can be more abſurd than to expect that others will be more faithful to you, than you have been to yourſelf (37)? A man muſt eſpecially ſhun, in Courts, the ſnares laid by the fair ſex. Cavendum præſertim in aulâ à fallacibus fœminarum vinclis: omnes nugaces eſſe, infidas, & judicii modicas, nunquam eodem tenore mentis & animi (38). Lewdneſs is the completion of all evils; it wounding the ſoul, the body, the reputation; and, what moſt affects debauchees, it empties their purſe. It is a folly to marry, unleſs a man be particularly obliged to take a wife, to prevent his family from being extinct. A man is ſcarce able to conduct himſelf; and therefore ought not to undertake to conduct that, which of all things is moſt ungovernable. Rhodius expreſſes theſe ſeveral particulars much better than I. Scortationem ultimum malorum, indecoram, noxiam, probroſam; animum, corpus, famam, & quod magis diſſolutum hominem afficit, crumenam lædentem. Quæcunque uni venditat ſui corporis jura, cuilibet ſine diſcrimine ſui copiam facit. Uxorem ducere, inſanum; ſi eos excipias, qui propagando ſanguini hoc debent ſuis penatibus; vix potens humana vis ſe regere, adſciſcit difficillimum quod regat, ut qui remigiis vix lembum ſubigit, remulcum adjungit (39). He had ſo ſtrong an averſion to a lie, that he could not hear lying ſpoken of without falling into a violent paſſion; and there was not any thing he recommended with greater earneſtneſs to his children, than to ſhun that fault, and to lead a pious life. Every Chriſtian (did he uſe to ſay) ought to keep clear from lying; and every Gentleman, though not a Chriſtian, ought to ſhun that vice. He bore a mortal hatred to thoſe who ridiculed the ſcriptures. Mendacium ita averſabatur, ut ad ſolam mentionem excandeſceret, nihil prius veritate & pietate in Deum, liberis commendans. Omnem Chriſtianum à mendacio alienum eſſe debere; nobilem autem, etiamſi Chriſtianus non ſit. In deriſores Scripturæ Sacræ, quorum hoc ſeculum feraciſſimum, inexpiabili odio flagrabat (40). He was a very ſtrict obſerver of juſtice, but paid little regard to the exterior of religion (41). This re-calls to my memory that Montagne, though not very devout, proteſts that he had a natural averſion to lying (42).

(36) Jo. Rhodius, de Vita Benjam. Prioli, p. 6. See Caſtiglione's Cortigiano, lib. 2. p. m. 295.

(37) Nulli ſe facere nimis ſodalem oportere, id eſt, nihil revelare, niſi quod publici juris eſſe velis. Nam quid ineptius quam putare aliquem tibi magis fidum, quam tibi ipſe fuiſti? Idem, ibid.

(38) Idem, ibid.

(39) Idem, ibid.

(40) Idem, ibid. p. 7.

(41) Juſti & æqui ſervantiſſimus, religionis parum, quæ quidem in externis actibus verſatur, Idem, ib. p. 5.

[L] I ſhall cite . . . the judgment he formed of Cicero, Livy, and the moſt celebrated Writers of ancient Rome.] He was no great admirer of Cicero. He admired Livy, and thought him inimitable; for which reaſon, believing it would be impoſſible for him ever to come up to that model, he reſolved to imitate Tacitus. He

(42) See chap. 17. book 2. of Montagne's Eſſays, p. m. 579, 580.

☞ PRIOR (MATTHEW), an eminent Engliſh Poet, was ſon of Mr. George Prior, Citizen of London, and joiner, and was born in that city in 1664 (a). His father dying while he was very young, left him to the care of an uncle, a Vintner near Charing-Croſs, who diſcharged the truſt repoſed in him with a tenderneſs truly paternal, as our Author always acknowledged with the higheſt gratitude. He received part of his education at Weſtminſter-ſchool, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage; but was afterwards taken home by his uncle, in order to be bred up to his trade. However, at his leiſure hours he proſecuted his ſtudy of the Claſſics, and eſpecially of his favourite Horace; by which means he was ſoon taken notice of by the polite company, who reſorted to his uncle's houſe. It happened one day, that the Earl of Dorſet being at this tavern, which he frequented, with ſeveral Gentlemen of Rank, the diſcourſe turned upon the Odes of Horace; and the company being divided in their ſentiments about a paſſage in that Poet, one of the Gentlemen ſaid, I find we are not like to agree in our criticiſms; but if I am not miſtaken, there is a young fellow in the houſe, who is able to ſet us all right: upon was ſo paſſionately fond of Seneca, that no man could be more ſo. He preferred Lucan to Virgil, and the tenderneſs of Catullus to the majeſty of Horace. But Rhodius, his good friend and panegyriſt, thinks this taſte a little odd. Senecam deperibat: neſcio quo malo genio M. Tullium ingentem virum, Romanæ eloquentiæ patrem, non admiratus eſt: cæteros ad unguem tenebat. Tit. Livium inimitabilem prædicabat, ideoque deſperans, nobis poſteriſque Tacitum repræſentavit. Lucanum præferebat Virgilio: quis hoc credat? & teneras Catulli amationes Horatianæ majeſtati (43). The judgments he gives are certainly not regular and juſt; for a man, who admires Livy more than Tacitus, ſhould naturally place Tully far above Seneca, and Virgil far above Lucan. The eloquence of Cicero, of Livy, and Virgil, their character and genius are pretty much of the ſame kind (44). Theſe are Authors who do not pretend to ſhine; they diffuſing, without affectation, a light that embelliſhes the whole work, as every part naturally requires it; a light that is not intended to dazzle, like that of ſome Writers, who, inſtead of letting every reaſon through its proper medium, have recourſe to a kind of Dioptricks, to collect together a numberleſs multitude of rays, in order to caſt the greater light. This is their chief aim and ſtudy. Thus Seneca, the two Plinys, and Tacitus, have done. Lucan, in like manner, toils and tortures himſelf, to hit upon expreſſions of an extraordinary kind, and to give himſelf airs of grandeur. Theſe, it muſt be confeſſed, were very great genius's; and they, perhaps, would have writ more naturally, had they lived in the ſame age with Cicero, Livy, and Virgil; but they began to ſtudy at the time when the Romans were beginning to have a depraved taſte. The ſame happened to the Romans, as to thoſe who are too much uſed to drinking excellent wines: their taſte palls, and they cannot raiſe it but by drinking brandy, or the ſtrongeſt liquors that the art of man can poſſibly invent. A majeſtic, natural and uniform eloquence began to be flat and inſipid, as ſoon as they had been accuſtomed to it; they required witty ſtrokes and bright ſallies; they were deſirous of walking, not by the light of the ſun, this not being ſtrong or piercing enough, but by the flaſhes of lightning. The French began to be infected with the ſame diſeaſe. Seneca and Tacitus gave into that taſte, and were afraid of not being eſteemed, in caſe they wrote like the Authors of the golden age. However this be, their ſtyle is directly oppoſite to that of Livy. How then could Priolo be charmed with that great Hiſtorian and Seneca at the ſame time? How came he to admire Lucan more than Virgil, and Seneca more than Tully? Such a taſte is no ways regular. But no perſon can give a reaſon why his taſte differs from others, and it is a ſubject that will hardly admit of controverſy. Let us therefore reſt ſatisfied with the fact; and confirm, from the teſtimony of Priolo, that of his panegyriſt. Here follows what he himſelf ſays with regard to his taſte for Livy (45): De me equidem dixero, ſi quis ævi priſci inflexit ſenſus, fuit ille Livius, quem unicum ſcriptorem Romanum imperium tulit majeſtate ſuâ dignum. Ita ſpiritus & quaſi voces repræſentabat, ut & agere eadem & loqui credas dicendi genere non anxio, ſed limpido, & quod me torquet, non imitabili. . . . . Ego deſperatione Livianæ imitationis (46) nulli me addicere decrevi. Priolo declares it here as his opinion, that Livy was a Writer worthy the Majeſty of the Roman Empire. That he repreſents ſo ſtrongly the very ſpirit and words of perſons, that one would imagine they were ſpeaking and acting. That he does this, not in a laboured, but a clear ſtyle, and which (to his great grief) was inimitable. That deſpairing to imitate Livy, he was determined not to imitate any one. The following paſſage relates to Priolo's admiration of Seneca. Ego M. Tullium magni ſemper feci; ſed ſi hodie viveret, ſtylum immutaret. Seneca, qui eum ingenio & judicio longiſſime ſuperavit, uſus eſt dicendi genere auribus ſui temporis accommodato, nec de imitatione Tulliana unquam cogitavit, jactatæ puritati arenam ſuam ſine calce præferens. Certè mirari ſatis non poſſum eorum ingenia, qui quicquid altum ſpirat, inflatum & tumidum appellant. Tales Lucanum, tales Statium ſuæ cenſuræ ſubjiciunt (47). i. e. "I always had the higheſt regard for Tully; but were he now living, he "would change his ſtyle. Seneca, who far exceeded "him in genius and judgment, writ in a ſtyle ſuited "to the ears of his Contemporaries; nor ever thought "of imitating that of Cicero, preferring his own "ſand without chalk or lime, to that Author's boaſted purity. I indeed cannot enough wonder at the "genius of thoſe people, who give the name of "inflated and fuſtian to every thing lofty. Theſe "perſons cenſure Lucan and Statius." Here alſo follows what he confeſſes with regard to his imitation of Tacitus: Profiteor me furem eſſe notæ rapacitatis, habeo piceatas manus, omnia rapio. Taciti & aliorum audax prædo, crudas ejus paginas in opus meum propello. Poteram adſcito fuco diſſimulare, non curavi. Niſi centonibus ſtylum animes in deſita lingua, quid niſi languidum & emortuum expectandum (48). i. e. "I confeſs my "ſelf to be a moſt rapacious thief; my hands are "pitchy, and ſnatch at every thing. I am a bold "plunderer of Tacitus and other Authors; and I take "whole indigeſted pages from him, and inſert them "in my work. I might have diſſembled my thefts, "but would not. If we don't animate a dead tongue "with paſſages from the ancients, what can be expected but a flat and lifeleſs work?" Coſſard the Jeſuit criticized his ſtyle; and to him, if I miſtake not, the following ſharp reply is directed (49). Meum ſtylum abruptum, inæqualem, immo, (ut verbis ejuſdem ſcioli utar) nullum; ſcatere paginam centonibus & furtis. Scias, ô blenne, quiſquis es, familiares mihi à puero antiquos ſcriptores, in aula & in caſtris aliquando lectos, nunc ſeſe offerre non vocatos, & ab hinc quadraginta annis nequidem eos libaſſe, & dictaſſe totam hanc Hiſtoriam inter ambulandum, ne litura quidem imperata: tantum abeſt, ut bis aliquid unquam ſcripſerim. i. e. "That my ſtyle is disjointed, unequal, and (to uſe this "Sciolift's words) no ſtyle at all, and crowded with "borrowed paſſages. But know, thou dunce, whoſoever thou art, that I have been converſant with "the ancients from my childhood; that I ſtudied "them formerly both in the Court and Camp; and that "they now preſent themſelves uninvoked. That I "have not looked into them for theſe forty years, "and dictated all this enſuing Hiſtory as I walked "up and down, without making the leaſt raſure; "ſo far am I from having writ any thing twice." The cloſe of this paſſage ſhews us the manner in which this Hiſtory of France was writ, the Author having dictated it as he walked, without blotting out one word; a circumſtance that is very extraordinary.

(a) Memoirs of the Life of Mr. Prior, by Samuel Humphreys, Eſq; p. 1. prefixed to the 3d volume of Prior's Poems on ſeveral Occaſions, 3d edit. London 1733.

(43) Jo. Rhodius, de Vita Benjam. Priuli, p. 7.

(44) Setting aſide the difference which depends, 1ſt, on the character of the ſubjects treated by ſome; 2d, between proſe and verſe.

(45) Priolus, ad Lectorem, in limine Hiſtoriæ, folio, m. c. 3 verſo.

(46) He ſays, that Buchanan endeavoured, but in vain, to write in Livy's manner. Buchananus Titum Livium præſtare nobis conatus eſt; certè vigeſies à capite ad calcem antequam ad ſuum opus ſe accingeret, eum lectitaſſe perhibetur. . . . . Buchananus, illius equidem ſimia eſt, tantum ab eo diſtans, quantum ſimia ab homine. Idem, bid.

(47) Idem, ibid. folio, c. 4.

(48) Idem, folio c. 5.

(49) Idem, ibid. in fine libri C c. 4 verſo.

[A] Brought

upon which he named Mr. Prior, who was immediately ſent for and deſired to give his opinion of Horace's meaning in the Ode under debate. This he did with great modeſty, and ſo much to the ſatisfaction of the company, that the Earl of Dorſet from that moment determined to remove him from the ſtation which he was in, to one more agreeable to his genius; and accordingly procured him to be ſent to St. John's College in Cambridge (b), where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1686 (c), and afterwards became Fellow of that College. During his reſidence in the Univerſity he contracted an intimate friendſhip with Charles Montague, afterwards Earl of Halifax; in conjunction with whom he wrote a very humorous piece, entitled, The Hind and the Panther, tranſverſed to the Story of the Country-Mouſe and the City-Mouſe, printed in 1687 in 4to. in anſwer to Mr. Dryden's Poem called The Hind and the Panther, publiſhed the year before. Upon the Revolution Mr. Prior was brought to Court by his great Patron, the Earl of Dorſet [A], by whoſe intereſt he was introduced into the ſcene of publick employment, and in 1690 was made Secretary to the Earl of Berkely, Plenipotentiary for King William and Queen Mary at the Congreſs at the Hague (d). In this ſtation he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that he was afterwards appointed Secretary to the Earls of Pembroke and Jerſey, and Sir Joſeph Williamſon, Embaſſadors and Plenipotentiaries at the Treaty of Ryſwick in 1697; as he was likewiſe in 1698 to the Earl of Portland, Embaſſador to the Court of France. While he was in France, one of the Officers of the French King's Houſhold ſhewing him the Royal Apartments and curioſities at Verſailles, eſpecially the paintings of Le Brun, wherein the victories of Lewis XIV. are deſcribed, aſked him, whether King William's actions were alſo to be ſeen in his palace? No, Sir, anſwered Mr. Prior; the monuments of my Maſter's actions are to be ſeen every where but in his own houſe (e). He was likewiſe in 1697 made Secretary of State for Ireland (f), and in 1700 was created Maſter of Arts by Mandamus, and appointed one of the Lords Commiſſioners of Trade and Plantations, upon the reſignation of Mr. Locke (g), and was Member of Parliament for Eaſt Grinſtead in Suſſex. In 1710 he was ſuppoſed to have had a ſhare in writing The Examiner, and particularly a criticiſm in it upon a Poem of Dr. Gaſth to the Earl of Godolphin [B]; which criticiſm occaſioned Mr. Addiſon to

(b) Ibid. p. 2, 3.

(c) From the College Regiſter.

(d) Oldmixon's Hiſtory of England, during the Reigns of King William and Q. Mary, Q. Anne, and K. George I. p. 150. edit. Lond. 1735. in folio.

(e) Ibid. p. 178.

(f) See his Epitaph.

(g) Oldmixon, ubi ſupra, p. 210.

[A] Brought to Court by his great patron, the Earl of Dorſet.] In 1689 he wrote the following epiſtle to Fleetwood Shephard, Eſq; publiſhed in the third volume of his Poems, which will inform us of ſome circumſtances relating to him.

" When crowding folks, with ſtrange ill faces,
" When making legs, and begging places,
" And ſome with patents, ſome with merit,
" Tir'd out my good Lord Dorſet's ſpirit;
" Sneaking I ſtood among the crew,
" Deſiring much to ſpeak with you.
" I waited while the clock ſtruck thrice,
" And footman brought out fifty lies;
" Till patience vext, and legs grown weary,
" I thought it was in vain to tarry;
" But did opine it might be better
" By penny-poſt to ſend a letter.
" Now if you miſs of this epiſtle,
" I'm baulk'd again, and may go whiſtle.
" My buſineſs, Sir, you'll quickly gueſs,
" Is to deſire ſome little place;
" And fair pretenſions I have for't,
" Much need and very ſmall deſert.
" Whene'er I writ to you, I wanted;
" I always begg'd, you always granted.
" Now, as you took me up when little,
" Gave me my learning and my vittle;
" Aſk'd for me from my Lord (1) things fitting,
" Kind as I'd been of your begetting;
" Confirm what formerly you've given,
" Nor leave me now at ſix and ſevens
" As Sunderland has left Mun Stephens.
" No family, that takes a whelp,
" When firſt he laps, and ſcarce can yelp,
" Neglects, or turns him out of gate,
" When he's grown up to Dog's eſtate:
" Nor periſh, if they once adopt
" The ſpurious brats by ſtrollers dropt,
" Leave them, when grown up luſty fellows,
" To the wide world, that is the gallows:
" No thank them for their love, that's worſe,
" Than if they'd throttl'd them at nurſe.
" My uncle, reſt his ſoul, when living,
" Might have contriv'd me ways of thriving;
" Taught me with cider to repleniſh
" My vats or ebbing tide of rheniſh;
" So when for hock I drew prickt white wine,
" Swear't had the flavour, and was right wine;
" Or ſent me with ten pounds to Furni-
" Val's Inn, to ſome good rogue-attorney;
" Where now by forging deeds, and cheating,
" I'ad found ſome handſome ways of getting.
" All this you made me quit to follow
" That ſneaking whey-fac'd God Apollo;
" Sent me among a fiddling crew
" Of folks, I'ad never ſeen nor knew;
" Calliope, and God knows who.
" To add no more invectives to it,
" You ſpoil'd a youth to make a poet.
" In common juſtice, Sir, there's no man,
" That makes the whore, but keeps the woman.
" Among all honeſt Chriſtian people,
" Whoe'er breaks limbs, maintains the cripple.
" The ſum of all I have to ſay,
" Is that you'd put me in ſome way,
" And your petitioner ſhall pray.
" There's one thing more I had almoſt ſlipt,
" But that may do as well in poſtſcript:
" My friend Charles Montague's preferr'd,
" Nor would I have it long obſerv'd,
" That one mouſe (2) eats, while t'other's ſtarv'd."

(1) Dorſet.

(2) Alluding to the City Mouſe and Country Mouſe, written by Mr. Montague and himſelf.

[B] Suppoſed to have had a ſhare in writing The Examiner, and particularly a criticiſm in it upon a Poem of Dr. Garth's to the Earl of Godolphin.] That Poem was as follows:

Whilſt weeping Europe bends beneath her ills,
And where the ſword deſtroys not, famine kills,
Our iſle enjoys by your ſucceſsful care
The pomp of peace amidſt the woes of war.
So much the public to your prudence owes,
You think no labours long for our repoſe.
Such conduct, ſuch integrity are ſhown,
There are no coffers empty but your own.
From mean dependence merit you retrieve,
Unaſk'd you offer, and unſeen you give.
Your favour like the Nile increaſe beſtows,
And yet conceals the ſource from whence it flows.
So poiz'd your paſſions are, we find no frown,
If funds oppreſt not, and if commerce run.
Taxes diminiſh'd, liberty entire,
Thoſe are the grants your ſervices require.
Thus far the ſtate-machine wants no repair;
But moves in matchleſs order by your care;
Free from confuſion, ſettled, and ſerene,
And like the univerſe by ſprings unſeen.

But

to attack our Author with great ſeverity in his Whig Examiner [C]. In 1711 Mr. Prior was made one of the Commiſſioners of the Cuſtoms, and was ſent Miniſter Plenipotentiary to France for the negotiating a peace with that Kingdom. Soon after the acceſſion

But now ſome ſtar, ſiniſter to our prayers,
Contrives new ſchemes, and calls you from affairs.
No anguiſh in your looks, nor cares appear,
But how to teach th' unpractis'd crew to ſteer.
Thus like ſome victim, no conſtraint you need,
To expiate their offence, by whom you bleed.
Ingratitude's a weed in ev'ry clime;
It thrives too faſt at firſt, but fades in time.
The God of day and your own lot's the ſame,
The vapours you have rais'd obſcure your flame;
But tho' you ſuffer, and a while retreat,
Your globe of light looks larger as you ſet.

The criticiſm upon this Poem was publiſhed in a letter to the Examiner, Numb. VI. for Thurſday September the 7th 1710. and the Author of it obſerves, that there does not appear either Poetry, Grammar, or deſign in the compoſition of that Poem. " The " whole, ſays he, ſeems to be, as the ſixth edition " of the Diſpenſary happily expreſſes it, A ſtrong un- " laboured Impotence of thought. If we examine it " by the new teſt of good poetry, which the Doctor " himſelf has eſtabliſhed, pleaſing at firſt bluſh, has " this piece the leaſt title even to that? Or if " we compare it with the only pattern, as he thinks, " of juſt writing in this kind, Ovid, is there any " thing in De Triſtibus ſo wild, ſo childiſh, ſo flat? " What can the ingenious Doctor mean? Or at what " time could he write theſe verſes? Half of the " Poem is a panegyric on a Lord Treaſurer in being; " and the reſt a compliment of condolance to an " Earl that has loſt the ſtaff. In thirty lines his pa- " tron is a River, the primum mobile, a pilot, a vic- " tim, the ſun, any thing, and nothing. He beſtows " increaſe, conceals his ſource, makes the machine move, " teaches to ſteer, expiates our offences, raiſes vapours, " and looks larger as he ſets. Nor is the choice of " his expreſſions leſs exquiſite than that of his ſimi- lies. For Commerce to run, paſſions to be poiz'd, " merit to be retriev'd from dependence, and a machine " to be ſerene, is perfectly new. The Doctor has a " happy talent at invention, and has had the glory of " enriching our language by his phraſes, as much as " he has improved medicine by his bills.

" But to be more particular:

" And where th' ſword deſtroys not (ſays our Pane- " gyriſt) famine kills.

" I could wiſh the verſe would have allowed of " the word plague or peſtilence, for I ſuppoſe that is " what the Author means. I have heard of the " plague at Dantzick; but what part of Europe fa- " mine rages in, I know not. Why won't phyſic " ſtand here? It is better ſenſe, and runs as well. " What the Pomp of Peace is, I as little compre- " hend, as how it can be enjoyed amidſt the woes of " War.

" Such conduct, ſuch integrity, are ſhown,
" There are no coffers empty but your own.

" Since there is little poetry in this couplet, I wiſh " there were more truth in it. Some coffers I have " heard were empty three weeks ago; and if they " are not ſo ſtill, the notion is more obliged to the " Doctor's unpractiſed crew than to the experienced " pilot.

" Unaſk'd you offer.

" A great diſcovery! I always thought till now, " he that was aſked might be ſaid to give, but not " properly to offer. The malicious part of the " world will, I doubt, be apt to obſerve, that this " ſentence, as it ſtands here, is as true in fact, as " it is exact in language.

" Your favour, like the Nile, increaſe beſtows.

" If the beauty of the ſimile is to be judged of by " the frequent uſe, which the Poets of all ages have " made of it, ſcarce any can come in competition " with the Doctor's River. The Nile on theſe occa- " ſions is as trite as the ſtories of Icarus and Phaeton. " I remember I uſed it when I was about twelve, " in a new-year's-gift to my uncle, and was heartily " aſhamed of it a year after. A ſchool-boy can no " more miſs the Nile, than a French Author, when " he dedicates to the Grand Monarch, can live with- " out the ſun, that other ſimile, in which the Doc- " tor rejoices.

" ——Some ſtar ſiniſter to our prayers
" Contrives new ſchemes.

" Alii legunt five ſtars, which makes this paſſage " intelligible. I have often heard Aſtrologers talk " of a ſort of influence, that ſtars have upon human " affairs; but I know of no ſtars but thoſe in Mr. " Bickerſtaff's conſtellation, that ever contrived ſchemes, " and thoſe too were erected under no very benign " aſpect.

" My Lord's care, he tells us, is to teach the un- " practiſed crew to ſteer. By crew we are to under- " ſtand the Lords of the Treaſury. A very civil " expreſſion! but as to the ſenſe of it, what affinity " is there between crew and ſteering? Is ſteering the " buſineſs of the whole ſhip's crew? This is a true " image of the Whig-ſcheme, where every man is " his own pilot."

If we read the next two lines, we ſhall find theſe people have wounded him, and yet like the beſt natured victim imaginable, he needs no conſtraint to expatiate their offences. All this is what the French call Gallimatias, and what the Engliſh Critics term nonſenſe. But what follows? For whom you bleed. Bleed? What is the Devil in the Doctor to mention ſuch a word, and give ſo unlucky a hint? I hoped that this point had been ſo well guarded, that here could be no farther need of an act of ſecurity.

The God of day, and your own lot's the ſame.

A hundred pound for a genitive caſe, as old Buſby uſed to cry out upon ſuch an occaſion.

But to go on from Grammar to decency. Of this happineſs of Great Britain is any part aſcribed to the Queen? To this machine, which moves ſo like the univerſe, does the Royal Hand give any turn? Methinks he might at leaſt allow her Majeſty as much as his friends did in the Coronation Medal, VICEM GERIT ILLA. But, as the Poet obſerves, Ingratitude's a weed of every clime.

He will give me leave in my own turn to obſerve, that in Don Sebaſtian it is,

Ingratitude's the growth of ev'ry clime.

What occaſion was there of altering a verſe he thought fit to ſteal? This is being a mere Banditti in poetry, to rob and murder too. But who is to be charged with this ingratitude? The whole body of the nation did indeed wiſh the treaſurer out, but it was her Majeſty only that could diſplace him. Such are the compliments, which the Crown receives from this Anti-monarchicl Academy. Excellent Poets, dutiful Subjects!

I could give you many more obſervations upon the beauties of this ſublime panegyric, if I had my Longinus by me. It has been corrected, I find, twice or thrice already; and if the Author corrects it once more, I am ſo well acquainted with his lucky performances that way, that I do not doubt but I ſhall be tempted to write to you again upon the ſame ſubject. He will not be like himſelf, if he does not ſhift his patron as well as his phraſes, and it will not ſurprize me at all, if the next edition the poem ſhould come out inſcribed to the late Treaſurer of Ireland.

[C] Which criticiſm occaſioned Mr. Addiſon to attack our Author with great ſeverity in his Whig-Examiner.] In acceſſion of King George I. to the Throne, October the 23d 1714 he preſented a memorial to the Court of France, requiring, that the canal and new works at Mardyke ſhould be demoliſhed. The year following he was recalled from France; and upon his arrival was taken up by a warrant from the Houſe of Commons, and ſoon after ſtrictly examined by a Committee of the Privy Council. On the 10th of June Robert Walpole, Eſq; moved the Houſe of Commons for an impeachment againſt him; and on the 17th Mr. Prior was ordered into cloſe cuſtody, and that no perſon ſhould be admitted to ſee him, without leave from the Speaker. In 1717 an Act of Grace paſſed, but he was one of the perſons excepted out of it; however, at the cloſe of that year he was diſcharged from his confinement. After the fatigues of a length of years ſpent in various ſcenes of action, he was deſirous of enjoying the remainder of his days in tranquillity and retirement, which he did partly at an eſtate of his at Down-Hall in Eſſex. He died at Wimpole in Cambridgeſhire, the ſeat of the Earl of Oxford, September the 18th 1721, and was interred, according to his deſire, in Weſtminſter-Abbey, where a beautiful monument is erected to him, the inſcription upon it [D] being written by Dr. Robert Freind, late Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool. His Poems which are juſtly admired, were collected

In the firſt number of that paper for Thurſday September the 14th 1710, he obſerves, that "the deſign "of this work is to cenſure the writings of others, "and to give all perſons a rehearing, who have ſuffered under any unjuſt ſentence of the Examiner. "As that Author has hitherto proceeded, his paper "would have been more properly entitled the Exe- "cutioner: at leaſt his examination is like that, which "is made by the rack and wheel. I have always "admired a critic, that has diſcovered the beauties "of an Author, and never knew one, who made it "his buſineſs to laſh the faults of other Writers, that "was not guilty of greater himſelf; as the hangman "is generally a worſe malefactor than the criminal "that ſuffers by his hand. To prove what I ſay, "there needs no more than to read the annotations, "which this Author has made upon Dr. Garth's "Poem, with the Preface in the front, and a riddle "at the end of them." Mr. Addiſon concludes that paper with theſe words. "Before I take my fare-"well of this ſubject, I ſhall adviſe the Author for "the future to ſpeak his meaning more plainly. I "allow, he has a happy talent at doggrel, when he "writes upon a known ſubject. Where he tells us in "plain intelligible language how Syriſcas's ladle was "loſt in one hole, and Hans Carvel's finger in ano-"ther, he is very jocular and diverting; but when "he wraps a lampoon in a riddle, he muſt conſider, "that his jeſt is loſt to every one but the few merry "wags that are in the ſecret. This is making "darker ſatires than ever Perſius did. After this "curſory view of the Examiner's performance, let us "conſider his remarks upon the Doctor's. This "general piece of raillery, which he paſſes upon "the Doctor's conſidering the treaſurer in ſeve-"ral different views, is that which might fall upon "any Poem in Waller, or any other Writer, who has "diverſity of thoughts and alluſions; and though it "may appear a pleaſant ridicule to an ignorant rea-"der, is wholly groundleſs and unjuſt. I do likewiſe "diſſent from the Examiner upon the phraſes of "paſſions being poized, and of the retrieving merit from "dependence, which are beautiful and poetical. It is "the ſame cavilling ſpirit, that finds fault with that "expreſſion of the pomp of peace among woes of war, "as well as of offering unaſk'd. As for the Nile, how "Icarus and Phaeton came to be joined with it, I "cannot conceive. I muſt confeſs, they have been "formerly uſed to repreſent the fate of raſh ambitious "men; and I cannot imagine why the Author ſhould "deprive us of thoſe particular ſimiles for the fu-"ture. The next criticiſm upon the Stars ſeems "introduced for no other reaſon but to mention Mr. "Bickerſtaff, whom the Author every where endea-"vours to imitate and abuſe. But I ſhall refer the "Examiner to the frog's advice to her little one, that "was blowing itſelf up to the ſize of an ox:

——Non ſi te ruperis, inquit,
Par eris——

"The alluſion to a Victim may be a Gallimatia in French "politicks, but is an apt and noble alluſion to a true "Engliſh ſpirit. And as for the Examiner's remarks "on the word bleed (though a man would laugh to "ſee impotent malice ſo little able to contain itſelf) "one cannot but obſerve in them the temper of the "Banditti, whom he mentions in the ſame paper, "who always murder where they rob. The laſt ob-"ſervation is upon the line, Ingratitude's a weed of "every clime. Here he is very much out of humour "with the Doctor for having called that the Weed, "which Dryden only terms the Growth of every "clime. But, for God's ſake, why ſo much tender-"neſs for ingratitude? But I ſhall ſay no more. "We are now in an age, wherein impudent aſſertions "muſt paſs for arguments; and I do not queſtion "but the ſame, who has endeavoured here to prove "that he, who wrote the Diſpenſary, was no Poet, "will very ſuddenly undertake to ſhew, that he, who "gained the battle of Blenheim, was no General."

[D] The inſcription upon it.] It is as follows.

Sui temporis Hiſtoriam meditanti
Paulatim obrepens Febris
Operis ſimul & Vitæ filum abrupit,
Sept. 18. An. Dom. MDCCXXI.
Ætat. 57.
H. S. E.
MATTHÆUS PRIOR Armiger
Vir Eximius,
Sereniſſimis
Regi Gulielmo Reginæq; Mariæ
In congreſſione Fœderatorum
Hagæ anno 1690 celebrata,
Deinde Magnæ Britanniæ Legatis,
Tum iis
Qui anno 1697, pacem Reſwicki confecerunt,
Tum iis
Qui apud Gallos annis proximis Legationem obierunt.
Eodem etiam anno 1697 in Hibernia
Secretarius,
Nec non in utroq; honorabili conſeſſu
Eorum,
Qui anno 1700 ordinandis Commercii negotiis,
Quique anno 1711 dirigendis Portorii rebus
Præfidebant,
Commiſſionarius;
Poſtremo
Ab ANNA;
Feliciſſimæ memoriæ Reginâ,
Ad Ludovicum XIV. Galliæ Regem
Miſſus anno 1711
De pace ſtabiliendâ, (Pace etiamnum durante, Diuque ut boni jam omnes ſperant duraturâ)
Cum ſumma poteſtate Legatus.
Qui,
Hos omnes, quibus cumulatus eſt, titulos
Humanitatis, ingenii, eruditionis laude Superavit.
Cui etiam naſcenti faciles arriſerant Muſæ,
Hunc puerum ſchola hic Regia perpolivit,
Juvenem in Collegio Sancti Johannis
Cantabrigiæ optimis ſcientiis inſtruxit;
Virum denique auxit & perfecit
Multa cum viris principibus conſuetudo;
Ita natus, ita inſtitutus,
A Vatum choro avelli nunquam potuit,
Sed ſolebat ſæpe rerum civilium gravitatem
Amœniorum Literarum ſtudiis condire;
Et cum omne adeo poetices genus collected by him, and published together in one volume in folio, with an elegant dedication to the present Duke of Dorset. Since his death some more of his Poems have been published under the title of Poems on several Occasions, by the late Matthew Prior, Esq; Several manuscript works of his are in the possession of the present Earl of Oxford. His Solomon, on the Vanity of the World, has been translated into Latin by Mr. William Dobson, of New College in Oxford, with so much elegance and spirit [E], that we may expect from that Gentleman a very masterly Latin Version of Milton's Paradise Lost, in which he is now engaged. His translation of Solomon was printed at Oxford in 4to.

Haud infeliciter tentaret,
Tum in fabellis concinnè lepideque texendis
Mirus artifex
Neminem habuit parem.
Hæc liberalis animi oblectamenta,
Quam nullo illi labore constiterint,
Facile ii perspexere, quibus usus est, Amici;
Apud quos Urbanitatum & Leporum plenus,
Cum ad rem, quæcunque forte inciderit,
Aptè copioseque alluderet,
Interea nihil quæsitum, nihil vi expressum
Videbatur,
Sed omnia ultrò effluere,
Et quasi jugi è fonte affatim exuberare
Ita suos tandem dubios reliquit,
Essetne in scriptis poeta elegantior,
An in convictu Comes jucundior.

[E] His Solomon, on the Vanity of the World, has been translated into Latin by Mr. William Dobson, of New College in Oxford, with so much elegance and spirit, &c.] We shall give a specimen of his translation in that of the following lines in the second book.

" I drank, I lik'd it not; 'twas rage, 'twas noise,
" An airy scene of transitory joys.
" In vain I trusted, that the flowing bowl
" Would banish sorrow, and enlarge the soul.
" To the late revel, and protracted feast,
" Wild dreams succeeded and disorder'd rest;
" And as at the dawn of morn, fair reason's light,
" Broke thro' the fumes and phantoms of the night,
" What had been said, I ask'd my soul, what done;
" How flow'd our mirth, and whence the source
" begun.
" Perhaps the jest, that charm'd the sprightly crowd,
" And made the jovial table laugh so loud,
" To some false notion ow'd its poor pretence,
" To an ambiguous word's perverted sense,
" To a wild sonnet, or a wanton air,
" Offence and torture to the sober ear.
" Perhaps, alas! the pleasing stream was brought " From this man's error, from another's fault;
" From topicks which good-nature would forget,
" And prudence mention with the last regret.
" Add yet unnumber'd ills, that lie unseen
" In the pernicious draught; the word obscene,
" Or harsh, which once elanc'd must ever fly
" Irrevocable; the too prompt reply,
" Seed of severe distrust, and fierce debate;
" What we should shun, and what we ought to " hate.
" Add too the blood impoverish'd, and the course
" Of health suppress'd by wine's continued force.
" Unhappy man! whom sorrow thus and rage
" To diff'rent ills alternately engage.
" Who drinks, alas! but to forget; nor sees,
" That melancholy sloth, severe disease,
" Mem'ry confus'd, and interrupted thought,
" Death's harbingers, lie latent in the draught;
" And in the flowers, that wreath the sparkling
" bowl;
" Fell adders hiss, and pois'nous serpents roll."

Indulsi Cyathis; Rabies mera; clamor ineptus,
Vanaque lætitiæ raptim fugientis Imago.
Credulus ah nimium! speravi pocula mœstum
Posse animum lenire, atrasque avertere Curas.
Post ludos sera jam nocte licentius actos
Incertus sopor, interruptaque somnia turbant.
Jamque ubi mane novo radiis victricibus alma
Dispulerat Ratio simulacra fugacia noctis,
Quid facere & fari suaserunt pocula, mecum
Volvi animo; quales & quo de fonte lepores
Fluxerunt, reputans. Risus, jocus ille, solutos
Qui movit, lætâ circum plaudente coronâ,
Forsitan ingenii nugis ab inanibus ortum
Duxerat, ambiguo lusu vel imagine falsa,
Improbulisve Lyræ numeris cantuve protervo,
Casta quibus metuat violari sordibus auris.
Forsitan heu! nimium lepidos movere cachinnos
Infelix Vitium, incauti levis error Amici,
Quæque palam fari sapiens & candidus ultro
Parceret, & densa velaret honestius umbra.
Quinetiam infidis Cyathis conferta malorum
Agmina cæca latent; hinc linguæ effusa Venena
Præcipitis, vanis nunquam revocanda querelis
Sæpius incauto pronum devolvier Ore
Responsum torquetur atrox, spargitque vicissim
Insanas lites, alienaque jurgia siccis.
Adde etiam exhaustas vini quod largior usus
Sanguinis attenuat vires, carpitque salutem.
Ah miserum! rabies quem cæca atrique Dolores
Diversis hinc inde malis involvere certant!
Heu! sperat curarum haurire oblivia; nescit
Interea sævo confidere funditus haustu
Morborum omne Genus; lentæ intolerabile pondus
Desidiæ, Errores Animi, Cerebrique natantis
Somnia, quæ passu sequitur mors tarda silenti.
Nec videt innexis circum cratera Corollis
Lethiferosque Angues, atrasque latere colubras. T.

PRISCILLIAN, a Spanish Heresiarch, lived in the fourth Century. He possessed very fine qualities [A], being a ready genius, very eloquent and learned. He was laborious, sober, and no ways avaricious. A too eager thirst after knowledge prompted him, in his youth, to learn magick (a). This thirst, I say, inclined him to listen to Helpidius the Rhetorician, and to a Lady who had imbibed some errors of the Gnosticks (b). He was infected with them, and employed all his abilities to spread them. He

(a) Idem vanissimus & plus justo inflatior profanarum rerum scientia, quin & Magicas artes ab adolescentia eum exercuisse creditum est. Sulpicius Severus, Sacræ Hist. lib. 2. p. m. 163. (b) This Rhetorician and that Lady were taught by one Mark, an Egyptian. It is falsely asserted in Moreri, that this Mark taught Priscillian.

[A] He possessed very fine qualities.] Sulpicius Severus speaks of him as follows. Ab his (Agape quadam non ignobili muliere, & rhetore Helpidio) Priscillianus est institutus, familia nobilis, prædives opibus, acer, inquietus, facundus, multa lectione eruditus, disserendi ac disputandi promptissimus: felix profecto, si non pravo studio corrupisset optimum ingenium, prorsus multa in eo animi & corporis bona cerneres. Vigilare multum, famem, sitim ferre poterat, habendi minime cupidus, utendi parcissimus (1). i. e. " By these (Agape, a Lady of some note, and Helpidius the Rhetorician) " Priscillian was instructed. He was born of a noble " family, vastly rich, of a violent and restless disposition; eloquent, very learned and extremely " quick and ready in disputation. Thrice happy " would it have been for him, had he not depraved " his admirable genius by the ill use he made of it; " he possessing many good qualities both of mind " and body. He could endure long watchings, hunger and thirst; was not greedy of amassing, and " very moderate in the use of riches."

(1) Sulpicius Severus, Sacræ Hist. lib. 2. p. 162, 163.

[B] He

He won over great numbers of people, and was followed particularly by the women [B]. Some Biſhops alſo became his ſectariſts. This poiſon having already ſpread itſelf into a great many cities, the ſtrongeſt endeavours were uſed to ſtop it. A Synod was accordingly aſſembled in Saragoſſa (c), whither the Biſhops of Aquitain came (d). Priſcillian, and all his adherents, were there condemned for refuſing to appear; and the Magiſtrates were ordered to drive them out of all cities. This ſentence was ſo far from intimidating the Hereticks in queſtion, that they choſe Priſcillian their Biſhop. He left Spain with Inſtantius and Salvianus, two Prelates of his ſect, and ſet out for Rome, to juſtify himſelf to the Pope. They brought over many Diſciples, in their way through Aquitain. Euchrocia, wife to Delphidius the Rhetorician (e), received them at her country-ſeat; and was ſo charmed with Priſcillian, that ſhe followed him every where. Several other women were ſeduced by theſe people, and abandoned all things to follow them in their journey [C]. The Pope refuſed to hear them, as alſo Saint Ambroſe; but the Papal Court ſhewed them greater indulgence, it favouring them with a Reſcript, commanding them to be reſtored to their ſeveral churches. They returned to Spain, and had ſo much intereſt, that Ithacius their accuſer, being cited to give an account of his conduct, as a diſturber of the church, fled into Gaul. He there inflamed to ſuch a degree Maximus the Tyrant againſt thoſe ſectariſts, that they were commanded to come to the Council at Bourdeaux. Inſtantius was there condemned, which Priſcillian ſeeing, he deſired to appear before Maximus, and his requeſt was granted. His accuſers followed him to that Court, and carried on the proſecution with ſo much vigour, that

(c) In 381.

(d) Among others, Delphinius Biſhop of Bourdeaux. Vide Alteſerram, Rerum Aquitanicarum, lib. 5. cap. 5. p. 323.

(e) De quo vide Alteſerram. ibid. cap. 3. p. 116, 317. & Auſonium in Profeſſor. num. 5.

[B] He employed all his abilities to ſpread them . . . . was followed particularly by the women . . . . ſome Biſhops alſo became his ſectariſts.] I ſhall again quote Sulpicius Severus. Is ubi doctrinam exitiabilem aggreſſus eſt, multos nobilium, pluresque populares authoritate perſuadendi & arte blandiendi allicuit in ſocietatem. Ad hoc mulieres novarum rerum cupidæ, fluxa fide, & ad omnia curioſo ingenio, catervatim ad eum confluebant. Quippe humilitatis ſpeciem ore & habitu prætendens, honorem ſui & reverentiam cunctis injecerat. Jamque paulatim perfidiæ iſtius tabes, pleraque Hiſpaniæ pervaſerat: quin & nonnulli Epiſcoporum depravati, inter quos Inſtantius & Salvianus, Priſcillianum non ſolum conſenſione, ſed ſub quadam etiam conjuratione ſuſceperant (2). Here follows father Maimbourg's copious paraphraſe on this Latin paſſage. " As this Hereſiarch ſaw on " one hand, and knew by his own experience, that " mankind are naturally very prone to ſenſuality, " which corrupted the whole world before the flood; " and knowing, on the other hand, the weak ſide of " people, and particularly of the female ſex, who " are eaſily impoſed upon by a ſpecious outſide of " piety; he acted ſo well the Saint, that there never " was a greater hypocrite than this Impoſtor. And " indeed, no man ever diſcovered leſs fondneſs for " the world; he ſtudiouſly affecting the higheſt con- " tempt of all ſublunary things, by the meanneſs and " poverty of his dreſs, his behaviour and converſati- " on; by his modeſt, humble and mortified air; by " the great auſterity of his life, and the alms he beſtow- " ed with a moſt liberal hand; talking of nothing but " penitence, faſting, watchings, prayer, and the con- " tempt of all worldly things, in order to be united " perfectly to God. By this means he ſoon acquired, " throughout all Spain, the character of a moſt zealous " ſervant of God; a man of wonderful holineſs, " on which account he was admired univerſally. The " women eſpecially, who are more eaſily impoſed " upon by theſe fallacious appearances, and whoſe " curioſity, (ſo natural to them) makes them fond of " novelty, the marvellous and ſhew, eſpecially in re- " ligious matters, flocked after him, in order to be " directed by him, when but a Lay-man. Being, " moreover, learned; having a ſmooth tongue, and " admirably well verſed in the arts of perſuaſion; " and knowing how to inſinuate himſelf artfully into " the minds of men, by flattering them in a de- " licate and witty manner; he ſoon became the " head of a very great party (in moſt of the provin- " ces of Spain,) conſiſting, not only of women and " the common people, but alſo of perſons of Quali- " ty and Eccleſiaſticks, among whom were even " ſome Biſhops, who, like all the reſt, looked upon, " and followed him, as a great Saint (3)."

(2) Sulpic. Sever. Sacræ Hiſt. lib. 2. p. 163.

(3) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontificat. de St. Leon, lib. 1. p. 44, 45. Dutch edit. He quotes Sulpicius Severus's words in the margin.

[C] Euchrocia, wife to Delphidius the Rhetorician . . . . . ſeveral other women were ſeduced by theſe people, and abandoned all things to follow them in their journey.] If we may credit what ſome ſharp Satyriſts ſay, the people in queſtion began with the ſpirit and ended in the fleſh. Euchrocia was charmed at firſt, by the outward devotion and pious diſcourſes of this Heretick; but he charmed her inſenſibly with ſomething of a very different nature, he lying with that Lady, and getting her with child. If any perſon ſhould object to me, that the Latin words I ſhall cite hereunder, ſignify, that this incident relates to Procula, daughter of Euchrocia, I will not deny it obſtinately; but will own, that this is, perhaps, the beſt ſenſe that can be given to the original. The exteriour devotion, which Priſcillian had long affected, had not made him forget that young Procula was preferable to her mother. Here follows the Latin: Iter eis præter interiorem Aquitaniam fuit: ubi tum ab imperitis magnifice ſuſcepti, ſparſere perfidiæ ſemina, maximeque Eluſanam plebem, ſane tum bonam & religioni ſtudentem, pravis prædicationibus pervertere: à Burdigala per Delphinum repulſi, tamen in agro Euchrociæ aliquantiſper morati, infecere nonnullos ſuis erroribus. Inde iter cœptum ingreſſi, turpi ſane pudibundoque comitatu, cum uxoribus atque alienis etiam fœminis, in quis erat Euchrocia, ac filia ejus Procula: de qua fuit in ſermone hominum, Priſcilliani ſtupro gravidam, partum ſibi graminibus abegiſſe (4). i. e. " They journied through A- " quitain, where meeting with a ſplendid reception " from the ignorant, they ſcattered abroad the ſeeds " of perfidiouſneſs; and perverted particularly, by " their wicked diſcourſes, the Gaſcoons, a worthy, " religious people. The Dauphin driving them " from Bourdeaux, they made ſome ſtay at the man- " ſion-houſe of Euchrocia, and infected ſome per- " ſons with their erroneous doctrines. They ſet out " from thence with a ſcandalous train, with their " wives and other women, among whom were Eu- " chrocia, and her daughter Procula, of whom it is " related, that ſhe was got with child by Priſcillian, " and miſcarried in the fields." It was happy for Delphidius that he died young; as it prevented his having the grief to hear of his daughter's incontinence, and his wife's execution (5). It is well known that Euchrocia was put to death with Priſcillian (6). An applauder of Theodoſius declaimed, with great eloquence, againſt this cruelty; and could not forgive Maximus for having put to death the wife of an illuſtrious Poet, becauſe ſhe was accuſed of being over devout. De virorum mortibus loquor, cum deſcenſum recorder ad ſanguinem fœminarum, & in ſexum cui bella parcunt non parcè ſævitum? Sed nimirum graves ſuberant invidioſæque cauſæ, ut unco ad pœnam clari vatis matrona raperetur. Objiciebatur enim, atque etiam exprobrabatur mulieri viduæ nimia religio, & diligentius culta divinitas (7). i. e. " Do I ſpeak of the death " of men, when I recollect, that he was ſo mean as " to ſpill the blood of women, and behaved with cruel- " ty towards that ſex, whom even war ſpares? But " there were reaſons why the widow of an illuſtrious " Poet was put to death: for it was objected to her, " and

(4) Sulp. Severus, Sacræ Hiſt. lib. 2. p. 165.

(5) Minus malorum munere expertus Dei, Medio quod ævi raptus es. Errore quod non deviantis filiæ, Pœnaque læjus conjugis. Auſonius, in Profeſſ. num. 5. p. m. 160.

(6) Sulp. Severus, Hiſt. Sacræ, lib. 2. p. 170.

(7) Latinus Pacatus, in Panegyrico Theodoſio dicto, cap. 29. p. m. 509.

(f) In 385. that they cauſed him to be ſentenced (f) to die (g). Hereunder is the character of Ithacius, the chief inſtrument of Priſcillian's death [D], and the conſequence of the ſeverity

(g) Extracted from Sulp. Severus, Hiſt. Sacræ, lib. 2.

" and ſhe was even reproached, with being over re-
" ligious, and too zealous a worſhipper of the Deity."
Some people are ſurprized, how it was poſſible for Priſcillian to win over ſo many females, ſince his mock devotion was blended with ſuch ſhocking lewdneſs. He confeſſed at his trial, that he had held nocturnal and lewd aſſemblies with women, and that he uſed to ſtrip himſelf ſtark naked when he prayed (8). But other Writers ſay, that it was this very thing made his flock increaſe, and drew over the women to him. This is Father Maimbourg's opinion. I will again quote his paraphraſe, which is a little too much extended, of Sulpicius Severus's words.
" When people are ſo much prepoſſeſſed in a man's " favour as to believe him a Saint, they obey implicitly
" all his commands; and they admit, without the
" leaſt reluctance, all his deciſions as ſo many ora-
" cles, particularly when they favour the impulſes of " corrupt nature. Hence this wretch found it no
" difficult taſk to perſuade his followers, that if the " ſpirit which comes from God was perfectly united
" to them, by a certain form of prayer he taught
" them, they then might, and ought to give the " luſts of the fleſh their full ſwing, without God's " taking any concern in, or being offended at it;
" ſince the fleſh does not proceed from him, but
" from the wicked principle, no leſs than marriage.
" It was owing to this deteſtable doctrine, that all
" ſuch women as did not love their huſbands, left
" them, in ſpite of their teeth *, as huſbands did " their wives, of whom they were grown tired; and " all of them in general, as did every one of his " diſciples, prayed together as he did, as though they " had been in a ſtate of innocence, and afterwards
" defiled themſelves with pollutions of every kind.
" Such is uſually the reſult or end of theſe new " doctrines, enthuſiaſms, and new forms of prayer,
" (more mad than myſterious) of certain mock-en-
" lightened, and pretendedly ſpiritual men, who " beginning by the ſpirit in order to impoſe upon
" the world, commonly end with the fleſh (9)."

(8) Nec diffitentem obſcœnis ſe ſtuduiſſe doctrinis, nocturnos etiam turpium fœminarum cœtus iſſe conventus, nudumque orare ſolitum, nocentem pronunciavit. Sulp. Severus, Hiſt. Sacræ, lib. 2. p. 170.

* Sever. lib. 2.

(9) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontific. de St. Leon, liv. 1. p. 45, 46.

[D] Hereunder is the character of Ithacius, the chief inſtrument of Priſcillian's death.] Ithacius was a Spaniſh Biſhop, of an impudent, debauched character, who ſacrificed all things to his paſſions. He plainly ſhewed, that he was not actuated by the love of truth; and that he perſecuted thoſe hereticks with ſo much violence, merely through a principle of vanity. The firſt ſteps he had taken obliged him to ſtake every thing; he thirſted after the honours of the victory, and would ſhew his great power, and his authority in cabals. He could not bear to think of its being obſerved that he did not win his cauſe; he left nothing unattempted with the tyrant Maximus, in order to obtain the victory by the aid of the ſecular arm; and as he was afraid of being traverſed in his deſigns by wiſe and judicious perſons, he was ſo impudent and politically malicious, as to accuſe all he did not like, as Priſcillian-Hereticks. Whenever any perſon uſed to apply himſelf to reading or faſting, ſuch a one was immediately branded, by this violent perſecutor, as an accomplice of that ſect. Was he not ſo bold as to accuſe (of favouring them) St. Martin, who beſought him not to act the part of a ſtate-proſecutor; and entreated Maximus not to ſhed the blood of the hereticks in queſtion? Such are the abominable artifices of moſt of thoſe who impeach others of hereſy: they are revived every age, and the world ſuffers itſelf to be as much impoſed upon, as though they were but juſt ſtarted up. The Hiſtorian I am going to quote deſerves the greateſt encomiums, for ſaying that the Priſcillianiſts were not more diſagreeable to him than their accuſers. Secuti etiam accuſatores Idacius & Ithacius Epiſcopi: quorum ſtudium in expugnandis hæreticis non reprehenderem, ſi non ſtudio vincendi plus quam oportuit certaſſent. Ac mea quidem ſententia eſt, mihi tam reos quam accuſatores diſplicere. Certe Ithacium nihil penſi, nihil ſancti habuiſſe definio. Fuit enim audax, loquax, impudens, ſumptuoſus, ventri & gulæ plurimum impertiens. Hic ſtultitiæ eo uſque proceſſerat, ut omnes etiam ſanctos viros, quibus aut ſtudium inerat lectionis, aut propoſitum erat certare jeju-niis, tanquam Priſcilliani ſocios aut diſcipulos, in crimen arceſſeret. Auſus etiam miſer eſt, ea tempeſtate Martino epiſcopo, viro plane Apoſtolis conferendo, palam objectare hæreſis infamiam. Namque tum Martinus apud Treveros conſtitutus, non deſinebat increpare Ithacium, ut ab accuſatione deſiſteret: Maximum orare, ut ſanguine infelicium abſtineret: ſatis ſuperque ſufficere, ut epiſcopali ſententia hæretici judicati eccleſiis pellerentur (10). St. Martin's interceſſion was ſo powerful, that the unhappy perſons in queſtion were not proſecuted, ſo long as he continued at Triers; but as ſoon as he had left that city, ſome Biſhops won over Maximus, and prompted him to break his word with him (11). Priſcillian was ſentenced to die; and then Ithacius, fully gratified in all his wiſhes, diſcontinued the impeachment, that is, he did not appear before the judges, when the ſentence was to be confirmed; a groſs artifice, which was juſtly ridiculed by Sulpicius Severus. Cæterum Ithacius videns quam invidioſum ſibi apud epiſcopos foret, ſi accuſato, etiam poſtremis rerum capitalium judiciis aſtitiſſet (etenim iterari judicium neceſſe erat) ſubtrahit ſe cognitioni fruſtra calido jam ſcelere perfecto (12). Latinus Pacatus treats theſe bloody minded Biſhops as they deſerved; and expatiates in a proper manner on the ſcandal they cauſed, by laying their polluted and bloody hands on the moſt ſacred things; and enveighed againſt the iniquity of the tyrant Maximus, for careſſing and protecting ſuch Prelates (13). Quid hoc majus poterat intendere accuſator ſacerdos? fuit enim, fuit & hoc delatorum genus, qui nominibus antiſtites, revera autem ſatellites, atque adeò carnifices, non contenti miſeros avitis evolviſſe patrimoniis, calumniabantur in ſanguinem, & vitas premebant reorum jam pauperum. Quinetiam cùm judiciis capitalibus aſtitiſſent, cùm gemitus & tormenta miſerorum auribus ac luminibus hauſiſſent, cùm lictorum arma, cùm damnatorum fræna tractaſſent, pollutas pœnali manus contactu ad ſacra referebant, & cærimonias quas inceſtaverant mentibus, etiam corporibus impiabant. Hos ille (14) Phalaris in amicis habebat, hi in oculis ejus, atque etiam in oculis erant: nec injuria, à quibus tot ſimul votiva veniebant, avaro divitum bona; cruento innocentium pœna; impio religionis injuria. i. e.
" Could an accuſer, who was a Miniſter, have gone
" greater lengths? For there was a ſet of informers,
" who being Biſhops nominally, but in reality ſol-
" diers, and therefore executioners, not content with " turning unhappy perſons out of their paternal
" eſtates, proſecuted them till they were ſentenced to " die; and took away the lives of thoſe whom
" they had reduced to beggary. Farther, after ſit-
" ting in judgment in criminal matters; beholding
" and hearing the groans and tortures of the unhap" py criminals; after handling the Lictor's rods and
" the ſcourges of condemned wretches; they then " would ſolemnize the holy Rites of Religion with " hands defiled with blood, and pollute its ceremo" nies. Theſe were the tyrant Maximus's friends, the " men he doated on; which indeed was natural
" enough for him to do, ſince they ſatiated his ava-
" rice with the wealth of the rich; his cruelty, by
" puniſhing the innocent; and his impiety, by pro-
" faning religion."

(10) Sulp. Severus, Hiſt. Sacræ, lib. 2. p. 168, 169.

(11) Quoad uſque Martinus Treveris fuit, dilata cognitio eſt: & mox diſceſſurus egregia authoritate à Maximo elicuit ſponſionem, nihil cruentum in reos conſtituendum. Sed poſtea Imperator per Magnum & Rufum epiſcopos depravatus, & à mitioribus conſiliis deflexus, cuique præfecto Evodio permiſit, viro acri & ſevero. Idem, p. 169.

(12) Idem, ibid. p. 170.

(13) Latinus Pacatus, in Panegyrico Theodoſio dicto, cap. 29. p. m. 509.

(14) That is, the Tyrant Maximus overcome by Theodoſius.

We may take notice in Ithacius of another circumſtance, in which ſuch as impeach with the greateſt violence reſemble him. No Biſhop would have found it a more difficult matter, than he, to account for his own conduct, and yet he was the moſt eager in ſlandering and proſecuting others. This wicked behaviour is unaccountable, as the Heathens have obſerved, they declaring, that innocence is the moſt eſſential quality in an accuſer (15). But thoſe who ſet up for accuſers, commonly have very little regard to this. There is a certain Writer, whoſe works, tho' filled with abſurdities, contradictions, profanations, novelties, very dangerous paradoxes and hereſies, he yet has charged a great many people with advancing falſe doctrines; and could he have had a Maximus, we ſhould have heard of nothing but perſons removed from their employments, out-lawed, fulminated with an anathema, not to ſay worſe. In all probability theſe irregular and unjuſt proceedings will laſt as long as the world.

(15) Cognoſce quam multa eſſe oporteat in eo qui alterum accuſet. . Primum integritatem atque innocentiam ſingularem. Nihil eſt enim quod minus ferendum ſit, quam rationem ab altero vitæ repoſcere eum, qui non poſſit ſuæ reddere. Cicero, in Verrem, lib. 1. folio 22, B.

[E] . . and ſeverity [E]. Saint Martin, Biſhop of Tours, refuſed to communicate with ſuch Biſhops as had prompted Maximus to that cruelty; and it being at laſt extorted from him to communicate with them, he was greatly afflicted upon that account all his life after; and imagined that this was the reaſon, why the gift of miracles, with which he was endued, was ſo much weakened with regard to him. Some other Biſhops imitated him [F], with a reſolution not to admit Ithacius and his adherents to their communion. He was not uneaſy at this ſo long as the tyrant Maximus, his protector, and the object of his adulation lived; but as ſoon as he had loſt him, he was puniſhed for his crime. Pope Leo was not ſo ſcrupulous as St. Martin, he approving of Priſcillian's execution [G]. Maimbourg makes a diſtinction that is almoſt ridiculous (b). I ſhall not enquire whether thoſe Hereticks believed and ſaid all that is aſcribed to them (i); I only ſay, that one of their opinions,

(b) See the rem. [G].

(i) See Moreri's Dictionary, Dutch edit. in the addition to the art. PRISCILLIAN.

[E] . . . and the conſequences of that ſeverity.] The words of Mr. Flechier, one of the fineſt Writers of his age, are ſo beautiful, that I am perſuaded all my Readers will be pleaſed to ſee them here. "This "execution was attended with many ill conſequences; "the putting this Hereſiarch to death, ſerved only "to add new ſtrength to his hereſy. His followers "interred him with great magnificence, and ho-"noured him as a Martyr; and thoſe who were the "inſtruments of his condemnation, abuſing their "credit, and the great intereſt they had at Court, "perſecuted good men with impunity *. Any per-"ſon who faſted, and loved ſolitude and retirement, "was immediately ſuſpected by them; and it was a "crime to behave with greater ſobriety and regula-"rity than they. Thoſe who were moſt obnoxious "to them, were immediately called Priſcillianiſts, "eſpecially when they were victims, whoſe death "might pleaſe the Prince, or increaſe his treaſures, "by the confiſcation of their eſtates †; for they "took away perſons lives, and deprived them of their "eſtates, at pleaſure; and preſerved the Tyrant's "friendſhip by calumnies, cruelties, and other acti-"ons like his (16)."

* Sulp. Sever. de vita S. Mart.

† Pacat. in Panegyric.

(16) Flechier, Hiſt. de Theodoſe, liv. 3. ad ann. 385. p. m. 303. Paris edit. 12mo. 1680.

[F] Some other Biſhops imitated St. Martin.] Continuing to ſhew the ill conſequences, which attended the putting to death Priſcillian, I ſhall make uſe of Father Maimbourg's words, they being better than any tranſlation I can make. "The moſt lamentable "circumſtance on this occaſion is, that this impeach-"ment carried on by Ithacius, cauſed, for ſome "time, a dangerous kind of ſchiſm in Gaul. For, "on one hand, Theognoſtus, a Biſhop of great au-"thority, having greatly condemned it, and even af-"terwards withdrawn from his communion, was imi-"tated in this particular by moſt of the Biſhops, who "imagined, as he did, that theycould not in conſcience "communicate with a man who had diſhonoured both "his character and the church, by polluting him-"ſelf with the blood of thoſe whoſe death he had "occaſioned. But on the other hand, ſeveral Bi-"ſhops, won over by Ithacius, whoſe accomplices "they were, or whoſe proceedings they applauded, "ſided with him; and ſeeing themſelves ſtrongly "ſupported by the favour of the Prince who pro-"tected Ithacius, they held a kind of a council or "conventicle in Triers, where he was cleared, and "declared legally innocent, by the ſentence pro-"nounced by them (17)." He afterwards relates how St. Martin refuſed to communicate with them, till he was informed that, by complying, he ſhould prevail with Maximus to repeal the decree, whereby all the Priſcillianiſts that could be found ſhould be put to death (18). St. Martin did not approve of the putting Hereticks to death; and he was afraid that many of the worthieſt Catholicks would ſuffer in that ſlaughter; becauſe they looked upon as Priſcillianiſts, thoſe who, by their modeſt and mortified look ſeemed to lead a more regular life than others; thoſe hypocritical Priſcillianiſts not being diſtinguiſhed from ſuch as were truly devout men (19). Thinking therefore that, of two evils, the leaſt ought to be choſen (20), he ſubmitted for a little time to the violence that was done to him; and aſſiſted with thoſe Biſhops at the ceremony of the ordination of Felix Biſhop of Triers. . . . . The next day he returned very ſorrowful, and deeply repenting what he had done; and perceiving that this gift of miracles, with which * God had endued him, did not exert itſelf ſo frequently in him as before, he endeavoured to compenſate the loſs he had ſuſtained by his penitence. As for Ithacius's ſchiſm, it was not long lived; for Maximus his protector having been defeated ſome time after by Theodoſius the Great †; and killed by the ſoldiers in Aquileia, he was abandoned by all the Biſhops his adherents, and ſent into baniſhment, in which he died.

(17) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontific. de St. Leon, lib. 1. p. 57, 58.

(18) Ibid. p. 59.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Ibid. p. 60. where he cites the following words of Sulp. Severus, Dial. 3. Satius æſtimans ad horam cedere, quam his non conſulere quorum cervicibus gladius imminebat.

* Sever. ibid.

† Iſid. de vir. ill. c. 2.

[G] Pope Leo . . . approved of Priſcillian's execution.] Maimbourg (21) acknowledges, that till then Hereticks had not been puniſhed in that manner; but he aſſerts, that they may very juſtly be treated with that ſeverity, as has frequently been practiſed ſince. And not to ſpeak, ſays he, "of thoſe, who have proved in "their writings, that it was not only lawful, but like-"wiſe very proper to act in this manner, we need "but read what St. Leo has writ on this head, when "iſſuing, as will ſoon be obſerved, the neceſſary or-"ders for proſecuting in Spain the Priſcillian Here-"ticks he applauds Maximus for this action, and "ſays as follows *: That the rigour and ſeverity of "his juſtice againſt that Hereſiarch and his diſciples "whom that Prince put to death, was of great ſervice "to the clemency of the church. For though ſhe is con-"tented with the mildneſs of the judgment which the "Biſhops pronounce, according to the canons, againſt ob-"ſtinate Hereticks, and is not for bloody executions (α*), "ſhe nevertheleſs is greatly aſſiſted and well ſupported, "by the ſevere conſtitutions of the Emperors, ſince "ſometimes Hereticks, through the dread of ſo rigorous "a puniſhment, have recourſe to the ſpiritual remedy, in "order to cure the deadly diſeaſe of their hereſy, by a "true and ſincere converſion." Maimbourg aſſerts (22), that Ithacius's chief fault was, his applying himſelf to a ſecular tribunal, in a cauſe that was wholly eccleſiaſtical, and doing all that lay in his power to take away the lives of thoſe Hereticks, which is contrary to the laws of the church. For which reaſon, ſays he, when the Clergy implore the aſſiſtance of Princes and Magiſtrates againſt them, they always proteſt that they ſo earneſtly wiſh for their amendment, that they do not deſire to have them put to death, but rather that they ſhould find mercy; leaving, however, the Judges at liberty to act according to the laws, for the good of the Church and State. This is a fallacious diſtinction, and mere grimace; it is, at leaſt, a conduct ſo oppoſite to the ſolemnity of a ſerious tribunal, that it is no wonder the Inquiſition ſhould be ridiculed on that account. The perſons hinted at, intreat Princes to enact laws againſt Hereticks, and laviſh the higheſt applauſes on them, when they make hereſy death; they deliver up to them thoſe whom they have declared Hereticks; conſequently ſuch perſons are the cauſe of their death. When they tell the Civil Magiſtrate, that they do not deſire them to be put to death, it is acting a mere farce (23). And by the way, why do not they requeſt the ſame indulgence with reſpect to aſſaſſins? for, according to theſe perſons, a Heretick is worſe than a poiſoner and a murderer. Ariſtotle's maxim, poſito uno abſurdo multa ſequuntur, was never truer than in this matter. The abſurdity of ſubjecting opinions to the ſword of the Civil Magiſtrate is attended with a thouſand abſurdities; and ſuch as maintain it fall into numberleſs contradictions. Obſerve that the Inquiſition ſentences people to die, and is not contented with declaring them Hereticks (24).

(21) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontific. de St. Leon, lib. 1. p. 56.

* Profuit diu iſta diſtrictio Eccleſiaſticæ lenitati, quæ etſi ſacerdotali contenta judicio cruentas refugit ultiones: ſeverit tamen Chriſtianorum Principum Conſtitutionibus adjuvatur, dum ad ſpirituale nonnunquam recurrunt remedium, qui timent corporale ſupplicium. St. Leo, Ep. 95. ad Turi b.

(22) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontific. de St. Leon, lib. 1. p. 57.

(23) See Jurieu, Apologie pour la Reformation, Tom. 2. p. 241, 257. 4to. edit.

(24) See Jurieu, ibid.

α* In thoſe countries where the Inquiſition prevails Hereticks are always ſentenced to be burnt. Now, as in ſuch executions there are neither bones broke, nor blood ſpilt, the query is, whether the maxim Eccleſia non novit ſanguinem, expreſſed here in equivalent terms by St. Leo, is obſerved in this reſpect, or only eluded. REM. CRIT.]

opinions, which was approved in St. Auſtin [H], ſeems to have been condemned in them.

(25) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontific. de St. Leon, lib. 1. p. 65.

(26) We cannot poſſibly ſuppoſe, that any Heretick ever deprived men of that faculty.

 Quod ſi id credi liceat, & doceri, nec virtutibus præmium, nec vitiis pœna debebitur. Omniaque non ſolum humanarum Legum, ſed etiam divinarum Conſtitutionum decreta ſolventur. Quia neque de bonis, neque de malis actibus ullum poterit eſſe judicium, ſi in utramque partem fatalis neceſſitas motum mentis impellit. St. Leo, Epiſt. 93.

(27) Maimb. Hiſt. du Pontific. de St. Leon, lib. 1. p. 66.

(28) I make uſe of his tranſlat. of the paſſage from S. Leo. ibid. p. 65, 66.

[H] One of their opinions, which was approved in St. Auſtin, ſeems to have been condemned in the Priſcillianiſts.] The three following things are certain. 1. St. Auſtin believes, that man is impelled invincibly, either to evil by the corrupt ſtate of his nature, or to good by the Holy Ghoſt. 2. This doctrine deprives man of free-will, taking this word for the liberty of indifference. 3. St. Auſtin's doctrine has been ſolemnly approved by the church. Now the Reader will preſently ſee, that the Priſcillianiſts were condemned for deſtroying free-will, by ſubjecting man's will to a fatal neceſſity, which it cannot oppoſe (25). That is, that they were condemned becauſe they deſtroyed free-will, taking that word, not for the faculty of acting freely (26), and with a moſt agreeable propenſion, but for the power of chooſing between two contraries. They therefore were condemned for a doctrine which was approved in St. Auſtin. Let us conſider the manner in which they are refuted by Saint Leo . " If it be lawful to believe and teach " this doctrine, virtue ought to be no longer rewarded, nor vice puniſhed; and all laws, not only human but alſo divine, are no longer binding, and " may be violated with impunity; becauſe it will be " no longer poſſible to give judgment, either in favour of good actions, or againſt evil ones, if a fatal neceſſity impells and overcomes the will (27). Now can it be doubted after this, (I ſtill uſe Father Maimbourg's expreſſions (28), without acquieſcing with all he ſays,) if Saint Leo believed what faith obliges us to believe, viz. that grace does ſo influence our minds, that it does not lay any neceſſity upon us; but that it leaves us our free-will entire, on the liberty of indifference, by which we may chooſe one of two contrary things; and do good by grace, or evil of ourſelves. I can eaſily ſuppoſe, that they differed from Saint Auſtin, in the explication of the cauſes which determine the will; but they muſt neceſſarily have agreed with him in this point, viz. that the principle, which moves it, does not permit it to ſtop, to go back, or turn aſide. Now it is on this very thing, that Pope Leo's arguments are grounded, when he refutes the Hereticks in queſtion. It is therefore certain, that when he condemns their doctrine, he refutes Saint Auſtin; and that he could not approve the doctrine of that Father, without admitting what he had rejected in the Priſcillianiſts. I do not enquire whether he argues juſtly; I only ſay, that all the proofs he builds on rewards and puniſhments, on laws and judgments, would be wrong againſt this ſect, if they were not good againſt Saint Auſtin's ſyſtem. It is to be obſerved, that Saint Leo argues from the conſequences, with which the doctrine of a fatal neceſſity might be attended; and does not ſay that theſe Hereticks taught theſe conſequences. This ſhews that he argued againſt the doctrine itſelf, independently of the principle on which they grounded it, and of the conſequences they actually drew from it. It was proper for me to add this obſervation, becauſe it confirms my text.

PRODICUS, a native of Iulis (a) in the iſland of Cea [A], one of the Cyclades, contemporary with Democritus Gorgias Leontinus, and Diſciple of Protagoras, was one of the moſt famous Sophiſts of Greece. He flouriſhed in the 86th Olympiad (b), and had, among other Diſciples, Euripides, Socrates (c), Theramenes (d), and Iſocrates (e). He was not aſhamed to teach privately in Athens, though he was come to that city with the character of Embaſſador, from his countrymen, who had before raiſed him to ſeveral other publick employments (f); and though one would have concluded that the high applauſes, which his ſpeech obtained him from the Athenians, the day he was admitted publickly to audience, would have made him employ his talent only on ſuch occaſions. Plato, who makes pretty frequent mention of him, and even with applauſe, but not without ſometimes employing irony (g), the darling figure of Socrates his great interlocutor, inſinuates, that a deſire of getting money prompted Prodicus to keep ſchool, and indeed he got a great deal of money that way. Philoſtratus (h) ſeems to be much of the ſame opinion with Plato; he declaring that Prodicus was fond of money, and loved to ſpend it in diverting himſelf. He uſed to go from one city to another, diſplaying his eloquence; and though he did it in a mercenary way [B], he nevertheleſs had great honours

(a) Suidas.

(b) Euſeb. in Chron.

(c) Plato, in Menone, p. 425.

(d) Suidas.

(e) Plutarch, and Dion. Hal. in the Life of Iſocrates.

(f) Plato, in Hippia Maj. p. 1246.

(g) Dion. Halicarnaſſeus, in his Letter to Pompey, blames Plato for ſlandering Prodicus and ſeveral others.

(h) In Vita Sophiſt. lib. 1. p. 500.

[A] In the iſland of Cea.] Suidas declares expreſsly, that Prodicus was a native of that iſland, ἀπὸ Κέω τῆς νήσου, and he calls him Κεῖον, as he had been called by Plato (1), Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (2), Plutarch (3), Diogenes Laertius (4), &c. From Κέως comes Κεῖος, and by contraction Κῖος, which the Latins have expreſſed Ceus, or Ceius, or Cius (5). Menage (6) juſtly cenſures Marcilius Ficinus, for tranſlating Πρόδικος Κεῖος in Plato, Prodicus Chius; as Amyot has likewiſe done in his verſion of the life of Iſocrates. The Latin tranſlator of Philoſtratus has committed the like error; he tranſlating Πρόδικον Κῖον, in Philoſtratus, Prodicum Chium (7). The French tranſlator was doubtleſs more careful in conſulting Philoſtratus's Latin verſion, than in examining the Greek text, ſince he rendered it thus, Prodicus, a native of Chios. Caſeneuve, who cenſures him for this and ſome other miſtakes (8), overlooks two that deſerve to be criticized. The Greek paſſage is as follows: Προδίκῳ δὲ τῷ Κίῳ ὄνομα τοσοῦτον ἐπὶ σοφίᾳ ἐγένετο ὡς καὶ τὸν Γρύλλου Ξενοφῶντα ἐν Βοιωτοῖς δεθέντα ἀκροᾶσθαι διαλεγομένου, καθιςάντα ἐγγυητὴν τῷ σώματι. The French Tranſlator has rendered theſe words to this purpoſe. Prodicus, a native of Chios and ſon of Grillus, was in ſo much reputation, that being impriſoned in Bœotia, Xenophon was bail for him, in order that he might hear him. 1. Xenophon, not Prodicus, ſhould be called Gryllus's ſon. Caſeneuve ſays this himſelf, page 43; and nevertheleſs, when he cenſures the tranſlation, page 42, he ſays the Tranſlator ſhould have ſaid, Prodicus, a native of Chios, and ſon of Gryllus, &c. 2. It was Xenophon who was impriſoned, not Prodicus; and nevertheleſs, there is no perſon who reads this tranſlation, but imagines that Xenophon was bail for Prodicus when impriſoned. Though Caſeneuve knew, that the Sophiſt in queſtion was not born in the iſland of Chios, he yet did not know what country-man he was; he ſaying, that he was a native of the iſland of Cio, now called Standia. But this is a miſtake, he being born in the iſland of Cea, or Ceos, now called Zea. Moreri, in ſuppoſing him a native of the iſland of Cos (9), has only followed the error of perſons who knew more than himſelf. Eraſmus calls him Coum, page 394, of his Adagia, as alſo Charles Stephens in his dictionary, which fault was not corrected either by Lloyd or Hofman. They likewiſe have not corrected what he aſcribes falſely to Suidas, viz. his having made Prodicus a native of the iſland of Chios. Menage (10) affirms, that an error has crept into the firſt chapter of the third book of Quintilian, where Prodicus is called Chius; but I have not found that miſtake in the editions I conſulted. Maucroix, in his verſion of the great Hippias, printed at Paris in 1685, makes Prodicus a native of the iſland of Cos. Father Goulu had committed the ſame miſtake, in his French tranſlation of the Apology for Socrates (11).

(1) In Protagora, & paſſim alibi. He ſays in Hippia Majore, p. m. 1246, that Prodicus came ἐκ Κέω ex Cea Inſula.

(2) In Vita Iſocratis.

(3) Ibid.

(4) In Protagora.

(5) See Wolfius, in Iſocrat. Vitam, & Menage in Diog. Laert. p. 419.

(6) Ibid.

(7) In Vita Sophiſt. p. 449.

(8) Caſeneuve, Comment. ſur les Epiſt. de Philoſtr. p. 42.

(9) In the Dutch edit. it is Col: but this is an error of the preſs.

(10) Menage, in Laert. p. 419.

(11) It is in part 2. of Phyllarchus's Letters. See p. 581.

[B] In a mercenary way.] See Philoſtratus (12) and Plato.

(12) In Vita Sophiſt. p. 488.

nours paid him in Thebes, and ſtill greater in Lacedæmonia. His declamation at fifty drachms has been very much talked of [C]. It was called πεντηκονταδραχμος, according to ſome learned men, becauſe every auditor was obliged to pay him fifty drachms (i), which amounted to more than four French Crowns. Prodicus's ſtyle muſt have been very eloquent [D], ſince people flocked prodigiouſly to hear him, though he had a diſagreeable voice (k). It is related that Xenophon, when a priſoner in Boeotia [E], being deſirous of hearing Prodicus (l), procured bail, and went and gratified his curioſity. Few orations have been oftener quoted, or occaſioned more applications, than that in which our Sophiſt feigned, that virtue [F] and pleaſure, in a female diſguiſe, preſent themſelves to Hercules, and each ſtrive to win him over (m). The Athenians put him to death as one who corrupted their youth. If this connexion was only that mentioned by Ariſtophanes, in one of his Comedies (n), when he ſays, this man has been ſpoiled by books,

(i) Hofman, in the art. PRODICUS, ſpeaks but of five drachms.

(k) Δυσήκοον καὶ βαρὺ φθεγγόμενος, diſſone & injucunde loquens. Philoſtr. p. 500. See alſo Plato in Protag. p. 220.

(l) Philoſtr. p. 499.

(m) Ἐν Ἀθήναις καίτοι πιεῖν αὐτῷ δοῦναι ὑπὲρ διαφθορᾶς τῶν νέων. Athenis hauſta cicuta mortuus eſt quaſi juvenes corrumperet. Suidas.

(n) Idem, Suidas.

Plato. The latter ſays, that young perſons of the richeſt and moſt noble families, drawn by Prodicus, Gorgias, Polus, and Hippias, who uſed to travel from town to town, gave them great ſums of money, and promiſed to be very grateful over and above this, and at the ſame time neglected to be taught by their fellow citizens, who would have inſtructed them gratis (13).

(13) Plato, in Apol. Socr. p. 15 and 16. and in Theage, p. 93.

[C] His declamation at fifty drachms.] I have employed the word declamation, but without depriving myſelf of the right to ſubſtitute another, in caſe it ſhould be neceſſary. In my opinion the word ἐπίδειξις, uſed by Plato and Suidas, ſignifies an harangue or ſpeech, in which an Author diſplays all his rhetoric; and intends to ſignalize himſelf, both on account of the importance of the ſubject, and the vaſt concourſe of auditors. Thoſe who tranſlate ἐπίδειξιν ποιεῖν, ſpecimen edere, to publiſh a ſpecimen, have not a wrong notion of the thing; for they give us to underſtand, that an orator exerts his utmoſt ſtrength, as though he had been deſired to produce a maſter piece. This I believe is the reaſon why the moſt ſhining ſpeeches, which are thoſe that form panegyricks or ſatyrs, have been aſcribed, by Rhetoricians, to the demonſtrative kind, ἐπιδεικτικὸν. However this be, there is ſome difficulty about the ἐπίδειξις πεντηκονταδραχμος of Prodicus. Suidas ſays that Prodicus firſt invented it; but ſays no farther, nor tells us what it is. Voſſius however makes him ſay, that all ſuch as deſired to hear that orator, uſed to pay him fifty drachms, that is, four French crowns and two Spaniſh rials (14). It is very plain, that Voſſius truſted to Creſollius (15), and looked no farther. He makes exactly the ſame valuation of money as the Jeſuit; but whereas, in the Jeſuit's book, this ſum of four crowns and two rials, which every auditor paid Prodicus, is but an explication of Suidas's words, or a conſequence drawn from them, it is ſet down in Voſſius as being Suidas's own words. Hence the reader may judge, how cautiouſly we ought to read common Authors in their quotations, ſince a man of Voſſius's character takes ſuch liberties. We will now ſee what he had ſaid in another book (16). He had related, as a circumſtance copied from Ariſtotle, that whenever Prodicus took notice that his auditors did not attend to him, he uſed to propoſe to them ſomething relating to his art, which he would not teach under the price of fifty drachms. The paſſage in Ariſtotle ſeems to bear two meanings; one, that Prodicus had a certain oration which abounded with ſuch lively ſtrokes, that whenever any of them was ſpoke before the audience, it immediately diſpelled the drowſineſs of the hearers; the other, that he had a treatiſe of rhetoric, containing ſeveral peculiar ſecrets, which would call up the attention of the hearers, though ever ſo abſent or weary (17). According to the firſt ſenſe, he had an oration which he kept for the grand days, that is, for his hearers who paid fifty drachms for it; and according to the ſecond ſenſe, he had a collection of good antidotes for his auditors, to keep them from ſleeping, and which he communicated to ſuch only as paid him handſomely for them. This puts me in mind of a Profeſſor of Philoſophy (18), famous among the Proteſtants of France, who would not teach certain ſophiſms, unleſs he was paid a certain tax or price he put upon them. Voſſius has followed the firſt of theſe two meanings in one of his books, and the laſt in the others. It would be no eaſy matter to determine which is the trueſt, conſidering the brevity which Ariſtotle and Suidas have affected, in ſpeaking of this matter; this, I ſay, would be pretty difficult, if Plato did not give us to underſtand, that the ἐπίδειξις πεντηκονταδραχμος of Prodicus's was rather a letter than a ſpeech. Socrates complains, in his bantering way, of his not being able to diſcourſe to purpoſe on the nature of names, becauſe he had not heard the ἐπίδειξις of fifty drachms, which Prodicus ſaid, taught that whole myſtery; he had heard only that of one drachm, τὴν δραχμιαῖα (19). Creſollius did not underſtand this laſt word; but falſely imagined, that it ought to be taken in Plato, for the ſame thing which had before been called πεντηκονταδραχμος. Plato qui rem eandem memorat, ea cauſa δραχμιαίαν ἐπίδειξιν nominavit (20). Madam Dacier, in her remarks on Ariſtophanes's clouds, p. 235. had a more juſt idea of the thing. Prodicus, ſays ſhe, was the vaineſt man that ever lived; and entertained ſo advantageous an opinion of his own learning, that he never taught the moſt inconſiderable thing gratis. He had ſpeeches of all rates and prices ready, from an obolus to fifty drachms.

(17) Τοῦτο δ' ἐστὶν, ὥσπερ ἔφη Πρόδικος ὅτε νυστάζοιεν οἱ ἀκροαταὶ παρεμβεβλῆσθαι τῆς πεντακοντάδραχμα αὐτοῖς. Hoc autem eſt, ut dixit Prodicus, cum dormitant auditores, inferre aliquid demonſtrationis quinquaginta drachmarum ipſis Ariſt. Rhetor. lib. 3. cap. 14.

(18) David Derodon.

(19) Νῦν δὲ οὐκ ἀκήκοα, ἀλλὰ τὴν δραχμιαίαν. Plato, in Cratylo, p. 265.

(20) Creſollius, Theatr. Rhetor. lib. 3. cap. 5. p. 178.

[D] Prodicus's ſtyle muſt have been very eloquent.] This may be proved by the teſtimony of ſeveral grave Authors. Maximus Tyrius (21) aſcribes to Prodicus the beauty of expreſſion, καλλιλογίαν, as his true characteriſtic. Marcellinus (22) ſays, he was very exact and accurate in the choice of his words. Themiſtius ſays, that his ſpeeches were full of ornaments and beauties, πολυτελεῖς τε καὶ γέμουσας ἡδονῆς. I am of opinion that Naudæus (23) ought not to have ranked him among thoſe Sophiſts, who uſed to declaim or ſpeek on any ſubject that was propoſed, without premeditation. But Philoſtratus would induce one to think the contrary; he ſaying, page 487, of his lives of the Sophiſts, that not only Gorgias was the firſt who underwent that trial; but alſo that he was prompted to it in order to eclipſe the glory which Prodicus gained by going from town to town, and delivering elaborate ſpeeches. Being deſirous of ſurpaſſing an Orator, whom he uſed to laugh at for often repeating the ſame words, he reſolved to exert his eloquence on unpremeditated ſubjects (24). There is no doubt, but that the thoughts in Prodicus's ſpeeches were as ſubtile as his ſtyle was beautiful; and that he contributed, as much at leaſt, as any body elſe, to cauſe the Athenians to forbid the Sophiſts to plead cauſes: this people could no longer bear to ſee the ſubtilties of thoſe Sophiſts make that to appear juſt which was unjuſt (25). See the Proverb Προδίκου σοφώτερος, more knowing than Prodicus. Eraſmus has committed an error there, in imagining that this Prodicus meant there was not the Sophiſt, but another. See how he is cenſured for it in Caſeneuve's notes on Philoſtratus's epiſtles, p. 42, 43. See alſo Ariſtophanes's clouds. But let the Poet ſneer as much as he pleaſes, we may infer from what he ſays, that our Sophiſt was conſidered as a man of great wit and learning.

(21) Diſſert. 7. init.

(22) In the Life of Thucydides, who ſays that he imitated τὴν τῶ Προδίκῳ ἐπὶ τοῖς ὀνόμασιν ἀκρίβειαν.

(23) Synt. de Studio Liber, p. 87. in the collection of Diſſertations de Studiis inſtituendis, printed in 1645, where we find Prodichum Chium. Doubtleſs the laſt miſtake is Naudæus's.

(24) Ἐπικόπτων τὸν Πρόδικον ὡς ἑωλά τε καὶ πολλάκις εἰρημένα ἀγορεύοντα ἐπαφῆκεν ἑαυτὸν τῷ καιρῷ. Philoſtr. p. 488.

(25) Idem, ibid.

[E] Xenophon, when a priſoner in Boeotia.] Charles Stephens did not underſtand any part of that paſſage of Philoſtratus. He explains it as though this Author had ſaid, that Prodicus was a man of ſo much authority, that Xenophon, having been taken Priſoner in Boeotia, was permitted to go home becauſe Prodicus was bail for him. Lloyd and Hofman have copied the errors of Charles Stephens word for word.

[F] That in which Prodicus feigned, that virtue.] I employed the word oration, not only becauſe Philoſtratus makes me have that idea of it, but alſo becauſe the profeſſion of Prodicus leads one naturally to it. It is not improbable but that a fiction of this kind books, by Prodicus, or the converſation of great talkers, his puniſhment would have been a little too ſevere; but it is ſomewhat probable, that he was accuſed of inculcating profaneneſs or irreligion into his Diſciples [G]. I know not whether other Authors beſides Plutarch have obſerved, that he was of an infirm and very ſickly conſtitution [H].

(26) Lib. 2. de memor. Socratis.

(27) Cicero, Officior. lib. 1. cap. 32. Epiſt. 12. ad Famil. lib. 5.

(28) Quintil. lib. 9. cap. 2.

(29) Max. Tyr. Orat. 4. init.

(30) Lucian. in Somnio. I ſhall obſerve hereunder, in the rem. [H] of the art. ZOROASTER, that the words of Clemens Alexandrinus are ambiguous.

(31) Berchet, in his Scholia on this paſſage of Henry Stephens, declares Prodicus to be a native of the iſland of Cos, or of the iſland of Chios; and ſince he ſays that he was a man ſummæ auctoritatis, he ſhews that he fell into the miſtake of Charles Stephen's Dict.

(32) Sext. Emp. adv. Mathem.

ſerved him for the ſubject of a declamation. It is nevertheleſs true that Xenophon (26), who favours us with the ſubſtance of it, gives it as the extract of a work concerning Hercules, ἐν τῷ συγγράμματι τῷ περὶ τοῦ Ἡρακλέους. What Charpentier ſpeaks of is ſtill more particular, in his French tranſlation; in the book, ſays he, which the learned Prodicus wrote concerning the Life of Hercules. Suidas informs us that this was a book entitled ὧραι, the hours; but notwithſtanding this, we yet may call this compoſition of Prodicus an oration. I ſaid that this fiction had been often quoted and applied, and I had reaſon to ſay ſo. Cicero (27), Quintilian (28), and Maximus Tyrius (29), ſpeak of it; but Silius Italicus, mentioned by Moreri, makes no mention of it. He feigns ſomething like this in honour of Scipio Africanus. Lucian alſo imitated this fiction (30). Among the moderns, I ſhall cite only Henry Stephens, who ſpeaks of it in the exhortation prefixed to his Greek verſion of the Geneva Catechiſm (31).

[G] He was accuſed of inculcating profaneneſs or irreligion into his Diſciples.] Sextus Empiricus ranks him among the Atheiſts (32); as does likewiſe Cicero, tho' not ſo directly, he ſaying that he taught, that to human gratitude is owing the belief of the exiſtence of Gods. This claſhes as much with ſound divinity, as if we ſhould ſay, as others have done, primus in orbe Deos fecit timor, to fear is owing the invention of religion; or with others, that the wiſdom of politicians invented it, in order to keep the common people to their duty. Cicero ſhews, that Prodicus's opinion is really deſtructive to religion. Quid? ii qui dixerunt totam de Diis immortalibus opinionem fictam eſſe ab hominibus ſapientibus Reipub. cauſa, ut quos ratio non poſſet, eos ad officium religio duceret, nonne omnem religionem funditus ſuſtulerunt? Quid Prodicus Chius? qui ea quæ prodeſſent hominum vitæ Deorum in numero habita eſſe dixit, quam tandem religionem reliquit (33)? i. e. "Did not thoſe perſons entirely deſtroy all religion, "who declared that the doctrine or belief of the im- "mortal Gods was invented by Politicians, to keep "thoſe men virtuous, from principles of religion, "whom reaſon could not reſtrain? What religion did "Prodicus of Chios leave, when he ſaid, that thoſe "things which are of advantage to man's life, are "ranked in the number of the Gods?"

(33) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. circa fin. p. m. 170.

[H] He was of an infirm and very ſickly conſtitution.] Plutarch obſerves, that when men are to be raiſed to publick employments, regard ſhould be had to their ſtrength and vigour, and not to their age; and therefore, that a robuſt old man ought not to be excuſed from it, as it was juſt to diſpenſe with Prodicus in his youth. It was this gave him occaſion to inform us of Prodicus's infirmity. He joins him with ſo lean and feeble (34) a man, that this paſſage deſerves to be cited, which is tranſlated according to Amiot's verſion (35). As therefore that man, who would adviſe Prodicus the Sophiſt, or Philetas the Poet, who were both young, but lean, feeble, ſickly (36), and commonly confined to their beds, to concern themſelves with publick affairs, would be ſtupid and ſenſeleſs; ſuch would thoſe be, who ſhould forbid ſuch old men as Phocion, Maſſiniſſa the African, and Cato the Roman, to exerciſe public employments.

(34) See the art. PHILETAS.

(35) Plut. an ſeni ſit gerenda Reſpublica, p. 791. E.

(36) Νίκε μὲν, ἰσχνὸς δὲ καὶ νοσώδης καὶ τὰ πολλὰ κλινοπετὴς δ' ἀῤῥωστίαι ὄντας. Integra quidem ætate verum graciles & ob infirmitatem valetudinis crebro decumbentes. Idem, ib.

PRODICUS, a Heretic in the ſecond Century (a), Founder of the Sect of the Adamites, imbibed the deteſtable opinions of Carpocrates, and added to them the ſhameleſs one of the copulation of both ſexes in publick [A]; he commanding that women ſhould be in common. Hence, in their publick banquets, every man took the firſt woman who fell in his way, after the candles were taken away; and it was affirmed that this lewd practice was the myſtical ceremony of initiation (b). Perſons, who are ever ſo little of a pious diſpoſition, are ſtruck with horror in finding, that ſo ſoon after the death of the Apoſtles, the doctrine of the myſterial union that ought to be between Chriſtians, was interpreted as implying the carnal conjunction of man and woman; and that perſons dared to maintain, that the true participation in the myſteries conſiſted in this. But what could be expected from ſuch a man as Prodicus, who imagined that ſouls were lodged in bodies, not for their puniſhment, but to pay homage to Angels, who had created the world, by all kinds of ſenſuality (c)? Prodicus's followers boaſted of their poſſeſſing

(a) See the rem. [A] of the art. ADAMITES.

(b) Theod. Hæret. Fab. lib. 1. cap. 6. and lib. 5. cap. 27.

(c) Idem, lib. 5. cap. 10 and 20.

[A] And added to them the ſhameleſs opinion of the copulation of both ſexes in publick.] Here follows Theodoret's words: Οὗτος προφανῶς λαγνείαν τοῖς Καρποκράτους προσέθηκε δόγμασι. Hic ad decreta Carpocratis adjecit palam & publicè ſcortari (1). The only proof Theodoret alledges for this is, that Prodicus commanded women to be in common, that is to ſay, that in the meats called by the primitive Chriſtians Agapæ (ἀγάπαι) every man ſhould enjoy a woman as ſhe ſhould happen to fall in his way, when the lights were put out. This they uſed to call communicating, and being initiated into the myſtery. I do not ſee any reaſon Theodoret had to aſcribe this additional doctrine to Prodicus, ſince Clemens Alexandrinus, whoſe teſtimony he borrows, aſcribes (2) all this to Carpocrates; for after having related, not as a circumſtance mentioned in their writings, but merely as an hearſay, that infamous practice of taking away the lights, and copulating, he ſays that Carpocrates ſhould enact thoſe laws for dogs, ſwine, and goats. Clemens Alexandrinus therefore did not think, that Carpocrates had left the enacting of theſe ſtrange laws to any of his ſucceſſors, for inſtance, Prodicus. Theodoret therefore makes uſe of an Author who is againſt him. This Author obſerves that the men in queſtion, before they went to theſe feaſts, uſed to inform ſuch women as they were deſirous of enjoying, that they had made choice of them (3). This is probable enough. The paſſions are too ingenious not to be active on ſuch occaſions, and to refer the whole to chance. The Carpocratian women knew therefore pretty well who would be their partners; and were not wholly in the caſe mentioned by a Roman Poet.

(1) Theodoret. Hæret. Fab. lib. 1. cap. 6.

(2) Stromat. lib. 3. p. 430.

(3) Μελετήσαντας δὲ τὴν τοιαύτην ἀγάπην τὴν κοινωνίαν, μιᾷ ἡμέρᾳ ἤδη παρ' ὧν ἂν ἐθελήσωσι γυναικῶν αἰτεῖν τὴν τῷ Καρποκράτει· ὃ γὰρ θέμις εἰπεῖν θεῖον· νόμεα ὑπαχοΐν. Meditatos autem in ejuſmodi agape communionem, interdiu jam, à quibus velint mulieribus exigere Carpocrateæ (divinæ enim nefas eſt dicere) legis obedientiam. Cl. Alex. Stromat. lib. 3. p. 430.

Mox juniores quærit adulteros
Inter mariti vina: neque eligit
Cui donet impermiſſa raptim
Gaudia luminibus remotis:
Sed juſſa coram non ſine conſcio
Surgit marito: ſeu vocat, inſtitor,
Seu navis Hiſpanæ magiſter,
Dedecorum pretioſus emtor (4).

(4) Horace, Od. 6. lib. 3.

"Marry'd, their leſſons ſhe improves,
"By practice of adult'rous loves,
"And ſcorns the common, mean deſign,
"To take advantage of her huſband's wine,
"Or ſnatch in ſome dark place,
"A haſty illegitimate embrace.

"No! the brib'd huſband knows of all,
"And bids her riſe when lovers call:
"Hither a Merchant from the Streights,
"Grown wealthy by forbidden freights,
"Or city Canibal repairs,
"Who feeds upon the fleſh of theirs:

"Convenient

poſſeſſing the ſecret books of Zoroaſter (d); and maintained that God ought not to be invoked (e), and that men ought not to run the hazard of martyrdom, by confeſſing the truth (f).

(d) Cl. Alex. Strom. lib. 1. p. 304.

(e) Ibid. lib. 7. p. 722.

(f) Tertull. in Scorpiac. cap. ult.

" Convenient brutes, whoſe tributary flame
" Pays the full price of luſt, and gilds the ſlighted ſhame. ROSCOMMON.

I muſt add that Theodoret, in another circumſtance, has not been ſo accurate as he ought in the quotation of Clemens Alexandrinus. He makes him ſay of Prodicus, what is properly and directly ſaid of ſome others; and which cannot be applied to Prodicus but in general, and with ſeveral indirect arguments.

PRUDENTIUS, whoſe entire name is Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, a Chriſtian Poet, was born in 348 [A]: he was a Spaniard; but it is diſputed whether he was a native of Calahorra, or Saragoſſa, or ſome other city of that country [B]. Thoſe who declare that he was raiſed to the Conſulate, are groſly miſtaken [C]; and they ſhould only have ſaid, that he was honoured with a very conſiderable employment (a). He did not begin to employ his muſe on religious ſubjects, till he was ſeven and fifty. He had been a Lawyer, afterwards

(a) See the rem. [D].

[A] He was born in 348.] This is proved from the following words:

Hæc dum vita volans agit
Inrepſit ſubito canities ſeni,
Oblitum veteris me Saliæ Conſulis arguens
Sub quo prima dies mihi (1).

(1) Prudent. in Prologo Operum.

" Whilſt my too fleeting life is thus engag'd,
" Inſtant, old age comes on, and turns me gray,
" Hinting that I've old Salia's Conſulate
" Forgot, the year which gave Prudentius birth."

The meaning of this is, that he was born under the Conſulſhip of Salia: now we find that the Conſuls of the year 348 were Flavius Philippus and Flavius Sallia, or Sallea (2). I am to obſerve, that ſuch as ſuppoſe him to flouriſh in 380 (3) are almoſt as much miſtaken as thoſe who declare him to flouriſh in 430 (4).

(2) Onuphrius, in book 3 of the Faſti, proves, by an inſcription, that his name was Sallea.

(3) Sixtus Senenſis is cenſured for this by Father Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 794.

(4) Bibl. Hiſpan. p. 205.

[B] . . . . It is diſputed whether he was a native of Calahorra, or Saragoſſa or ſome other city of that country.] Aldus Manutius, Sixtus Senenſis, Poſſevinus, and ſome other Writers, declare him to be a native of Saragoſſa; but Mariana aſſerts that he was born in Calahorra (5). They inſiſt, in favour of the firſt opinion, the hymn in honorem ſanctorum decem & octo Martyrum Cæſarauguſtanorum (6), which begins thus:

Bis novem NOSTER populus ſub uni
Martyrum ſervat cineres ſepulchro
Cæſarauguſtam vocitamus urbem
Res cui tanta eſt.

(5) Mariana, Hiſt. Hiſpan. lib. 4. cap. 17.

(6) It is the 4th of the book περὶ στεφάνων.

" Beneath one tomb, my countrymen have laid
" The ſacred, bleſt remains of twice nine martyrs?
" The only place, which can this honour boaſt,
" Cæſar Auguſta's called."

The following paſſage is found in the hymn in queſtion:

NOSTER eſt quamvis procul hinc in urbe
Paſſus ignota dederit ſepulchri
Gloriam victor, prope litus altæ
Forte Sagunti.
NOSTER, & NOSTRA puer in palæſtra,
Arte virtutis, fideique olivo
Unctus, horrendum didicit domare
Viribus hoſtem (7).

(7) Prudent. ib. Hymn. 4. ver. 97.

" He's ours, tho' martyr'd in a diſtant clime,
" The victor may indulge funereal honours,
" And let his aſhes lie near fam'd Saguntum.
" Our countrymen anointed with the oil
" Of faith, aroſe a mighty hero 'mong us,
" And learnt to triumph o'er the dreadful foe."

Prudentius ſpeaks of St. Vincentius, who was a native of Saragoſſa. A like proof is brought in favour of the ſecond opinion; for we find, the two following verſes in the hymn in honorem ſanctorum Martyrum Hemiterii & Chelidonii Calagurritanorum (8).

Hoc bonum ſalvator ipſe, quo fruamur, præſtitit
Martyrum cum membra NOSTRO conſecravit oppido (9).

(8) It is the 1ſt of the book περὶ στεφάνων.

(9) Prudent. ib. Hymn. 1. ver. 115.

" This good we owe to our bleſt Saviour's bounty,
" Who, loving us, made ſacred to our city,
" The blood of Martyrs."

And in the hymn for the martyrs of Saragoſſa, we read as follows.

NOSTRA geſtabit Calagurris ambos
Quos veneramur (10).

(10) Idem, ibid. Hymn. 4. ver. 31.

" Both, ſhall our Calahorra bear,
" Whom we with equal awe revere."

Mariana made uſe of theſe two paſſages; but the Author who criticiſed him ſhews (11), that if they afforded a good proof, they would be inſignificant for that very reaſon, becauſe they cannot be ſolid, unleſs the paſſages brought in favour of the contrary opinion are ſo likewiſe. In a word, they are reaſons which prove too much, and conſequently prove nothing. He invalidates the arguments of Mariana and Aldus Manutius reciprocally; and declares that Prudentius, though born neither in Saragoſſa nor Calahorra, might have called them noſtra, becauſe they were ſituated in Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, the country where he was born. He confirms his opinion by two remarks (12), one of which is taken from the following words concerning Tarragona:

(11) Pedro Mantuano, Advertencias à la Hiſt. de Juan de Mariana, p. 82 & ſeq.

(12) Idem, ibid. p. 85.

O triplex honor, o triforme cumen
Quo NOSTRÆ caput excitatur urbis
Cunctis urbibis eminens Hiberis (13).

(13) Prudent. Hymn. 6. ver. 142.

" O triple honour, triple glorious fame,
" Which raiſes thus our city 'bove all others"

The other proof is grounded on this, that though Prudentius ſays ſo many things of Merida, the native country of St. Eulalia, he does not call it noſtra; the reaſon of which, ſays he is, becauſe it was not in Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, but in Hiſpania Luſitanica. I muſt obſerve that he is miſtaken with regard to the following words, noſtra puer in palæſtra, he affirming (14) that they hinted at Valentia (15) where St. Vincentius ſuffered martyrdom; but it is plain they denote Saragoſſa, the place of his birth and education.

(14) Pedro Mantuano, Advertencias à la Hiſt. de Mariana, p. 84, 85.

(15) A town in Hiſpania Tarraconenſis.

The Author who cenſures Mariana is better at pulling down than building up; for when he endeavours to prove that Salia in Aſturia is the place of Prudentius's birth, he does not give one good reaſon, though he ſhews a great deal of ingenious learning. His principal argument is in the following words, oblitum veteris me Saliæ Conſulis (16). He pretends (17) that if veteris refers to Conſulis, there muſt have been two Salias ſucceſſively Conſuls; and that Prudentius muſt have been under the conſulate of the firſt. Now it is certain there was not a Salia major and Salia minor, as a Scipio Africanus major, and a Scipio Africanus minor. This objection would have ſome weight, was Prudentius an Author rigorouſly accurate in the choice of his terms. To conclude, if we were to refer, with Pedro Mantuano, the word veteris to a town, what will become of the word conſulis? His ſaying (18), that it ſignifies a year will not be any thing to the purpoſe.

(16) See the rem. [A].

(17) Pedro Mantuano, Advertencias à la Hiſt. de Mariana, p. 87.

(18) Idem, ibid. p. 90.

[C] Thoſe who declare that he was raiſed to the Conſulate are groſly miſtaken.] Aldus Manutius (19) calls him

(19) Aldus, in Vita Prudentii.

wards a judge, then a ſoldier, and laſtly, enjoyed a noble employment at Court [D]. He does not deny but that he was debauched in his younger years (b). His Poems ſhew more of religious zeal than imbeliſhments of art (c). He is often guilty of falſe quantity, not to mention that all his opinions are not orthodox [E]. The liberty he took in aſſerting that

(b) See the rem. [D].

(c) Melior omnino Chriſtianus quam Poeta meo judicio. Lilius Gregor.

Gyraldus, Dialog. 25. p. 906. Tom. 2. Operum. See alſo Gyrald. in Poet. Hiſt. p. 290.

him vir conſularis & Maſſaliæ Conſul. His miſtake proceeds from his not rightly underſtanding the letters V. C. added to Prudentius's names; and from reading oblitum veteris Meſſaliæ conſulis arguens, inſtead of which it ſhould be me Saliæ. The two letters V. C. ſignify vir clariſſimus, as Alciatus obſerves (20), and not vir conſularis, a title which was no longer uſed in that age (21). Here follows a paſſage from du Pin (22). "This paſſage has been underſtood by very "few Authors (23); and ſome, as Aldus, Sixtus Se- "nenſis, Poſſevinus, and even father Labbe imagined "that he had been Conſul of a city called Meſſalia, "which father Labbe (24) ſuppoſes to be Marſeilles; "but it is a blunder. They miſtook the name of "Salia the Conſul, who was Conſul with Philip in "348, for the name of a city; and gave Prudentius "the title of Conſul, which belongs to Salia, under "whoſe Conſulate Prudentius was born." The Author who criticiſes Mariana (25) refutes Antonius Nebriſſenſis, who ſuppoſes that Prudentius was born under the Conſulſhip of Meſſalia: he ſhews that there was no Conſul of this name from the beginning of the reign of Dioclefian till the reign of the Emperor Anaſtaſius. He refutes Aldus, who imagines, that Prudentius was Conſul of Meſſalia (26), ſhews that there is no ſuch Conſul in the Faſti Conſulares, that ancient Authors have never ſpoke of a city called Meſſalia. There indeed was a city named Maſſillia, now called Marſeilles: but (ſays he) ever ſince the diviſion of the Empire under Conſtantine, one Conſul uſed to be elected at Rome, and another at Conſtantinople; or both in Rome, and then both in Conſtantinople; and ſometimes two in Rome, and two in Conſtantinople at the ſame time; but it does not appear that any Weſtern Conſul ever reſided in Marſeilles. It is ſufficient to ſay, that had Prudentius been Conſul, he would have mentioned that circumſtance in the paſſage inſerted in the beginning of the following remark.

(20) See Father Chamillard, the Dauphin Scholiaſt, p. 1.

(21) Idem, ibid.

(22) Du Pin, Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſ. Tom. 3. p. 6. Dutch edit.

(23) That is, oblitum veteris me Saliæ, &c.

(24) See his Diſſertat. de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 793.

(25) Pedro Mantuane, Advertencias à la Hiſt. de Mariana, p. 86, 87.

(26) It ſhould be Maſſalia.

[D] He did not begin . . . . till he was ſeven and fifty. He had been a lawyer, afterwards a judge, then a ſoldier; and laſtly, enjoyed a noble employment at Court.] He himſelf gives us a ſhort account of his life, and does not omit the lewdneſs he was guilty of in his younger years. Read the following lines.

Per quinquennia jam decem,
Ni fallor, fuimus; ſeptimus inſuper
Annum cardo rotat, dum fruimur ſole volubili.
Inſtat terminus, & diem
Vicinum ſenio jam Deus adplicat.
Quid nos utile tanti ſpatio temporis egimus?
Ætas prima crepantibus
Flevit ſub ferulis: mox docuit toga
Infectum vitiis falſa loqui, non ſine crimine:
Tum laſciva protervitas,
Et luxus petulans (heu pudet ac piget!)
Fœdavit juvenem nequitiæ ſordibus ac luto.
Exin jurgia turbidos
Armarunt animos, & male pertinax
Vincendi ſtudium ſubjacuit caſibus aſperis.
Bis legum moderamine
Frænos nobilium reximus urbium:
Jus civile bonis reddidimus, terruimus reos.
Tandem militiæ gradu
Evectum pietas Principis extulit,
Adſumptum proprius ſtare jubens ordine proximo (27).

(27) Prudent. in Prologo Operum.

"Five times ten years I've liv'd, and ſeven more,
"If I miſtake not: ſuch the time theſe eyes,
"Were favour'd firſt with ſol's inſpiring ray.
"But now, ſince life's dire limits I approach,
"And age begins to creep thro' every nerve,
"Let me examine what good acts I've done.
"Beneath the maſter's rod my youth I wept;
"My riper years the wrangling bar beheld,
"Where all its quirks and cavils I imbib'd.
"Next, wanton luxury and riot luſt,
"Their venom ſpread round my polluted ſoul,
"And prompted me to acts I now repent.
"Then, in fierce conteſts, thoughtleſs I engag'd;
"And the fell thirſt of conquering ſwell'd my mind,
"Which long expos'd me to unnumber'd perils.
"Twice, o'er the nobleſt cities I preſided,
"Whilſt juſtice and ſoft mercy ſway'd alternate;
"The bad reſtraining; making vertue happy.
"Laſtly, exalted in my Prince's favour,
"A military honour I receiv'd;
"Kindly commanded to be near his perſon."

He bethought himſelf a little late, but not too much ſo (28), of renouncing ſublunary vanities, and compoſing verſes in a pious ſtrain. It may be made a queſtion, whether Prudentius's publiſhing the debauched conduct of his youth may be of advantage to all his readers. A young debauchee, who ſhould anſwer thus to thoſe who ſhould cenſure his behaviour, Prudentius, that very devout Poet, and ſo good a Chriſtian, behaved as I now do when he was young; I will conduct myſelf as he did afterwards, when I am ſeven and fifty; ſuch a debauchee, I ſay, would make a wretched anſwer, and yet it appears juſt in his eye, and lulls him in his ſin.

(28) Nam ſera nunquam eſt ad bonos mores via. Quem pœnitet peccaſſe pene eſt innocens. Seneca, in Agamemn. act. 2. ver. 342. p. m. 262. i. e. It is never too late for a man to reform his conduct. He who repents of his fault is almoſt innocent.

[E] All his opinions are not orthodox.] He aſſerts as a truth, that the damned have annually a day of reſt or intermiſſion from their torments; and that this is the day on which Chriſt roſe from Hell. Who had let him into theſe anecdotes?

Sunt & ſpiritibus ſæpe nocentibus
Pœnarum celebres ſub Styge feriæ,
Illa nocte, ſacer qua rediit Deus
Stagnis ad ſuperos ex Acheronticis (29):
. . . . . .
Marcent ſuppliciis Tartara mitibus,
Exſultatque ſui carceris otio
Umbrarum populus liber ab ignibus:
Nec fervent ſolito flumina ſulphure (30).

(29) Prudent. Hym. 5. Cathemer. ver. 125. p. m. 21.

(30) Idem, ibid. ver. 133.

"The tortur'd ſouls below, have reſt from pain,
"And gaily wanton 'midſt feſtivities,
"On that all ſacred night, when God's great ſon
"Roſe from th' infernal ſhades and ſoar'd to hea- "ven.
. . . . . .
"The torments of dire Tartarus grew mild;
"Then flitting ſhades, releas'd from horrid woe,
"Exult for joy, nor feel the ſcorching fires;
"Nor floods are heated with their uſual ſulphur.

He affirms in another place, that God ſentences but very few to damnation.

Quæſitor ille ſolus
Animæque corporiſque,
Enſiſque bis timendus
Prima ac ſecunda mors eſt.
Idem tamen benignus
Ultor retundit iram,
Paucoſque non priorum
Patitur perire in ævum (31).

(31) Idem, ibid. Hym. 6. ver. 89. p. 24.

"He only ſearches out the heart and mind;
"He is the ſword that's to be doubly fear'd;
"The firſt and ſecond death.——
"Yet he in tenderneſs to poor mankind,
"His anger ſoftens, and permits but few
"Ungodly ſouls, eternally to periſh.

Some blame him exceedingly for having wiſhed, not to enjoy the glories of paradiſe, but a ſtate of moderately-violent ſuffering. He declares that he would be contented, provided that his ſoul was not lodged in the deepeſt dungeon of hell, and does not deſire a better fate after the reſurrection (32).

(32) See the Bibl. Univerſelle, Tom. 12. p. 186, 187.

Multa in theſauris Patris eſt habitatio, Chriſte, that but few would be damned, would not now be received. This might be of ſome ſervice to him againſt the objections of the Marcionites, againſt whom he wrote a Poem ; but it is certain that he could not thereby ſolve the difficulties relating to the origin of evil [F]. There

Diſparibus diſcreta locis ; non poſco beatâ
In regione domum : ſint illic caſta virorum
Agmina, pulvereum quæ dedignantia cenſum
Divitias petiere tuas : ſit flore perenni
Candida virginitas, animum caſtrata reciſum.
At mihi Tartarei ſatis eſt ſi nulla miniſtri
Occurrat facies, avidæ nec flamma Gehennæ
Devoret hanc animam, merſam fornacibus imis.
Eſto : cavernoſo, quia ſic pro labe neceſſe eſt
Corporeâ, triſtis me ſorbeat ignis Averno :
Saltem mirificos incendia lenta vapores
Exhalent, æſtuque calor languente tepeſcat.
Lux immenſa alios, & tempora vincta coronis
Glorificent : me pœna levis clementer adurat (33).

(33) Prudent. in Hamartigenia, ſub fin. p. 227.

" O Chriſt ! in thy almighty father's houſe
" Are many manſions : I, too worthleſs mortal,
" Aſk not a place in thoſe celeſtial ſeats.
" There dwell the ſouls of men, of virtuous men,
" Who ſcorning the vain riches of this world,
" Sought only after thy eternal treaſures.
" There lives virginity in deathleſs bloom.
" Enough for me, if gracious Heaven preſerves
" From the dire aſpect of Hell's gloomy fiends,
" And keeps me from its ſwift, ſurrounding flames.
" But, as my blackening guilt requires purgation,
" O ! let the fire with gentle heat exhale,
" And mildly purge away my various ſins.
" Let others aim at light, and heavenly crowns,
" I only wiſh to burn in gentler flames.

Mr. Perkins, a Proteſtant divine, affirms that this is an impious prayer, and ought not to be aſcribed to Prudentius (34). He is not the only perſon who thinks that it is a piece added to the Hamartigenia. However this be, Victor Giſelinus, a Roman Catholick Author, has publickly condemned that prayer in a work (35), which Poſſevinus greatly applauds (36). I am to obſerve, that the moſt accurate editions (37) give it as genuine ; whereas ſome verſes that have been looked upon as ſuppoſititious, have been omitted. We do not find in Heinſius's edition, as in that of Sichard, the third ſtanza of the hymn falſely entitled, ad incenſum cerei Paſchalis (38). This title, as well as this ſtanza, are not in the beſt manuſcripts, but have been left out as ſuppoſititious pieces. The prayer annexed to the Hamartigenia would have been expunged alſo, had there been any reaſons to make it believed that it was not written by Prudentius. But here follows a hereſy, of which he cannot be cleared by denying the thing. He believed the materiality of the ſoul.

(34) Dictum impium & non tribuendum Prudentio ait noſter Perkinſius. Rivet. Crit. Sacri, lib. 3. cap. 26. p. 1123. Tom. 2. Oper.

(35) In his notes on Prudentius.

(36) See Rivet. Oper. Tom. 2. p. 1123.

(37) For inſtance, that of Nicholas Heinſius.

(38) It is the 5th of the Cathemerinon.

Reſciſſa ſed iſta (39) ſeorſum
Solvunt hominem perimuntque ;
Humus excipit arida corpus
Animæ rapit aura LIQUOREM (40).

(39) That is, the body and ſoul.

(40) Prudent. Hym. 10. Cathemerinon, ver. 9.

" When ſoul and body by Death's icy hand
" Are ſeparated ; ſoon to duſt the body
" Changes ; and the liquid ſoul to air.

That Prudentius meant, by animæ liquorem, a material ſubſtance, cannot be doubted, when we conſider what he ſays in another place :

Non occidet, inquit,
Interior qui ſpirat homo : luet ille perenne
Supplicium, quod ſubjectos male rexerit artus.
Nec mihi difficile eſt LIQUIDAM circumdare flammis
Naturam, quamvis PERFLABILIS illa feratur
Inſtar Noti : capiam tamen, & tormenta adhibebo (41).

(41) Idem, contra Symmach. lib. 2. ver. 184.

" Th' interior man (ſays he) will never die,
" But ſuffer endleſs puniſhment, becauſe
" It plung'd in wickedneſs the ſubject body.
" I eaſily can conceive a liquid nature,
" Tho' thin and open as the ſouthern wind,
" Suffering ſad tortures.

Le Clerc obſerves (42), that theſe words of Prudentius, animæ rapit aura liquorem, ſignify very naturally the mortality of the ſoul, and that an Epicurean could not expreſs himſelf better. It is certain that this verſe, and the three foregoing, explain a doctrine, which is found in the books of ſeveral Heathens, and relates to the characteriſticks of death (43). It is, ſaid theſe, a compound's reſolving itſelf into its firſt principles, each of which returns to the place from which it came ; the body to the earth, the ſoul to the air or æther. If we peruſe what Lucretius ſays on this head, it will appear that Prudentius might paſs for his epitomizer :

(42) Le Clerc, Bibl. Univerſ. Tom. 12. p. 166.

(43) See in the art. AMPHIARAUS, citat. (35), what I have cited from Epicharmus.

Denique cæleſti ſumus omnes ſemine oriundi
Omnibus ille idem Pater eſt, unde alma liquenteis
Humorum guttas Mater cum Terra recepit
Fœta parit nitidas fruges, arbuſtaque læta,
Et genus humanum (44).
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Cedit item retro de Terra quod fuit ante,
In terras : & quod miſſum 'ſt ex Ætheris oris,
Id rurſum Cæli rellatum templa receptant :
Nec ſic interimit mors res, ut Materiai
Corpora conficiat, ſed cœtum diſſupat ollis (45).

(44) The Reader will find the ſequel of this citation (58) of the art. JUPITER.

(45) Lucret. lib. 2. ver. 990.

" Laſtly, we all from ſeed celeſtial riſe,
" Which Heav'n, our common parent, ſtill ſupplies.
" From him the earth receives enliv'ning rain,
" And ſtrait ſhe bears bird, tree, and beaſt, and man.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
" And ſo each part returns, when bodies die,
" What came from earth to earth, what from the ſky
" Dropt down, aſcends again, and mounts on high.
" For death does not deſtroy, but diſunite
" The ſeeds, and change their order and their ſite. CREECH.

(46) See the rem. [R] of the art. LUCRETIUS the Philoſopher.

(47) And alſo in other books, See Le Clerc, Bibl. Univerſ. Tom. 12. p. 166.

But though theſe two Poets agree in their expreſſions, they yet are diametrically oppoſite in their ſentiments. This return of the ſoul to its principle, was a true death, according to Lucretius (46) ; but not according to all the reſt of the Heathens, and ſtill leſs ſo according to Prudentius the Poet, who expreſſes himſelf a little after (47) ſo poſitively on this head, that we cannot doubt his having taught the immortality of the ſoul.

Let me be allowed to ſay, that the judgment, which Mr. Perkins has paſſed, ſeems a little harſh to thoſe who have a due regard to equity and charity. Theſe are perſuaded, that the only reaſon why this Poet was willing to be deprived of Paradiſe, and to ſuffer a moderate puniſhment after this life, was, becauſe he thought himſelf too unworthy of the ſupreme beatitude, and but too deſerving of puniſhment. Now can this be called an impious humility ? Ought we not, in taking this matter in a favourable light, to call it a ſacrifice or offering of his perſon to God's juſtice ?

[F] He could not thereby ſolve the difficulties relating to the origin of evil.] I have propoſed them in ſeveral parts of this Dictionary (48) ; but, in order to ſhew that the Philoſophers are not the only ſet of men who ſpeak of them, I'll cite a long paſſage from an able Divine. " (49) The Manichees and Marcio-
" nites raiſed an objection to the orthodox, mention" ed by Prudentius (50) in its full ſtrength. This ob" jection is, that if the God who governs the world,
" was not pleaſed with vice, he would put a ſtop to
" it, ſince he is not ignorant of the corruption of " mankind, and can ſtop it. They affirmed, that it " is the ſame thing for a Being to commit evil and " permit it, when he can hinder it. Prudentius an-
" ſwers, firſt, that it is plain that God is not de" lighted with vice, ſince he appoints a remedy for it,
" and ſaves thoſe who abſtain from it. In ſhort (re" ply the Hereticks) men cannot ſin in ſpite of God ;
" ſince he is the maſter of the heart of man and moulds
" it

(48) In the articles MARCION, MANICHEES, PAULICIANS.

(49) Bibl. Univerſelle, Tom. 12. p. 182 & ſeq.

(50) The words are as follow : Si non vult Deus eſſe malum, cur non vetat ? inquit. Nil refert auctor fuerit factorque malorum. Anne opera in vitium ſceleris pulcherrima verti, Cum poſſit prohibere, ſinat ? quod ſi velit omnes Innocuos agere Omnipotens, nec ſancta voluntas. Degeneret, facto nec ſe manus inquinet ullo. Condidit ergo malum Dominus, quod ſpectat ab alto, Et patitur, fierique probat, tamquam ipſe crearit. Ipſe creavit enim, quod, cum diſcludere poſſit, Non abolet, longoque ſinit graſſarier uſu. Prudent. in Hamartig. ver. 640. p. m. 217.

(d) Prudent. in Symmach. lib. 2. p. 695 & ſeq.

There are ſeveral editions of his works [G]. His books againſt Symmachus were writ before the victory gained over Radagaiſus in 405, and after that which Stilico won over Alaric, near Pollentia, in 402. He mentions the latter (d), but ſays nothing of the former,

" it as he pleaſes. Our Poet does not ſolve this difficulty any otherwiſe, than by returning to free-will, without which there could not be either vice or virtue. He expatiates very much on this, and proves it by the examples, not only of our firſt parents, but alſo of Lot and his wife, of Naomi's daughters-in-law, and of brothers, one of whom is daily ſeen to follow virtue, and the other vice, to which he adds this general maxim :

" Omnibus una ſubeſt natura ; ſed exitus omnes
" Non unus peragit, placitorum ſegrege formâ.

" All men are of the ſame nature, but all have not the ſame fate, becauſe they all have not the ſame will. It appears from what was ſaid above, that Prudentius ſuppoſed that mankind are born corrupt; but it is plain from what he ſays here, that he did not believe that this corruption determined them neceſſarily to evil. He adds, that the reaſon why God appointed rewards and puniſhments, is, becauſe men may be either good or bad as they pleaſe. If the Manichees had alſo objected to him, that it had been better there had been no liberty nor happineſs given as a reward; and if men had been neceſſarily happy, by their being neceſſarily determined to the love of virtue; than to make them ſo fatal a preſent as liberty, whereby moſt of them are plunged into eternal damnation : if (I ſay) the Manichees had ſtarted ſuch an objection to him, he perhaps would have made uſe of his principle mentioned above, viz. that few perſons are damned ; and who can ſay whether Prudentius did not ſtart ſuch a thought on account of this objection, which might naturally occur to his mind ?"

All the laſt part of this paſſage from le Clerc is extremely probable. I join in opinion with him, that had our Poet found himſelf hard preſſed, he would have anſwered that the number of the damned is very inconſiderable, and therefore that we ought not to exclaim ſo much againſt the ſeverity of divine juſtice, in expoſing mankind to miſery. But this anſwer would not have ſatisfied the Manichees, nor even have been looked upon as a palliative remedy, for they might have replied as follows. You own that our objection would be valid, were two thirds, or half of mankind to be damned eternally. You therefore own, that the good principle cannot make choice of a plan, in which the damnation of the greateſt part of mankind is included. You confeſs therefore that ſupreme goodneſs is inconſiſtent with the eternal infelicity of ſo many perſons. This confeſſion deſtroys their whole ſyſtem ; for you cannot admit that inconſiſtency, without acknowledging that the eternal unhappineſs of a very great number of creatures would be a mark of cruelty in the being who ſhould puniſh them. You are very ſenſible that infinite goodneſs cannot be blended with cruelty ; and if you could ſuppoſe that the Sovereign diſpoſer of all things might, without any mixture of this vice, ſentence to the flames two thirds or half of mankind, you would ceaſe to think ſupreme goodneſs inconſiſtent with this damnation. Here then is the foundation of that anſwer : the good principle would be cruel, were a great number of people to be damned ; but becauſe few perſons are damned, he is not cruel, and preſerves all the characteriſticks of infinite goodneſs. Conſider what it is you expoſe yourſelf to. You ought to own, that the damnation of mankind in general would be the effect of extreme cruelty, actus ſævitiei ut octo, as the ſchoolmen ſpeak, who meaſure the whole extent of a quality by eight degrees. Conſequently the damnation of half mankind would be the effect of a cruelty of four degrees ; whence it follows, that the damnation of a fourth part of mankind would ſhew God cruel two degrees. Though you ſuppoſe the number of the damned ever ſo ſmall, it will always ſhew, in God, a degree of cruelty, which, how ſmall ſoever it may be, cannot be conſiſtent with infinite goodneſs, ſince that goodneſs neceſſarily excludes the leaſt mixture of the contrary quality (51). In a word, if it be cruel to damn a thouſand millions of ſouls, it is alſo cruel to damn nine hundred millions, which proves that it is the ſame with regard to eight hundred millions, and ſo on ; for the difference would be only with regard to a greater or leſs number ; and this kind of ſubtraction will never lead from cruelty to infinite goodneſs ; but at moſt to a goodneſs leſs blended with the contrary vice; a goodneſs inconſiſtent with a principle, that is eternally and eſſentially good (52). On the other hand, if it is not cruel to damn an hundred thouſand perſons, why ſhould it be ſo to damn two hundred thouſand ? And if ſupreme goodneſs is not impeached by the damnation of two thouſand men, nor will it be ſo by the damnation of three hundred thouſand ; and you cannot aſſign any number that can leſſen its plenitude or fulneſs, ſince three hundred thouſand cannot hinder its continuing ſuch. Own therefore that your ſyſtem falls to the ground, if you pretend to anſwer our difficulty, by leſſening the number of the damned. We may here apply a thought of Horace (53) with all the ſubtleties of the Sorites (54). The true way of anſwering would be to aſſert, that the damnation of all men would be but an act of juſtice, without the leaſt mixture of cruelty. Our Author's method would therefore have been defective.

(51) Compare this with ſection 7, of the 3d treatiſe of Janua Cœlorum reſerata.

(52) See the art. ORIGEN, rem. [E], num. 4.

(53) Eſt vetus atque probus centum qui perficit annos, &c. Horat. Epiſt. 1. lib. 2. ver. 39. See this whole paſſage citat.

(54) See the rem. [O] of the art. CHRYSIPPUS.

I ſay nothing of another defect in his anſwer. The ſtrength of his adverſary's principle lyes in this, that a principle, who is able to prevent evil, and does not do it, wills it. This notion is evident. To what purpoſe is it to ſay, as our Poet does, that God has given man a full power of doing good ; and that man is the ſole cauſe of ſin, by his making an ill uſe of free will ? This does not weaken the objection ; it is giving one's theſis for a reply, it is ignoratio elenchi, and petitio principii, ſince the Manichees attack directly the hypotheſis of a free creature, whom a good principle will ſuffer to commit ſin.

[G] There are ſeveral editions of his works.] That of Aldus, printed at Venice in 1502, in 4to. is not the firſt, as has been affirmed, there having been one before in Deventer (55). Some ſay that he publiſhed two editions, but there ſeems to be no ground for ſuch an aſſertion (56). Du Pin (57) ſpeaks of the Antwerp edition of 1540, in 8vo. with notes by Antonius Nebriſſenſis and Sichardus. I am poſſeſſed of an Antwerp edition in 8vo. with notes by thoſe two Authors, but it was printed in 1546. The dedication by Sichardus is dated from Baſil in March 1537. Geſner, in his Bibliotheque (58), mentions an edition of Baſil by Cratander in 1527, with Sichardus's Scholia, and another edition in the ſame town, by Henricus Petri. Father Labbe (59) followed Plantin's Antwerp edition, printed in 1564, with notes and corrections, by Theodore Pulman (60), and a Commentary by Victor Giſelinus. The two books againſt Symmachus were printed at Paris in 1614, with Grangæus's notes, whom du Pin falſely calls Gangræus. He ſays that the laſt edition of Prudentius was that of Amſterdam in 1667, with Heinſius's notes and corrections; but he ought to have ſaid Nicholas Heinſius, to prevent the ſon's works from being aſcribed to the father. Methinks he ought to have mentioned that (omitted by him) in uſum Delphini, by Father Chamillard, printed at Paris in 1687. Moreri ſays, that there is an Amſterdam edition of Prudentius, in 1670, with notes by Nicholas Heinſius, and the Author's Life, but I have not yet been able to diſcover whether this is true. I have only the edition of Daniel Elzivir, printed in 1667, 12mo, but the Life of Prudentius is not inſerted in it, but it is (61) in Sichardus's edition. The Variorum edition, publiſhed by Weitzius, is of Frankfort or Hanaw, in 1613, and not of Hanover, as du Pin affirms.

(55) Nich. Heinſius, in Præfat. Prudentii.

(56) Idem, ibid.

(57) Du Pin, Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſ. Tom. 3. p. 5.

(58) Folio 125.

(59) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 262.

(60) He calls him Pulmaninus Cranenburgius. Du Pin calls him Pulman Graffembourg. Both are errors ; for, beſides that he ſhould have ſaid Cranenburg, (a little town in the territory of Cleves, the native country of Theodore Pulman) he ſhould not have expreſſed himſelf in ſuch a manner, as to make the Readers imagine, that it is the name of this Author's family.

(61) Written by Aldus Manutius.

The Reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee the judgment, which Father Chamillard forms of thoſe who have writ on this Author. Giſelinus ſectatus eſt tantum ea, quæ omnium erant facillima & minime ſcitu neceſſaria, mer, though his ſubject required it.

neceſſaria, lapſus in multis etiam & hallucinatus. Nebriſſenſis hæret in Prudentio magis, ſed eſt brevior & ſingula delibare ſatis habet, quæ ad fabulam, hiſtoriam, & penitiorem ſcriptoris cognitionem requiruntur, omittit. Quid quod Apotheoſim, Hamartigeniam, duos contra Symmachum libros qui ſunt præ cæteris tamen digniſſimi qui legantur non attigit . . . . . Heinſii variæ lectiones in Prudentium adſperſis interdum lectiſſimis notulis perquam eruditæ ſunt & accuratæ, ut ab Heinſio profectas facile noris . . . . Weitzius, qui cum editas hactenus in Prudentium notas collegiſſet, addidit etiam ſuas, eaſque minime contemnendas, hoc uni cæteris ſuperior quod veterum autorum locos indicet, ac eos præcipue ſacræ ſcripturæ quos Prudentius operi ſuo intexuit. Mitto Jacobum Spiegelium, qui commentariolum edidit in oden Prudentii inſcriptam omnis hora, ejus enim in illam notæ non ſolum ſunt propter nimiam prolixitatem moleſtæ, verum etiam minutis quibuſdam ac pene puerilibus nugis ab ipſa grammatica repetitis refertæ. Mitto etiam Adamum Siberum, Georgium Remum, Adamum Theodorum Siberum, Andream Wilkium: quorum alii verba ſex interdum aut ſeptem protulerunt, in hymnos tres aut quatuor totos, alii in unum duntaxat, ut merito ab interpretum Prudentii numero ſint expungendi. Aliter ſentiendum de Scholiis Iſonis, quæ quamvis admodum brevia ſint, quidquid eſt tamen gravioris modi ſolvunt (62). He beſtows great applauſes on Fabricius's notes on five hymns of Prudentius, and thoſe of Eraſmus on the two laſt hymns of the CATHEMERINON.

(62) Stephanus Chamillard, è Societate Jeſu, Præfat. ad Prudent. in uſum Delphini.

I am to obſerve, that Walafridus Strabo has been made two Authors of, in Moreri, by a comma being put after Walafridus.

PRYNNE (WILLIAM), an Engliſh Lawyer, made a very great noiſe during the wars between King Charles I. and the Parliament. He was of a very inconſtant and fiery temper. He oppoſed the Epiſcopal Clergy with ſo much animoſity, that his conduct was looked upon as criminal, and he ſuffered an ignominious puniſhment, he being ſentenced to loſe his ears [A]. This ſentence was put in execution; but it afterwards proved of great advantage to him, when the war broke out between the King and Parliament. He then was conſidered as a glorious confeſſor of the good old cauſe, and a ſufferer for the purity of the Goſpel. He was choſen a Member of Parliament, and diſcovered a ſpirit of ſtrong animoſity againſt the Royaliſts: nevertheleſs, either from inconſtancy, or from ſome particular diſguſt, he grew more mild afterwards, and was thrown into priſon. He wrote a little book in his confinement [B], in which he repreſented, in the ſtrongeſt terms, to the adherents of the Parliament, that they ought not to bring the King to a trial; and that the army, which oppreſſed the liberties of the Parliament, was directed by the counſels of the Jeſuits. He, before that, had writ a book, in which he exhorted the Parliament to root out, by penal laws, all the Independents [C].

If

[A] He being ſentenced to loſe his ears.] A Proteſtant Miniſter of Baſil ſeems to ſay, that he was ſentenced to be baniſhed to ſome of the American iſlands; but it is more natural to ſuppoſe, that his meaning is, he was condemned to paſs the remainder of his life in a dungeon. His words are as follow. Author noſter Prynnus, Baſtwicus & Burtonus, trium Facultatum Doctores, quod contra iſtam tyrannidem hiſcere auſi fuiſſent auribus mutilati, extra anni ſoliſque viam expulſi ſunt quo longa tabe perimerentur (1). i. e. "Our "Author Prynne, Baſtwick and Burton, Doctors of "three Faculties, had their ears cut off; and were ſent "to baniſhment beyond the ſun's courſe, there to lan-"guiſh away their lives, for having preſumed to "exclaim againſt this tyranny." Here follows a paſſage from Baillet, which informs us of the time and place when William Prynne's ears were cut off. Some other incidents are likewiſe mentioned, for which reaſon I ſhall quote it entire (2). "William Prin, "or Prynne, indeed, wrote an Anti-Arminianiſm; "but this title does not ſo much attack the perſons of "the Arminians, as the nature and quality of their "doctrines. The only deſign of his book is to ſhew, "that the doctrine of abſolute predeſtination, as be-"lieved by the Calviniſts, had been held, without "interruption, by the Church of Chriſt. In all pro-"bability, this Mr. Prynne is that famous adverſary "of the Engliſh Biſhops; and particularly of the un-"fortunate William Laud, Archbiſhop of Canterbury "(3). It is he, whoſe ears were cut off by the hang-"man, in the Palace-yard of Weſtminſter, the 30th "of June 1637, for his tragedy concerning the viola-"tion of the Sabbath, and the ſtate of the Biſhops; and "who being ſentenced to pay five thouſand pounds, "with one Baſtwick a Phyſician, and Burton a Lon-"don Miniſter, was thrown into priſon, there to paſs "the remainder of his days. But the troubles in "England breaking out, he was ſet at liberty when "Charles I. was put to death, and even choſen a "Member of Parliament (4). He wrote a prodigious "number of books afterwards, moſt of them in Eng-"liſh, and was made Keeper of the Records in the "Tower of London. He died about eighteen or "nineteen years ſince."

(1) Wolfangus Meyerus, S. Th. D. & Verbi divini in Eccleſ. Baſil. Miniſt. Senior, Epiſtola Dedicat. Fulcimenti Gladii.

(2) Baillet, in his Anti, num. 88.

(3) See a paſſage from Dr. Smith, in Vita Camdeni, p. 56. Illo (Archiepiſcopo Laudo) in carcerem detruſo, Gulielmus Prinnus, ob ſeditioſos libellos ſtigmate inuſtus, in D. Archiepiſcopi ſcrinia, tum ut ſi quicquam, quod fictis criminibus objectis aliqualem induceret colorem, occurriſſet, inde excerperet, tum ut quantum erat documentorum, quod Viro innocentiſſimo iiſdem diluendis, cum pro Tribunali ſiſtendus eſſet, de capite dicturus, uſui eſſe potuerit, quoque auferret, animo malevolo involavit. See rem. [M] of the art. CAMDEN.

(4) He had been releaſed from his firſt confinement before this, and elected a Member of the Houſe of Commons.

[B] He wrote a little book in his confinement.] It is inſerted in a collection of various pieces, printed by a Royaliſt in 1649, and entitled, Sylloge variorum Tractatuum, Anglico quidem idiomate & ab Auctoribus Anglis conſcriptorum, ſed in linguam Latinam tranſlatorum; quibus Caroli Magnæ Britan. Franciæ, & Hiberniæ Regis innocentia illuſtratur, & parricidium injuſtiſſimè & immaniſſimè in illum perpetratum, à Pſeudo-Parlamento & perduelli exercitu luce clarius declaratur. Acceſſit Reſponſum perneceſſarium ad declamationem ſeu provocationem M. Joannis Cooke. Auctore I. V. A. R. William Prynne's tract is entitled, Breve Memento ad præſens Non-Parlamentarium conventiculum, tangens ipſorum præſentes intentiones & proceſſus ad deponendum & ſupplicio afficiendum Carolum Stewardum legitimum ſuum Regem: per Guilielmum Prynnium, Armigerum, membrum Domus Communium, & captivum ſub exercitus Tyrannide: qui, ut apparet, arma fert contra Domos Parlamenti, ſuos quondam Dominos: quarum membra nunc violenter capit & detinet captiva, durante ipſorum illegali licentia. The perſon, who tranſlated this piece into Latin, obſerves, that the Author of it was not well affected to the King (5).

(5) Quam injuſte, perfide, perjure, crudeliter hæc geſta ſint in Unctum Domini, auctor hujus ſcripti quamquam omnium minime Regi obnoxius liberrime & fideliſſime exponit.

[C] To root out, by penal laws, all the Independents.] He dedicated this book to the Houſe of Commons. I have the Latin tranſlation of it, printed in 1649. This verſion was one Wolfgang Meyer's, a Swiſs Proteſtant Miniſter. The title of the work is as follows. Guilhelmi Prynn Angli Armigeri Aulæ Lincolnienſis, Fulcimentum Gladii Chriſtianorum Regum, Principum & Magiſtratuum: quo ipſorum Hæreticos, Idololatras, Schiſmaticos, Sectarum Authores, & Blaſphemos, pro criminis gravitate puniendi authoritas, jus ac poteſtas teſtimoniis Veteris ac Novi Teſtamenti, edictis & praxi Chriſtianorum Imperatorum, Regum, Statuum & Magiſtratuum, ſanctionibus item & ſtatutis Regni Angliæ: conſenſu denique optimorum tàm veteris, quàm recentioris Eccleſiæ Doctorum, & Politicorum, contra hodiernos Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ turbatores, veterum Donatiſtarum, & Monaſterienſium Anabaptiſtarum æmulos, ſolidiſſimè vindicatur. Prynne has here taken notice of whatever may be ſaid for the power of the ſword againſt error; he brings in arguments, authorities, cuſtom, the deciſion of the Doctors or Fathers, that of the confeſſions of faith, &c. Father de Sainte Marthe, a French Benedictine, made no ſmall uſe of this book, to prove that the edict of Nantes had been juſtly repealed. See his anſwer to the complaints of the Proteſtants, or

If the circumſtance aſcribed to him, concerning the perſon who ſet fire to the city of London [D], be true, he muſt have been a madman. He wrote a vaſt number of books, which ſhew him to be a man of prodigious reading [E]. He died the 24th of October, 1669, aged 69 years (a).

(a) Witte, in Diario Biographic.

or Mr. Coſins extract of it (6). Prynne, as early as 1643, oppoſed, with great vigour, the Independents, who were of opinion, that it would be to no purpoſe to aboliſh epiſcopacy, nay, that it would be prejudicial, if people, after that, were to be ſubject to the Synodical Government of the Puritans. Voſſius wrote to Grotius about this matter, in a letter dated in September 1643. Unum eſt, in quo non ſatis conveniat illis, qui ſe Epiſcopis opponunt. Multi omnem regendæ Eccleſiæ poteſtatem penès preſbyterale collegium eſſe volunt. Alii vero ajunt hoc jugum gravius Epiſcopali. Quare contendunt, ſingulis id committendum Eccleſiaſtis, ut ſecundum Dei verbum, populum doceant, & gubernent. Atque ſic ab Epiſcopalibus & Preſbyteralibus (ſicut vocant) diſtincti, independentes nuncupantur. Pimius (7), cujus magna adeo in Parlamento eſt authoritas, prioris eſſe ſententiæ dicitur, ſed multi hac parte ei adverſantur, qui cætera convenire videntur. Eſtque plurimorum id judicium, utcunque infracta omni Regis poteſtate, & abolito Epiſcopatu, geminum agerent triumphum, eos inter ſeſe mox commiſſum iri ; quia multi non à Preſbyterii poteſtate minus, quam Epiſcoporum abhorreant (8). i. e. " Thoſe who oppoſe Epiſcopacy, do not ſufficiently " agree in a certain particular. Many would have " the whole power of Church Government lodged " in the Preſbyteral Aſſembly ; whilſt others look " upon this as a more heavy yoke than Epiſcopacy. " They therefore would have every Paſtor or Eccle- " ſiaſtick teach and govern his reſpective flock, ac- " cording to God's word : and being, in this man- " ner, diſtinct or different from both Epiſcopalians " and Preſbyterians (the name theſe go by) they are " called Independents. We are told that Pym, who " has ſo much credit and authority in the Parliament, " is of the former opinion ; but ſeveral who ſeem " to agree with him in other particulars, oppoſe him " in this. Many think, that after having triumphed " over both the Regal Power, and aboliſhed Epiſco- " pacy, they will ſoon quarrel among themſelves ; " great numbers hating the power of the preſbytery " no leſs than that of the Biſhops." Here we have an inſtance of the propenſion, which mankind have to run into extremes. Part of the adverſaries of Epiſcopacy were for aboliſhing preſbyterian conferences and ſynods ; declaring that it was a more inſupportable yoke than that of the Hierarchy. Prynne ſtrongly oppoſed thoſe people, and was for inflicting a corporal puniſhment on them. See his Fulcimentum gladii.

(6) In Journal des Savans, for April 26, 1688. See alſo Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, for May 1688, p. 384.

(7) This doubtleſs is an error of the preſs : read Prynnius. Voſſius's letters are full of ſuch errors, in the proper names. In p. 210, of the letters received, is Theſtreſaito for Meſtrezatio. This was Mr. Meſtrezat, a Proteſtant Clergyman of Paris.

(8) Voſſius, Ep. 462. p. m. 409. col. 1.

[D] If the circumſtance aſcribed to him, concerning the perſon who ſet fire to the city of London, be true.] If the thing I am going to relate had not been printed, I would not have cited it. " This thought puts me " in mind of the madneſs of William Prynne, an " Engliſhman. . . . . This Madman aſſerted to a " Gentleman who told it me again, that Pope Alex- " ander VII. ſet fire to the city of London in 1666 ; " and that he came over into England in the diſguiſe " of a Coleman (9)."

(9) Le Grand, Hiſt. du Divorce de Henry VIII. Roi d'Angleterre, p. 82. of the continuation of the ſecond part.

[E] He wrote a vaſt number of books, which ſhew him to be a man of prodigious reading.] Here follows what is told in De Witte's Diarium (10). GUIL. PRYNNE, Anglus, Swainſwica-Somerſetenſis, Collegii Orielenſis Oxoniæ Commenſalis, Artium Baccalaureus. . . . Libri quos varii admodum, Theologici nimirum, Hiſtorici, Politici, & Polemici argumenti conſcripſit ad 170. adverſaria potius quam opera nuncupari merentur, adeoque (11) ipſum pene Toſtatum æquaſſe videtur. . . . . Libros à ſe conſcriptos moriens Hoſpitio Lincolnienſi, quod Londini eſt, legavit, qui voluminibus 37. in fol. & 4to continentur. i. e. " William Prynne, born at Swainſwick in Somer- " ſetſhire, of Oriel College in Oxford, and Bachelor " of Arts. . . . . He wrote 170 books on various " ſubjects, viz. Divinity, Hiſtory, Politicks and " Controverſy ; which ought to be entitled adverſa- " ria, rather than works ; ſo that he ſeems to have " equalled Toſtatus himſelf. He bequeathed, at his " death, his books to Lincolns-Inn, in London, they " conſiſting of 37 volumes in folio and quarto." Here follows a paſſage from Schoockius, which ſhews that Prynne has been complimented as a man of vaſt reading ; and alſo prove that he was ſo rigid a Puritan, as even not to permit people to drink to one another's healths (12). Is eſt qui auguſto elogio ab eodem (D. Voetio) condecoratur in diſput. de ebrietate, & quidem ſecundum hanc formulam : Diffuſæ eruditionis Juriſconſultus Gul. Prynne, (13) cum generis nobilitate tum rara pietate conſpicuus, in tract. Anglico, adverſus Salutes conſcripto. Liber hic Prynnii (de quo viro ante aliquot annos tam amplus rumor per Britanniam & Belgium fuit) ſi reſpondeat ejuſdem Tractatui de Spectaculis, (nam hunc ſolum vidi) dixerim, diffuſam eruditionem Authoris (licet hic ipſe à D. Voetio oſtentetur ut nobilis) reſpondere ſcopis diſſolutis, atque ſervire confirmando dicto vulgato, quod eam ſolam vim fortem eſſe agnoſcit, quæ fuerit unita. Fueritne vero Prynnius pius ſolus Deus novit, quum D. Voetius quando favet, nimis quam liberalis ſit in titulo illo concedendo. Certe, hoc non poſſum cognoſcere ex ejuſdem libro de Spectaculis, niſi pariter Phariſæi pii fuerint agnoſcendi, eo, quod cuminum & anethum decimarent. i. e. " This is the man on whom " Voſſius beſtows ſo great an elogium in his diſputa- " tion on drunkenneſs, and his words are as follow : " William Prynne, a very learned lawyer, a man con- " ſpicuous for the greatneſs of his birth and piety, in the " Engliſh tract written by him againſt healths. In caſe " this book of Prynne, who, ſome years ſince, made " ſo much noiſe both in England and Holland, be " like the treatiſe he wrote againſt the ſtage, (for I " have ſeen only this piece) I will be ſo bold as to " affirm, that this Author's extenſive learning (tho' " Voetius applauds him for the nobility of his birth) " is mere idle, disjointed ſtuff ; and ſerves to confirm " the common ſaying, that no force is ſtrong but what " is united. Heaven only knows whether Prynn was a " pious man, ſince Voetius, when he likes an Author, " is too liberal in beſtowing that title. I certainly cannot " diſcover this from his book againſt the ſtage, unleſs, " at the ſame time, we allow the Phariſees to have " been pious, becauſe they tithed cumin and anniſeed."

(10) Ad 24. October 1669.

(11) This adeo does not make a right concluſion, for Toſtat's works are not like Adverſaria.

(12) Martin Schoockius, Exercitat. Variarum, p. 302. edit. 1663. 4to.

(13) The edition of this diſpute de Ebrietate which I make uſe of (it is that of 1667, vol. 4. Diſput. ſelect. p. 503.) has only theſe words, Diffuſæ lectionis Juriſconſult. Gul. Prynne, in tractatu, &c.

☞ PRYNNE (WILLIAM). Mr. Bayle's article of this Writer being very defective, we ſhall give the following Supplement to it. He was born at Swainſwick near Bath in Somerſetſhire in the year 1600, (at which time his father was a tenant of Oriel College in Oxford) was educated in Grammar learning in the city of Bath, and became a Commoner of Oriel College under the tuition of Mr. Giles Widdowes in 1616 (a). January the 22d 1620 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts (b). He removed afterwards to Lincoln's-Inn, where he ſtudied the common law, and was made ſucceſſively Barriſter, Bencher, and Reader. At his firſt coming to that Inn, he was a great follower and admirer of Dr. John Preſton, an eminent Puritan, who was Lecturer there ; and he publiſhed ſeveral books againſt what he thought the growing enormities of that age, in point of luxury, and concerning the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church [A]. His Hiſtrio-

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 434. 2d edit.

(b) Idem, Faſti, Oxon. vol. 1. col. 215.

[A] Publiſhed ſeveral books againſt what he thought the growing enormities of that age in point of luxury, and concerning the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church.] They were as follow : The perpetuity of a regenerate man's eſtate, againſt the Saints total and final Apoſtacy. London 1627 in 4to. Health's Sickneſs : Or, A compendious

Hiſtrio-Maſtix, which he publiſhed about Chriſtmas in the year 1632, giving great offence to the Court, he was committed priſoner to the Tower of London on the 1ſt of February 1632-3 (c), and ſentenced by the Star-chamber on the 17th of February 1633-4, to be fined 5000*l.* to the King, expelled the Univerſity of Oxford and Lincoln's-Inn, degraded and diſenabled from his profeſſion of the law, to ſtand in the pillory, firſt in Palace-yard Weſtminſter, and three days after in Cheapſide, in each to loſe an ear, to have his book called Hiſtrio-Maſtix, publickly burnt before his face by the hand of the hangman, and remain priſoner during life (d). After this ſentence was executed, which was in May 1634, he was remitted to priſon; and on the 11th of June following, as ſoon as he could procure pen, ink, and paper, wrote a ſevere letter to Archbiſhop Laud concerning his ſentence in the Star-chamber, and that which the Archbiſhop in particular had declared againſt him; who acquainted the King with this letter, upon which his Majeſty commanded the Archbiſhop to refer it to Noy the Attorney General. Noy ſent for Prynne, and demanded whether the letter was of his hand-writing or not; who deſiring to ſee it, tore it to pieces, and threw the pieces out of the window; which prevented a farther proſecution of him (e). In 1635, 1636, and 1637, he publiſhed ſeveral books [C], particularly one, entitled, News from Ipſwich, in which he reflected very groſsly on the Archbiſhop and others of the Biſhops [D]; for which on the 14th of June pendious and brief diſcourſe, proving the drinking and pledging of healths to be ſinful and utterly unlawful unto Chriſtians, &c. Lond. 1628 in 4to. The unlovelineſs of love-locks: or, a ſummary diſcourſe, proving, the wearing and nouriſhing of locks or love-locks to be altogether unſeemly and unlawful unto Chriſtians; in which there are likewiſe ſome paſſages out of the Fathers, &c. againſt face-painting; the wearing of ſuppoſititious, powdered, or extraordinary long hair; and the women's manniſh, unnatural, impudent, unchriſtian cutting of the hair, &c. London 1628 in 4to. Brief ſurvey and cenſure of Mr. Cozens his couzening devotions. London 1628 in 4to. This was written againſt the Private Devotions, publiſhed by Mr. John Coſins, afterwards Biſhop of Durham, which Mr. Prynne cenſures as containing Arminianiſm, and tells us (1), that this was one of the reaſons of Archbiſhop Laud's reſentment againſt him, and his calling into queſtion his Hiſtrio-Maſtix. Anti-Arminianiſm: or, the Church of England's old Antitheſis to new Arminianiſm, &c. London 1630 in 4to. There was a ſecond edition the ſame year. To this is added an Appendix concerning bowing at the name of Jeſus. This was anſwered by Mr. Giles Widdowes, formerly tutor to our Author, in a piece entitled, The lawleſs, kneeleſs, ſchiſmatical Puritan: or, a confutation of the Author of an Appendix concerning bowing at the name of Jeſus. Oxford 1631 in 4to. God no Impoſtor or Deluder: or, an Anſwer to a Popiſh and Arminian Cavil in defenſe of Free-will and univerſal Grace, &c. London 1630 in 4to. Lame Giles his haltings; together with an Appendix concerning the Popiſh original and progreſs of bowing at the name of Jeſus. London 1631 in 4to. Hiſtrio-Maſtix: The Player's Scourge, &c. againſt the intolerable miſchief and abuſes of common Plays and Play-houſes. London 1633 in 4to.

(c) Prynn's New Diſcovery of the Prelates of Tyranny, p. 7, 8, 9. edit. London 1641, in 4to.

(d) Ibid. p. 10, 11.

(e) Heylin's Life of Archbiſhop Laud, Part 1. lib. 4.

(1) A new Diſcovery of the Prelates Tyranny, p. 1.

[B] His Hiſtrio-Maſtix . . . giving great offence to the Court, he was committed priſoner to the Tower of London on the 1ſt of February 1632-3.] Mr. Whitelocke obſerves (2), that this book was licenſed by Archbiſhop Abbot's Chaplain, and "being againſt "plays, and a reference in the table of the book to "this effect, Women-actors notorious whores, relating "to ſome women-actors mentioned in his book, as "he affirmeth; it happened, that about ſix weeks "after this, the Queen acted a part in a Paſtoral at "Somerſet-houſe; and then Archbiſhop Laud and "other Prelates, whom Prynne had angered by ſome "books of his againſt Arminianiſm, and againſt the "juriſdiction of the Biſhops, and by ſome prohibi-"tions which he had moved, and got to the High-"commiſſion Court; theſe Prelates and their inſtru-"ments, the next day after the Queen had acted her "Paſtoral, ſhewed Prynne's book againſt plays to the "King, and that place in it, women-actors notorious "whores, and they informed the King and Queen, "that Prynne had purpoſely written this book againſt "the Queen and her Paſtoral; whereas it was pub-"liſhed ſix weeks before that Paſtoral was acted. Yet "the King and Queen, though thus exaſperated, "did direct nothing againſt him, till Laud ſet Dr. "Heylin (who bore a great malice to Prynne for con-"futing ſome of his doctrines) to read Prynne's books, "and to collect the ſcandalous points out of them; "which Heylin did, though (as Prynne affirms) not at "all warranted by the text of his book. But thoſe "two Gentlemen were well matched, and alike in "other things, though ſo much different in divinity "or ſhew of it. The Archbiſhop went with theſe "notes to Mr. Attorney Noy, on a Sabbath-day morn-"ing, and charged him to proſecute Prynne for this "book; which Noy afterwards did rigorouſly enough "in the Star-Chamber; and in the mean time the "Biſhops and Lords of the Star-Chamber ſent Prynne "cloſe priſoner to the Tower."

(2) Memorials of the Engliſh affairs, p. 18. edit. London 1732.

[C] In 1635, 1636, and 1637, he publiſhed ſeveral books.] Appendix, Supplementum, & Epilogus, to the Flagellum Pontificis, written by John Baſtwick, Doctor of Phyſic of Padua, ſome time of Emanuel College in Cambridge, afterwards a Practitioner of Phyſic at Colcheſter, where he was born. A breviate of the Biſhops intolerable uſurpations and encroachments upon the King's prerogative and ſubject's liberties; with an Appendix to it: 1635. Certain queries propounded to the bowers at the name of Jeſus and the patrons thereof, 1636. The unbiſhoping of Timothy and Titus, proving them no Dioceſan Biſhops of Epheſus and Crete; and that Preſbyters have a divine right to ordain Miniſters as well as Biſhops, with a poſtſcript, 1636. Reprinted with additions at London 1660 in 4to. Looking-glaſs for all lordly Prelates, 1636. Certain queries propounded to Biſhops, &c. 1636. Inſtructions for Church-wardens concerning Viſitation-articles, fees, oaths, &c. 1636. News from Ipſwich, diſcovering certain late deteſtable practices of ſome domineering lordly Prelates to undermine the eſtabliſhed doctrine and diſcipline of our Church, 1636 in 4to. publiſhed under the name of Matthew White three times in that year. Mr. Wood tells us (3), that he had a ſpecial hand in writing of a book, entitled, A Divine Tragedy lately acted: or, a collection of ſundry memorable examples of God's judgment upon Sabbath-breakers, &c. 1636 in 4to. At the end is an Appendix printed in another character, containing an account of the ſufferings of Prynne for his Hiſtrio-Maſtix, and the miſerable end, which is there ſaid to have befallen Noy, the Attorney General, and chief inſtrument of his ſufferings. Catalogue of ſuch teſtimonies in all ages, as plainly evidence Biſhops and Preſbyters to be both one, equal, and the ſame in juriſdiction, office, &c. by divine law and inſtitution, &c. 1637. reprinted in double columns in 1641. A quench-coal, with an Appendix to it, in anſwer to a Coal from the Altar, and other pamphlets touching altars, and bowing to or towards them, 1637. An humble remonſtrance againſt the tax of ſhip-money lately impoſed, laying open the illegality, injuſtice, abuſes, and inconveniencies thereof. Written in 1636; corruptly printed without the Author's knowledge at London 1641, and reprinted from a more correct copy at London 1643 in 4to. Additions to the firſt part of a dialogue between A and B concerning the Sabbath's morality and the unlawfulneſs of paſtimes on the Lord's Day. Printed twice in 1636.

(3) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 442.

[D] In which he reflected very groſsly on the Archbiſhop and others of the Biſhops.] He ſtyles the Biſhops

June 1637 he was ſentenced in the Star-chamber to be fined 5000 l. to the King, to loſe the remainder of his ears in the pillory, to be branded on both cheeks with the letters S. L. for a ſchiſmatical libeller, and to be perpetually impriſoned in Caernarvon Caſtle (f). On the 30th of the ſame month this ſentence was put in execution in the Palace-yard in Weſtminſter [E]; and on the 27th of July following he was removed from the Tower to the Fleet, and the ſame day began his journey towards Caernarvon-Caſtle, whence he was in January following removed to Mount-Orgueil Caſtle in the iſle of Jerſey, where he exerciſed his pen in writing ſeveral books [F]. November the 7th 1640 an order was iſſued out by the Houſe of Commons for his releaſement from priſon; and on the 28th of the ſame month he entered London triumphantly [G]. December the 3d following he preſented a petition repreſenting his ſufferings from Archbiſhop Laud, for which Mr. Wood tells us (g) that he had a recompence allowed him, though Mr. Prynne abſolutely denies that he ever received one farthing recompence (h). He was elected a Member of Parliament for Newport in Cornwall, and oppoſed the Biſhops, eſpecially the Archbiſhop, with great vigour, both by his ſpeeches and writings [H], and was the chief manager of the trial of that Prelate. In 1647 he was one of the parliamentary Viſitors

(f) L'Eſtrange's Hiſtory of King Charles I. p. 151.

(g) Ubi ſupra, col. 437.

(h) See The Subſtance of a Speech made in the Houſe of Commons by W. Prynne, Eſq; Decemb. 4. 1648. p. 4.

Biſhops in general Luciferian Lord Biſhops, execrable traytors, devouring wolves, &c. and "deſcants, ſays "Dr. Heylin (4), very trimly (as he conceived) on "the Archbiſhop himſelf, with his arch-piety, arch-charity, arch-agent to the Devil; that Beelzebub "himſelf had been an Archbiſhop, and the like to thoſe, a moſt triumphant arch indeed to adorn his victories."

(4) Life of Archbiſhop Laud, part 2. lib. 4. p. 309.

[E] On the 30th of the ſame month this ſentence was put in execution in the Palace-yard in Weſtminſter.] He himſelf tells us (5), that he ſpoke at the execution of his ſentence among other things what follows: "The cauſe of my ſtanding here is for not putting "in my anſwer, under Council's hand, for which "the information was taken pro confeſſo againſt me. "What endeavours I uſed for the bringing in there-"of, God, my own conſcience, yea, and my Council "know, whoſe cowardice ſtands upon record to all "ages. For my own part, rather than I will have "my caſe a leading caſe, to deprive the ſubjects of "their liberty, which I ſeek to maintain, I will "joyfully expoſe my perſon to be a leading example "to bear this puniſhment." He bore the execution of his ſentence with more patience than either Mr. Burton or Dr. Baſtwick; and as he returned to the Tower by water, made this Diſtich upon his own ſtigmatizing:

(5) New Diſcovery of the Prelates Tyranny, p. 36.

S. L.
Stigmata maxillis referens inſignia Laudis,
Exultans remeo, Victima grata Deo.

[F] Where he exerciſed his pen in writing ſeveral books.] Mount-Orgueil: or divine and profitable meditations raiſed from the contemplations of three leaves of nature's volumes, 1ſt, Rocks, 2. Seas, 3. Gardens. London 1641 in 4to. A poetical deſcription of Mount-Orgueil Caſtle in the iſle of Jerſey. The ſoul's complaint againſt the body's encroachment on her; and comfortable cordials againſt the diſcomforts of the impriſonments, a Poem. Pleaſant purge for a Roman Catholic to evacuate his ill humours, conſiſting of a century of polemical epigrams. Theſe three laſt pieces were printed and bound up with Mount-Orgueil: or divine and profitable meditations, &c. During our Author's impriſonment there was publiſhed a book, entitled, Woodſtreet-Compter's plea for its priſoner: or, the ſixteen reaſons which induce Nathan Wickins, late ſervant to Mr. Will. Prynne, but now priſoner in the ſaid Compter, to refuſe to take the oath ex officio, &c. printed in 1638 in 4to. which book, though publiſhed under the name of N. Wickins, was generally ſuppoſed to be written by Mr. Prynne on account of the great number of quotations in it.

[G] Entered London triumphantly.] In the diurnall occurrences or daily proceedings of both Houſes in this great and happy Parliament from the 3d of November 1640 to the 3d of November 1641 (6), we find the following paſſage: "That afternoon [November "28th] maſter Prynne and maſter Burton came into "London, being met and accompanied with many "thouſands of horſe and foot, and rode with roſe-"mary and bays in their hands and hats; which is "generally eſteemed the greateſt affront, that ever "was given to the Courts of Juſtice in England." And Whitelocke obſerves (7), that Prynne and Burton were conducted into London from their ſeveral priſons by many hundreds of horſe and foot in great pomp, and defiance of juſtice; and they petitioned the Houſe of Commons for damages againſt their proſecutors.

(6) Page 8. edit. London 1641, in 4to.

(7) p. 39.

[H] Oppoſed the Biſhops, eſpecially the Archbiſhop, with great vigour, both by his ſpeeches and writings.] After his return from exile, he publiſhed the following books. The antipathy of the Engliſh lordly prelacy both to legal monarchy and civil unity: or an hiſtorical collection of the ſeveral execrable treaſons, conſpiracies, rebellions, ſtate-ſchiſms, contumacies of antimonarchical Engliſh, Britiſh, French, Scotiſh, and Iriſh lordly Prelates, againſt our King, Kingdoms, &c. Enlarged and publiſhed by authority, ſince the Author's enlargement and return from exile. London 1641 in 4to. in two parts. New diſcovery of the Prelate's tyranny, in their late proſecutions of Mr. Will. Prynne, Dr. John Baſtwick, and Mr. Hen. Burton, Wherein the joint proceedings againſt them in the High-Commiſſion and Star-chamber, &c. London 1641 in 4to. Mr. Wood obſerves (8), that in this book "he does Archbiſhop Laud a great deal "of injuſtice, eſpecially in this reſpect, that all the "things, that make againſt him, or ſound ill to his "name, he with great zeal ſcrapes together, whilſt "any thing that ſounds to his honour, or the leaſt "good that he hath done, he doth omit." The ſame Author tells us (9), that a Tract, entitled, A terrible outcry againſt the loytering exalted Prelates; ſhewing the danger and unfitneſs of conferring them in any temporal office or dignity, &c. London 1641 in 4to. is not Mr. Prynne's, nor like his ſtyle, nor mentioned in the catalogue of his books, though his name be to it, with his picture in a wooden cut. A ſovereign antidote to prevent, appeaſe, and determine our unnatural and deſtructive civil wars and diſſenſions, &c. London 1642 in 4to. Vindication of Pſalm cv. ver. 15. (Touch not mine anointed, and do my Prophets no harm) from ſome falſe gloſſes lately obtruded on by Prieſts and Royaliſts. London 1642 and 1644 in 4to. The treachery and diſloyalty of Papiſts to their ſovereigns, in doctrine and practice. Together with an exact parallel of the juriſdiction, power, and privileges, claimed and exerciſed by our Popiſh Parliaments, Prelates, Lords and Commons, in former times, with theſe now claimed and practiſed by the preſent Parliament, &c. London 1643 in a large quarto, in four parts, the firſt of which is in ſix ſheets under the title above mentioned. The ſecond part is entitled, The ſovereign power of Parliaments and Kingdoms, wherein is vindicated their intereſt and power over the militia, poſts, &c. their right to nominate privy counſellors, ſtate-officers, &c. againſt the King's negative voice in the paſſing of bills. The third part treats of the lawfulneſs of the Parliaments neceſſary defenſive war againſt the King's malignant forces, both in law and conſcience. The fourth part treats farther concerning the ſovereign power of Parliaments and Kingdoms in ordering the militia, ſhips, magazines, great officers, &c. with an Appendix, manifeſting by ſundry hiſtories, that in the ancient Roman Kingdom and Empire, &c. the ſupreme ſovereignty of power reſided not in Emperors and Kings themſelves, but in their kingdoms, &c. Rome's maſterpiece: or the grand conſpiracy of the Pope and his jeſuitical inſtruments, to extirpate the Proteſtant religion, re-eſtabliſh popery

(8) Col. 443.

(9) Ibid.

Viſitors of the Univerſity of Oxford. During his ſitting in the Long Parliament, he was very zealous for the Preſbyterian Cauſe; and when the Independents began to gain the aſcendant, ſhewed himſelf a warm oppoſer of them, and promoted the King's intereſt, eſpecially in his declenſion. December the 4th, 1648, he made a long ſpeech in the Houſe of Commons, concerning the ſatisfactorineſs of the King's anſwers to the propoſitions popery, ſubvert laws, liberties, peace, parliaments, by kindling a civil war in Scotland, &c. Lond. 1643 and 1644 in 4to. Archbiſhop Laud wrote notes in the margin of this book as far as related to his own vindication from ſome aſperſions caſt on him in it. This book was reprinted with the Archbiſhop's notes by Mr. Henry Wharton, at the end of the hiſtory of the troubles and trial of Archbiſhop Laud. London 1695 in folio. The opening of the great ſeal of England, containing certain brief hiſtorical and legal obſervations touching the original, antiquity, progreſs, uſe, neceſſity of the great zeal of the Kings and Kingdom of England in reſpect of charters, &c. London 1643 in 4to. This book and his ſovereign power of parliaments were animadverted upon in a pamphlet printed at Oxford 1644 in 4to. entitled, The fallacies of Mr. William Prynne diſcovered and confuted; in a ſhort view of his late books, entitled, The ſovereignty of Parliaments, opening of the great ſeale, &c. Wherein is laid open his falſe quotations, calumniating falſhoods, wreſting of the ſcriptures, points of Popery, groſſe abſurdities, mere contradictions, heinous treaſons, and plaine betraying of the cauſe. Written in anſwer to a letter ſent by J. T. to his friend. The doom of cowardice and treachery: or a looking-glaſs for cowardly and corrupt governors and ſoldiers, who through puſillanimity or bribery betray their truſts to publie prejudice, &c. London 1643 in 4to. Written in relation to Nath. Fiennes's ſurrendering of Briſtol to the King's uſe, Popiſh royal favourite: or, a full diſcovery of his Majeſty's extraordinary favour to and protection of notorious Papiſts, Prieſts, Jeſuits, &c. manifeſted by ſundry letters of grace, warrants, &c. London 1643 in 4to. Anſwer'd by N. D. in a book entitled, Vindiciæ Caroli Regis: or, a loyal Vindication of the King, &c. printed in 1645 in 4to. Moderate apology againſt a pretended calumny; in anſwer to ſome paſſages in the Preheminence of Parliaments, publiſhed by James Howell, &c. London 1644 in one ſheet in 4to. Check to Britannicus for his palpable flattery, &c. London 1644. Written againſt Marchamant Needham concerning ſome paſſages in one or two of his Mercurius Britannicus, in vindication of Nath. Fiennes. Upon which there was publiſhed ſoon after, a pamphlet, entitled, A Check to the Checker, &c.. The falſities and forgeries of the anonymous Author of a pamphlet, entitled, The Fallacies of Mr. Willian Prynne diſcovered in a ſhort view of his book, entitled, The Sovereignty of Parliaments, opening of the Great Seal, &c. London 1644, in one ſheet in 4to. Four ſerious Queſtions touching Excommunication and Suſpenſion from the Sacrament. London 1644, in 4to. Twelve conſiderable Queſtions touching Church-Government, ſadly propounded, out of a real deſire of Unity and Tranquillity in Church and State, to all ſober-minded Chriſtians, &c. London 1644, in one ſheet in 4to. Independency examined, unmaſked, refuted by twelve new particular interrogatories, &c. London 1644, in two ſheets in 4to. This was anſwered by Henry Burton, his fellow-ſufferer, in a tract printed at London 1644, and by another, in a pamphlet intitled, A Help to the right Underſtanding of a Diſcourſe concerning Independency, lately publiſhed by Will. Prynne, 1644, in one ſheet in 4to. Mr. Prynne's book was twice printed the ſame year. A full Reply to certain brief Obſervations and Anti-Queries on Mr. Prynne's twelve Queſtions about Church-Government, &c. London 1644, in one ſheet in 4to. True and full Relation of the Proſecution, Arraignment, Trial, and Condemnation of Nath. Fiennes, late Colonel and Governor of the City of Briſtol, &c. London 1644, in 4to. Clement Walker had a ſhare in this piece. Juſt Defence of John Baſtwick, Doctor of Phyſick, againſt the Calumnies of John Lilbourne, Lieutenant-Colonel, and his falſe Accuſations: written in way of Reply to a Letter of Mr. Vicars, &c. London 1645, in 5 ſheets in 4to. The Lyar confounded; or, a brief Refutation of John Lilbourne's miſerably miſ-ſtated Caſe, miſtaken, &c. againſt the High Court of Parliament, &c. the honourable Committee of Examinations, &c. London 1645, in 7 ſheets in 4to. Truth triumphing over Falſhood, Antiquity over Novelty: or, a ſeaſonable Vindication of the undoubted Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, Right, Legiſlative and Coercive Power of Chriſtian Emperors, Kings, Magiſtrates, Parliaments, in matters of Religion, Church-Government, &c. in Refutation of John Goodwin's Innocency's Triumph, and his dear brother Burton's Vindication of Churches, commonly called Independent, &c. London 1645, in 4to. Hidden works of Darkneſs brought to publick Light: or, a neceſſary Introduction to the Hiſtory of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Trial, &c. London 1645, in folio. Suſpenſion ſuſpended: or, the Divines of Sion-College's late Claim of the Power of ſuſpending ſcandalous perſons from the Lord's Supper, &c. briefly examined, diſcuſſed, refuted, &c. London 1646, in ſix ſheets in 4to. Vindication of four ſerious Queſtions of grand Importance, concerning Excommunication and Suſpenſion from the Lord's Supper, &c. againſt a Reverend Brother (10) of Scotland, in a Sermon at St. Margaret's Weſtminſter, 5 Sept. 1645. London 1646, in nine ſheets in 4to. anſwered by John Saltmarſh, in a pamphlet entitled, The opening of Mr. Prynne's new Book, called a Vindication: or Light breaking out from a Cloud of Differences, or late Controverſies, wherein are Inferences upon the Vindication, &c. London 1645-6, in 4to. Freſh Diſcovery of ſome prodigious new wandering blazing Stars and Firebands, ſtiling themſelves New Lights, firing our Church and State into new Combuſtions. London 1646, in 4to, 2d edition. To which are added of Mr. Prynne's Collection, Letters, Papers, and a Petition lately ſent from the Summer-Iſlands, touching the ſchiſmatical, illegal, tyrannical proceedings of ſome Independents there, &c. Diotrephes catechiſed: or, ſixteen important Queſtions touching the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction and Cenſures contradiſtinct to Civil, now challenged, as of divine right, by ſome rigid Preſbyterians and Independents, &c. London 1646, in two ſheets in 4to. 3d edit. Twelve Queſtions of publick Concernment touching the Regulation of ſome Abuſes in the Law and legal Proceedings. London 1646, in 4to. Scotland's ancient Obligation to England, and publick acknowledgment thereof for their brotherly aſſiſtance and deliverance of them. London 1646, in 4to. Scotland's publick Acknowledgment of God's juſt Judgments upon their Nation, for their frequent Breach of Faiths, Leagues, Oaths, &c. London 1646, in 4to. Canterbury's Doom: or, the firſt part of a complete Hiſtory of the Commitment, Charge, Trial, Condemnation, Execution of William Laud, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, &c. London 1646, in folio. Minors no Senators. London 1646, in two ſheets in 4to, written againſt young men under age ſitting in the Houſe of Commons. A Gag for long-haired Rattle-heads. London 1646, in 4to. Plain and ſhort Expedition to ſettle the Diſtractions of the Kingdom. London 1647. Counter-plea to the Cowards Apology. London 1647. Account of the King's Majeſty's Revenues and Debts. London 1647. Declaration of the Officers and Army's illegal injurious Proceedings and Practices againſt the eleven impeached Members. London 1647. Eight Queries upon the Declaration and late Lettsr to the Army. London 1647. Nine Queries upon the printed Charge of the Army, againſt the eleven Members. London 1647. The Hypocrites unmaſked. London 1647. New Preſbyterian Light ſpringing out of Independent Darkneſs. London 1647. The total and final Demands of the Army. London 1647. Brief Juſtification of the eleven accuſed Members from a ſcandalous Libel. London 1647. A Plea for the Lords: or, a ſhort and neceſſary Vindication of the Judiciary and Legiſlative Power of the Houſe of Peers, &c. againſt the late ſeditious Anti-parliamentary printed Petitions, Libels, &c. of Anabaptiſts, Levellers, Agitators, Lilbourn, Overton, &c. London 1648, in four ſheets and half in 4to. The Levellers levelled, &c. London 1647. The Sword of the Chriſtian Magiſtracy ſupported: or, a full Vindication of Chriſtian Kings and Magiſtrates Authority under the Goſpel to puniſh Idolatry, Apoſtaſy, Hereſy, Blaſphemy, and ſitions of peace [I]; but on the 6th of that month, he, with ſeveral other Members of the Houſe of Commons, was refuſed entrance into the Houſe by the Army, and impriſoned, on account of their zeal for a peace and ſettlement with the King. Upon this he became a bitter enemy to the army and Cromwell their Leader, attacking them with great ſeverity in his writings [K]. Soon after he conveyed his eſtate to ſome of his relations, and denied the payment of taxes, and ſtood in open defiance of Cromwell; for which he was, on the 1ſt of July 1650, committed cloſe priſoner to Dunſter Caſtle in Somerſetſhire, by a warrant under Mr. John Bradſhaw's hand, expreſſing no particular cauſe, dated June the 25th, 1650. He then inſiſted ſtrongly upon Magna Charta, and the liberty of the ſubject. The year following, he was committed to Taunton Caſtle, and afterwards to Pendennis Caſtle. He afterwards wrote ſeveral books upon religious controverſies, and obſtinate Schiſm with pecuniary, corporal, and in ſome Caſes capital Puniſhments. London 1647, in 4to. Tranſlated into Latin by Wolfgangus Meyerus, and printed in Germany in 1650. Vindication of Sir Will. Lewes, from his Charge. London 1647. This Sir W. Lewes, was one of the eleven accuſed Members. Full Vindication and Anſwer of the eleven Members, viz. Denzil Holles, &c. to a late printed Pamphlet, entitled, A particular Charge or Impeachment in the Name of Sir Tho. Fairfax and the Army, againſt the eleven Members. London 1647, in ſix ſheets in 4to. The Lords and Commons firſt Love to, Zeal for, and Vindication of their injuriouſly accuſed and impeached Members, and violated Privileges, &c. London 1647, in three ſheets in 4to. The Univerſity of Oxford's Plea refuted: or, a full Anſwer to a late printed Paper, entitled, The Privileges of the Univerſity of Oxford in point of Viſitation. &c. London 1647, in eight ſheets in 4to. Soon after came out a pamphlet of one ſheet, entitled, An Account of Mr. Prynne's Refutation of the Univerſity of Oxford's Plea, &c. written by Mr. Robert Waring; and another, in two ſheets, entitled, A ſhort Cenſure of the Book of Mr. William Prynne, entitled, The Univerſity of Oxford's Plea, &c. written by Edward Bagſhaw. Nine Propoſals by way of Interrogation to the General, Officers, and Soldiers of the Army, concerning the Juſtice of their Proceedings in Law or Conſcience againſt the Parliament. London 1647, in 4to. Twelve Queries of publick Concernment. London 1647, in half a ſheet in 4to. Publick Declaration and ſolemn Proteſtation of the Freemen of England, againſt the illegal, intolerable, undoing Grievance of Free-quarter. London 1648, in eight ſheets in 4to. The Machiavellian Cromwelliſt. London 1648. Irenarches redivivus: or, a brief Collection of ſundry uſeful Statutes and Petitions in Parliament (not hitherto printed) concerning the Neceſſity, Inſtitution, Office, Oaths, &c. of Juſtices of the Peace. Lond. 1648, in 8 ſheets, 4to. Ardua regni: or, twelve arduous Doubts of great Concernment to the Kingdom. London 1648. The Caſe of the impeached Lords, Commons, and Citizens, truly ſtated. London 1648; in three ſheets in 4to. Practical Law, controuling, countermanding the Common Law, and the Sword of War the Sword of Juſtice. Printed, as is ſaid in the title page, at Exeter 1648. The Petition of Right of the Freeholders and Free-men of the Kingdom of England. London 1648. A new Magna Charta, London 1648. The County of Somerſet divided into ſeveral Claſſes. London 1648. Mercurius Ruſticus, containing News from ſeveral Counties of England, and their joint Addreſſes to the Parliament. London 1648. Juſt and ſolemn Proteſtation and Remonſtrance of the Lord Mayor, Common-Council-men, and Free-men of London. London 1648.

(10) George Gilleſpie.

[I] Made a long ſpeech in the Houſe of Commons, concerning the ſatisfactorineſs of the King's anſwers to the propoſitions for the ſettlement of peace.] He publiſhed it at London in 4to, under the following title, The Subſtance of a Speech made in the Houſe of Commons by Will. Prynn, of Lincoln's-Inn, Eſq; on Monday the fourth of December 1648, touching the King's Anſwer to the Propoſitions of both Houſes upon the whole Treaty, Whether they were ſatisfactory or not ſatisfactory? Wherein the Satisfactorineſs of the King's Anſwers to the Propoſitions for Settlement of a firm laſting Peace and future Security of the Subjects againſt all feared legal Invaſions and Encroachments whatſoever, is clearly demonſtrated. As likewiſe, that there is no other probable or poſſible Way to ſettle a ſpeedy, firm and laſting Peace, but by the Houſes embracing and proceeding upon the large extraordinary Conceſſions of the King in this Treaty, for the Kingdom's preſent Weal and future Security. And that the Army's Remonſtrance, Nov. 20. is a way to ſpeedy and certain Ruine, and a meer Plot of the Jeſuites, to defame and deſtroy us. Put into writing, and publiſhed by him, at the importunate Requeſt of divers Members, for the ſatisfaction of the whole Kingdom, touching the Houſes Vote upon this Debate. In this ſpeech, having mentioned his ſervices and ſufferings, he declares (11), that "he "had never yet received one farthing recompence "from the King, or any other, though I have wait- "ed, ſays he, above eight years at your doors for "juſtice and reparations, and neglecting my owne "private calling and affaires, imployed moſt of my "time, ſtudyes, and expended many hundred pounds "out of my purſe, ſince my inlargement, to maintain "your cauſe againſt the King, his Popiſh and Pre- "latical party. For all which coſt and labour, I never "yet demanded, nor received one farthing from the "Houſes, nor the leaſt Office or Preferment whatſo- "ever, though they have beſtowed divers places of "honour upon perſons of leſſe or no deſert. Nor did "I ever yet receive ſo much as your publike thanks "for any publike ſervice done you, (which every "Preacher uſually receives for every ſermon preached "before you, and moſt others have received for the "meaneſt ſervices) though I have brought you off "with honour in the caſes of Canterbury (12) and "Macguire, when you were at a loſſe in both; and "cleared the juſtneſſe of your cauſe, when it was at "the loweſt ebb, to moſt Reformed Churches abroad "(who received ſuch ſatisfaction from my books, that "they tranſlated them into ſeveral languages,) and "engaged many thouſands for you at home by my "writings, who were formerly dubious and unſatisfied." The preface is dated January the 22d, 1648. To the ſpeech is ſubjoined An Appendix for the Kingdom's better Satisfaction of ſome Occurrences ſince this Speech, in which he tells us, that "this ſpeech, uttered with "much pathetique ſerioufneſſe, and heard with great "attention, gave ſuch generall ſatisfaction to the "Houſe, that many Members, formerly of a contra- "ry opinion, profeſſed, they were both convinced "and converted; others, who were dubious in the "point of ſatisfaction, that they were now fully con- "firmed; moſt of different opinion put to a ſtand; "and the majority of the Houſe declared, both by "their chearefull countenances and ſpeeches (the "Speaker going into the withdrawing-roome to re- "freſh himſelfe, ſo ſoon as the ſpeech was ended) "that they were abundantly ſatisfied by what had "been thus ſpoken. After which the Speaker reſu- "ming the Chair, this ſpeech was ſeconded by many "able Gentlemen; and the debate continuing Sa- "turday, and all Munday and Munday night, till "about nine of the clock on Tueſday morning, and "244 Members ſtaying quite out to the end, though "the Houſe doores were not ſhut up (a thing never "ſeene nor knowne before in Parliament) the queſ- "tion was at laſt put: and notwithſtanding the Ge- "nerall's and whole Armie's march to Weſtminſter, "and menaces againſt the Members, in caſe they "voted for the Treaty, and did not utterly reject it "as unſatisfactory, carried it in the affirmative by "140 voices (with the foure Tellers) againſt 104, "that the queſtion ſhould be put; and then, with- "out any diviſion of the Houſe, it was reſolved on "the queſtion, That the anſwers of the King to the "propoſitions of both Houſes are a ground for the Houſe "to proceed upon for the ſettlement of the peace of the "Kingdom."

(11) p. 4.

(12) Archbiſhop Laud; Connor Lord Macguire.

[K] Became a bitter enemy to the army and Cromwell their Leader, attacking them with great ſeverity in his writings.] controverſies, and other points [L]. February the 1ſt 1659, he, as a ſecluded Member of the Houſe of Commons, being reſtored to ſit again, became inſtrumental in recalling King Charles II. in which he appeared with ſo much zeal, that he openly declared in the Houſe, when it was not ſeaſonable for ſuch expreſſions, that "if the King muſt come "in, it was ſafeſt for them, that he ſhould come in by the votes of thoſe, who "had made war againſt his father, &c." Upon this he was ſent for by General Monk and his friends, and admoniſhed to be quiet, ſince ſuch declarations were unſeaſonable. In April 1660 he was choſen Burgeſs for the City of Bath to ſit in the Healing Parliament, which began at Weſtminſter the 25th of that month; and after the Reſtoration, he, inſtead of being made one of the Barons of the Exchequer, which place he is ſaid to have writings.] He wrote the following books. True and perfect Narrative of the Officers and Army's forcible ſeizing divers Members of the Commons-Houſe, Dec. 6 and 7. London 1648. Second Part of the Narrative concerning the Army's Force upon the Commons-Houſe and Members. London 1648. Proteſtation of the ſecured and ſecluded Members. London 1648. Vindication of the impriſoned and ſecluded Members of the Houſe of Commons, from the Aſperſions caſt upon them in the Majority of the Houſe, in a Paper lately printed and publiſhed, entitled, An humble Anſwer of the General Council of Officers of the Army under Thomas Lord Fairfax, &c. London 1649, in five ſheets in 4to. Demand of his Liberty to the General, 26th Decemb. 1648, with his Anſwer thereto, and his Anſwer and Declaration thereupon. Remonſtrance and Declaration of ſeveral Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, againſt the Unfaithfulneſs of ſome of their Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes. London 1648. Brief Memento to the preſent un-parliamentary Junto, touching their preſent Intentions and proceedings to depoſe and execute King Charles, Jan. 1. ann. 1648. London 1649 in twelve ſheets in 4to. Reprinted at London 1660 in 4to. Letter to the General, dated Jan. 3. 1648, demanding what kind of a priſoner he is? and whoſe priſoner? With an appearance to his action of falſe impriſonment. With an additional poſtſcript, both printed on one ſide of a ſheet of paper. Impeachment of High Treaſon againſt Lieutenant-General Cromwell, and other army officers, January 1648. Four conſiderable poſitions for the ſitting members, judges, and others to ruminate upon, January 1648. Declaration and proteſtation againſt the preſent proceedings of the general and general council of the army and their faction, now remaining and ſitting in the ſaid houſe; dated the 19th of January 1648. Six propoſitions of undoubted verity, fit to be conſidered of in our preſent exigency by all loyal ſubjects and conſcientious Chriſtians. Six ſerious queries concerning the King's trial by the new High Court of Juſtice. London 1648. After the death of King Charles I. he wrote the following books. Proclamation proclaiming Charles Prince of Wales, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, 1 Febr. in the firſt year of his reign, 1648. Declaration and proteſtation of the Peers, Lords, and Barons, againſt the uſurpations of ſome members of the Commons houſe, 8 Febr. 1648. Publick declaration and proteſtation of the ſecured and ſecluded Members of the Houſe of Commons againſt the treaſonable aud illegal late acts and proceedings of ſome few confederate members of that Houſe, ſince their forcible Excluſion, 13 February 1648. New Babel's Confuſion: or, ſeveral Votes of the Commons aſſembled in Parliament againſt certain Papers, entitled, The Agreement of the People, &c. London 1649 in one ſheet in 4to. Prynne the Member reconciled to Prynne the Barriſter: or, an Anſwer to a ſcandalous Pamphlet, entitled, Prynne againſt Prynne; wherein is demonſtrated that William Prynne Utter Barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn in his Sovereign Power in Parliaments and Kingdoms is of the ſame judgment with and no ways contradictory to Will. Prynne, Eſq; a Member of the Houſe of Commons in his Memento, &c. London 1649 in four ſheets in 4to. Firſt part of an Hiſtorical Collection of the ancient Councils and Parliaments of England, from the year 673 till ann. 1216, &c. London 1649 in four ſheets in 4to. Legal Vindication of the liberties of England againſt illegal taxes, and pretended Acts of Parliament lately enforced on the people: or, Reaſons aſſigned why he [Prynne] can neither in conſcience, law, or prudence, ſubmit to the new illegal Tax and Contribution of ninety thouſand Pounds the Month lately impoſed on the Kingdom by a pretended Act of ſome Commons in (or rather out of) Parliament. London 1649 in eight ſheets in 4to. Reprinted with additions in 1660. Arraignment, Conviction, and Condemnation of the Weſtmonaſterian Junto's Engagement. London 1650. Brief Apology for all Non-ſubſcribers, and looking-glaſs for all Apoſtate Preſcribers and Subſcribers of the new Engagement, &c. London 1650 in two ſheets in 4to. Summary Reaſons againſt the new Oath and Engagement. And an Admonition to all ſuch as have already ſubſcribed to it, &c. 1649 in 4to. The time-ſerving Proteus and ambi-dexter Divine uncaſed to the World. London 1650 in 4to. Written againſt John Dury; in anſwer to which Mr. Dury wrote a piece publiſhed by Samuel Hartlib, Eſq; under the title of The unchanged, conſtant, and ſingle-hearted Peace-maker drawn forth into the World: or, a Vindication of Mr. John Dury, from the aſperſions caſt upon him in a nameleſs pamphlet called, The time-ſerving Proteus, &c. London 1650 in three ſheets in 4to. Sad and ſerious Conſiderations touching the invaſive War againſt our Preſbyterian Brethren of Scotland. Written in Dunſtar-Caſtle during his cloſe impriſonment there in September 1650. A Goſpel Plea (interwoven with a rational and legal) for the ancient ſettled Maintenance and Tenths of the Miniſters of the Goſpel, &c. London 1653. Reprinted with the ſecond part thereof in 1659. Jus Patronatus: or, a brief, legal, and rational Plea for Advowſons and Patrons, ancient, lawful, juſt, and equitable rights and titles to preſent incumbents to Pariſh Churches or Vicarages upon vacancies, &c. London 1654 in ſeven ſheets in 4to. Declaration and Proteſtation againſt the illegal, deteſtable, and oft condemned Tax and Extortion of Exciſe in general, &c. London 1654 in 4to. Firſt part of a ſeaſonable, legal, and hiſtorical Vindication, and chronological Collection of the good old fundamental Liberties, Rights, Laws, Government of all Engliſh free Men. London 1655 in 4to. The ſecond part was printed at London the ſame year. A new diſcovery of Free-State Tyranny: containing four letters; together with a ſubſequent Remonſtrance of ſeveral Grievances and Demands of common Right; written and ſent by him [Prynne] to Mr. John Bradſhaw and his aſſociates at Whitehall (ſtyling themſelves The Council of State) after their two years and three months cloſe impriſonment of him, &c. London 1655 in 4to.

[L] He afterwards wrote ſeveral books upon religious controverſies and other points] He wrote the following before the Reſtoration. Brief polemical Diſſertation concerning the true time of the Inchoation and Determination of the Lord's Day Sabbath from Evening to Evening. London 1655 in 4to. The Quakers unmaſked, and clearly detected to be but the ſpawn of Romiſh Frogs, Jeſuits, and Franciſcan Friers, ſent from Rome to ſeduce the intoxicated giddy-headed Engliſh Nation, &c. London 1655 in five ſheets in 4to. Reprinted at London in 1664. An old Parliamentary Prognoſtication made at Weſtminſter for the preſent new Year and puny Members there aſſembled. London 1655. Seaſonable Vindication of free Admiſſion to and frequent Adminiſtration of the Holy Communion, to all viſible Church-Members, regenerate or unregenerate, &c. London 1656 in 4to. New diſcovery of ſome Romiſh Emiſſaries, Quakers; as likewiſe of ſome Popiſh errors, unadviſedly embraced, purſued by our Anti-communion Miniſters, diſcovering the dangerous Effects of their diſcontinuing the frequent Adminiſtration of the Lord's Supper. London 1656 in eight ſheets in 4to. Legal Vindication of two important Queries of preſent general Concernment, clearly diſcovering from our Statute, common, and canon Laws, the bounden Duty of Miniſters and Vicars of Pariſh Churches, to adminiſter the Sacraments, as well as preaching to their Pariſhioners, and the legal Remedies have ſolicited, was chief Keeper of his Majeſty's Records in the Tower of London, with a ſalary of 500 pound per ann. In Auguſt the ſame year, he was appointed one of the ſix Commiſſioners for Appeals and regulating the Exciſe. In April 1661, he was again elected Burgeſs for Bath, to ſit in the Parliament, which began May the 8th, the ſame year. In July following, being diſcontented at ſome proceedings in the Houſe, he publiſhed a paper, entitled, Sundry Reaſons tendered to the moſt honourable Houſe of Peers, by ſome Citizens and Members of London, and other Cities, Boroughs, Corporations, and Ports, againſt the new intended Bill for governing and reforming Corporations; of which he being diſcovered to be the Author, was obliged to beg pardon of the Houſe, in order againſt them, in caſe of obſtinate refuſal. London 1656 in 4to. It was twice printed in that year. Short Demurrer to the Jews long diſcontinued barred Remitter into England; compriſing an exact chronological Relation of their firſt admiſſion into England, their ill Deportment, Miſdemeanours, Condition, Sufferings, &c. London 1656, ſecond edition in 4to. The ſecond part of his Short Demurrer, &c. was printed at London 1656 in 4to. A ſummary Collection of the principal fundamental Rights, Liberties, Properties of all Engliſh free-Men. London 1656 in 4to. Two editions, the ſecond of which was much enlarged. Lord's Supper briefly vindicated, and clearly demonſtrated to be a Grace-begetting, Soul-converting (not a mere confirming) Ordinance. London 1657. Anſwered by S. S. Miniſter of the Goſpel, in a book entitled, Holy Things for holy Men: or, the Lawyer's Plea non-ſuited, &c. London 1658 in 4to. The Subjection of all Traytors, Rebels, as well Peers as Commons, in Ireland, to the Laws, Statutes, and Trials by Juries of good and lawful Men of England, in the King's Bench at Weſtminſter, for Treaſons perpetrated by them in Ireland, &c. Being an Argument at Law made in the Court of the King's Bench, Term Hillar. 20 Car. Reg. in the Caſe of Connor Magwire, an Iriſh Baron, &c. London 1658 and 1681, in 4to. Probable Expedient for future Peace and Settlement. London 1658. Twelve ſerious Queries propoſed to all conſcientious Electors of Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes, for the Aſſembly. London 1658. Twelve ſeveral Heads of publick Grievances, and uſeful neceſſary Propoſals of the Weſtern Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, to their Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes. Ann. 1658. Eight military Aphoriſms, demonſtrating the uſeleſneſs, unprofitableneſs, hurtfulneſs, and prodigal expenſiveneſs of all ſtanding Engliſh Forts and Garriſons, to all the People of England, &c. London 1658, in three ſheets in 4to. The firſt Part of a brief Regiſter, Kalendar, and Survey of ſeveral Kinds, Forms of all parliamentary Writs, &c. London 1659. Beheaded Dr. John Hewyt's Ghoſt, pleading, yea crying for exemplary Juſtice againſt the miſnamed High Court of Juſtice. London 1659 4to. The true good old Cauſe rightly ſtated, and the falſe uncaſed. London 1659, two Edit. in one ſheet in 4to. Anſwered by an anonymous Writer, in three ſheets in 4to, entitled, Mr. Prynne's good old Cauſe ſtated and ſtunted ten years ago, &c. and by Henry Stubbe, in his Commonwealth of Iſrael. The Republicans and others ſpurious good old Cauſe briefly and truly anatomized, to preſerve our native Country, Kingdom, legal Government, &c. London 1659, three edit. in three ſheets in 4to. This was animadverted upon ſoon after by John Rogers, in his Chriſtian Concertation with Mr. Prynne, Mr. Baxter, and Mr. Ja. Harrington, for the true Cauſe of the Commonwealth; being an Anſwer to Mr. Prynne's Anatomy of the Republicans, &c. and his true and perfect Narrative. To part of Mr. Baxter's Holy Commonwealth, with ſome Reflections on his Catholick Key. New Cheaters Forgeries detected, diſclaimed, &c. London 1659. True and perfect Narrative of what was done, ſpoken by and between Mr. Prynne, the old and newly forcibly late ſecluded Members, the Army-Officers, and thoſe now ſitting, both in the common Lobby-Houſe, and elſewhere, on the 7th and 9th of May, &c. London 1659, in fourteen ſheets in 4to. Upon this was publiſhed, in one ſheet in 4to, a pamphlet, entitled, The Character or Earmark of Mr. Will. Prynne, Author of a great many ſcandalous Paſquils, &c. Ten conſiderable Queries concerning Tithes, &c. againſt the Petitioners and Petitions, for their total Abolition, as Anti-chriſtian, Jewiſh, burthenſome, &c. London 1659, in one ſheet in 4to. Anſwer to a Propoſition, in order to the propoſing of a Commonwealth or Democracy. London 1659. Concordia diſcors: or, the diſſonant Harmony of ſacred publick Oaths, Proteſtations, Leagues, Covenants, Ingagements, lately taken by many time-ſerving Saints, Officers, without ſcruple of Conſcience, making a very unpleaſant Conſort, &c. London 1659, in ſix ſheets in 4to. The Remainder of A Goſpel Plea, for the Tithes and ſettled Maintenance of the Miniſters of the Goſpel. London 1659. A brief neceſſary Vindication of the old and new ſecluded Members from the falſe malicious Calumnies, and of the fundamental Rights, Liberties, Privileges, &c. from the late avowed Subverſions, 1. of John Rogers, in his Chriſtian Concertation with Mr. Will. Prynne, and others. 2. Of Marchamont Needham, in his Intereſt will not lie, &c. London 1659, in eight ſheets in 4to. Short, legal, medicinal, uſeful, fair, eaſy Preſcription to recover our Kingdom, Church, Nation, from their preſent dangerous, diſtractive, deſtructive Confuſion, and worſe than Bedlam madneſs, &c. London 1659, in one ſheet and half in 4to. Conſcientious, ſerious, theological, and legal Queries propounded to the twice diſſipated, ſelf-created, anti-parliamentary Weſtminſter Junto, and its Members. To convince them of, humble them for, &c. London 1660, in ſix ſheets and half in 4to. It was printed in November 1659. Seven additional Queries in Behalf of the ſecluded Members, propounded to the twice broken Rump now ſitting, the Cities of Weſtminſter, London, &c. London 1660, in one ſheet in 4to. Publiſhed in December 1659. Caſe of the old ſecured, ſecluded, and twice excluded Members, briefly and truly ſtated, for their own Vindication, &c. London 1660, in one ſheet in 4to. Publiſhed in December 1659. A full Declaration of the true State of the ſecluded Members Caſe. In Vindication of themſelves and their Privileges, and of the reſpective Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, for which they were elected to ſerve in Parliament, againſt the Vote of their Diſcharge, publiſhed in print January the 5th, 1659, by their Fellow-Members. Compiled and publiſhed by ſome of the ſecluded Members, who could not meet with ſafety and convenience, without danger of a forcible ſurprize by Red-coats. London 1660, in ſeven ſheets and half in 4to. Publiſhed in January 1659-60. Remonſtrance of the Noblemen, Knights, Gentlemen, Clergymen, Freeholders, Citizens, Burgeſſes, and Commons, of the late Eaſtern, Southern, Weſtern Aſſociation, who deſire to ſhew themſelves faithful and conſtant to the good old Cauſe, &c. London 1659. Ten Queries upon the ten new Commandments of the general Council of the Officers of the Army, 22d Decemb. 1659. Printed in one ſheet in 4to. Brief Narrative of the manner how divers Members of the Houſe of Commons that were illegally and unjuſtly impriſoned or ſecluded by the Army's Force in Decemb. 1648, and May 7, anno 1659, coming on the 27th of Decemb. 1659 to diſcharge their Truſt, were again ſhut out, by the pretended Order of the Members ſitting, &c. London 1660, in one ſheet and half in 4to, publiſhed in the latter end of December 1659. Six important Queries propoſed to the re-ſitting Rump of the Long-Parliament, fit to be ſatisfactorily reſolved, &c. Printed in December 1659, on one ſide of a ſheet. The Privileges of Parliament, which the Members, Army, and this Kingdom, have taken the Proteſtation and Covenant to maintain. Re-printed in one ſheet in 4to, January the 5th, 1659-60, the day appointed to remember them. Copy of the Preſentment and Indictment found and exhibited by the Grand Jury of Middleſex, on the laſt Day of Hilary Term 1659, againſt Col. Matthew Alured, Col. John Okey, and others, for aſſaulting and keeping Sir Gilbert Gerard, and other Members, by force of Arms out of the Commons Houſe of Parliament, on 27 Decemb. 1659. London 1660. Three ſeaſonable Queries propoſed to all thoſe Cities, Counties, and Boroughs, whoſe reſpective Citizens, &c. have been forcibly excluded, der to eſcape puniſhment (i). After the Reſtoration, he publiſhed ſeveral books [M]. He gave his works bound up together, in forty volumes in folio and quarto, to the Library of Lincoln's-Inn. Marchamont Needham (k) tells us, that he was one of the greateſt Paper-worms, that ever crept into a cloſet or library. In 1659, there was publiſhed a pretended petition of the peaceable and well affected people of three nations, ſhewing, that "whereas Will. Prynne, Bencher of Lincoln's-Inn, had for many years laſt paſt been "an indefatigable and impertinent Scribler, and had almoſt nauſeated the ſober part "of the ſaid Nations with the ſtench of his carion Paſquils and Pamphlets, for ſome "whereof he had ſuffered under the hierarchy in the time of the late King, &c. he might "have an Act of Amneſty and pardon for all his treaſons, ſeditions, jeſuitiſms, con-"tempts of Government, miſunderſtanding of the Scriptures, Law, and Reaſon, miſ-"quotations, and miſapplications of authorities to his Paſquils, &c." Mr. Wood tells us (l), "that many perſons, eſpecially Royaliſts, judged his books to be worth little "or nothing, his proofs for no arguments, and affirmations for no teſtimonies, having "ſeveral forgeries made in them for his and the ends of his brethren. They are all in "the Engliſh tongue; and by the generality of ſcholars are looked upon to be rather "rhapſodical and confuſed, than any way polite or conciſe; yet for antiquaries, critics, "and eluded, unjuſtly ejected and diſabled to ſit in the Commons Houſe, by thoſe now acting at Weſtminſter. London 1666, publiſhed about the latter end of December 1659, on one ſide of a ſheet of paper. Humble Petition and Addreſs of the Sea-men and Water-men in and about the City of London, to the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common-Council aſſembled, for a free and legal Parliament, &c. London 1660. Seaſonable and healing Inſtructions, humbly tendered to the Free-holders, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of England and Wales, to be ſeriouſly commended by them to their reſpective Knights, Citizens, Burgeſſes, elected, and to be elected, for the next Parliament, 25 April 1660.

(i) Wood, col. 438, 439.

(k) Mercur. Polit. No. 7.

(l) Col. 439.

[M] After the Reſtoration he publiſhed ſeveral books.] Second part of a brief Regiſter, Kalendar, and Survey of the ſeveral kinds of parliamentary Writs (relating to the Houſe of Commons), &c. London 1660, in 4to. Bathonia rediviva: the humble Addreſs of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of the City of Bath, to the King's moſt excellent Majeſty, preſented by Mr. Prynne, 16 June 1660. London 1660. The firſt part of the ſignal Loyalty of God's true Saints and pious Chriſtians (as likewiſe of Pagans) towards their King, both before and under the Law and Goſpel, expreſſed in and by their conſtant publick Prayers, Supplications, Interceſſions, Thankſgiving for them. London 1660, in 4to. The ſecond part of ſignal Loyalty; together with various Forms of Prayers, Supplications, Votes, Acclamations, Ceremonies, and Solemnities uſed at the Coronations of Emperors and Kings, eſpecially of the Kings of England. London 1660, in 4to. A ſeaſonable Vindication of the ſupreme Authority and Juriſdiction of Chriſtian Kings, Lords, and Parliaments, &c. London 1660, in 4to, taken out of John Hus. A ſupplemental Appendix to the premiſed Diſputation of John Hus. Sundry Reaſons humbly tendered to the moſt honourable Houſe of Peers, by ſome Citizens and Members of London, and other Cities, Boroughs, Corporations, and Ports, againſt the new intended Bill for governing and reforming Corporations. Some few of theſe Reaſons were publiſhed, and the reſt ſuppreſſed. A ſhort, ſober, pacifick Examination of ſome Exuberances in, and ceremonial Appurtenances to, the Common Prayer, &c. London 1661, in 4to. Brevia Parliamentaria rediviva: in 13 Sections, containing ſeveral Catalogues of the Numbers, Dates of all Bundles of original Writs of Summons and Elections, newly found, or formerly extant, in the Tower of London, &c. London 1662, in 4to. Apology for tender Conſciences, touching not bowing at the Name of Jeſus. London 1662, in 4to. The fourth part of a Regiſter and Survey of the ſeveral Kinds and Forms of parliamentary Writs, &c. London 1664 4to. The firſt tome of an exact chronological Vindication and hiſtorical Demonſtration of our Britiſh, Roman, Saxon, Daniſh, Norman, Engliſh Kings ſupreme Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in over all ſpiritual and religious Affairs, Cauſes, Perſons, as well temporal, within their Realms of England, Scotland, Ireland, and other Dominions, from the original planting of Chriſtian Religion therein, and Reign of Lucius our firſt Chriſtian King, till the Death of King Richard I. A. D. 1199, &c. London 1666, in folio. Dedicated to King Charles II. At the end of this volume is an advertiſement to the Reader, informing us, that the late dreadful fire having in three days turned 88 pariſhes and their Churches, with the Cathedral of London, into aſhes; and among other loſſes and miſchiefs to the ſeveral Companies of the City, moſt of all endamaged the Company of Printers and Stationers, moſt of whoſe habitations, ſtore-houſes, ſhops, ſtocks, and books, were not only conſumed, but their aſhes and ſcorched leaves conveyed aloft and diſperſed by the wind to places above ſixteen miles diſtant; among millions of other books thus deſtroyed, while our Author was buſy in ſecuring the publick Records of the Kingdom, his Printer's houſe, with moſt of the printed copies of this tome, then finiſhed at the preſs (except the tables to it) as likewiſe the ſecond tome formerly publiſhed, and of the firſt book and third tome, (wherein he had made ſome progreſs,) were then burnt together with it; not above 70 of them being reſcued from the fire, to the Author's damage near 2000 l. Upon this account he did not print his intended Tables for ſo few copies of this tome, till he ſhould be inabled to reprint it; eſpecially ſince the pages of the reprinted volume, by reaſon of ſome additions, would vary from thoſe already printed, and ſo make the tables unſuitable thereto. The ſecond tome of an exact chronological Vindication and hiſtorical Demonſtration of our Kings ſupreme Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, &c. from the firſt of King John 1199, to the Death of King Henry III. 1273. London 1665, in folio. Dedicated to the Lord Chancellor Clarendon. Aurum Reginæ: or concerning Queen-Gold, &c. London 1668, in 4to. Animadverſions on the fourth part of Sir Edward Coke's Inſtitutes of the Laws of England, &c. London 1669, in folio. The Hiſtory of King John, King Henry III. and the moſt illuſtrious King Edward I. wherein the ancient Sovereign Dominion of the Kings of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, over all Perſons and all Cauſes, is aſſerted and vindicated againſt all Incroachments and Innovations whatſoever. The miſtakes in ſome printed Statutes, Canoniſts, Law-books, Hiſtories, and other Matters of moment, are rectified and reſcued from Oblivion. Collected out of the ancient Records in the Tower of London, and now publiſhed for the better Advancement of Learning, Maintenance of the King's Supremacy, the Subjects Liberties, and the Laws of the Realm. London 1670, in folio. The Dedication by the Author himſelf to the Earl of Angleſey, Sir Harbottle Grimſton, Sir Matthew Hale, Sir Edward Atkins, Sir Wadham Windham, Sir Richard Ramsford, Sir Robert Atkins, and the reſt of the worſhipful readers of Lincoln's-Inn, is dated from his ſtudy in Lincoln's-Inn, July 28 1688. This laſt volume was deſigned by the Author to have borne the ſame title with the two former, as appears from the book itſelf. But he dying juſt before it was publiſhed, "his executors, into whoſe "hands moſt of the impreſſion fell, put a new title to "the book, and called it The Hiſtory of King John, "&c. in hopes that appearing in the ſhape and diſ-"guiſe of an entire work, it would go off the more "readily (13)." Mr. Oldys obſerves (14), that "neither of the three volumes have been ſo ſufficiently "uſed by or known to ſucceeding writers of or upon "our Engliſh Hiſtory, as ſuch copious materials, ſo "carefully collected, do deſerve. One reaſon no "doubt is the ſcarcity of the two former volumes, "which are advanced to ſuch an extraordinary price, "that

(13) Nicholſon's Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, part 3. p. 203. edit. Lond. 1699.

(14) Britiſh Librarian: exhibiting a compendious Review or Abſtract of our moſt ſcarce, uſeful, and valuable books in all Sciences, as well in Manuſcript as in print. No. 1. for January 1737. p. 20.

" and ſometimes for Divines they are uſeful. In moſt of them he ſhews great induſtry, " but little judgment, eſpecially in his large folios againſt the Pope's uſurpations. He " may be well entitled, Voluminous Prynne, as Toſtatus Albulenſis was two hundred years " before his time called Voluminous Toſtatus; for I verily believe, that if rightly com-
(m) Letter to Dr. Rogers, ſect. 2. p. 28. edit. Lond. 1727. " puted, he wrote a ſheet for every day of his life, reckoning from the time, when he " came to the uſe of reaſon and the ſtate of man." Mr. Anthony Collins ſtyles him (m) a little, factious, ſcribling fellow. He died at his lodgings in Lincoln's-Inn, October the 24th 1669, and was interred in the walk under the Chapel there, which ſtands upon
(n) Wood, col. 453. pillars (n).

" that it is well known, the complete ſett has been " ſold for thirty pounds. Another reaſon for their " having lain ſo much in obſcurity, might be, ſome " publick puniſhment the Author once underwent for " writing another book, but in the former reign, and " long before he was Keeper of the Records, for " which yet he had a handſome recompenſe aſſigned " him by the Parliament, however it might leave " ſome diſtaſte to his name upon the minds of many, " as we may elſewhere obſerve. The laſt cauſe of " their neglect may be that artful diſregard, which " has been inſinuated of theſe collections, to abate " the curioſity of the Laity, and diſſuade their look-" ing into them. The Right Reverend Author laſt " quoted [Nicholſon] ſpeaking of thoſe two tomes
(15) Ubi ſupra, p. 202. " which periſhed in the fire of London, adds (15), " No man has hitherto thought it worth his expence and " while to give us a new edition from any of the few " that eſcaped. His third has enough in all conſcience to " ſatisfy any reaſonable Reader, and ſuperſede his enquiry into " the ſtate of the caſe in either former or following ages." Beſides the works, of which we have already given a catalogue, he reviſed, rectified, and added a preface and marginal Notes, &c. to An exact Abridgment of the Records of the Tower of London, from the Reign of King Edward II. unto King Richard III. of all the Parliaments holden in each King's Reign, and the ſeveral Acts in every Parliament, &c. collected by Sir Robert Cotton, Bart. and printed at London 1657, in folio. He publiſhed likewiſe ſeveral treatiſes of other perſons, as, 1. Truth gloriouſly appearing from under the ſad Cloud of Obloquy: or, a Vindication of the Practice of the Church of Chriſt in the Summer Iſlands, &c. written by Nath. White, B. D. and Paſtor of the Church of Chriſt in the Summer Iſlands. 2. A Diſcourſe of the Spaniſh Monarchy, written by Thomas Campanella; which having been tranſlated into Engliſh by Edm. Chilmead, and publiſhed in 1654, had a new preface put to it by Mr. Prynne, with a title bearing the date of 1659. 3. A Breviate of the Life of William Laud, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, being extracts from the Archbiſhop's Diary. There are ſeveral pamphlets aſcribed to him, of which he was not the Author; particularly one intitled, Mola aſinaria: or, the unreaſonableneſs and inſupportable Burthen now preſſed upon the Shoulders of this groaning Nation by the headleſs Head and unruly Rulers, &c. held forth in a Remonſtrance, &c. London 1659, in one ſheet in 4to. T.

PSAMMITICHUS, King of Egypt 640 years before the birth of Chriſt, was the ſon of Nechus, whom Sabacus King of Ethiopia put to death, when he ſeized upon Egypt. The ſon would have met with the ſame fate, had he not fled to Syria. He was recalled after Sabacus was withdrawn, and he was one of the twelve great Lords who go-
(a) Herodot. lib. 2. cap. 152. verned Egypt (a). Every one of theſe had his diviſion or diſtrict, but then they acted
(b) Ibid. cap. 147. in concert, and rather like Partners or Collegues than neighbouring Princes (b). Pſam-
(c) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 1. cap. 66. mitichus was envied by the eleven others, either becauſe the wealth he had amaſſed by the impoſts he levied on goods (c) had enabled him to make alliances with foreigners; or becauſe they were afraid he would be Monarch over the whole Kingdom, as had been foretold by an Oracle [A]. They therefore baniſhed him to fenny places, where he perhaps would have lived all his life-time, had he not heard that ſome foreigners, who had made a deſcent into Egypt, laid waſte all the level country. Theſe were the Ionians and Carians. As advice was brought him that they were brazen men [B], he entertained great hopes, becauſe of an Oracle pronounced to him. He went to take a view of theſe people, and having engaged theſe foreigners to live with him, he made them inſtrumental in getting him poſſeſſion of all Egypt. He ſhewed himſelf very grateful, and gave
(d) Herod. lib. 2. cap. 154. them lands near the Nile, below the city Bubaſte (d). From that time he had always foreigners in his pay, and even gave them the precedency over the ſoldiers, his country-
(e) Diod. Sicul. lib. 1. cap. 67. men, in the war carried on by him in Syria (e). This exaſperated the Egyptians to ſuch a degree, that two hundred thouſand of them abandoned him. They went and ſettled in

[A] They were afraid he would be Monarch over the whole Kingdom, as had been foretold by an oracle.] The oracle had told them, that he among them, who ſhould perform his libations in a brazen cup, ſhould poſſeſs the Kingdom ſingly. It happened that on the laſt day of a ſolemn feſtival, as they were all in Vulcan's Temple, ready to perform the libations, the Prieſt who was to give them the golden cup they employed in that ceremony, miſtook in the number, and brought only eleven cups. What did Pſammitichus, who being the laſt of all had no cup? He took off his helmet, and employed it for the libation. The other Kings called to mind the oracle, and to prevent the effects of it, would have killed Pſammitichus, had they not known certainly that he had no hand in
(1) Herod. lib. 2. cap. 151. the Prieſt's miſtake (1). I know not how to bring off Athenæus, who makes Herodotus ſay, that the Egyptian Prieſts uſed to drink out of brazen cups; and that it does not appear that even the Kings, when they ſacrificed in publick, made uſe of a ſilver cup; ſo that Pſammitichus, who was the youngeſt King, performed his libations with a brazen cup, whilſt the reſt made them with ſilver cups (2). If the reader looks into the 151ſt chapter of the ſecond book of Herodotus, he will find that Athenæus relates this incident very unfaithfully. His tranſlator is almoſt as unfaithful. Here follows the Greek ψαμμήτιχον γῆν πάτρην ὄντα τῶν ἄλλων βασιλέων χαλκῆ φιάλῃ σπεῖσαι, τῶν ἄλλων ἀργύραις σπονδύλοις; and the Latin is as follows; Itaque Pſammetichum aliis regibus poſteriorem libaſſe argentea phiala, ſuperiores autem ænea.
(2) Athen. lib. 6. p. 231.

[B] That they were brazen men.] Pſammitichus, being reduced to a low condition by the jealouſy of the other Kings, conſulted an Oracle of Latona, which was in the city of Butis, and was looked upon as the beſt in all Egypt. He was anſwered, that revenge would come to him by ſea, when brazen men ſhould be ſeen. The pirates who were landed in Egypt were armed from head to foot, and as the people of that country had never ſeen men armed in that manner before, they imagined they were of braſs, and carried the news of it to Pſammitichus. From in Ethiopia [C], and returned a very blunt reply to the arguments he cauſed to be made uſe of, in order to oblige them to return [D]. He did all that lay in his power to make up that loſs, and applied himſelf chiefly to make trade flouriſh. He was extremely fond of ſtrangers, and indulged them protection of every kind, putting a ſtop to the barbarity which had been exerciſed againſt them in the preceding reigns. He made an alliance with the Athenians and ſome other Greek Nations, and would have his children inſtructed by them (f). He alſo put ſeveral children, for inſtruction, under the Carians and Ionians, whom he had ſettled on the bank of the Nile; and this was the firſt time that men, ſpeaking a different language from the Egyptians, ſettled in their country (g). By this, as Herodotus (h) obſerves, curious perſons who afterwards travelled into that country, met with perſons who underſtood them, and interpreted and explained for them. I have enquired in another article (i), whether the city of Naucratis was built by the people of Miletus, in the reign of Pſammitichus. This Prince reigned fifty four years [E], and died the 3d of the 42th Olympiad (k), leaving his kingdom to his ſon Nechus (l). He was buried in Sais, the place of his birth, and the Capital of lower Egypt. He was buried (I ſay) there, in the Temple of Minerva (m); and it was there the Saïtes uſed to bury all their Kings (n). He was the firſt Egyptian Monarch who drank wine (o). He ſent perſons in ſearch of the ſpring or head of the Nile (p); and in order to diſcover who were the moſt ancient people in the world, he cauſed two children to be brought up in ſuch a manner, that they never heard any perſon ſpeak; and becauſe that, when they were two years of age, they ſpoke a word which ſignifies bread in the Phrygian language, the Egyptians were obliged to lay aſide their pretenſions of being the oldeſt people in the world, and yield it to the Phrygians (q). No ſiege ever laſted longer than that which Pſammitichus laid before the city of Azotus (r); it being twenty nine years before he took it. He did not gain ſo much glory by this enterprize, as by the art and dexterity with which he put a ſtop to a flood that was going to drown his whole kingdom. The Scythians, having defeated the Medes, ruled over all Aſia, and were marching directly into Egypt; but Pſammitichus met them in Paleſtine; and prevailed ſo far by his preſents and entreaties, that they marched back; and it was then that ſome of them plundered the Temple of Venus Urania in Aſcalon (s). Neither Moreri, nor the Authors of the Supplement to him, had much regard for the memory of this Monarch, ſince, inſtead of introducing, in his article, ſuch particulars as relate to him, and which, as the reader has ſeen, are neither few nor common, they have inſerted ſuch incidents only as relate to his ſucceſſors.

(f) Diod. Sicul. lib. 1. cap. 67.

(g) Herodot. lib. 2. cap. 154.

(h) Ibid.

(i) In the article NAUCRATIS.

(k) Calviſius, Helvicus, &c.

(l) Herod. lib. 2. cap. 158.

(m) Strabo, lib. 17. p. 551.

(n) Herod. lib. 2. cap. 169.

(o) Plut. de Iſide, p. 353.

(p) Athen. lib. 8. p. 345.

(q) Herod. lib. 2. cap. 2.

(r) Ibid. cap. 157.

(s) Idem, lib. 1. cap. 105.

From that time he entertained a very good opinion of the oracle, which, till then, he thought unworthy of the leaſt credit (3). What pity it is that Herodotus, whoſe relations are ſo delightful, did not live in another age, or did not know the difference there is between a hiſtory and a poem? In the latter, things muſt not be unravelled without a miracle, without ſomething in a ſupernatural way; the reader muſt be ſtruck with admiration at any rate: but the events related by an Hiſtorian muſt be ſimple and natural; a reader of good taſte may juſtly ſuppoſe, where theſe are not found, the Author forbore to write in that way, in order to make room for fictions, for machines, and the marvellous. I wonder that Herodotus ſhould leave any gleanings after him. He was ignorant of the Oracle mentioned by Polyænus (4). The God Ammon adviſes King Tementhes to beware of cocks. A Carian informed Pſammitichus, that the Carians were the firſt people who had ſet cock's-combs or creſts on their helmets; which was motive ſufficient to prompt Pſammitichus to levy a great number of Carians.

(3) Herod. lib. 2. cap. 152.

(4) Polyænus, Stratag. lib. 7. num. 3.

[C] They went and ſettled in Æthiopia.] According to Strabo (5), they were ſubject to a Queen who reigned over the iſland of Meroe; and that they poſſeſſed, near that iſland, the Province of Teneſis, and an iſland above that of Meroe. Pliny (6) quoting Ariſtocrean, ſpeaks of theſe fugitives, and of a city called Eſar, which they had inhabited three hundred years. The account he gives of its ſituation does not agree with Ptolemy, nor with what we juſt now heard from Strabo.

(5) Lib. 16. p. 530. lib. 17. p. 541.

(6) Lib. 6. cap. 30.

[D] . . . and returned a very blunt reply, to the arguments he cauſed to be made uſe of in order to oblige them to return.] Pſammitichus firſt got their Captains to exhort them, but afterwards he went in perſon. He beſought them to conſider, that they forſook their native country, their wives and children; to which they unanimouſly anſwered, ſtriking their bucklers with their lances, We ſhall find countries enough, ſo long as we continue able to handle theſe weapons; and we ſhall never want wives and children, whilſt we ſhall be able to manage theſe other implements. Saying theſe laſt words, they had the impudence to ſhew their pudenda. Precibus ad ſententiæ mutationem eos ſolicitans, templa; patriam; uxores; liberos; recordari jubet. Tum univerſi haſtas clypeoſque pulſantes, contentâ voce reſpondent, quoad arma in poteſtate habeant, facilè ſibi patriam reperturos; reductis quoque tunicis genitalia oſtentant, nunquam ſibi uxores aut liberos defore, quamdiu his ſint inſtructi, dictitantes (7).

(7) Diod. Sicul. lib. 1. cap. 67. p. m. 59.

[E] He reigned fifty four years.] Herodotus (8) declares this; Euſebius ſays he reigned but forty four years, and Moreri fifty eight years.

(8) Herod. lib. 1. cap. 157.

PTOLEMY, King of Egypt, XI of that name, was ſirnamed Auletes, becauſe of the prodigious fondneſs he had for playing on the flute. He ſucceeded his father (a) about the beginning of the 175th Olympiad, and the year of Rome 673 (b). He laid very heavy taxes on Egypt, in order to pay the immenſe ſums, which he wanted in order to gain and preſerve the friendſhip of the Romans. Upon this account his ſubjects hated him; and being beſides deſpiſed by them, by his ſo tamely ſuffering the Romans to win the iſland of Cyprus, he was expelled from his kingdom. He retired to Rome, where he long ſued for the protection and aid of the Commonwealth, in order to recover his kingdom: but his negotiation met with infinite oppoſition; and at laſt having loſt all hopes of being gratified in his wiſhes, he left Rome and went to Epheſus, where he obtained letters, commanding Gabinius to reſtore him to his kingdom, which order was accordingly happily executed by Gabinius (c). I have taken notice elſewhere (d) what

(a) His name was Ptolemy Lathurus.

(b) Vide Calviſium ad hunc annum.

(c) See the article BERENICE daughter of Ptolemy.

(d) Ibid.

became of Berenice, eldeſt daughter to this Monarch; and will obſerve here that Arſinoe, his youngeſt daughter, ſwayed the ſceptre ſome time [A]; but, properly ſpeaking, his other daughter, the famous Cleopatra, ſucceeded him.

Thoſe who deſire to have a more particular account of the life, manners, and fortune of this King, may peruſe his hiſtory publiſhed in Paris, anno 1698, by Baudelot de Dairval.

[A] Arſinoe, his younger daughter, ſwayed the ſceptre ſome time.] It is here I will diſcharge the promiſe I made (1), to compenſate for the too great brevity of Moreri. I ſay then, that ARSINOE ſtole away from the palace, whilſt the Egyptians were preparing to attack Julius Cæſar, who had the young King in his hands (2). She went to the Egyptian army, and commanded in it in conjunction with Achillas; but as a great quarrel aroſe between her and the laſt mentioned, each of them graſping at the ſole command, ſhe had him killed by Ganymede the eunuch (3). But Cæſar having given the young Prince his liberty, Arſinoe was obliged to reſign the throne to her brother. After Cæſar had gained the victory, and the death of young Ptolemy, Cæſar thought it expedient, for Cleopatra's ſafety, that Arſinoe ſhould leave Egypt (4). We learn from Appian, that Megabyzus, a Prieſt of Diana in Epheſus, received her in quality of a Queen (5); but he had like to have been put to death for this good office, when Mark Anthony, to pleaſe Cleopatra, would have killed Arſinoe in Miletus. He cauſed Magabyzus to be ſeized, becauſe of the kind reception he had given that Princeſs; but Cleopatra releaſed him at the requeſt of the Epheſians.

(1) In the art. ARSINOE.

(2) Cæſar, de Bello Civ. lib. 3. ſub fin. Lucan. lib. 10. ſub fin.

(3) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandr. circa init. p. m. 378.

(4) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandr. circa init. p. m. 396.

(5) Appian. de Bello Civ. lib. 5.

PUCCIUS (FRANCIS), born at Florence of an illuſtrious family, renounced the Roman Catholick Religion, as ſoon as he had examined the religious controverſies which aroſe in France in Calvin's time. He was at Lyons when he reſolved to change his religion. He went over to England, where he ſtudied Divinity firſt at Oxford, and then at London. He ſet out afterwards for Switzerland, where he had a diſputation with Socinus, concerning the ſtate of the firſt man. This ſeems to prove, that the Proteſtants looked upon him as an Orthodox man: but we ſhould be miſtaken if we thought ſo; for he held ſome opinions, for which the Magiſtrates of Baſil baniſhed him. He returned to London, where he was ſent to priſon, becauſe of the Doctrines which he diſperſed abroad. The moment he was ſet at liberty, he went over into the Low-Countries, and challenged Socinus to a verbal diſputation. They diſputed ſeveral times together in Poland, in preſence of the Church of Cracow, but could not agree. Wherefore Puccius, breaking off with the Sectaries of that country, got into the company of ſome perſons who were ſtudying Magick [A], and went with them to Prague, where he returned to his ancient profeſſion, I mean, that he returned again into the Pale of the Church of Rome (a). But notwithſtanding this, it is ſaid, that he was burnt at Rome [B]. He

(a) Extracted from Hoornbeeck, Apparat. ad Controverſias Socinianas, p. 52.

[A] Who were ſtudying magick.] The Author, whom I have quoted, uſes theſe words, in comitatum ſe dedit aliquorum Magiæ ſtudioſorum, quibuſcum Pragam pervenit (1). But it is better to conſult Socinus, who has given a more full account of this departure of Puccius. He obſerves (2) that that man, being condemned by the arbiters of the diſputation he had held with him at Cracow, would not confeſs himſelf vanquiſhed; but that they would not hear him any longer: the Synod of the Unitarians did not ſo much as vouchſafe to read his new book. Socinus adds, that he received from him an Italian book concerning the ſeal put to the ſcriptures (3). Puccius aſſerted that men could not underſtand one word in that divine book, and that we muſt wait for the arrival of the two men or witneſſes, who are mentioned in the eleventh chapter of St. John's Revelation, who would explain to us all the myſteries contained in the bible; which till that time could not be uſed as a rule to determine our controverſies about religious ſubjects. He imagined that theſe two men would appear very ſoon; for he took the 1260 of the beaſt's reign for ſo many years, and ſuppoſed that reign to have begun with the Council of Nice. He expected to be promoted to conſiderable preferments under the adminiſtration or miſſion of theſe two men (4); and whilſt he was flattering himſelf with theſe expectations, he got acquainted with two Engliſhmen, who attended the Palatine Laſci on his return from his Embaſſy to England. One of them was a Phyſician, the other had been a Magician, and they were both Roman Catholicks: but they promiſed the world a quick and general reformation, which God was to perform in Chriſtendom by their means. They boaſted of a familiar correſpondence with the Angels; the Phyſician had no viſions, and heard nothing extraordinary, but he wrote down very accurately all that his companion pretended to ſee and to hear. Socinus and ſeveral other perſons exhorted Puccius not to follow theſe two men; but they could not perſuade him: he went with them to Prague, and embraced again the Roman Catholick Religion; on which occaſion he wrote a long letter to Socinus, in which he aſſerted that the Angel, who ſhewed himſelf to theſe two Gentlemen, had alſo appeared to him, Puccius, in particular, and had moved him to abjure his errors. Statim autem fere ut Pragam pervenit, factus eſt Papiſta, et miniſtros Pontificios adiens, ſuæ ab Eccleſia Romana olim defectionis veniam, conveniente ſatisfactione exhibita, impetravit. Ac mox huc ad amicos, et præſertim ad me, ad quem hac de re bene longas literas dedit, de ſuo, ut ipſe loquitur, ad Catholicæ, ſanctæque Dei Eccleſiæ gremium reditu diligenter ſcripſit, aſſerens ſe verbis unius ex illis Dei Angelis, qui ſociis illis ſuis reſponſa dare ſolent, ad ſe nominatim loquentis, monitum atque impulſum id feciſſe, diuturnumque errorem ſuum tandem agnoviſſe (5). Socinus's letter, which contains that paſſage, was written in the beginning of the year 1586; it was not long before that Puccius had returned to Popery. Let us obſerve that he followed the profeſſion of a Merchant at Lyons, when he began to reliſh the doctrines of the Proteſtants. Though he was of a noble family, he could do it without degrading himſelf, according to the principles of the Italians: I ſay, of a noble family, for it is aſſerted, that he was really of the family of the Pucci's, of which there have been three Cardinals. Scias eum ante plures annos, cum Lugduni, quamvis ex nobili admodum familia, quæ etiam tres Cardinales habuit, natus, ut patriæ ipſius adeoque totius noſtræ Etruriæ mos fert, mercaturam exerceret, exorientibus illis de religione in Gallia diſſidiis, quæ necdum ſopita ſunt, ſtatuit, mercatura relicta, ſe totum ſtudio Sacrarum Literarum tradere, ut quid ſentiendum in noſtra religione eſſet, dilucide cognoſcere poſſet (6).

(1) Hoornbeeck, Apparat. ad Controverſ. Socinianas, p. 52.

(2) In his 3d Letter to Matthew Radecius.

(3) Librum . . . cui titulum fecit de Bibliis occluſis, deque Elia qui ea aperturus eſt. i. e. "A book . . "which he entitled, of the "Bible being "ſhut up, and of "Elijah who is "to open it." Socin. Epiſt. 3. p. 380. vol. 1. Bibl. Fratrum Polonorum.

(4) Dum Puccius in hac venturi Eliæ expectatione totus eſt, dumque ſeipſum participem hujus divinæ legationis fore ſperat, quemadmodum ejus ipſe libellus non obſcure indicat. Socin. ibid.

(5) Socin. Epiſt. 3. p. 380, vol. 1. Bibl. Fratrum Polonorum.

(6) Idem, ibid. p. 379.

[B] Notwithſtanding this it is ſaid that he was burnt at Rome.] The Archbiſhop of Saltſburg, they ſay (7), had him apprehended. and ſent him priſoner to Rome. That man deſerved ſome protection from the Inquiſitors, ſince he furniſhed them with a fair pretence to exclaim againſt the fundamental principle of the Proteſtants. Puccius returning into the Pale of the

(7) Ab Archiepiſcopo Salisburgenſi captus tandem, & Romam miſſus, in rogo periit. Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. m. 860.

He had no manner of learning, and was inclined to Fanaticiſm [C]. But the chief Doctrine with which he was infatuated was, that all honeſt men, even among the Heathens, would be ſaved [D]. Monſieur Baillet mentions him [E].

the Roman Catholick Church, after he had examined all the Sects who ſeparated from that Church, and tried whether he could meet with any thing ſatisfactory in France, Switzerland, England, Poland, Puccius, I ſay, returning after this into the Pale of the Church of Rome, is an evident proof, might the controverſial Writers ſay, that as ſoon as man go out of the road of authority, and follow that of a private examination, they cannot find any place where to reſt their foot upon; they ramble from one place to another, and if they have a mind to meet with firm ground, they muſt, like Noah's dove, return at laſt to the Ark. This is a noble common-place topic, which two moderns (8) have lately (9) urged when they went over to the Roman Religion. But it is after all nothing but a mere ſophiſm. The principle of authority does unavoidably lead private perſons to be Mahometans in Turkey, Heathens in China, and every where always of the national religion.

(1) The Sieurs Papin and de Verſé.

(9) I writ this in the year 1696.

[C] He had no manner of learning, and was inclined to Fanaticiſm.] Here follows the fine character which Voetius gives him. Fr. Puccius natione Italus Filidinus (10), inſtar cotburni omnium aut nullius religionis, nullius eruditionis literariæ, philoſophicæ, ſcripturariæ, molitus eſt libellum Goudæ in Hollandia anno 1592. editum & Clementi VIII. dedicatum, quo aſſerit univerſalem reſtitutionem, & fidem naturalem in Deum, per quam omnes ſalvari poſſint. Fanatico illi errori (jactat enim revelationes rat. 120. pag. 94.) mox publica ſcripta oppoſuerunt, ex Reformatis Franciſcus Junius, ex Lutheranis Lucas Oſiander, ex Pontificiis Nicolaus Serrarius. De hominis iſtius univerſali ἀπαιδευσία ex ſcriptis, de ingenio & moribus ex Epiſtolis Socini judicare poteris, Epiſt. 3. quæ eſt ad Matth. Radecum, Secret. Gedanenſ. Puccius prior Socinum ſatis ſarcaſticè perſtrinxerat in collatione de Mortalitate, quæ poſtea typis edita fuit in 4 (11). i. e. " Fr. Puccius an Italian, who like a " ſtage-player was of all religions, or of none at " all, a man ignorant of literature, of philoſophy, " and of divinity, wrote a book which was publiſhed " at Gouda in Holland, and dedicated to Pope Cle- " ment VIII. He aſſerts there is a general reſtora- " tion of all things, and maintains that all men can " be ſaved by their faith in God. That fanatical " error (for he pretends to revelations) was refuted " in printed books, by Francis Junius among the " Reformed, by Luke Oſiander among the Lutherans, " and by Nicholas Serrarius among the Roman Ca- " tholicks. You may judge of that man's univerſal " ignorance by his writings, and of his wit and " morals by Socinus's third letter, which he wrote " to Matthew Radſci. Puccius had firſt ridiculed " Socinus bitterly, in his diſſertation concerning mor- " tality, which was afterwards printed in 4to."

(10) See hereunder quotation (12).

(11) Gisb. Voetius, Diſputat. Theolog. Tom. 2. p. 234, 235.

[D] That all honeſt men even among the Heathens would be ſaved.] Tobias Pfannerus aſcribes that opinion to him on the credit of two Authors, whom he quotes. Franciſcus Puccius Fedelinus, Romæ quidem poſtea neſcio quâ de causâ combuſtus, ignorationem & incredulitatem Evangelii, vel defectum Baptiſmi ad ſalutem nulli obeſſe (ſtatuit) modò ſtudeat vitæ inculpatæ, quoad externos mores, nec præfractè quicquam neget: ineſſe omnibus naturaliter hanc facultatem, ut poſſint & velint ſalvi fieri, etiam abſque ſcrutinio quæſtionum Theologicarum; ut Oſiander *, & poſt hunc Joh. Ludovicus Hartmannus †, teſtantur (12). i. e. " Francis Puccius, " who was afterwards burnt at Rome, I know " not for what crime, aſſerted, that no man's igno- " rance or diſbelief of the goſpel, or want of bap- " tiſm, would be any obſtacle to his ſalvation, if he " did live an innocent life as to his morals, and " did not reject any doctrine out of obſtinacy: that " it is naturally in all men's power both to be able to " obtain ſalvation, and to will it, even without exa- " mining theological queſtions, as Oſiander, and J. " Lewis Hartman teſtify."

* Oſiand. Cent. 16. lib 4. cap. 46. citat. ib.

† J. L. Hartmann. hiſt. Conc. Tom. 4. Period. 6. Peric. 16. Exerc. 67. p. 701.

(12) Tob. Pfannerus, Syſtemate Theolog. Gentilis, p. 493.

[E] Monſieur Baillet mentions him (13)]. He tells us, that Luke Oſiander publiſhed a book in the year 1593 againſt our Francis Puccius, which book, adds he, is perhaps the ſame with that which is entitled, Anti-Puccius. " He has alſo the following paſſage. " Francis Puccius is, I think, no other but the Au- " thor of Puccianiſm, that is to ſay, of a new Sect, " which laſted but three days, and lay buried under " the ſtones, with which it was pelted by the Calvi- " niſts, the Lutherans, and the Catholicks. Tracing " the hiſtory of that man a little higher up, I find " that he is perhaps the ſame with Franciſco Pucci " of Florence, who retired to Baſil, who diſputed " with Socinus in the year 1577, about the ſtate of " the firſt man before the fall, and who held the im- " mortality of all the creatures, and conſequently of " man from the creation. But I will not aſſert, that " this Florentine is the ſame (14) with Franciſcus " Puccius Filidinus, who is mentioned in the firſt " claſs of the Index of condemned Authors and books, " under the name of the Council of Trent, where " it is obſerved, that that man did falſly call himſelf " Pucci." Obſerve that there is an Anti-Puccius quoted, which was wrote by Fauſtus Socinus; but that is not the title of the book, it is quoted thus only by abbreviation. That work contains four pieces: 1. A ſmall diſcourſe of Puccius concerning the immortality of all the creatures before the fall. That piece conſiſts of ten Theſes or poſitions, each of which contains one of the ten arguments on which he grounded his paradox. 2. Socinus's refutation of theſe ten Theſes. 3. Puccius's anſwer to that refutation. 4. Socinus's reply (15): it is very long and elaborate. All theſe pieces are inſerted in the ſecond volume of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum, under this general title, De ſtatu primi hominis ante lapſum Diſputatio.

(13) In his Anti, num. 33. See alſo num. 69.

(14) He is certainly the ſame.

(15) Entitled, Ad Defenſionem Franciſci Puccii Reſponſio.

☞ PUCKERING (Sir JOHN), Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, was born at Flamborough-head, in Yorkſhire, and ſecond ſon of a Gentleman, who left him a moderate eſtate (a). He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Common-law with ſuch ſucceſs, that he became the Queen's Serjeant, Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, and at laſt, Lord Keeper. Upon his being raiſed to the laſt poſt, he ſolicited her Majeſty, that he might have a leaſe of a large portion of the revenues of the Biſhoprick of Ely, then vacant [A], as it had been from the death of Biſhop

(a) Fuller's Worthies in Yorkſhire, and David Lloyd's State-Worthies, p. 607. 2d edit. Lond. 1670.

[A] Solicited her Majeſty that he might have a leaſe of a large portion of the revenues of the Biſhoprick of Ely, then vacant.] There are ſeveral original papers to this purpoſe among the manuſcripts belonging to the Biſhops of Ely. We ſhall give the Reader a copy of ſome of them.

" The moſt humble petition of your Majeſtie's moſt " bounden ſervant, the Keper of your Highnes " Great Seale.

" That it wolde pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſ- " tie to receave from him, to be aſſured to you and " your heyres, mannors and lands of the cleere yeer- " ly valew of 4000 l. and to graunte to him and " his heyres, mannors and lands of the yeerlie valew " of 4000 l. in fee-ferme, with the advowſons be- " longinge or beinge in the pariſhes where the pre- " miſes lye.

" The ſame to be none of the aunciente reve- " news of the Crowne, or of the auncient revenewes " of the Dutchies of Lancaſter or Cornewall, or of " the Principalitie of Wales, nor lyinge within fower " miles of any of your Majeſtie's howſes of acceſſe, " but to be of the meane revenewe, which came to " your Majeſtie by attainder, or by exchainge duringe " your Heighnes reigne, and of parſonadges impro- " priate, tythes, and Chaunterei lands, and ſuch " like;

Biſhop Coxe, who died July 22, 1581, and not filled till the end of the year 1599. In 1588, he made a remarkable ſpeech in the Houſe of Lords concerning the Puritans [B]. He died in the year 1596. Camden (b) ſtyles him Vir integer, a man of integrity; but Lloyd tells us (c), that though he was "of good repute for his own carriage, he "was unhappy for that of his ſervants, who for diſpoſing of his Livings corruptly, left "themſelves an ill name in the Church, and him a dubious one in the State." The laſt of his male deſcendants was Sir Thomas Puckering, a Gentleman of three thouſand pounds a year in land, beſides money, who died in 1637, leaving one daughter not above ſix years old, as appears from a letter of the Reverend Mr. Charles Garrard, afterwards Maſter of the Charter-Houſe, in a letter to the Lord Viſcount Wentworth, Lord Deputy of Ireland, dated at London April 28, 1637 (d). Dr. Fuller likewiſe tells us (e), that the Lord Keeper's male iſſue failing, his eſtate deſcended to Sir Henry Newton, who aſſumed the name of Puckering.

(b) Annales Reginæ Elizabethæ, ad ann. 1596.

(c) Ubi ſupra, p. 609.

(d) See the Letters and Diſpatches of Sir Thomas Wentworth, Bart. Earl of Straffford, vol. 2. p. 72. edit. Lond. 1739. folio.

(e) Ubi ſupra.

PUFEN-

" like; and that no parcell thereof exceed fourtei " pounds by yeere.

" By which your Majeſtei ſhall preſently encreaſe " your revenews in poſſeſſion 400 l. yeerly contynew " for ever.

" Yf your Majeſtie ſhall not like to graunte ſo " much in fee-ferme; then it is moſt humbly deſired, " that your Heighnes wolde graunte 200 l. yeerlie in " fee-ferme after the rate aforeſaid, and other 200 l. " yeerlye by leaſe, to be aſſured from a Biſhop of " Elye of the lands of the Biſhoprike to your Majeſtie " for ſome reaſonable number of yeers, as Biſhops " have heretofore graunted in like caſes, not exceed- " ing 80 yeeres, yeeldinge the auntient and accuſ- " tomed rents to the Biſhop and his ſucceſſors; and " your Majeſtie to aſſigne the ſame leaſe over to your " ſaid ſervante.

" By which your Majeſtie ſhall encreaſe your reve- " new preſently in poſſeſſion 200 l. yeerly to conty- " new for ever."

" It may pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſtie to " graunt me your moſt bounden ſervant your Princely " favour, that I may have a leaſe of parte of the " poſſeſſions of the Biſhoprike of Elye, not exceedinge " a thirde parte thereof in valew for ſuch reaſonable " terme of yeeres as the Biſhop may graunte unto " your Majeſtie, yeeldinge to the Biſhop and his ſuc- " ceſſors the beſt accuſtomed rents now or at any " tyme heartofore anſwered to the Biſhop for the " ſame, and performinge all ſervices and uſuall co- " venants for payment of rents, and doinge repara- " tions.

" For the accompliſhment whereof, yt may pleaſe " your Majeſtie to tranſlate one of the eldeſt Biſhopps, " whoe may make the ſame leaſe, by whoſe great " age it is lykeley the ſame Biſhoprike will not tarie " longe forrth of your Majeſtie's hands.

" Yt ſhall appeare unto your Majeſtie, that there- " by your Heighnes ſhall have as much profitt yeer- " ly in tenthes, ſubſidies, and firſt fruits out of thoſe " Biſhopriks, as your Majeſtie now hath clearly, the " See being voyde."

Reaſons that move the Lord Keper to aſke. " Sarge- " ant Puckeringe was taken to ſerve fower ſeſſions of " two Parliaments as Speaker, to his great expence " and chardge, and to the loſſe of his gaines in prac- " tize; wherby he coulde not make himſelf able, " as others (not ſervinge this courſe) have don.

" Being called to be Keper of the Great Seale, the " furniſhinge to ſo great a countenance (as this place " upon the ſodaine ſo enforced) was exceedinge " chardgeable.

" He hath no help of howſe (as ſondrie other Of- " ficers have appertaininge to their offices,) but pay- " eth 100 l. rente for his houſe at London, beſides " his houſe in the contrie.

" He hath no help of proviſion for horſe or howſe- " kepinge, by keeping of parks, or havinge other " offirs or leaſes of her Majeſtie.

" Other Chancellers have (for the moſt part) been " Biſhopps, and had therby great livings, beſides the " pore duteis of the Chanceller's office.

" The Lord Keper's profitts (ſithens his cominge to " the Seale) have been deminiſhed by cuttinge of " divers termes (by occaſion of ſickneſs) and the " chardge increaſed by ſeekinge habitation in the " contrei, where he hath no help of proviſion, but " all on the penny.

" Ther is detained from him the makinge of De- " niſons, which every Lord Keper and Chanceller " have had ſince her Majeſtie's tyme.

" He deſireth but to be made able to ſerve.

" He ſeketh not out of her Majeſtie's revenewes " and cofers.

" Yf he were a Civill Lawyer, he might ſue for " the Biſhoprike, but beinge a Common Lawyer, he " ſeeketh but to be the Biſhopp's Fermor, and that " only of ſuch a portion as the Biſhop can and wil be " willinge to ſpare, beinge no parte of his manſion " howſes or demeſnes, but that which others ſhall " have, yf the Lord Keper have it not.

" His Lordſhip (having this reaſonable ſuit) will " let to the tenants for reaſonable fynes, and thei " will be glad of certaine termes, and will beſtow " coſt upon their tenements."

[B] In 1588, he made a remarkable ſpeech in the Houſe of Lords concerning the Puritans.] He made this ſpeech by the ſpecial command of Queen Elizabeth. Mr. Tho. Pierce (1), afterwards Dean of Sarum, gives the following paſſage from it, tranſcribed from the Lord Keeper's own copy of the ſpeech. And eſpecially you are commanded by her Majeſty to take heed, that no ear be given, nor time afforded to the wearifom ſollicitations of thoſe, that commonly be called Puritans, wherewithal the late Parliaments have been exceedingly importuned. Which ſort of men, whilſt in the giddineſs of their ſpirits they labour and ſtrive to advance a new Elderſhip, they do nothing elſe than but diſturb the good repoſe of the Church and the Commonwealth, which is as well grounded for the body of religion itſelf, and as well guided for the diſcipline, as any realm, that profeſſeth the truth. And the ſame thing is already made good to the world by many the writings of learned and godly men; neither anſwered nor anſwerable by any of theſe new-fangled refiners. And as the preſent caſe ſtandeth, it may be doubted, whether they or the Jeſuits do offer more danger, or be more ſpeedily to be repreſſed. For albeit the Jeſuits do empoiſon the hearts of her Majeſty's ſubjects, under a pretext of conſcience, to withdraw them from their obedience due to her Majeſty; yet do they the ſame but cloſely, and only in privy corners. But theſe men do both publiſh in their printed books, and teach in all their conventicles, ſundry opinions, not only dangerous to the well-ſettled eſtate and policy of the realm, by putting a pike between the Clergy and Laity, but alſo much derogatory to her ſacred Majeſty and her Crown, as well by the diminution of her ancient and lawful revenues, and by denying her Highneſs's prerogative and ſupremacy, as by offering peril to her Majeſty's ſafety in her own Kingdom. In all which things, (however in many other points they pretend to be at war with the Popiſh Jeſuits, yet) by the ſeparation of themſelves from the unity of their fellow-ſubjects, and by abuſing the ſacred Authority and Majeſty of their Prince, they do both join and concur with the Jeſuits in opening the door, and preparing the way to the Spaniſh Invaſion that is threatened againſt the Realm. And thus having, according to the weakneſs of my beſt underſtanding, delivered her Majeſty's moſt royal pleaſure and wiſe direction, I reſt here, with moſt humble ſuit for her Majeſty's a gracious pardon in ſupply of my defects, and recommend you to the Author of all good counſel. T.

(1) New Diſcoverer diſcovered, by way of Anſwer to Mr. Baxter his pretended Diſcovery of the Grotian Religion, p. 109. edit. Lond. 1659, in 4to.

[A] An

☞ PUFENDORF (SAMUEL DE), an eminent Writer [A], was born in 1631, at Fleh, a little village near Chemnitz in Miſnia, a Provence in Upper Saxony (a), and was ſon of Elias Pufendorf, Miniſter of that place. His father having obſerved in him a very early inclination to learning, cultivated it with great care, and when he was of a proper age for the Univerſity, ſent him thither, by the aſſiſtance of a Saxon Nobleman, who being pleaſed with the excellent genius of the youth, was ſo generous as to maintain him there, the narrow circumſtances of our Author's father not enabling him to ſupport that expence. He went firſt to Grim, and having reſided there ſome time, removed to Leipſick, where, by his extraordinary application, he made a vaſt progreſs in his ſtudies. His father deſigning him for the Miniſtry, directed him to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity; but his inclination leading him another way, he turned his thoughts to that of the publick Law, which in Germany conſiſts of the knowledge of the Rights of the Empire over the Princes and States of which it is compoſed, and thoſe of the Princes and States, with reſpect to each other. He conſidered this ſtudy as a proper method of raiſing himſelf in time to ſome poſts in the Courts of Germany; for it is well known, that the ſeveral Princes, who compoſe the Germanick Body, have no other Miniſters of State, than men of learning, whom they ſtyle Counſellors, and whoſe principal ſtudy is the knowledge of the Publick Law of Germany. As theſe poſts are not venal, and no other recommendation is neceſſary to obtain them, but diſtinguiſhed merit, Mr. de Pufendorf reſolved to qualify himſelf for the honours, to which he aſpired. After he had reſided ſome time at Leipſick, he left that city, and went to Jena, where he joined to the ſtudy of Law that of the Mathematicks, to which he applied himſelf under Profeſſor Erhard Weigel, at whoſe houſe he lodged during the whole year 1657. His application to this ſcience, and to the Carteſian Philoſophy, for which he had an high eſteem, though without (a) See his Life written in High Dutch, and prefixed to the High Dutch tranſlation of his book de Statu Imperii Germanici; and the Preface to the French tranſlation of his book de Jure Naturæ & Gentium; and the Preface to the French tranſlation of his Introduction to Hiſtory, edit. 1722, and Bibl. Fabriciana, Tom. 4. p. 133.

[A] An eminent Writer.] His works are as follow. I. Elementorum Juriſprudentia Univerſalis Libri duo. Hague 1660 in 8vo. Cum Appendice de Sphærâ Morali, Jena 1669 in 8vo. The Appendix printed in this ſecond edition was not written by our Author. In this work our Author has in ſome meaſure followed the method of the Geometricians, by laying down at firſt his definitions and axioms, which he then explains, and draws the concluſions contained in them. Though he was not afterwards ſatisfied with this treatiſe himſelf, and publickly owned the defects of it, as an haſty production of youth; yet it was very favourably received by the publick, and diſtinguiſhed him to great advantage. It was thought, that ſuch a performance promiſed ſomething very conſiderable in the future; and Baron Boinebourg, then Chancellor to the Elector of Mentz, who was extremely deſirous, that ſome perſon ſhould undertake to give a methodical body of the law of nature, and had in vain applied himſelf for this purpoſe to ſeveral learned men, particularly Boecler, Conringius, and Rachelius, thought him capable of ſo noble a work, and engaged him in it. This produced his famous book De Jure Naturæ & Gentium, of which we ſhall ſpeak below. II. Joannis Meurſii Miſcellanea Laconica, ſive variarum Antiquitatum Laconicorum Libri IV. primum editi cura Samuelis Pufendorfii. Amſterdam 1661 in 4to. III. Joannis Laurembergii Græcia Antiqua, cum tabulis Geographicis, edente Samuele Pufendorf. Amſterdam 1661 in 4to. IV. Severini de Mozambano de Statu Imperii Germanici Liber unus. Geneva 1667 in 12mo. Pufendorf dedicated this book to his brother, whom he ſtyles here Lælio Signor de Trezolani. It was reprinted with ſome remarks Eleutheropoli 1668 in 12mo. Cum Notis & Stricturis Pacifici à Lapide [Philippi Andreæ Oldenburgeri.] Acceſſit Samuelis Pufendorfii Diſquiſitio de Republicâ irregulari ad Severini de Mozambano Caput IV. de formâ Imperii, 1671 and 1682 in 8vo. Auctior, & Exercitationum ſpecimine illuſtratus ab Ulrico Obrechto, 1684 in 8vo. Cum Præfatione Jacobi Pauli Gundlingii. Berlin 1706 in 8vo. Ex Autographo Auctoris recognitus, cum prioribus Editionibus collatus, ac ſetectis variorum Notis illuſtratus: curante D. Gottliel Gerhard Titio. Leipſic 1708 in 8vo. It was tranſlated into High Dutch, and printed in 1715 in 8vo. An Engliſh tranſlation by Mr. Edmund Bohun was printed at London 1696 in 8vo. It was publiſhed in French at Amſterdam 1696 in 12mo. under this title: *L'Etat de l'Empire d'*Allemagne, traduit da Latin de Mozambane, per François Savinien d'Alquié. This tranſlation is a very bad one; to have ſucceeded in it, the tranſlator ought to have been better acquainted with the affairs of Germany. Pufendorf ſent in 1666 the manuſcript of this work to his brother, Iſaac Pufendorf, then Embaſſador from the Court of Sweden to that of France, in order that it might be printed in that Kingdom. The latter offered it for that purpoſe to a bookſeller, who gave it to Mezeray to peruſe. Mezeray thought it worth publiſhing, but refuſed to give his approbation, becauſe he found in it ſome paſſages oppoſite to the intereſts of France and others, in which the Prieſts and Monks were treated with great ſeverity. This engaged Iſaac Pufendorf to ſend the book to Geneva, where it was printed. The Author, who foreſaw, that it would make a great deal of noiſe, would not put his name to it, which did not appear except in the latter editions. It met with great oppoſition; it was condemned, prohibited, and ſeized in many parts of Germany; and ſeveral learned Civilians immediately wrote againſt it, either expreſsly, or occaſionally; as particularly the following. Martin Schoockius in his Exercitationes XII. quibus Severini de Monzambano ad modum promulſidis, Tractatus de ſtatu Imperii Germanici diſcutitur, & quædam Chreſtino, plura obelo notantur. Cis Veronam 1668 in 12mo. He deſigned to have written a larger work upon this ſubject, but was prevented by death. Philip Andrew Oldenberger in his Notæ & Strictura, publiſhed under the name of Pacificus & Lapide. Utopia 1668 in 8vo. and added to ſome editions of Pufendorf's books. John Lewis Praſchius in his Literæ ſecretiores Monzambani ad Lælium Fratrem, de Germanâ Imperii Germanici formâ, 1668 in 12mo. Charles Scharſchmidius in his book entitled, Syſtema Juris Publici Romano Germanici, & Diſquiſitio de Republicâ Monſtruosâ, contra Severinum de Monzambano ejuſque Aſſeclas. Francfort 1677 in 8vo. John George Kulpis in his Commentationes Academicæ in Severinum de Monzambano de Statu Imperii Germanici. Stutgard 1682 in 8vo. V. De Jure Naturæ & Gentium Libri VIII. Lundini Scanorum 1672 in 4to. This edition is the moſt correct. Secunda Editio auctior & emendatior. Francfort on the Mein 1684 in 4to. This edition is enlarged above a quarter. Reprinted at Amſterdam 1688 in 4to. Cum Annotatis Johannis Nicolai Hertii Juriſconſulti. Francfort on the Mein 1706 in 4to. Amſterdam 1715 in 4to. Francfort on the Mein 1716 in 4to. This edition is probably the ſame with that of 1706, with a new title page. Hertius's notes are likewiſe inſerted in the edition of Amſterdam. Mr. Barbeyrac in his advertiſement before the ſecond edition of his French tranſlation of this work, tells us, that Hertius ſeems to have wrote theſe notes in haſte, in order to gratify the bookſeller, who was deſirous of recommending his edition by ſomething wanting in the former; and that they are very erroneous. The French tranſlation was publiſhed under this title: Le Droit de la Nature & des Gens, ou Syſtême general des Principes les out a blind attachment to all its notions, contributed greatly to perfect his natural talents, and to give him a juſt and clear method of reaſoning. Though he uſed his utmoſt efforts to diſtinguiſh himſelf by his ſkill in the law, he neglected thoſe pompous titles, which are ſo much ſought for at the Univerſities, and are often a very equivocal characteriſtic of abilities and learning; and would never take the Degree of Doctor. He returned to Leipſic in 1658 with a view to ſeek for an employment fit for him. One of his brothers, whoſe name was Iſaiah, and who had been for ſome time in the ſervice of the King of Sweden, whoſe Chancellor he afterwards was in the Duchies of Bremen and Werden, and by whom he was employed in the management of his affairs at ſeveral of the principal Courts of Europe, wrote to him then, adviſing him to follow his example, and not to fix in his own country, but to ſeek his fortune elſewhere. Pufendorf reſolved to take this advice, and accepted the place of Governor to the ſon of Monſieur Coyet, a Swediſh Nobleman, who was then Embaſſador of the King of Sweden at the Court of Denmark. For this purpoſe he went to Copenhagen; but he did not continue long at eaſe there, for the war being renewed ſome time after between Denmark and Sweden, he was ſeized with the whole family of the Embaſſador, who a few days before had taken a tour into Sweden. During his confinement, which laſted for eight months, as he had no books, and was allowed to ſee no perſon, he amuſed himſelf by meditating upon plus importans de la Morale, de Juriſprudence, & de la Politique traduit du Latin de M. le Baron de Pufendorf, par Jean Barbeyrac, avec des Notes du Traducteur, & une Preface, qui ſert d'inſtruction à tout l'ouvrage. Amſterdam 1706 in 4to. two tomes. The ſecond Edition reviſed and conſiderably enlarged, was printed at Amſterdam 1712 in 4to. two tomes This tranſlation is preferable to the original on account of the corrections, which the tranſlator has made in it, and the learned notes which he has added to it. It was tranſlated into High Dutch, and printed with the notes of John Nicholas Hertius, John Barbeyrac, and others, at Francfort on the Mein in 1711 in 4to. Mr. Barbeyrac ſays, that the editor of this tranſlation promiſes in the title page much more than he performs, ſince he has inſerted but a few of his notes, and thoſe the ſhorteſt, contenting himſelf with referring to the original French for thoſe, which are longer. It was tranſlated into Engliſh by Dr. Baſil Kennet, and others, and printed in 1708. This work has met with a very general approbation; it is indeed a body of the law of nature well digeſted, and preferable to Grotius's book de Jure Belli & Pacis, ſince the ſame ſubjects are treated with more extent and order. However, there has been a great number of critics, againſt whom Pufendorf was obliged to defend himſelf, which he did with ſucceſs. The firſt, who attacked him, was Nicholas Beckman, his Collegue in the Univerſity of Lunden. It is ſaid that he mixed a great deal of paſſion in his criticiſm, in which a Lutheran Profeſſor of the ſame Univerſity, named Joſua Schwartz, had likewiſe an hand.

This Writer, in order to give the greater weight to his objections, endeavours to draw the Divines into his party, by bringing religion into the diſpute, and accuſing our Author of Heterodoxy. He attempted by this means to exaſperate the Clergy of Sweden againſt Pufendorf; but the Senators of that Kingdom prevented this, and injoined his enemies ſilence, by ſuppreſſing by the King's authority, Beckman's book, which notwithſtanding was afterwards printed at Gieſſen, under this title, Index Novitatum quarundam, quas Dn. Samuel Pufendorf, Libro ſuo de Jure Naturæ & Gentium, contra orthodoxa fundamenta, Lundini edidit. This piece being brought into Sweden, was burnt there in April 1675, by the hands of the common Executioner, and Beckman, the Author, baniſhed from all the Dominions of the King of Sweden, for having diſobeyed the orders given him, by publiſhing it. Jealouſy had occaſioned him to write this; but revenge made him write others, the very titles of which are ſufficient to ſhew his temper. He publiſhed at firſt under the fictitious name of Veridicus Conſtantius, a very ſatyrical piece, which was followed by ſome others, and among the reſt one under this long title: Nicolai Beckmanni legitima Defenſio contra Magiſtri Samuelis Pufendorfii execrabiles fictitias calumnias, quibus illum contra omnem veritatem & juſtitiam ut carnatus diabolus, & ſingularis mendaciorum artifex per fictitia ſua entia moralia (Diabolica puto) toti honeſto ac erudito orbi malitioſè exponere voluit. Naturalis ſive Brutalis & Gentilis Pufendorfii ſpiritus uſq; adeo enormiter ſe exerit & perverſè opinatur, ut nec Diabolum nec infernum nec vitam æternam dari impiè credat; & dum omnem actionem humanam ſtatuat eſſe indifferentem, boni ac mali nec præmium nec pœnam futuram: hic tamen pro ſatyrico ſuo ingenio firmiter credit, ſi viris honeſtis & proximo ſuo audacter & malitioſè calumnietur, quod ſemper aliquid fœcis ſive mendacii in animis legentium hæreat. Impreſſum anno 1677. He was not content with attacking Pufendorf with his pen, but he likewiſe challenged him to fight a duel, and wrote to him from Copenhagen for that purpoſe, threatening, that if he did not meet him at the place appointed, to purſue him wherever he ſhould go. Pufendorf took no notice of this letter, but without writing an anſwer, ſent it to the Conſiſtory of the Univerſity, which proceeded againſt Beckman. However he thought it neceſſary to publiſh ſomething in anſwer to the ſatyrical pieces of that Writer, which he did in the following books. VI. Apologia pro ſe & ſuo Libro, adverſus Authorem Libelli famoſi, cui Titulus, Index Novitatum, &c. 1674, in 8vo. VII. Epiſtola ad amicos ſuos per Germaniam ſuper Libello famoſo, quem Nicolaus Beckmannus quondam Profeſſor in Academiâ Carolinâ, nunc verò cum infamiâ inde relegatus, mentito nomine Veridici Conſtantii ſuperiori anno diſſeminavit, 1678, in 8vo. VIII. Petri Dunæi in Academiâ Carolinâ Pedelli ſecundarii Epiſtola ad virum famoſiſſimum, Nicolaum Beckmannum, totius Germaniæ convitiatorem & calumniatorem longè impudentiſſimum, ſuper noviſſimis ipſius ſcriptis. Holmiæ 1678, in 8vo. This piece, which was written by our Author, is intirely ſatyrical and perſonal. IX. Joannis Rolletti, Palatini, diſcuſſio Calumniarum, quas abſurdiſſimas de illuſtri viro Samuele Pufendorfio, relegatus è Sueciâ nequam Nicolaus Beckmannus per cauſam defendendæ ſuæ famæ non ita pridem in vulgus ſparſit. Manheim 1678, in 8vo. In this piece Pufendorf concealed himſelf under the name of Rollettus. Though Joſua Schwartz had an hand in the Index Novitatum, &c. publiſhed at firſt againſt Pufendorf, the King of Sweden pardoned him, after he had declared that he had no intention, that the book ſhould be printed, as it had been by Beckman, without his knowledge. But there happened afterwards an incident, which obliged him to leave the Dominions of that Prince. In the war between Sweden and Denmark, the Danes having made themſelves maſters of the city of Lunden, inſiſted upon the inhabitants taking an oath of fidelity to the King of Denmark. Schwartz not only ſubmitted to this, but likewiſe uſed his utmoſt efforts to perſuade others to follow his example. But when peace was ſettled between the two Crowns, and Lunden reſtored to the King of Sweden, he ſaw, that he could not continue any longer in ſafety in that country, and therefore retired into Denmark, where he was taken into the King's ſervice, and was appointed ſuper-intendant of the Duchy of Sleſwick. Being now at liberty to revenge himſelf upon Pufendorf for what he had ſaid of him in his Apology, he publiſhed againſt him, under the name of Severin Wildſchutz, his ſon-in-law, a violent piece, entitled, Severini Wildſchutz, Malmogienſis Scani, Diſcuſſio Calumniarum à Samuele Pufendorfio, in upon what he had read in Grotius's Treatiſe De Jure Belli & Pacis, and the political writings of Hobbes. He drew up a ſhort ſyſtem of what he thought beſt in them; he turned and unravelled the ſubject in his own way; he treated of points, which had not been touched by theſe Authors; and added to the whole ſome new thoughts, which occurred to him. His deſign in this was only to divert himſelf in his ſolitude, but two years after he went to Holland, where a friend of his having read this eſſay adviſed him to reviſe it, and publiſh it; which he did at the Hague in 1660 under the title of Elementa Juriſprudentiæ Univerſalis. The Elector Palatine, Charles Lewis, to whom he had dedicated it, not only wrote him immediately a letter of thanks dated September the the 29th the ſame year, but invited him the year following to the Univerſity of Heidelberg, to which he was deſirous to reſtore its former luſtre, and founded in his favour a Profeſſorſhip of the Law of Nature and Nations, which was the firſt that was eſtabliſhed in Germany, though many ſince have been erected in imitation of it. Beſides this the Elector afterwards engaged him to beſtow ſome of his leiſure hours upon the inſtruction of the Electoral Prince, his ſon, who had likewiſe other maſters employed in his education. Pufendorf remained at Heidelberg till 1670, when the King of Sweden Charles XI. having founded an Univerſity at Lunden in the Province of Schonen, ſent for him to be Profeſſor there. The Elector Palatine was extremely ſorry to loſe him; but would not oblige him to continue with him, and conſented, that he ſhould accept of a more lucrative and advantageous poſt, which was offered him in Sweden. He went thither the ſame year, and was inſtalled in the place of Profeſſor of the Law of Nature and Nations, with a ſtipend in Apologiâ Indicis Errorum ſuorum Venerabili univiro impoſitarum. Sleſwigæ 1687, in 4to. Pufendorf anſwered under the name of the ſame Schwartz, in the following letter. X. Joſuæ Schwartzii Diſſertatio Epiſtolica ad eximium unum Juvenem Severinum Wildſchyſſium, privignum ſuum. Hamburg 1688, in 4to. This piece is intirely ironical, and the ſtyle like that of the Epiſtolæ obſcurorum virorum; as is alſo that of the following, of which Pufendorf was likewiſe the Author. XI. Juriſconſulti Nicolai Beckmanni ad V. C. Severinum Wildſchutz Malmogienſem Scanum, Epiſtola, in quâ ipſi cordicitus gratulatur de devicto & triumphato Pufendorfio. Hamburg 1688. Our Author's book met likewiſe with oppoſition in Germany. The Univerſity of Germany condemned it in 1673, upon the mere repreſentation of Beckman's Index; and this condemnation engaged Pufendorf to write the following letter. XII. Epiſtola ad plurimum Reverendum atque celeb. Virum Dn. Johannem Adamum Scherzerum, Theologum apud Lipſienſes primarium ſuper Cenſurâ quapiam in Librum ſuum iniquè latâ. Harderwick 1673. This letter had not ſo great an effect as the book itſelf; for when it was brought to Leipſic, and examined with care, it was found immediately, that they had been impoſed upon by the accuſations of his adverſary, and the prejudices conceived againſt it vaniſhed by degrees. XIII. Eris Scandica, quâ adverſus Libros de Jure naturali & Gentium objecta diluuntur. Francfort on the Mein, 1686, in 4to. This is a collection of ſeveral pieces, ſome of which had been printed ſeparately. The principal, which is the ninth, is entitled, S. Pufendorfii ſpecimen controverſirum circa Jus naturale ipſi motarum. In this he anſwers the objections and difficulties, which ſeveral Proteſtant Divines had urged to him with relation to ſome paſſages of his book. There is prefixed to this collection, Julii Rondini Diſſertatio Epiſtolica ſuper controverſiis, quæ S. P. cum quibuſdam aliis circa Jus naturale interceſſerunt. This piece was written by Pufendorf himſelf, though diſguiſed under the name of Rondinus. XIV. Joannis Rolleti Scharenſchmidus vapulans. Stralſund 1678, in 8vo, pagg. 32. This piece, in which Pufendorf aſſumed the name of Rolletus, is deſigned to refute what Scharenſchmid, a Licentiate of Law at Leipſic, had written againſt his treatiſe de ſtatu Imperii Germanici, in his Diſquiſitio de Republicâ Monſtroſâ contra Monzambanum. XV. Commentatio ſuper invenuſto Veneris Lipſicæ ovo, Val. Alberti calumniis & ineptiis oppoſita. 1687. This was written againſt Alberti, whoſe ſyſtem of the foundation of the Law of Nature he had attacked in his Eris Scandica, and who had written an anſwer to him, entitled, Eros Lipſicus, quo Eris Scandica Samuelis Pufendorfii cum convitiis & erroribus ſuis maſculè, modeſtè tamen repellitur; ſcriptus ad Ill. V. Vitum-Ludovicum à Seckendorf, adjectis prioribus Apologiis contra eundem Pufendorfium, & nonnullis Diſputationibus ejuſdem aut ſimilis argumenti. Leipſic 1687.

Theſe are all the polemical Writings of Pufendorf, which do not deſerve the ſame regard with his other works, ſince they are full of perſonalities, and diſcuſſions of very little importance to the publick. XVI. De officio Hominis & Civis juxta legem naturalem Libri duo. Lunden 1673, in 8vo, Stockholm 1689, in 12mo. This edition is full of faults. Francfort on the Mein 1714, in 8vo. Supplementis & Obſervationibus in Academiæ Juventutis uſum auxit & illuſtravit Gerſchovius, Edinburg 1724, in 8vo. Tranſlated into French under this title: Les Devoirs de l'Homme & du Citoyen, tels qu' ils lui ſont preſcrits par la Loy naturelle: traduits du Latin par Jean Barbeyrac, avec quelques Notes du Traducteur. Amſterdam 1707, in 8vo. Luxembourg 1708, in 8vo. This edition is very incorrect, and printed on bad paper. The third edition was printed at Amſterdam 1715, in 8vo. The fourth edition reviſed, and enlarged, with a great number of notes, and ſome other pieces, was printed at Amſterdam 1718, in 8vo, two tomes. This is a very clear and methodical abridgment, made by our Author himſelf of the great work De Jure Naturæ & Gentium. Andrew Adam Hochſtetter, Profeſſor of Divinity at Tubing, has publiſhed notes upon this abridgment, under the title of Collegium Pufendorfianum, ſuper Libris duobus de Officio Hominis & Civis, XII. Exercitationibus inſtitutum. Tubing 1710, in 4to. Theſe notes are ſhort, and add but very little to the text; but there is a great multitude of quotations at the end of every article. There is another abridgment by an unknown Author of Pufendorf's large work, digeſted into queſtions and anſwers, and publiſhed under this title; Compendium Juriſprudentiæ univerſalis ex Sam. Pufendorfii præcellenti Opere de Jure Naturæ & Gentium, in privatum uſum quorundam Juvenum excerptum. Francfort 1694, in 12mo. XVII. Diſſertationes Academicæ ſelectiores. Lunden 1675, in 8vo. Upſal 1677, in 8vo. Accedit Caroli Scharenſchmidii Diſquiſitio de Republicâ Monſtroſâ, ejuſque defenſio contra Monzambanum & Pufendorfium. Francfort 1678, in 12mo. Reprinted under this title, Analecta Politica, quibus multæ raræ graviſſimæque hujus Diſciplinæ Quæſtiones variis diſſertationibus explicantur & enodantur. Amſterdam 1698 in 8vo. XVIII. Hiſtorical and political deſcription of the ſpiritual Monarchy of the Pope, in High Dutch. Hamburg 1679 in 12mo. pagg. 258. Tranſlated into Low Dutch with the remarks of Chriſtian Thomaſius, by J. le Long. Amſterdam 1724 in 8vo. Tranſlated into Latin, and printed at Francfort 1688 in 8vo. at the end of the Latin tranſlation of his Introduction to Hiſtory. Pufendorf publiſhed this book under the name of Baſilius Hypereta, and afterwards inſerted it with ſome alterations in his Introduction to Hiſtory, of which it makes the twelfth chapter of the firſt part. There was publiſhed ſome years after a Treatiſe of the ſame nature and in the ſame language, under the title of Theodoſii Gibellini Cæſaro-Papa. Francfort 1684 in 8vo, the Author of ſtipend more conſiderable than thoſe of the other Profeſſors. His reputation greatly increaſed after that time, both by the fame and ſucceſs of his Lectures, and the works, which he publiſhed. Some years after the King of Sweden ſent for him to Stockholm, and made him his Hiſtoriographer, and one of his Counſellors. In 1688 the Elector of Brandenburg obtained the conſent of the King of Sweden, that he ſhould come to Berlin, in order to write the Hiſtory of the Elector William the Great, and granted him the ſame titles of Hiſtoriographer and Privy Counſellor, which he had in Sweden, with a conſiderable penſion. However, the King of Sweden ſtill continued to ſhew him marks of his eſteem, and in 1694 made him a Baron. But he did not long enjoy this title; for he died of an inflammation in one of his feet, occaſioned by cutting his nails, on the 26th of October the ſame year, aged ſixty three years.

PUTEANUS

of which is not known, though ſome aſcribe it to Iſaiah Pufendorf. XIX. Introduction to the Hiſtory of the principal States, at preſent in Europe. In High Dutch. Francfort on the Mein 1682 in 8vo. Pufendorf wrote this introduction for ſome Gentlemen, who ſtudied privately under him, without any deſign of publiſhing it. But finding it handed about in manuſcript, and that it was going to be printed, and was already tranſlated into the Swediſh language, he thought proper to publiſh it himſelf in High Dutch, juſt as it was, that is, not in ſo perfect a ſtate as he could have given it. The fourth edition of this book in High Dutch was made in 1699. XX. Continuation of the Introduction to Hiſtory, &c. in which is an account of Sweden. In High Dutch. Francfort on the Mein 1686 in 8vo. As our Author wrote in Sweden, and for the Swedes, he is more ample upon the Hiſtory of that Kingdom than upon that of others. XXI. Addition to the Continuation of the Introduction to Hiſtory, &c. in Anſwer to Varillas. In High Dutch. Francfort on the Mein 1687 in 8vo. Pufendorf in this addition, which is ſhort, attacks Varillas upon what he had ſaid in his Revolutions concerning the reformation in Sweden, and takes notice of 91 errors in his account. Our Author's Introduction to Hiſtory was tranſlated into French by Claude Rouxel, and printed in that language at Utrecht in 1687 and 1688 in four volumes in 16°. and afterwards at Amſterdam in 1710 in 16°. and at Leyden the ſame year in four volumes in 12mo. Though the title page aſſures us, that this tranſlation was made from the High Dutch original, it is certain, that it was done only from the Low Dutch verſion; but this did not prevent it, any more than the meanneſs of the tranſlator's ſtyle, and the puerilities, which he frequently makes his Author guilty of, from having a vaſt ſale. The title page of the Leyden edition of 1701 aſſures us, that it was corrected; but this whole correction conſiſts merely in the change of ſome words of no conſequence, without rectifying the groſs abſurdities. There has been ſince publiſhed a new edition more perfect, under this title: Introduction à l'Hiſtoire generale & politique de l'Univers, où l'on voit l'origine, les revelations, l'Etat preſent & les interets des Souverains par M. le Baron de Pufendorf. Nouvelle edition, où l'on a continuè tous les anciens chapitres juſqu' à preſent, & ajoûtè l'Hiſtoire des principaux Souverains de l'Italie, de l'Allemange: &c. le tout dans un ordre plus naturel. Avec des Notes Hiſtoriques, Geographiques, & Critiques, & des Cartes. Amſterdam, (i. e. Trevoux) 1722 in ſeven tomes in 12mo. The Editor not having leiſure to make a new tranſlation, only corrected that of Rouxel, comparing it with the High Dutch original, and mending the ſtyle. There is a Latin tranſlation of his work by Mr. Cramer, printed at Francfort 1688 in 8vo. and at Utrecht 1692 and 1703 in 8vo. In the two firſt editions there is no account of Sweden, but in the third of 1703 Cramer has given an abſtract of what Pufendorf wrote in the ſecond part of his work. There is likewiſe a Low Dutch tranſlation by Simon de Vries, printed in 1684, and an Engliſh one at London 1706. XXII. Georgii Caſtriotæ, Schanderbegi vulgo dicti, Hiſtoria compendio tradita. Stadæ 1684 in 12mo. Our Author wrote this Hiſtory at the command of Charles Lewis, Elector Palatine, and John Philip, Elector of Mentz. XXIII. Commentariorum de rebus Suecicis Libri XXVI. ab Expeditione Guſtavi Adolphi Regis in Germaniam, ad abdicationem uſque Chriſtianæ. Utrecht 1686 in folio.

Pufendorf having applied himſelf to read over the publick papers kept in the Archives of Sweden, with a deſign to write the Hiſtory of Charles Guſtavus, according to the orders, which he had received from Charles IX. thought proper to begin with that of Guſtavus Adolphus, and to continue it down to the abdication of Queen Chriſtina; and this he has executed in the preſent work, which is very curious and exact. XXIV. De Habitu Religionis Chriſtianæ ad Vitam Civilem Liber ſingularis. Accedunt Animadverſiones ad aliqua loca è Politicâ Adriani Houtuyn Juriſconſulti Batavi. Bremen 1687 in 4to. and 1692 in 12mo. In this book he endeavours to ſettle the juſt limits between the eccleſiaſtical and civil Powers. XXV. Epiſtolæ duæ ſuper Cenſura in Ephemeridibus Eruditorum Pariſienſium, & Bibliothecâ Univerſali de quibuſdam ſuorum ſcriptorum locis lata, ad Vir. Cl. L. Andream Rechenbergium. Leipſic 1688 in 4to. pag. 14. Pufendorf in this piece defends himſelf with great modeſty from the errors imputed to him in the Journal des Savans and the Bibliotheque Univerſelle. XXVI. Epiſtola ad Fratrem Eſaiam Pufendorfium ſuper Theologiâ in formam demonſtrationis redigendâ. This letter, which is dated February the 24th 1681. is printed in the ſecond volume of the Supplement to the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic. XXVII. Jus Feciale divinum, ſive de conſenſu & diſſenſu Proteſtantium Exercitatio poſthuma. Lubeck 1695 in 8vo. pagg. 384. In this book our Author propoſes a ſcheme for a reunion of religions. It appears from the zeal, with which he recommended, before his death, the printing of it, that it was his favourite work. XXVIII. De rebus geſtis Friderici Willelmi Magni, Electoris Brandenburgici, Commentariorum Libri XIX. Berlin 1695 two volumes in folio. This Hiſtory, which is highly eſteemed, is extracted from the Archives of the Houſe of Brandenburg. The impreſſion was almoſt finiſhed, when it was thought proper to retrench ſeveral paſſages; and it is rare to meet with any copies, in which thoſe paſſages are preſerved. XXIX. De Rebus à Carolo Guſtavo Sueciæ Rege geſtis Commentariorum Libri ſeptem. Nuremberg 1696 in folio, in two volumes with cuts. A French tranſlation was printed at Nuremberg 1698 in two volumes in folio with cuts. Theſe cuts, which repreſent the ſieges and battles, are very numerous and well engraved, but defective in this reſpect, that they are the mere reſult of the imagination, and have no manner of relation to the Author's narration. XXX. Epiſtolæ Amœbææ Sam. Pufendorfii & Joan. Groningii de Commerciis pacatorum ad Belligerantes. Inſerted in the collection of John Groningius, entitled, Bibliotheca univerſalis Librorum Juridicorum. Hamburg 1703 in 8vo. XXXI. Diſſertatio de Fœderibus inter Sueciam & Galliam. Hague 1708 in 8vo. Tranſlated into French, and printed at the Hague 1709 in 8vo. XXXII. Prodromus Juſtitiæ Palatinæ in causâ Wildfangiatus. Item Epiſtola ad Amicum in eadem cauſâ. Inſerted in the Diarum Europæum. Some perſons have affirmed, that the notes printed under the name of Athanaſius Vincentius, on the Polygamia Triumphatrix, were written by Pufendorf. Perhaps the title of Lunden in Schonen, in that book, where he then was Profeſſor, gave occaſion to ſuſpect him for the Author. But theſe notes are full of a kind of learning ſo remote from the ſtudies, which he profeſſed, that he wants no apology in this point. Beſides, he was then too much employed in his great Hiſtory of Sweden, when that book was publiſhed, that is in 1682, to think of ſuch a work, which could not be done without very elaborate ſearches.

T.

PUTEANUS (ERYCIUS), Author of an immenſe number of books [A], was born at Venlo in Gelderland, November the 4th 1574. He began his ſtudies at Dort, whence he removed to Cologne, where he ſtudied rhetoric, and went through a courſe of philoſophy in the College of the Jeſuits. He went afterwards to ſtudy the Law at Louvain, and took his degree of Bachelor there in June 1597. He improved very much by Lipſius's Lectures, who conceived a great eſteem and friendſhip for him. In the year 1597 he went into Italy, and continued ſome time in the houſe of John Fernand de Velaſcos Governor of the Milaneze: from thence he removed to Padua and lodged at the celebrated Pinelli's (a). He left him in the year 1601 being choſen Profeſſor of eloquence at Milan. He gained a great reputation in that employment, ſo that he was promoted to the honourable poſt of Hiſtoriographer to his Catholick Majeſty, and in the year 1603 the city of Rome aggregated him and his poſterity among her patricians. He commenced Doctor of Law at Milan, more rituque majorum (b). He took alſo a wife (c) in the year 1604, and got many children by her. He commends her and his children very much in his letters [B]. In the year 1606 he removed to Louvain, being appointed to ſucceed to the Profeſſor's Chair which Juſtus Lipſius had filled with ſo much glory. He was very much conſidered in the Low Countries, and enjoyed the titles of Hiſtoriographer to the King of Spain, and Counſellor to the Arch-Duke Albert. He was even appointed Governor of the Caſtle of Louvain (d). He died in the year 1646 [C], and was buried in a Chapel, in which no man had yet been interred. It was the Chapel of St. Charles Borromeo in St. Peter's Church at Louvain (e). He was a man of merit and learning, and had a great literary correſpondence [D]. He affected

(a) Moreri ſuppoſes erroneouſly, that Pinelli lived at Milan.

(b) That is to ſay, with the ancient ceremonies.

(c) Her name was Mary Magdalen Catharine de la Tour, Turriana.

(d) Extracted from Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belgica, p. 206, 207.

(e) Vita Erycii Puteani, in limine Epiſtolar. Poſthumar.

[A] Author of an immenſe number of books.] See the catalogue of them in Valerius Andreas's Bibliotheque, and in Ghilini's Theatre; but it is more complete in Witte's Memoirs (1). Moſt of them are ſmall works, and no man ſeemed ever more perſuaded than he of the maxim of a Greek Poet, that a great book is always a great evil (2). It is an eaſy matter for a man to multiply his publick productions, when he ſends to the preſs all that he writes. Our Puteanus laboured under that diſtemper: he has publiſhed even the very teſtimonials which he gave to his ſcholars (3). Monſieur Colomiés has mentioned a particular, which cannot be placed any where better than here. "Voſſius "has told me, that Moretus, a celebrated Printer at "Antwerp, blaming once Erycius Puteanus, who "had ſucceeded Lipſius, for publiſhing only ſmall "pamphlets, Puteanus anſwered that Plutarch, and "ſeveral other ancient Authors, had done the ſame. "To which Moretus replied, do you think, that "your books, which I cannot ſell, are as good as "Plutarch's? This put Puteanus into a paſſion, ſo "that he went out of Moretus's ſhop (4)." See Monſieur Baillet, in the 1ſt volume of his Jugemens des Savans, chap. 10. ſection de la petiteſſe des Livres, (of the ſmallneſs of books.) Read alſo theſe words from the 2d volume (5): It is certain that this Puteanus paſſed for a Prattler, and for a great Writer of pamphlets: but he was otherwiſe a very learned man.

(1) Witte, Memoriæ Philoſophorum, p. 567, & ſeq.

(2) See Monſ. le Fevre, in his Vie des Poet. Grecs, p. 141, 142. He aſcribes that thought to Callimachus. Here follow that Poet's words, as they are quoted by Athenæus, in the beginning of his 3d book. Τὸ μέγα βιβλίον ἴσον ἔλεγεν εἶναι τῷ μεγάλῳ κακῷ. i. e. "He uſed "to ſay, that a "great book "was like a "great evil."

(3) See the pamphlet, entitled, Erycii Puteani Martyremata Academica, ſive doctrinæ & probitatis teſtimonia. It was printed at Leiden, in the year 1618.

(4) Colomiés, Opuſcules, p. 124, 125. edit. of Utrecht, 1669.

(5) Art. 229 of the Critiques Hiſtoriques.

[B] He commends her and his children very much.] There is nothing more agreeable than a good wife, did he write to one of his friends; I ſpeak of it by experience, mine appears always young and beautiful to me, and though ſhe has often had children, yet ſhe has ſtill preſerved the charms of her face. Illa mihi ſemper juvencula, ſemper pulchra; quia & ætatis florem, & formæ decus, toties jam puerpera ſervat. Imò illa mihi bona eſt, & qualem ex Apiculâ naſci Simonides voluit. Opportunè hic igitur illud Theognidis uſurpem:

Οὐδὲν Κύρν' ἀγαθῆς γλυκιρώτιρόν ἰστι γυναικὸς.
Μάρτυς ἐγὼ, σὺ δέ μοι γίγνε ἀληθοσύνης.

Vin' & Latinè dicam?

Nil uxore bona, Cyrne, eſt jucundius: hujus
Cum tibi ſim teſtis, tu mihi teſtis eris (6).

(6) Eryc. Puteanus, Epiſt. ſelectarum Apparatu, Epiſt. 10. Cent. 4. p. m. 10.

This is what he wrote in the year 1626: but this did not come up to the whole wiſh of a Roman Poet. Puteanus's wife appeared ſtill young and beautiful to her huſband, but it was becauſe ſhe was ſtill really ſo. But the chief point for a woman is to appear young and handſome, even when ſhe is no longer ſo. Here follows the Poet's wiſh.

Candida perpetuo reſide, Concordia, lecto, Tamque pari ſemper ſit Venus æqua jugo.
Diligat illa ſenem quondam: ſed & ipſa marito,
Tunc quoque cum fuerit, non videatur anus (7).

(7) Martial. Epigr. 13. lib. 4.

i. e. "Let concord always dwell in our bed; let pro-"pitious Venus keep up peace and union between us: "let my wife love me ſtill when I ſhall be old, and "let her when old ſtill be young in my eyes."

In another letter (8) written in the year 1617, Puteanus acquaints us, that his wife had born him four ſons and four daughters; and that he had loſt three boys. He ſeems very well pleaſed to have girls, and tells us the reaſons for it (9). He got other boys after that time. His ſon Fauſtus ſerved in the Armies (10), but he did not continue long there, for at the end of two years he entered among the bare-footed Carmelites, to follow in ſome manner the example of his brother John Stephen, who had taken the Jeſuit's habit (11). Puteanus mentions alſo two other ſons of his, the one of whom, named Juſtus, was Secretary to the Archbiſhop of Compſa, Apoſtolick Nuncio; and the other named Maximilian, was ſtudying under his father (12).

(8) It is the 64th of the 1ſt Century, p. 26.

(9) Ibid. p. 27, 28.

(10) See the 28th Letter of the 4th Century. It was wrote in the year 1626.

(11) See the 55th Letter of the ſame Century. It was wrote in the year 1628.

(12) See the ſame Letter.

[C] He died in the year 1646.] Monſieur Bullart does not ſuppoſe this; for he aſſerts, that Puteanus being born the fourth of November 1574, died at the age of threeſcore and ten years, after he had been near forty years Profeſſor of Hiſtory at Louvain (13). This is ſuppoſing plainly that he died in the year 1644. Lorenzo Craſſo (14) is widely miſtaken, when he aſſerts that Puteanus died in the year 1624. He has been miſled, for want of conſidering with due attention, theſe words of Ghilini, L'anno M.DC.XXIV. ſù il Puteani da malattia oppreſſo, percio ſcriſſe queſto Epitaffio da metterſi ſopra la ſua ſepoltura (15). i. e. "In the year "1624, Puteanus was taken ill, and therefore he "wrote this epitaph to be put upon his tomb." It is plain that this ſignifies only that he was ſick, and not that he died that year. Witte (16) places Puteanus's death under the year 1646, the 71ſt of his life, he ſhould have ſaid the 72d. He places it under that ſame year 1646 in the ſummary account he gives us of that Profeſſor's life (17). Valerius Andreas is the Author of that ſummary account, we may therefore depend upon it.

(13) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, tom. 2. p. 220.

(14) Lorenzo Craſſo, Iſtoria di Poet. Greci, p. 193.

(15) Ghilini, Teatro d'huomini Letterati, vol. 2. p. 73.

(16) In Diario Biographico.

(17) In Memoriis Philoſoph. p. 565. Konig, quoting the ſame book does nevertheleſs place Puteanus's death under the year 1644.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have conſulted the life of Puteanus, which is prefixed to his poſthumous letters publiſhed by his ſon-in-law, and I have found there that he died in the Caſtle of Louvain September the 17th 1646.

[D] He had a great literary correſpondence.] This appears from the letters he has publiſhed, and more ſtill from the following paſſage of Monſieur Bullart. Laſtly, it was his learning which raiſed him ſo great a reputation in the moſt conſiderable Courts of Europe, and which made almoſt all the Princes, the learned men, the Embaſſadors of Kings, and the Generals of affected to interſperſe his writings with witty ſtrokes as they are called, and ſucceeded therein ſometimes pretty well; but on many occaſions his wit was not eaſy and natural enough, and conſiſted in quibbles and puns which are a little forced. He publiſhed a work, entitled, Statera belli et pacis, (The balance of peace and war) which made a great noiſe, and was like to have ruined him [E]. And yet it is a work, from which it appears that he was better acquainted with the true intereſt of his Catholick Majeſty than Armies give him proofs of their friendſhip and eſteem in the letters they wrote him, of which above ſixteen thouſand were found in his library all placed in a regular order (18).

(18) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, Tom. 2. p. 220.

The catalogue (19) of all his works divided into five volumes ſhews, that the ſecond contains his letters, that is to ſay, Epiſtolarum Atticarum apparatus, nimirum promulſis. This contains about three hundred letters. Miſſus ſecundi; alſo three hundred. Bellaria, as many. Deliciæ adoptivæ, about a hundred. Epiſtolarum Atticarum centuria ſingularis & nova. Epiſtolarum Atticarum apparatus novus; it contains four hundred letters. Apparatus poſthumus in quatuor centurias diſtributus; four hundred. A collection of letters, which he wrote to Mr. de Zuylichem and to Daniel Heinſius, publiſhed at Leyden by Boxhornius in the year 1647. Add to this the 5th, the 6th, and the 7th century of his poſthumous letters publiſhed at Louvain in the year 1662 by the care of his ſon-in-law, Xiſtus Anthony Milſer (20), who had alſo cauſed the four former centuries to be printed in the ſame city and the ſame year. See Monſieur de Vigneul-Marville (21).

(19) Prefixed to his Poſthumous Letters, printed at Louvain, in the year 1662.

(20) He was Knight of the Order of Chriſt, and Governor of the Caſtle of Louvain.

(21) In the 2d vol. of his Melanges, p. 368, of the edit. printed at Rotterdam.

[E] He publiſhed a work, entitled, Statera belli & pacis, which . . . . was like to have ruined him.] That book was printed whilſt there was a truce negotiating between his Catholick Majeſty and the United Provinces in the year 1633. The Author adviſed to conclude a Peace, and ſhewed that the continuation of the war would be very detrimental to the Spaniſh Low Countries. He ſpoke with too much freedom of the advantages which the enemies had already got, and of the victories which they might ſtill expect to gain. Voſſius, his good friend, and the moſt peaceful man in the world, I mean, the moſt remote from the character of certain Writers, who in order to encourage the people to continue the war, lay before them the moſt artful deſcriptions of the people's own ſtrength, and of the enemy's weakneſs; Voſſius, I ſay, was very ſorry that Puteanus had brought himſelf into trouble by publiſhing a work of quite another kind (22). His diebus haud lætus accepi, optimum, & diſertiſſimum virum Erycium Puteanum, in periculum, aut certè moleſtias aliquas incidiſſe. Scripſit ſtateram Belli, & Pacis, quo nonnullis de partium ſuarum impotentia prolatis, complures offendit. Noſti faſtum Hiſpanorum, & Principum aures, quorum nec hæ, neque illi veritatem accipere ſuſtinent. Itaque niſi noſſem multos ei in aula Bruxellenſi, quò vocatus eſt, amicos eſſe, niſi quoque ingenium, & eruditionem illius æſtimari ſcirem, ſiniſtri aliquid vererer. Nunc optima non omnino deſpero. Utinam non aliud audire cogatur, quam quod olim in ſimili ferè negotio, à Phalaride ajunt fuiſſe dictum Simonidi (23), Μέλουν σοὶ Μουσῶν ἰυκλέϊς πόνος. i. e. "I have lately heard with grief, that "Erycius Puteanus, that beſt and moſt eloquent of "men, has brought himſelf into danger, or at leaſt "into ſome trouble. He has publiſhed the balance "of peace and war, wherein he has obſerved ſome"thing concerning the weakneſs of his own party, "which has given offence to many perſons. You "know the pride of the Spaniards, and the tickliſh "ears of Princes, neither of whom are able to bear "the truth. So that if I did not know that he has "many friends at the Court of Bruſſels, whither he "is ſummoned to appear, and if I were not ſenſible "that his wit and learning are very much eſteemed, "I ſhould fear the worſt; but now I hope the beſt. "Would to God! he were obliged to hear only "what Phalaris is reported to have ſaid to Steſichorus, "on an occaſion pretty much like this: Mind only "the Muſes, your labours will be glorious enough." Voſſius acquainted a Phyſician of Dort with his uneaſineſs, who anſwered him that Puteanus had done imprudently, and that in Holland ſuch a fault would not be pardoned (24). De Cl. Puteano quod ſcribis, valdè me percuſſit, quamvis tale quid metuerem, cùm legiſſem ſtateram, doctè magis, quam prudenter ſcriptam. Accepi ab eo literas, ſtatera jam edita, quam tamen præter morem ſuum non miſit. Eam Catzius Haga (ubi impreſſam (25) quoque noſti, nec hoc noſtro melius) ex conventu ordinum, ubi cum plauſu excepta, attulit, & mihi legendam tradidit. Deus bone! quàm bonus ille Belga, tam malus Politicus. Non hic ferremus, qui talia de nobis, quæ ille de Rege, de importuna Archid. legatione, & ſimilia. Ac niſi amici omnia pro illo, eſt quod metuamus vicem optimi, & elegantiſſimi ingenii. i. e. "What "you wrote to me concerning the celebrated Putea"nus has made me very uneaſy, though I feared "ſomething like it, when I read his Balance, which "is wrote with more learning than prudence. I "have received a letter from him when his Balance "was publiſhed, which yet he has not ſent to me, "as he uſed to do his other works. Catz, coming "from the aſſembly of the States, where it was re"ceived with great applauſe, has brought it to me "from the Hague (where you know it was printed, "for which our friend will not fare the better) Catz, "I ſay, gave it me to read. Good God! how good "a Dutchman he is, but how bad a Politician? We "would not ſuffer here a man, who ſhould write "ſuch things of us, as he does of the King of Spain, "of the Arch-Duke's unſeaſonable Embaſſy, &c. "And if his friends do not exert themſelves for him, "we have juſt reaſons to dread that good and inge"nious man's fate." Beverwyck adds, that Puteanus was ſummoned to appear at Bruſſels, that they were to continue to examine him, that the Preſident Roſe had declared againſt him, but that other conſiderable perſons protected him, and that it was hoped their protection would ſave him. The Reader will no doubt be glad to find here the names of thoſe Protectors, for this is a part of our Puteanus's hiſtory. Ob amicos quos plurimos habet, nihil illi periculi fore putabat. Sibi addictiſſimum habet, Varambonum Archiepiſcopum Ceſarienſem Infanti à ſacris, Chiffletium Medicum, qui plurimùm apud Ser. Inf. poſſunt, & alios, ſed infeſtum Roſam Præſidem Hiſpanis obnoxium, & paci ut dicitur, adverſum, qui etiam cauſa eſſe putatur, cur decem jam menſibus, nullæ ex Hiſp. literæ ad ιρηνοποιὸς. Infans quoque Cardinalis, qui jam in Burgundia, non minùs quàm Eugenia, illi benè volunt. Deum rogo, & benè faciant, neque ob παῤῥησίαν hanc gravius animadvertant, in virum candoris melle penitus imbutum. i. e. "It is "thought he will be in no danger, conſidering the "many friends he has. Varambonus, Archbiſhop of "Saragoſſa, and Almoner to the Infante, is his Pro"tector, as well as Chifflet the Phyſician, and they "have both great credit with the Infante; he has "alſo ſome other Friends. But the Preſident Roſe, "who is attached to Spain, is his enemy: it is "thought he is againſt the peace, and that it is owing "to him that the Plenipotentiaries have received no "letters from Spain theſe ten months. Even the Cardi"nal Infante, who is now in Burgundy, and Eugenia, "are in Puteanus's intereſt. God grant that they "may ſerve him effectually, and that they do not "puniſh too ſeverely that moſt meek of all men for "his liberty of ſpeaking." This affair ended according to that Phyſician's wiſhes. We muſt not forget to obſerve, that an anonymous Author wrote againſt this work of Puteanus. His anſwer was entitled, Anti-Puteanus, ſive Politico-Catholicus ſtateram Puteani inducias expendentis alia ſtatera expendens (26). I have by me a little book (27), which contains the Statera of Puteanus, the Anſwer of the anonymous Writer, and two Letters, in which we meet with the opinion of a Dutchman, concerning that Anſwer. The Author of theſe Letters ſuſpects that the anonymous Writer is a Clergy-man (28), and even a Monk (29), and he ridicules him for aſſerting that there is neither courage nor prudence to be met with any where

(22) Voſſius, Epiſt. 199. p. m. 218. That Letter is dated in the month of July 1633.

(23) He ought to have ſaid Steſichoro.

(24) Joh. Beverwyckius, Epiſt. ad Voſſium. It is the 172d. p. m. 111, 112. It is dated July the 8th, 1633.

(25) This was not the firſt edit. for it was firſt printed in the Spaniſh Low-Countries, in 4to.

(26) See Monſ. Baillet's Anti, num. 158.

(27) Printed Coſmopoli, apud Batavum patriæ libertatis & pacis amantiſſimum, for a Dutchman, a great lover of peace, and of the liberty of his country.

(28) Impenſe cavet, ne alius eſſe videatur quam ex ſacrorum ordine. Barlæus, Epiſt. 214. p. 458. Tom. 1.

(29) Videtur cucullus galeam induiſſe, aut galeæ cucullum, ita amice conjurant, & ex eodem ore jam Theologo jam milite digna audis. Idem, Epiſt. 213. p. 451.

than they who applied themſelves only and entirely to ſtate affairs. They aſcribed falſely to him a ſatyr againſt King James [F]. It is aſſerted that he did the King of Poland a very great ſervice (f). They who have a mind to ſee the commendations, which many learned men have beſtowed upon him, and the honours which ſome Princes have done where but in the Catholick Church (30); that the treaſury of Holland was almoſt exhauſted; that the States made the people groan under their high taxes; that their troops were cowards; that they received more prejudice than profit from their victories; that the King of Spain could very conveniently ſpare the towns he had loſt; that the Dutch owed their conqueſts to treaſon, and had bought them at a much higher price than they were worth. He will tell us very ſoon, ſays his Cenſurer to him, that it is for the King of Spain's intereſt, that our troops ſhould go and encamp in the very heart of Brabant, for the land will become more fruitful by the dung, which our horſes will leave there. Nec minus ridiculus eſt, cum tributis & exactionibus ſupra quam fas eſt Batavos premi queritur, qui iſtos cenſus ſe Dominis ſuis debere, & felicitatis ſuæ ac fortunarum non niſi ſpicilegium eſſe credunt. . . . . Verum enimvero, quam lepide fatuus eſt hic ſcriptor, cum milites Federatorum timidos lepores vocat, cum Batavos pugnam ſemper declinare ſcribit: victorias nobis magis nocuiſſe, quam profuiſſe. Illane ſcribere non veretur poſt cladem Turnhautanam & Flandricam? An & tunc Henrici Belgii culpa terga vertit Hiſpanus? Et quando quæſo Regi Hiſpaniarum ac ſuis perſuadebit, Sylvam Ducis, Veſaliam, Venloam, Ruræmundam, Trajectum ad Moſam, expugnata ad Scaldim & alibi caſtella, victam Bercam nobis nocere? Regem vero ſuo commodo iis carere? quia non ſine magnis impenſis ea vicimus. Dicet propediem, utile eſſe Brabantis, exercitus noſtros in ipſo pene Brabantiæ meditullio ſtare & in hoſtico ali, ut ab equorum multitudine ſtercorati agri uberiorem ſegetem ferant (31). The Author of this Cenſure is known long ago (32) to be Barlæus. I have got another little book (33), which beſide the Stratera belli & pacis, and the Anti-Puteanus, contains a political diſſertation of Puteanus de Induciis Belgicis (of the truce with Holland) and a Letter of Lipſius, with remarks on that Letter (34), and ſome other little pieces. Lipſius's Letter was wrote from Louvain, January the 3d, 1595, to a great Lord, who had aſked him, Bellumne an potius Induciæ expediant Regi Hiſpaniarum cum Gallo, Anglo, Batavo. i. e. "Whether it were better for the King of Spain to have "peace or war with the French, the Engliſh, and the "Dutch." It abounds with malice againſt Holland, and with political maxims, which are very ſubtle and refined. The Author of the Remarks refuted (35) effectually, and called himſelf Juſtinus Bonæfidius Mont. He abuſed Lipſius. See (36) the complaint the Jeſuit Petra Sancta makes of it..

(f) See the rem. [H].

The event has proved that Puteanus was in the right. For if the King of Spain had concluded either a peace or a truce with the United Provinces in the year 1633, he would have avoided many vexations and many loſſes, and Spain would be perhaps at this time in a more flouriſhing condition. I do not pretend to excuſe that Profeſſor; he had done much better to keep within the bounds of his profeſſion: prudence will not ſuffer us to publiſh all ſorts of truths: but we muſt not imagine, that the Dutch learnt any thing new from this book; they were perfectly well acquainted with the bad condition, in which the Spaniſh Low-Countries were. This is the firſt thing, which Politicians inquire into with regard to the enemy, and the people generally believe much more than there really is; they think the enemy in a worſe condition than he is. However it be, that Profeſſor did not ſufficiently conſider Salluſt's words, which he prefixed to his book, and which ſhewed him ſo evidently the reaſons why it is dangerous to give advice to Princes. They have other perſons enough to conſult; futurity is unknown even to the wiſeſt heads; and bad counſels are very often attended with good ſucceſs: ſo true it is, that fortune orders all things according to her own fancy. It is Salluſt who argues thus. Scio ego, ſays he (37), quam difficile atque aſperum factu ſit, conſilium dare regi, aut imperatori; poſtremo cuiquam mortali, cuius opes in excelſo ſunt: quippe cum & illis conſultorum copiæ adſint; neque de futuro quiſquam ſatis callidus, ſatiſque prudens ſit. Quinetiam ſæpe prava magis, quam bona conſilia proſperè eveniunt: quia pleraſque res fortuna ex lubidine ſua agitat. Men repent a thouſand times to have followed the advice of wiſe and prudent perſons, becauſe there happen many things, which make them judge, that if they had gone another way to work, they would have performed great matters. They with whom others have to deal, commit ſome faults, of which they were thought uncapable. A prudent Counſellor does not depend on ſuch faults: he diſſuades therefore from thoſe undertakings, which a raſh inconſiderate man adviſes: and it happens, that thoſe unforeſeen faults, or ſome other events, would have rendered the ſucceſs of the undertaking infallible if it had been attempted. The ſafeſt way is, not to ſet up for a Counſellor in publick affairs. Salluſt underſtood the reaſons of it perfectly well.

(30) In Principe Auriaco nec fortitudinem, nec prudentiam agnoſcit, hac fretus ratione, quia Catholicus non eſt. Audi verba: ad num. 90. In ſola Eccleſia Catholica vera eſt fortitudo & prudentia. Idem, ibid. p. 453.

(31) Idem, ibid. p. 454.

(32) Theſe two Letters are the 213th and the 214th of Barlæus's Letters.

(33) Printed at Leyden, ex officina Elzeviriorum, 1633, in 12mo.

(34) Notæ ſeu Stricturæ Politicæ ad Juſti Lipſii Epiſtolam.

(35) That Letter of Lipſius had already been refuted in the year 1618, by John Gael, an Advocate at the Hague.

(36) In the rem. [C] of the art. LIPSIUS.

(37) Salluſtius, Orat. 2. ad Cæſarem de Republica ordinanda, init. p. m. 527.

[F] He aſcribed falſely to him a ſatyr againſt King James.] Here follows the title of it. Iſ. Caſauboni Corona Regia, id eſt, Panegyrici cujuſdam vere aurei, quem Jacobo I. Magnæ Britanniæ, &c. Regi, fidei defenſori, delinearat, Fragmenta ab Euphormione inter ſchedas τῦ μακαρίτυ inventa, collecta, et in lucem edita 1615, pro officina regia Jo. Bill Londini. i. e. "Iſaac Caſau"bon's Royal Crown; that is to ſay, ſome frag"ments of a certain excellent panegyrick, which he "drew up for James I. of Great Britain, &c. "King, Defender of the Faith; which fragments "were found among the deceaſed's papers, collected "together and publiſhed by Euphormion in the year "1615, printed at London by Jo. Bill, at the King's "Printing-houſe." Mr. Almeloveen lent me that book (38) in the year 1693. It was then very ſcarce; but Monſieur Thomaſius has cauſed it to be reprinted ſince that time in his Hiſtoria Sapientiæ et Stultitiæ humanæ, (i. e. The Hiſtory of human Wiſdom and Folly.) There never was any thing more ſatyrical than that piece: the moſt wicked Princes were never more abuſed by the moſt ſlanderous Writers, than the good King James is by the terrible Scioppius, for it cannot be queſtioned but he is the Author of that outrageous piece. We ſhall now quote a Writer, who acquaints us that Puteanus cleared himſelf publickly from being the Author of it. Non potuit ſatyricorum manus effugere Jacobus Britanniæ Rex, utut doctiſſimus & laudatiſſimus Princeps: cui ſub ſpecie Panegyrici Poſtumi à Caſaubono ſcripti, cujus quaſi fragmenta inter ſchedas ejus reperta, per inſignem nequitiam, continuo myſteriſmo horrenda flagitia objiciuntur. Lepide alioquin ſcriptus liber eſt; cui titulus, Caſauboni Corona Regia, &c. . . . . Refertur in Georgii Richteri vitâ Epiſtolis ejus præfixâ, pag. 21. è Colloquio cum Erycio Puteano accepiſſe Richterum, quod Puteanus ejus libelli autor habitus fuerit: cujus rei verò famam ille innixè declinans velut Apologiæ loco ſcriptum quoddam exhibuerit, cui nomen, Perjurium RUFFI & GIBBOSI, præfatus, quo delatorum ſuorum virulentiæ ac ſiniſteritati ſatis fuiſſe obviatum exiſtimaverit (39). i. e. "James, King "of Great Britain, though a moſt learned and com"mendable Prince, could not eſcape the ſtrokes of "ſatyrical Writers. He is charged with the moſt "horrid crimes in a libel, publiſhed under the name "of Caſaubon, as though it were a panegyrick, the "fragments of which were found among that great "man's papers after his death: but it is a continual "and wicked irony, though wrote wittily enough; "it is entitled, Caſaubon's Royal Crown, &c. . . . . "It is related in George Richterus's life, prefixed "to his letters, that Erycius Puteanus told him in "converſation, that he (Puteanus) was thought to be "the Author of that libel; and as he was willing "to avoid that imputation as much as lay in his "power, he publiſhed a pamphlet by way of apology, "which is entitled the Perjury of Ruffus and Gibbo"ſus, (or of the red-haired and crump-ſhouldered fel"low) whereby he thought he had ſufficiently re"futed the virulency and malice of his accuſers." Theſe words of Morhof have not been well underſtood

(38) It is in 12mo, and contains 127 pages.

(39) Morhofius, Polyhiſt. lib. 1. cap. 8. p. 78.

done him, may read Pope Blount's Cenſura, &c. [G], and Bullart's Academy [H] (g). One of the moſt conſiderable friends he had at Milan was Secretary of the Council, and named John Baptiſt Saccus. I ſhall give ſome account of the manner in which Puteanus educated a young girl [I], for whom that friend was concerned. As ſhe was an Italian ſtood by the Author, who gave an extract from his book. " One may alſo put in the ſame rank thoſe " ſatyrs, which are levelled againſt the reputation " of the moſt virtuous men : ſuch is that, which is " entitled, Caſauboni Corona Regia, &c. which was " without any ground aſcribed to Monſieur du Puy, " and in which James I. King of England is charg- " ed with enormous crimes ; of which Monſieur du " Puy has cleared him ſufficiently in his Perjurium " Ruffi et Gibboſi (40)." There are two miſtakes in that paſſage. I. The Author of the extract imagined, no doubt, that Erycius Puteanus is the celebrated Peter du Puy, whoſe life Monſieur Rigault has written. When an Author, who is ſpeaking of books and of learned men, mentions Monſieur du Puy without any addition, he muſt be underſtood to mean Peter du Puy, the King of France's Library-keeper, that admirable man, who with his worthy brother afforded ſo much help to the men of letters, and who held ſo many learned conferences. II. It is not true, that the Author, whom Morhof mentions, cleared King James of the erroneous crimes which are imputed to him in that ſatyr ; he did only clear himſelf of being the Author of that wicked libel, and expoſed the malicious envy of his accuſers. Let us tranſcribe a very curious paſſage. They aſcribe alſo to John Barclay a moſt bitter ſatyr againſt James I. King of Great Britain, entitled, Corona Regia, in which, under the ſpecious title of a Panegyriſt, he expoſes the adminiſtration of Henry VIII. the extraction and celibacy of Queen Elizabeth, and above all, the birth and actions of King James, whom he defames in a diſcourſe as witty as it is abuſive and outragious, All men being curious to read that libel, it was diſperſed throughout all Europe, and King James ſeeing himſelf repreſented therein in ſo odious a light, perſuaded his Allies to make ſtrict inquiries about the Author of it, that he might be puniſhed. Erycius Puteanus, Profeſſor of Eloquence in the Univerſity of Louvain, being ſuſpected, the Archduke Albert cauſed him to be examined, but he was found innocent (41).

(g) See alſo Baillet, Jugement ſur les Critiques Gramm. num. 503.

(40) Bibl. Univerſelle, Tom. 13. p. 23.

(41) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, Tom. 1. p. 198.

[G] Pope Blount's Cenſura.] But you muſt omit theſe words, Inter præcipua Galliæ ornamenta, dum viveret, merito ſuo ſemper habitus eſt Erycius Puteanus (42). i. e. " Erycius Puteanus had ſo much merit, that during " his life-time, he was always reckoned one of the " greateſt ornaments of France." Theſe words are quoted from Caſaubon's Preface to the Hiſtory of the Emperors : but in the firſt place, our Puteanus was not a French-man. Secondly, he was not much known, when Caſaubon publiſhed that book (43). Thirdly, he lived above forty years after that book was printed.

(42) Pope Blount, Cenſura Authorum, p. 689. edit. Londin. 1690.

(43) It was printed at Paris in the year 1603.

[H] . . . . . and Bullart's Academy.] Where you will meet with this paſſage. " (44) It was that " great learning, which having won the heart of Ur- " ban VIII. determined that great Pope to ſend him " his picture in a gold Medal which was very hea- " vy, with ſome copies of his works : it was that ſame " learning, which engaged Cardinal Frederick Borro- " meo to receive him into his Palace, when he re- " turned to Milan, and to preſent him with thoſe " precious relicks of his Uncle St. Charles Borromeo, " which that learned man has given to the Collegiate " Church of St. Peter at Louvain. It was alſo his " learning, which made him be tenderly beloved by " the Count de Fuentes, Governor of Milan, and " afterwards by the Archduke Albert, who having " promoted him to Juſtus Leipſius's Chair, admitted " him alſo moſt honourably into the number of his " Counſellors. Finally, it was that learning, which " made him be conſidered and eſteemed in the chief " Courts of Europe (45). . . . . He had the glory to " ſave the King of Poland's life, by explaining an " enigmatical writing, drawn up in unknown cha- " racters, which no man could read nor underſtand, " and which contained the ſcheme of an abominable " conſpiracy againſt that Prince."

(44) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, Tom. 2. p. 220.

(45) What I omit here is to be found in the rem. [D].

Concerning this laſt particular, we meet in his Life prefixed to his poſthumous Letters with the following paſſage ; Ejus ingenio ac ſolertia conjurationem Polonicam detectam & ſic impeditam fuiſſe tanti momenti fuit, ut omne præmium ſuperarit. Verba Patris HERMANNI HUGONIS qui Marchioni SPINOLÆ à ſacris confeſſionibus erat, æſtimanda hic ſunt : mea cautio erit, ut REX POLONIÆ ſciat, cui ſalutem debeat ſuam ut PHARAONIS liberalitatem imitetur in JOSEPHUM, aut ASSUERI gratitudinem in MARDOCHÆUM. POLONIA quidem recepit hoc ab illo beneficium, ſed in univerſum orbem Chriſtianum extenſum eſt, quod quale quantumque ſit BOHEMIA & turbæ inde natæ ſatis declararunt (46). i. e. " By his wit and penetration, the " conſpiracy in Poland was diſcovered, and diſap- " pointed ; and this was ſo conſiderable a ſervice, " that it could never be ſufficiently rewarded. Let " us conſider here the expreſſions of Father Herman " Hugo, Confeſſor to the Marquiſs of Spinola. I " ſhall take care, ſays he, to let the King of Poland " know to whom he is indebted for his life, that he may " imitate Pharaoh's generoſity towards Joſeph, or Aha- " ſuerus's gratitude towards Mordecai. Poland has " indeed received that benefit from him, but the ef- " fects of it extend over the whole Chriſtian world ; " what and how great it was, appears ſufficiently " from what happened in Bohemia, and from the " troubles which aroſe from thence."

(46) Vita Erycii Puteani, in limine, Epiſt. poſthum.

[I] The manner, in which Puteanus educated a young girl.] He wrote to his friend, that he did not ſuffer her to be kiſſed. This, ſaid he, is dangerous for Italian Ladies ; our Flemiſh Ladies may ſuffer it without any danger : they do not think there is any harm in it ; they do not find there is any amorous lecture in a young man's ogles, nor in the application of his lips to theirs : but the maidens of your country know the conſequences of all this : and therefore I have made this girl learn the language of our country, and our cuſtoms, excepting only that of kiſſing. If I ſhould not tranſcribe that Author's own words, the Reader might think that I add ſomething to them ; I ſhall therefore tranſcribe them, that it may appear I do rather weaken and enervate his thought. De puella veſtra quid ſcribam ? valet, viget, jam matura viro, jam plenis nubilis annis. Mores & linguam quoque noſtram diſcit, tamen oſcula non libat. Sic eam habeo, uti educata eſt. Scis tu ; ut confringi vas citò Samium ſolet. Pudica quidem Belgarum oſcula, ſed tamen oſcula : & inſinuentur multò honeſtius, quam figantur. Abhorrere illa ab hoc ritu debet, & ſi pudicitiæ alumna eſſe velit, illæſum uſque quoque verecundiæ florem ſervare. Neſciunt noſtræ virgines ullum libidinis rudimentum oculis aut oſculis ineſſe, ideoque fruuntur. Veſtræ ſciunt. Si noſtra eſſe hæc quoque incipiet, particeps candoris noſtri erit, & caſtæ immunitatis capax (47). i. e. " What ſhall I write " of your young maiden ? She is healthy, ſtrong, " ripe, fit to be married. She learnt our language " and our cuſtoms, but yet ſhe does not kiſs. I con- " tinue to educate her, as ſhe was educated at firſt. " You know, that a veſſel made at Samos is eaſily " broken. The Flemiſh women's kiſſes are modeſt " indeed, but yet they are kiſſes. It is more honeſt " juſt to touch the lips, than to preſs them cloſe. She " muſt abhor that cuſtom, if ſhe has a mind to keep " herſelf chaſte and modeſt. Our virgins do not " know that there is any inticement to luſt in the " eyes or in kiſſes ; but yours know it very well. If " ſhe begins once to be perfectly of the ſame tem- " per with our country-women, ſhe will then partake " of our plainneſs, and be capable to enjoy the " ſame honeſt liberty." Kempius quotes this whole paſſage in his learned and curious compilation de Oſculis (concerning kiſſes), and refers us to a Profeſſor of Philoſophy in the Univerſity of Leyden. That Profeſſor, treating of Temperance, one of the four Cardinal Virtues, propoſes this queſtion among others. Is the cuſtom, which ſuffers ſtrangers in the Low-Countries, and in other places, to kiſs other men's wives, widows, and maidens, when they make them ceremonious viſits, agreeable to the rules of Chaſtity (48) ? He anſwers, that that cuſtom is of very old ſtanding, but that

(47) Erycius Puteanus, Epiſt. ad Joh. Baptiſtam Saccum, apud Martinum Kempium, Diſſertat. 16. de Oſculis, num. 6. p. 626.

(48) Quæritur tertio, An cum legibus caſtitatis, quæ temperantiæ eſt ſpecies, bene conveniat recepta illa apud noſtrates Belgas, aliaſque nationes, conſuetudo, qua peregrini oſcula figunt alienis uxoribus, viduis, ac virginibus, quando eas humanitatis cauſa ſalutant ? Adrianus Heereboord, Exercitat. Ethic. 46. p. m. 173.

Italian, he would not ſuffer her to imitate ſome cuſtoms of the Flemiſh Ladies, which he that ſeveral ancient ſages have condemned it, thinking it little conſiſtent with chaſtity. He quotes Socrates, who would have men abſtain from it abſolutely, nothing being more proper to ſtir up the fire of love than kiſſes. He quotes Seneca as aſſerting, that a virgin was charged with impudence becauſe ſhe had received a kiſs (49). He aſſerts that the ancients were perſuaded, that a kiſs caſts a blemiſh on a virgin's chaſtity (50), and proves it by the words of Ovid;

Oſcula qui ſumpſit, ſi non & cætera ſumpſit,
Hæc quoque quæ data ſunt perdere dignus erat.

i. e. "He who took a kiſs, and did not alſo take "the reſt, deſerved to loſe even that, which was "granted him." His concluſion or deciſion is, that kiſſes of compliment or ceremony are not inconſiſtent with chaſtity, ſince they may very well be given without any wicked deſire: and that we are not to imagine that all men or women are ſo eaſily inflamed, as not to be able to give or to receive a kiſs of men civilly without any detriment to their chaſtity. Neque exiſtimandum eſt, omnium eſſe tam pronam & irritabilem ad libidines naturam, quin citra violationem coſtitatis, ac circa libidinem ullam, id genus mediorum, officii teſtandi cauſa, adhiberi poſſit (51). This deciſion, and the reaſon on which it is grounded, are very judicious and unqueſtionable. But can there be any thing leſs judicious than the quotation from Ovid? For that Poet's words relate only to the kiſſes of lovers. That Profeſſor is very much to blame for quoting them upon ſuch a ſubject: he ought to have left out of his Theſis all that ſhew of learning, which he has ſtuffed it with, and ſhould have confined himſelf, like Puteanus, to the difference of the climates. The ſame liberties which are dangerous in Italy, are not ſo, or are leſs ſo in the Northern Countries; this was no doubt the meaning of the Profeſſor of Louvain. For we ought not to imagine that he meant a farewel-kiſs, or thoſe kiſſes that are given on the return from a long voyage. It is not at all probable, that in ſuch a caſe he would forbid his Italian virgin to follow the cuſtom. There were other occaſions enough in which he could preſcribe a particular behaviour to her, and in which ſhe might experience, according to the natural ſkill of the women of her own nation (52), what Horace obſerves (53).

The Profeſſor of Leyden has not exaggerated what he relates of Socrates. Socrates apud Xenophontem abſtinendum eſſe in totum ab iſta oſculandi conſuetudine cenſet: quia nihil, inquit, ad amorem incendendum acrius eſt oſculo (54): for that ancient Philoſopher has expreſſed himſelf upon that ſubject in the ſtrongeſt manner he could chooſe. Critobulus, ſaid he (55), is more raſh, than if he were to throw himſelf headlong upon the points of naked ſwords, or to run into the fire, for he has been ſo bold as to kiſs a beautiful face. Is there ſo great a raſhneſs in this, replied Xenophon. "Truly, "I could eaſily, I think, expoſe myſelf to the ſame "danger. Oh! thou wretched man, anſwered Socrates, doſt thou conſider what happens to thee after "thou haſt kiſſed a handſome face? Doſt not thou "loſe thy liberty? Doſt not thou become a mere "ſlave? Doſt not thou expoſe thyſelf to make exorbitant expences, in order to enjoy pernicious pleaſures? Doſt not thou put thyſelf under an incapacity to do good? Doſt not thou perceive ſomething that forces thee to apply thyſelf intirely to "the purſuit of ſuch things, as thou wouldſt deſpiſe "if thy reaſon were not corrupted? Good God, "ſaid Xenophon, this is aſcribing a ſtrange influence "to a mere kiſs! And doſt thou wonder at it, replied Seneca? Doſt not thou ſee ſmall ſpiders, "whoſe bite is ſo venomous, that it cauſes the greateſt anguiſh, and even turns men's brains? I know "it very well, ſaid Xenophon, but theſe little animals caſt a venom as they bite. And doſt thou "think, O fool, added Seneca, that amorous kiſſes "are not poiſon, becauſe thou doſt not ſee their poiſon? Let me tell thee, that a beautiful woman is "a more dangerous animal than even ſcorpions; "for theſe cannot hurt us, but when they touch us; "but beauty ſtrikes us, without coming near us; "from whatſoever diſtance we can behold it, it caſts "its poiſon upon us, and turns our brains. It is "perhaps for that reaſon, that Cupids are repreſented "with bows and arrows, becauſe a beautiful face "wounds from afar. I adviſe thee therefore, Xenophon, to fly away, without looking behind thee, "the moment thou perceiveſt an handſome woman. "And as for thee, Critobulus, I think it were proper thou ſhouldſt keep out of the way for an "whole year; that time will not be too long to cure "thy wound." Can there be a moral precept more becoming a great Philoſopher, than this is? Our honeſt Caſuiſts would not think it too ſevere, and would find no exaggeration in Socrates's compariſons (56). The maxims of an ancient Roman were not leſs ſevere. He had a freed-man, whom he loved very much, and a daughter who began to be marriageable. He came to know that his freed-man had kiſſed her, and puniſhed him ſeverely for it: though that fault were attended with ſome favourable circumſtances, which rendered it excuſable: but he did not mind this, nor the friendſhip he had for the guilty man; he conſidered only the conſequences of the puniſhment. We are not told whether or not he contented himſelf with the uſual puniſhment inflicted for a kiſs, and which was whipping (57): it is probable that the puniſhment he inflicted on his freed-man was more ſevere: but however it be, we know that his chief motive was to make his daughter ſenſible, that even with regard to mere kiſſes, ſhe was to preſerve herſelf a pure virgin for the huſband ſhe was to marry, and keep even in that reſpect her firſt bloom for him. Valerius Maximus had expreſſed himſelf very well upon that ſubject: let us hear him. Quid P. Mænius? quam ſeverum pudicitiæ cuſtodem egit! In libertum namque gratum admodum ſibi animadvertit, quia eum nubilis jam ætatis filiæ ſuæ oſculum dediſſe cognoverat, cùm præſertim non libidine, ſed errore lapſus videri poſſet. Cæterùm amaritudine pœnæ, teneris adhuc puellæ ſenſibus, caſtitatis diſciplinam ingenerari magni æſtimavit. Eique tam triſti exemplo præcepit, ut non ſolum virginitatem illibatam, ſed etiam oſcula ad virum ſincera perferret (58). Penelope would not have judged this a too ſevere morality. See the remark [L] of her article. We have mentioned (49) a Lady of Florence who acted from that principle, and according to a law which ſuppoſed the ſame maxim (60). That law is now out of date in France, but it has not yet been abrogated at Naples. One half of the bridegroom's ſettlement, who dies before the marriage be conſummated, goes to the bride, if ſhe has granted him a kiſs, but otherwiſe they allow her nothing. Is not this hinting that ſhe has no longer the ſame firſt favours to grant as ſhe had before (61), and that ſhe ought therefore to be indemnified? Theſe are maxims, which many other nations are entirely unacquainted with, who judge quite otherwiſe of things, and do not ſet ſo high a price on kiſſes. Let us quote the Author of the Saint-Evremoniana. A kiſs, which in Turkey, Italy, and Spain, is the firſt ſtep to adultery, is nothing at Paris but a mere piece of civility: and if that pretty Perſian, who made ſo many myſterious journeys, in order to kiſs three times the handſome Cyrus, had lived at Paris, he would not have ſet ſo high a value on the pleaſure he had. Men make no viſits, but they give kiſſes; but theſe are like pieces of money, one makes them go for what one pleaſes: and as kiſſes are a commodity which coſts nothing, which does never wear out, and of which there is always a great plenty, none are ſparing of them, and few are fond to receive them (62). What I ſhall now quote from Montaigne is of the ſame kind, for that Author conſidered only the kiſſes given out of mere civility; but as what he obſerves acquaints us with the cuſtom of his time, I may add it to the paſſage from the Saint-Evremoniana. "The ſcarcity of "any meat makes it palatable. See how the manner of ſaluting, which is peculiar to our nation, "leſſens the pleaſure of kiſſing, by making it too "common: whereas according to Socrates, kiſſes "are extremely powerful, and dangerous to ſteal away our

(49) Apud ſapientiſſimum Senecam, Virginis Sacerdotem (he ſhould have ſaid Sacerdotium) petentis, inde arguitur impudentia (it ſhould be impudicitia) quod oſculo ſalutata fuiſſet. Idem, ib. i. e. "In the "moſt wiſe Seneca, a virgin, "who had declared herſelf a "candidate for "the Prieſthood, was "taxed with "unchaſteneſs; "becauſe ſhe "had received a "kiſs." But this is not the ſtate of the queſtion. See Seneca, Controv. 2. lib. 1.

(50) Oſculo pudicitiam virginis delibari cenſebant veteres, unde illud Ovidii. Idem, ibid.

(51) Idem, ibid.

(52) Neſciunt noſtræ virgines.. veſtræ ſciunt. See above, quot. (47).

(53) Oſcula quæ Venus quinta parte ſui Nectaris imbuit. Horat. lib. 1. Od. 13. i. e. ".. A kiſs "Which Venus "doth in Nectar "ſteep." Creech.

(54) Heereboord, Exercit. Ethic. 44. p. 173. The ſenſe is given above, between the quotat. (48) and (49).

(55) Xenophon, lib. 1. de Memorab. Socratis. Mr. Bayle quotes Monſ. Charpentier's French tranſlation, p. 57. edit. of Paris 1657, in 12mo.

(56) Confer quæ Achilles Tatius, lib. 2. p. m. 79.

(57) Si alienæ fœminæ oſculum infixum rationis ſit verbere vindicare, nonne qui illud puncto temporis fecerit, incomparabili horarum ſpatio verberatur, & ſuavitas voluptatis exiguæ diuturno dolore punitur? Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. 21. cap. 11.

(58) Val. Maximus, lib. 6. cap. 1. num. 4. p. m. 513.

(59) Above, quotation (1), of the article GUALDRADA.

(60) Above, quotation (1), of the art. MAMILLARIANS.

(61) Quia ex oſculo vir capit gaudium, & ſponſa verecundiam, & quod Sponſus oſculando videtur quaſi cæpiſſe caſtrum. Alii eam aſſignant rationem, quia oſculum eſt actus carnis, & pro medietate eſt quaſi corrupta caro. Kempius, Diſſ. 15. de Oſculis, p. 607.

(62) Saint-Evremoniana, p. 271, of the Dutch edit. 1701.

he thought would not have been dangerous, if ſhe had been born at Louvain.

" our hearts. It is a cuſtom unacceptable, and even " injurious to the Ladies, to be obliged to put out " their lips to any man who has three footmen be- " hind him, how diſagreeable ſoever he may be ;

" Cujus * livida naribus caninis
" Dependet glacies, rigetque barba :
" Centum occurrere malo culilingis.

* Mart. 7.

" Nor do we men get much by it : for as the world " ſtands divided, we muſt kiſs fifty old and ugly " women, if we have a mind to kiſs two or three " who are handſome. And to a weak ſtomach, as " thoſe of my age generally have, one diſagreeable " kiſs over-pays a delicious one (63)." We have ſeen above (64) in a paſſage from Eraſmus, what relates to the cuſtom of England. Let us ſee here what Kornmannus relates with regard to ſome cities in Germany (65). Apud Germanos in multis locis uſitatum vidi Coloniæ Agrippinæ, Tubingæ (66), &c. ubi nefas grande creditur, ſi juvenis ad puellam veniens ipſam non oſculetur, & amplexetur : aſt in aliis locis contrarium obtinet : ſi enim quis apud nos in chorea puellam oſculetur indignata prorumperet. Quam me ? &c. aſt in occulto & ubi nemo videt benè patiuntur, imo per totam noctem non ſemel ferre recuſant : nam poſt factum oſculum nihil reliqui manet, quod cernatur : tantum de abſterſione agitur. i. e. " I have ſeen many places in " Germany, as for inſtance, Cologne, Tubingen, " &c. where it would be looked upon as great " unpoliteneſs for a young man to meet with a " maiden without embracing and kiſſing her : but " a contrary cuſtom prevails in other places : for if " a young man offered with us to kiſs a maiden, ſhe " would fall into a paſſion, and tell him, whom do " you take me for ? &c. But in the dark, and when " nobody ſees them, they ſuffer it very patiently, " nay, they do not refuſe it many times for a whole " night ; for there is nothing to be perceived when " a girl has received a kiſs, and it is only wiping it " off."

(63) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 3. chap. 5. p. m. 371.

(64) Quot. (57), of the article ERASMUS.

(65) Kornmannus, de Linea Amoris, p. m. 189, 190.

(66) Tho. Lanſius, apud Kempium, Diſſert. 16. 624. denies what Kornmannus aſſerts concerning Tubingen.

The obſervation of the Author of the Saint Evremoniana, namely, that in ſome countries a kiſs is looked upon as the firſt ſtep to adultery, would make ſome Commentators quote an hundred paſſages. They would not omit the words of Achilles Tatius, in which kiſſes are called agreeable forerunners, nor thoſe in which kiſſes are ſtyled ſuch powerful intices ments, that it is more to be wondered they were not followed with the whole ſport, than that all the other preludes proved ineffectual (67). Μέχρι τινος ἐπὶ τῶν φιλημάτων ἰσόμεθα, φιλίστη ; καλὰ τὰ προοίμια, προσθῶμεν ἤδη τὶ καὶ ἐρωτικόν. How long, my dear Leucippa, ſhall we do nothing elſe but kiſs ? Theſe are indeed charming forerunners : but let us at laſt do ſomething of what lovers moſt paſſionately deſire (68). Οὐδέν σε ἠρέθισεν εἰς ἀφροδίτην καὶν μίαν, ὁ δέησις, ὁ χρόνος, οὐχ ἡ τῶν σωμάτων συμπλοκή· ἀλλὰ, τὸ πάντων ὑβριστικώτατον, προσαπολόμενος, καταφιλῶν, ὅτως ἀνίεις ὡς ἄλλη γυνή. Nothing could move you to make me taſte the pleaſures of love, not even ſo much as once, neither my prayers, nor the opportunities I gave you, nor my embraces : nay, what is moſt ſhameful ſtill, from my cloſeſt embraces, from my WARMEST KISSES, you part juſt as another woman would do. Theſe words are a woman's complaints. But as to that other obſervation in the Saint-Evremoniana, that kiſſes are a commodity, which never wears out ; ſhall I be ſuffered to make the following Commentary upon it ? A man, who though he never ſtudied a courſe of philoſophy, was very much uſed to enquire into the reaſons of every thing, aſked a Phyſician once, why ſome ſtatues of braſs bore the marks of the kiſſes that had been given them (69), though nothing like it was ever obſerved on the face of the moſt famous Courtezans ? The Phyſician anſwered, that the ſtatues are expoſed for many ages together to the devotion of a prodigious crowd of people, and that beauty laſts but a very little time. That anſwer was not ſatisfactory ; it was replied to it, that the hardneſs of braſs making it laſt the longer was a full compenſation for the ſoftneſs of the ſkin, the rather becauſe reſpectful kiſſes, like thoſe that are given to idols, are very ſlight and ſuperficial, and do not come up to the cloſe and impetuous preſſing of the other kiſſes. The Phyſician was ſenſible of that difference, and alledged another reaſon, which was, that all that friction or preſſure could take away from a ſtatue was loſt for ever ; whereas living bodies do ſoon receive by nouriſhment what they loſe. This ſecond anſwer was judged to be perfectly to the purpoſe. Here are many trifles, will ſome ſevere readers ſay ; but muſt not there be ſome in large volumes like theſe ? Muſt not the reader meet here and there with a reſting-place ? I mean, with ſome things that are neither grave nor ſerious ?

(67) Achilles Tatius, lib. 2. p. 107.

(68) Idem, lib. 5. p. 347.

(69) See above, quotat. (17), of the art. GERGENTI. You may add to it this paſſage from Lucretius, lib. 1. ver. 517. Tum portas propter ahena
Signa manus dextras oſtendunt tenuari
Sæpe ſalutantes tactu, præterque meantum.

To conclude, I muſt obſerve that Puteanus was in the right to educate his young Italian maiden otherwiſe than he would have done a Flemiſh girl. In ſuch things we ought to follow cuſtom : this part of education does not belong to the law of nations, nor to the law of nature : the difference of climates and of prejudices is a better rule. We ſhall ſee in another place (70) what a Profeſſor of Groningen has obſerved in a work, in which he makes a parallel between ſome practices, which the Rigoriſts (71) condemned, and ſome other practices which they tolerated.

(70) In the rem. [M] of the art. SAINTE ALDEGONDE.

(71) Obſerve that this is not the name which is given them among the Proteſtants in Holland ; for they are called there Preciſians, in French Preciſistes.

PYGMALION, King of Cyprus, lived before the Trojan War, if we may credit thoſe who aſſert, that he was the father of Metharme the wife of Cinyras, by whom ſhe got Adonis (a) : for Cinyras reigned in Cyprus when the Greeks waged war againſt the Trojans (b). Some aſſert, that Pygmalion ſucceeded to his father Delus (c), and that he was a Phœnician by Nation (d). A Prieſt who had eat of the fleſh of a ſacrificed victim, and who had made his wife eat of it, was puniſhed for it, and thrown down from a precipice with her (e), by that Prince's command, who nevertheleſs did not ſhew himſelf a very devout man, ſince he loved a ſtatue of Venus criminally [A]. According

(a) Apollodor. lib. 3. p. m. 239.

(b) See the rem. [B] of the art. CINYRAS.

(c) Porphyr. de Abſtin. lib. 4. Hieronym. in Jovinian. lib. 2. cap. 9. apud Bochart. Geogr. Sacræ, parte 2. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. m. 370.

(d) Porphyr. ib. apud Meurſium in Cypro, p. 124.

(e) Porphyr. de Abſtinentia, lib. 4. apud Meurſium in Cypro, p. 126.

[A] He loved a ſtatue of Venus criminally.] Clemens of Alexandria urges this inſtance in order to ſhew to the Heathens the vanity of their Idols. Ὁ Κύπριος, ὁ Πυγμαλίων ἐκεῖνος, ἐλεφαντίνου ἠράσθη ἀγάλματος· τὸ ἄγαλμα Ἀφροδίτης ἦν, καὶ γυμνὴ ἦν, νικᾶται ὁ Κύπριος τῷ σχήματι, καὶ συνέρχεται τῷ ἀγάλματι· καὶ τοῦτο Φιλοστέφανος ἱστορεῖ. Pygmalion the Cyprian was in love with an ivory ſtatue : it was the ſtatue of Venus repreſented quite naked. Pygmalion's heart is moved by the image, and he lyes with it, as Philoſtephanus relates (1). Arnobius has quoted that ſtory to the ſame purpoſe. Perdocent (Dii) aſpernari ſe illa (ſimulacra) in quibus ſpretos ſe ultione in aliqua ſignificare non curant. Philoſtephanus in Cypriacis auctor eſt, Pygmaleonem regem Cypri ſimulachrum Veneris, quod ſanctitatis apud Cyprios & religionis habebatur antiquæ, adamaſſe, ut fœminam, mente, animo, lumine rationis judiciique cæcatis : ſolitumque dementem, tanquam ſi uxoria res eſſet, ſublevato in lectulum numine copularier amplexibus atque ore, reſque alias gerere, libidinis vacuâ imaginatione fruſtrabiles (2). i. e. " The Gods ſhew well enough how " much they deſpiſe thoſe images, ſince they do not " care to teſtify their anger by ſome puniſhment, " when any affront is done to their ſtatues. Phi- " loſtephanus relates in his account of Cyprus, that " Pygmalion, King of that iſland, fell in love with " a ſtatue of Venus, which from antiquity was held " ſacred and religious by the inhabitants of Cyprus : " Pygmalion, I ſay, loved that ſtatue as though it " had been a woman, ſo much was his mind, his " reaſon, and his judgment blinded. Like a mad " man he uſed to take the image into his bed, as if " it

(1) Clem. Alex. Admonit. ad Gentes, p. 38, C.

(2) Arnobius, lib. 6. p. 206.

According to Ovid, who does not ſuppoſe he was King of Cyprus [B], he was ſo ſcandalized to ſee the proſtitution of ſome women in that iſland, and beſides ſo much diſheartened by the defects which are natural to the fair ſex, that he reſolved to live in a perpetual celibacy [C]; but he made a ſtatue of ivory, with which he fell ſo paſſionately in love, that he practiſed towards it all the methods which men are uſed to practiſe in order to win a maiden's heart: he coaxed it, he praiſed it, he made it preſents, and loaded it with jewels: he went farther ſtill; he ſtroked it, he kiſſed it, and lay with it. The high Feſtival of Venus being come, he fell down before the altar of that Goddeſs, and with a trembling voice begged of her to give him a wife like the ſtatue he loved; his intention was to beg that that ſtatue might become his wife, but he did not dare to explain his mind. Venus gueſſed it, and granted him his heart's deſire. He was no ſooner got home, but beginning again to careſs that ivory ſtatue, he perceived it became ſenſible by degrees, and was at laſt a living maiden, who found herſelf in her lover's arms the very moment ſhe ſaw the light. At the end of nine months ſhe was delivered of a boy, who was named Paphus, and who was the father of that Cinyras, who lay with his own daughter, without being aware of it, and got the beautiful Adonis on her (f), as I have obſerved in another place (g). Some miſtake this Pygmalion for him, who is the ſubject of the next article [D].

(f) Extracted from Ovid, book 10. (and not 3, as we read in Charles Stephens, and in Lloyd) of the Metam. chap. 8. ver. 243, & ſeq.

(g) In the articles CINYRAS and MYRRHA.

" it had been his wife, he embraced it, kiſſed it, " and did other things, which could not but have " fruſtrated an imagination, which had been void " of luſt."

[B] Ovid . . . . does not ſuppoſe he was King of Cyprus.] I wonder he did not take more care, that his Readers might not miſtake Pygmalion for a mere Statuary, who got his livelihood by that trade. It is true that by ſtyling him Paphius Heros (3), the hero of Paphos, he hints plainly enough that he was no vulgar man; and it is certain that there are Princes, who know how to draw a picture, or to carve a ſtatue: but after all, it had been better to leave the Reader no room to doubt whether Pygmalion was a King or not. That he was a King, has been teſtified by Apollodorus, and by ſeveral other Authors (4). Add to this, that he was the Founder of the city of Carpaſia, in the iſland of Cyprus (5).

(3) Ovid. Metam. lib. 10. ver. 290.

(4) See the quotations in the text of this art.

(5) Steph. Byzant. in Καρπασια.

[C] He was ſo ſcandalized at . . . . . the proſtitution of ſome women, and . . . . ſo much diſheartened by the defects which are natural to the fair ſex, that he reſolved to live in a perpetual celibacy.] Here I only give the ſenſe of Ovid's words:

Quas quia Pygmalion ævum per crimina agentes
Viderat, offenſus vitiis, quæ plurima menti
Fœmineæ natura dedit, ſine conjuge cælebs
Vivebat, thalamique diu conſorte carebat (6).

(6) Ovid. Metam. lib. 10. ver. 243. p. m. 240.

" Pygmalion loathing their laſcivious life,
" Abhorr'd all woman-kind, but moſt a wife:
" So ſingle choſe to live, and ſhunn'd to wed,
" Well pleas'd to want a conſort of his bed.

DRYDEN.

The Poet had juſt been ſpeaking of the Propætides, whom Venus had prompted to proſtitute themſelves, becauſe they had refuſed to own her a Goddeſs (7).

(7) See the Continuation of my Penſees diverſes, p. 748.

[D] Some miſtake this Pygmalion for him, who is the ſubject of the next article.] Meſſieurs Lloyd, Hofman, and Moreri are of that number, as well as Meurſius; for he applies to Pygmalion King of Cyprus, ſeveral particulars, which belong only to Pygmalion King of Tyre, and brother of Dido. He quotes (8) Lutatius, who in his abridgment of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, has aſſerted, that Pygmalion King of Tyre being offended at the impudence of the Propætides, reſolved never to marry. Pygmalion, continues he, killed Sichæus, Dido's huſband, and being afterwards become King of Cyprus, he choſe Paphos for the ſeat of his Empire, which is the reaſon why Ovid ſtyles him Paphius Heros. He fell in love with the ſtatue of Venus; or, according to others, with a ſtatue he had made himſelf: he got a daughter by it, who was the wife of Cinyras; he puniſhed a Prieſt, who had eat of the fleſh of a victim; he reigned forty-ſeven years, and lived fifty-ſix, as Joſephus aſſerts. It was therefore with regard to his reign, rather than with regard to his life, that Venus preſerved him a long time. It appears from all this, that Meurſius knew but of one Pygmalion (9), and did not obſerve the difference of the times: for if he had done it, he would have ſeen that it was impoſſible the brother of Dido ſhould have been father-in-law to Cinyras, and the ſame with the perſon, to whom he has applied theſe lines of Nonnus,

(8) Meurſius, de Cypro, p. 124.

Οὐκ ἀπὸ Πυγμαλίωνος ἔχεις γένος, ᾧ ποτε Κύπρος
Μηκεδανὴν βιότοιο πολυχρονίοιο περείτην (10).

" You do not deſcend from Pygmalion, to whom " Venus granted a long term of life."

Nonnus ſpeaks there of a Pygmalion, who did not live after the expedition of Bacchus.

I ſhall obſerve occaſionally, that the ſame Meurſius applies to King Cinyras, the Paphius Heros (11), which in Ovid relates only to the Pygmalion, who was in love with a ſtatue, and who was grand-father to Cinyras by the father's ſide. He pretends alſo that he was in love with a ſtatue, which being changed into a maiden, he got by her a ſon called Paphus (12).

(9) Excepting his ſpeaking of a Pygmalion, one of the Kings of Cyprus, whom Ptolemy put to death, as we read in Diodorus Siculus, in his account of the war between the ſucceſſors of Alexander.

(10) Nonnus, Dionyſ. lib. 32. p. m. 813.

(11) Meurſius, de Cypro, p. 106.

(12) Idem, ibid. p. 107.

PYGMALION, King of Tyre, was by his father's laſt will to have reigned together with his wife; but the people beſtowed the ſovereign power upon him alone. His ſiſter, who was very beautiful, and whoſe name was Eliſa, is much better known under the name of Dido. She was married to Sicharbas (a) her uncle by the mother's ſide, who enjoyed the ſecond Dignity in the State, (for he was a Prieſt of Hercules) and was poſſeſſed of immenſe treaſures. Pygmalion, who thirſted after them, put him to death [A], and yet he did not get the prey he longed for: his brother-in-law's treaſures were buried in the ground, and the widow found means to make her eſcape with all thoſe riches, and went and built Carthage. Her brother had a mind to purſue her; but (a) Virgil calls him Sichæus.

[A] Pygmalion . . . . . put him to death.] It was before the altar according to Virgil (1) and Ovid (2). But Euſtathius, upon Dionyſius the Geographer, and Cedrenus, do not ſpeak thus. For Euſtathius aſſerts, that Sichæus was killed by Pygmalion, as he was gone to walk in the fields with him, and Cedrenus relates, that as they were both hunting, and Sichæus was purſuing a wild boar, Pygmalion ſtruck him in the back with a dart, and threw his corps from the top of a precipice; and being returned into his palace, he publiſhed, that Sichæus fell into a precipice, as he was purſuing a wild boar too eagerly (3).

(1) See hereunder, quot. (31).

(2) Occidit in terras conjux mactatus ad aras. Ovid. Epiſt. Didon. Some Criticks will have us read inſtead of in terras, Herculeas, others again infernas. See Meziriac, ſur les Epitres d'Ovide, p. 743, 744.

(3) Meziriac, ſur les Epitres d'Ovide, p. 745.

[B] He

but he was diſſuaded from it by the entreaties of his mother, and by the threatenings that were made him from the Gods (b). He was then in the 7th year of his reign; he died at the age of fifty ſix years, of which he had reigned forty ſeven years (c). They, who are willing to know at what time he lived, may conſider, that according to Joſephus, the city of Carthage was built an hundred and twenty ſix years after the Temple of Solomon (d). We muſt not forget to obſerve that Pygmalion is ſaid to have had another ſiſter named Anna, whom he perſecuted after Dido's death [B]. There has been a controverſy occaſioned by ſome perſons cenſuring the celebrated Author of the Adventures of Telemachus, for repreſenting Pygmalion as a profligate man abandoned to all manner of vices, and particularly to an exceſſive incontinency [C]. It was pretended (b) Ex Juſtino, lib. 18. cap. 4 and 5.

(c) Joſeph. contra Apion. lib. 1. p. 1043.

(d) Joſeph. contra Apion. lib. 1. p. 1043. But obſerve that in his text, which is followed by the Latin Tranſlator, and by Genebrard in his French Tranſlation, there is the number of 143 years and eight months, which does by no means follow from the number of years he aſſigns to the reign of each particular King.

[B] He is ſaid to have had another ſiſter named Anna, whom he perſecuted after Dido's death.] "There are "but few Authors, who mention that ſiſter of Dido. "Virgil, in his 4th Æneis relates, it was ſhe, who "ſeeing that Dido was uncertain whether or not ſhe "ſhould engage in a love intrigue with Æneas, ad-"viſed her to do it without the leaſt ſcruple, for "ſeveral reaſons which ſhe urged to her; and from "that time, ſhe was conſtantly the faithful meſſenger "between theſe two lovers. . . . . Servius obſerves, "that according to Varro . . . . it was not Dido, "but Anna, who being in love with Æneas, killed her-"ſelf on the pile which ſhe had cauſed to be built." Ovid, in the 3d book of his Faſti relates, that when Dido had killed herſelf out of deſpair, ſeeing that Æneas had forſaken her, Iarbas, King of Mauritania, took the city of Carthage by force of arms. Anna made her eſcape by ſea, with a great number of Tyrians, and retired at firſt into the iſle of Malta, where King Battus, who had been her gueſt, received her very kindly, and promiſed to aſſiſt her. But afterwards, dreading the power of Pygmalion, who threatened to make war againſt him, if he did not deliver his ſiſter into his hands, he deſired his gueſt to ſeek for another ſanctuary, if ſhe would not prove the cauſe of his ruin. Anna put to ſea again, dreading above all things her brother's fury, and fearing extremely to fall into his hands. Her ſhip met with a violent ſtorm, and was carried on the coaſt of Italy (4), where Æneas received her very kindly. You may read the reſt of that account in Ovid; it is very curious, but probably a mere fiction of the Poet. And after all, his authority is not ſufficient to perſuade us, that Pygmalion would perſecute his ſiſter Anna.

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 760.

[C] Some perſons have cenſured the celebrated Author of the Adventures of Telemachus, for repreſenting Pygmalion as a profligate man, abandoned to all manner of vice, and particularly to an exceſſive incontinency.] "He re-"preſents him to us as a man paſſionately fond of "women, as doating upon the beautiful Aſtarbe, as "the moſt diſſolute man, who loved all ſenſual plea-"ſures to an exceſs, in a word, as a monſter of in-"continence. But that Prince was very far from be-"ing ſuch; he abhorred the women; he could not "bear them; he would never marry, nor admit by "his ſide a lawful wife, much leſs a concubine. Ve-"nus and her ſon Cupid had the vexation to ſee that "they could never make him ſubmit to their power. "The love of money was his predominant vice. "Covetouſneſs extinguiſhed in his breaſt all the other "paſſions, and made him proof againſt all the charms "of the beauties who were at his court. The Hiſto-"rians pretend, that the Gods put him to death, "with no other deſign, but to puniſh him for his con-"tempt, and want of love for the women. And "the Poets on the other hand aſſert, that Venus and "Cupid, in order to be revenged of him, becauſe "they could never ſubject him to their power, made "him fall in love with a ſtatue, and that to puniſh "him for his antipathy againſt living and animated "idols of fleſh, they inſpired him with an exceſſive "and mad fondneſs for an idol of ſtone. Upon this "ſubject, and the other particulars of the life and "character of Pygmalion, you may conſult the fol-"lowing Authors; Trogus Pompeius, or his Abbrevi-"ator Juſtinus, l. 18. c. 5. Velleius Paterculus, l. 1. "c. 2. Silius Italicus, in the 1ſt and 3d book of the "Punick war; Ariſtotle, in his treatiſe of Wonder-"ful Things: Joſephus, contra Appion. l. 1. Samuel "Bochart, in his Canaan, l. 1. c. 3. St. Theophilus "of Antioch, in his 3d book againſt Antilochus; the "Servius of Daniel, on the 1ſt Æneis; and laſtly, "the Parallelle de l'Hiſtoire d'Eſpagne, by John, Biſhop "of Girona. You will find by all theſe Authors, "that the Pygmalion of the Romance of Telema-"chus, is as much like the Pygmalion of the ancient "Hiſtorians and Poets, as a Wind-mill, or a Croco-"dile. The Author of the Romance deſcribes him to "us as a Tyrant, who was frighted by the ſenſe of his "horrid crimes, and who feared continually to be "murthered; he repreſents him as a man whom every "thing troubles, diſquiets, and tortures, who fears his "own ſhadow, who cannot ſleep neither by day nor by "night; as an Owl that ſhuns the light. . . . The "ancient Hiſtorians on the contrary, repreſent Pyg-"malion as a meek, peaceable, and quiet man. His "very name proves it; for, as the learned Bochart "obſerves, the word Pygmalion ſignifies in the Phœni-"cian language, the Reſt of God. There was never a "better brother. He would ſhare the Crown with "his ſiſter Eliſa or Dido, and having no wife, he did "all his endeavours to have her acknowledged and "declared Queen. After their father's death, he "had a mind to reſign the Kingdom to her, but the "people, not being willing to be governed by a "woman, oppoſed it, and conferred the whole au-"thority on Pygmalion alone, though he was ſtill "very young, and Dido had been inſtituted Heireſs "to the Crown, together with him, by their father, "whom ſome call Murgon, and others Agenor, the "ſon of Belus; and whereas the Author of the Ro-"mance ſuppoſes, that Pygmalion had always been "abhorred and deteſted by the people, he was on the "contrary their darling, and extremely beloved by "them. The people appointed him their only King, "by main force, againſt his father's laſt will, againſt "the laws of the Kingdom, and before he was of "age to reign. Interim rex Tyri decedit, filio Pygma-"lione & Eliſſa filia inſignis formæ virgine hæredibus "inſtitutis. Sed populus Pygmalioni admodum puero reg-"num tradidit. i. e. In the mean time the King of "Tyre died, leaving by his laſt will the Crown to his ſon "Pygmalion, and to his daughter Eliſſa, a beautiful vir-"gin. But the people raiſed Pygmalion alone to the "throne; though ſtill very young, ſays Juſtinus *. He "was always inſtead of a father to his ſiſter Dido; and "having married her to Acerbas, or Sicharbas, or "Sichæus, High-Prieſt of the Phœnicians, and High-"Prieſt of Hercules the God of the Tyrians, which "was the ſecond dignity in the Kingdom, that "Prieſt being the firſt perſon after the King, he ne-"ver called him otherwiſe but his ſon-in-law, though "he was only his brother-in-law, and at the ſame "time his uncle by the mother's ſide, being his mo-"ther's brother. Avunculum ſuum, eundemque generum, "ſays Juſtinus † (5)."

* Juſtinus, lib. 18. cap. 15.

† Idem, ibid.

The Cenſurer thinks it particularly ſtrange, that Pygmalion ſhould be ſtyled an impious man. On the contrary, replies he (6), he was a moſt religious Prince, and ſo pious towards the Gods, that though he had the ſtrongeſt reaſons in the world to be exaſperated againſt his ſiſter, who had robbed him of all his treaſures, and was making her eſcape into Africa, and though he might eaſily have overtaken her, and cauſed her to be arreſted in the iſle of Cyprus, where ſhe landed firſt, before ſhe paſſed over into Africa; yet he would not make the leaſt attempt againſt her, becauſe having conſulted the Gods in a ſacrifice he offered to them, before he undertook any thing, the Diviners aſſured him, that the Gods would not ſuffer any perſon to prevent Dido from executing her deſigns, and that ſhe was to build a city, for which they were very much concerned. Victus minis deorum quievit, cui cum inſpirati vates canerent, non impune laturum,

(5) L'Abbé Faidit, Telemacomanie, p. m. 126, & ſeq. I make uſe of an edit. in which the place where it was printed (in the year 1700) is called Eleuteropole.

(6) Telemacomanie, p. 129, 130.

tended that this was receding too much from the truth of hiſtorical facts. I ſhall give an account of the arguments urged on both ſides during that controverſy (e), and I ſhall make ſome obſervations upon them [D].

(e) See the rem. [C].

PYLADES,

turum, ſi incrementum urbis toto orbe auſpicatiſſimæ interpellaſſet, ſays Juſtin *. And indeed we find that all the ill which the Poets and the Hiſtorians have ſaid of Pygmalion, conſiſts only in their charging him with coveteouſneſs.

* Juſtinus, lib. 18. cap. 3.

Portantur avari
Pygmalionis opes pelago: dux fœmina facti †.

† Virgil, Æn. 1.

" Nor is Pygmalion's * treaſure left behind.
" The veſſels, heavy-laden, put to ſea
" With proſperous winds: a woman leads the way."

* Virgil ſays the covetous Pygmalion.

Avarice was his only vice, which certainly was but a ſlight foundation for the Author of the Romance, to repreſent him in ſo odious a light as he has done.

Here follows what an anonymous Writer anſwered to that cenſure. " The Author of the cenſure at" tempts here to prove, that Pygmalion King of " Tyre was not a diſſolute man, becauſe about four " hundred years before him there lived in the iſle
" of Cyprus a famous carver, of the ſame name,
" who was very chaſte. And indeed the Pygmalion he
" ſpeaks of, and whom he miſtakes for the King of " Tyre, was a celebrated carver in the iſle of Cyprus,
" who had made a ſtatue with which he fell in love.
" Venus being moved with his paſſion, tranſ-
" formed the marble into a woman as beautiful as " Pygmalion's work was. It was by that woman he " got Paphos, who gave his own name to his native
" country. Paphos was the father of Cinyras; and
" Cinyras got by his own daughter Myrrha, a ſon
" called Adonis, who was Venus's darling. That
" ſtory is ſo well known, that one cannot ſufficiently
" wonder at that Author's ignorance, who pretends
" to ſo much learning, and yet has blundered in a
" ſubject which is as clear as the ſun at noon-day.
" That blunder is not the only one he has committed " with regard to Pygmalion. He pretends that that " Prince, whom the Archbiſhop of Cambray repre-
" ſents as an impious man, was moſt religious, and " that his unſatiable avarice, and the murder he " committed on the perſon of Sichæus, his ſiſter
" Dido's huſband, were mere trifles, and that he " was nevertheleſs an honeſt man, and extremely be" loved by his ſubjects. Theſe are indeed noble
" ſentiments for a man, who blames us for writing a
" romance, which is deſigned only to promote the
" cauſe of virtue (7)."

(7) Préface des Avantures de Telemaque, of the laſt edit. printed at the Hague, p. m. 24.

Here follows the Cenſurer's reply (8). The anonymous Apologiſt of the Romance of Telemachus, in his Preface to the new edition printed for Moetjens, charges me with miſtaking Pygmalion King of Tyre, and brother of Dido, whom Virgil  mentions, for Pygmalion the ſtatuary, and carver of ivory ſtatues, who fell in love with one of his images, and with an ivory maiden he had made, and whom Ovid mentions ††. And for committing that pretended blunder in Literature, that honeſt man, as well as he, who wrote the new book, entitled, les Caracteres des Auteurs anciens & modernes *, (the Characters of the ancient and modern Authors) are of opinion that I ought to be ſhamefully driven out of Athens and Delphi, and confined in a mad-houſe. . . All I can ſay is, that their Apollo is a lying and ignorant fellow. I have never committed the blunder they charge me with. I am better acquainted with the two Pygmalions than they are. But I have made but one of them two as to their character and inclination. I have obſerved, with all the Ancients, that the two Pygmalions were ſo far from being amorous, and diſſolute with regard to the women, and deſerved ſo little to be quoted as inſtances of the diſorders, with which lewdneſs is attended (as the Author of the Romance of Telemachus does) that on the contrary, they did both extremely abhor and deteſt all women and maidens; they both lived unmarried, ſo that one could not chooſe in all antiquity an inſtance leſs proper to repreſent a diſſolute King, abandoned to the love of women, than the King of Tyre, who was never diſſolute, no more than the carver or turner Pygmalion, ſince the greateſt pleaſure of them both was to rail againſt the whole ſex (9).

(8) L'Abbé Faydit, Supplemens aux Eſſais de Litterature, partic. 5. p. 124, & ſeq.

 Æn. 1.

†† Metam. lib. 10.

* p. 161.

(9) The Author quotes here theſe lines from the 24th book of Ovid's Metam. Quas quia, &c. which may be read above in the rem. [C] of the foregoing article.

[D] And I ſhall make ſome obſervations upon them.] It is very likely that I ſhall not make all the obſervations that could be made upon that ſubject: but no matter for that; let them, who pleaſe, come and glean after me.

I. I aſk, who are the ancient Authors, who have aſſerted that Pygmalion, Dido's brother, could not abide the women; and that this was the only reaſon why the Gods put him to death, or made him fall in love with a ſtatue. I conſult the Writers to whom I am referred, and find nothing in them of what I was made to expect. Juſtin, who is the firſt, does not ſay a word of it, and yet he is the Author who gives the largeſt account of Pygmalion. We meet with nothing concerning that Prince in Velleius Paterculus, who relates only in a few words, that the Tyrians built Utica (10), and that Dido built Carthage (11). Silius Italicus (12) mentions the unfortunate Dido ſeveral times, but without relating any of the particulars for which he is quoted. The paſſage from Ariſtotle (13) relates only to the building of Utica. Joſephus tells us only what you have ſeen above (14). Bochart's remarks conſiſt only in the etymological obſervation mentioned by the Cenſurer. St. Theophilus of Antioch tells us nothing but the name of Pygmalion's father, and how long Pygmalion lived, and how many years he reigned (15). The Servius of Daniel is not capable to ſatisfy my curioſity; and as for the pretended Parallele de l'Hiſtoire d'Eſpagne, by John Biſhop of Girona (16), what would it ſignify to meet with any particulars there? Since that Biſhop lived in the 15th Century, he deſerves no credit but ſo far as he quotes the Ancients.

(10) Val. Paterc. lib. 1. cap. 2.

(11) Idem, ibid. cap. 6.

(12) See him, lib. 1. p. m. 3, 11. lib. 2. p. 81.

(13) You will meet with it in the Juſtinus Variorum, p. 370. edit. Græviı 1683.

(14) In the text of this article.

(15) See Meurſius in Cypro, p. 126.

(16) The Latin title is Paralipomena Hiſt. Hiſpanicæ.

We have not therefore any authority, either for Pygmalion's chaſtity, or for the puniſhment he is ſaid to have ſuffered for it. Let us ſee whether the other good qualities, which are aſcribed to that Prince, be better grounded or not.

II. We are told, that he was a meek, peaceful, and quiet man, and that this is the character which the ancient Hiſtorians give him. His very name proves this, as the learned Bochart obſerves. But unfortunately for the cenſurer of Telemachus it happens, the Pygmalion of Bochart was the ſon of one Belus, who conquered the iſle of Cyprus at the time of the Trojan War (17): he was not therefore the brother of Dido who built Carthage. And beſides, who is there but knows, that the ſame name is given ſucceſſively to ſeveral perſons, who do not at all reſemble the firſt who bore it, and to whom it was perhaps given only to expreſs his character and morals? Laſtly, I cannot find thoſe ancient Hiſtorians, who have given our Pygmalion ſo fine a character. That tender friendſhip for his ſiſter, which is aſcribed to him; thoſe great endeavours to have her acknowledged Queen, are nothing but a paraphraſe of two or three words of Juſtin, who tells us that the people raiſed Pygmalion alone to the throne, though Dido by their father's will was appointed to inherit the Crown as well as he. By what means ſhall that paſſage be ſtretched or wire-drawn (18), in order to find in it the ſenſe, which our Cenſurer pretends to put upon it? May not we believe, with a great deal of probability, either that Pygmalion's faction laboured underhand to have that Princeſs excluded, or that the people were determined to exclude her, becauſe they thought this would pleaſe the Prince, and be an effectual method to prevent the ill effects of a diviſion, conſidering that Dido was married to the ſecond perſon in the State (19), that ſhe was very beautiful, and that, no doubt, ſhe was known to be capable of great deſigns (20). Laſtly, there never was a more ill grounded Commentary than that, by which Juſtin is made to ſay, that Pygmalion had a mind to reſign the Kingdom to his ſiſter . . but that the people oppoſed it . . . and appointed him only King by main force.

(17) See Bochart. in Geogr. Sacræ, part. 2. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. m. 369, 370.

(18) Obſerve that the Abbé Faydit quotes it as you have ſeen above.

(19) Huic conjux Sichæus erat. . . . Cui PATER intactam dederat, primiſque jugarat Ominibus. Virgil. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 343.

III. As Pygmalion was at that time but nine years old, one can hardly imagine that the Crown was given to him only and not to his ſiſter, for no other reaſon but becauſe he was extremely beloved by the Tyrians, and their darling. It is plain that he had not yet had time to become ſuch by his actions, but at moſt by the great hopes the people had conceived of what he would be one day. But this was an uncertain and deceitful hope; which does not afford a ſufficient ground to aſſert, that he governed juſtly: for how many lovely and promiſing children are there who are afterwards ſpoiled and corrupted to ſuch a degree, as to become the moſt wicked and profligate men?

(20) She ſhewed it plainly enough by the building of Carthage.

IV. There was no great occaſion to obſerve, that Pygmalion having no wife did all his endeavours to have his ſiſter Dido declared Queen. It muſt almoſt always (21) be ſuppoſed, that a child, who is but nine years old, is not yet married, and it muſt never be ſuppoſed that he will regulate his conduct ſo, as though he deſigned never to marry: and after all it is not Pygmalion's celibacy, which makes Juſtin ſay that that Princeſs was deprived of a right which her father's laſt will had given her.

(21) I make uſe of that reſtriction, becauſe there are Princes who marry ſometimes their children, before they be of a ripe age.

V. Neither Juſtin, nor any other ancient Author, tells us, that Pygmalion was always inſtead of a father to his ſiſter Dido, nor that he married her to Sicharbas (22), nor that he ever called the latter otherwiſe than his ſon-in-law. The words of Juſtin quoted by the Cenſurer, Avunculum ſuum eundemque generum, are deſigned only to ſhew the odiouſneſs of Pygmalion's crime; for they ſignify that he killed Sicharbas who was at once his uncle by the mother's ſide, and his brother-in-law (23): the word Gener is taken indifferently by the ancient Writers to ſignify a father-in-law, a brother-in-law, and a ſon-in-law, though to ſpeak accurately it was at length taken only in the laſt ſenſe (24).

(22) You may have ſeen above, quotation (18), that it was Dido's father who married her to Sichæus.

(23) Pygmalion oblitus juris humani avunculum ſuum eundemque generum ſine reſpectu pietatis occidit. Juſtinus, lib. 18. cap. 4. p. m. 372.

(24) See Berneggerus's note on that paſſage of Juſtin.

VI. What the Cenſurer of Telemachus aſſerts (25), viz. that Pygmalion ſeized Sicharbas's riches, and that Dido robbed him of all his treaſures (26), is not accurate. Pygmalion could not make himſelf maſter of his brother-in-law's treaſures, which were buried in the ground: he was in hopes of coming at them, when Dido ſhould have taken ſanctuary in his own houſe: but inſtead of chooſing that ſanctuary, ſhe removed as far as ſhe could from Tyre, with all her huſband's treaſures. This is what Juſtin relates in the cleareſt manner in the world. Virgil's words, quoted by the Cenſurer (27), Portantur avari Pygmalionis opes pelago, dux fœmina facti (28), ſhould not have made him imagine, that Pygmalion's riches were carried away by his ſiſter. It appears evidently from what goes before, that ſhe took only her huſband's treaſures with her, which Virgil calls Pygmalionis opes, Pygmalion's treaſure, for no other reaſon but becauſe Pygmalion was in hopes to get them into his own hands: this is what the Commentators obſerve moſt expreſsly; and the thing is unqueſtionable.

(25) p. 128.

(26) p. 129.

(27) p. 130.

(28) Virg. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 363.

VII. The proof which is given us of Pygmalion's piety is very equivocal: the threatnings of the God's anger, which the Diviners explained to him, prevented him from purſuing Dido. This is no proof of love, or of filial fear for the Deity. Irreligious men being frighted by prodigies have ſometimes altered their wicked deſigns.

I ſhall make but two obſervations upon the diſcourſe of the Apologiſt.

VIII. The firſt is, that he ſuffered many blunders (29) of the Cenſurer to paſs unobſerved, which he might have taken notice of.

(29) Thoſe which I have been mentioning here.

IX. The ſecond is, that he neglected to take an advantage, which Virgil and Juſtin afforded him. He clears the Archbiſhop of Cambray very well with regard to the Anachroniſm he is ſuppoſed to have been guilty of in making Pygmalion King of Tyre, and brother of, Dido live at the time of the Siege of Troy. He clears him very well in that reſpect, I ſay; for he ſhews that the Archbiſhop was obliged to follow herein the Diſpoſition of Virgil's Poem (30): but for that ſame reaſon he was in the right to ſuppoſe, that that King of Tyre was a monſter of tyranny. That great Poet repreſents him as the moſt wicked of all men.

(30) Preface des Avantures du Telemaque, p. 26.

——Regna Tyri germanus habebat
Pygmalion, ſcelere ante alios immanior omnis,
Quos inter medius venit furor. Ille Sichæum
Impius ante aras, atque auricæcus amore,
Clam furo incautum ſuperat, ſecurus amorum
Germanæ; factumque diu celavit, et ægram
Multa malus ſimulans, vana ſpe luſit amantem (31).

(31) Virg. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 346.

"Pygmalion then the Tyrian Sceptre ſway'd;
"One who contemn'd divine and human laws.
"Then ſtrife enſu'd, and curſed gold the cauſe.
"The Monarch blinded with deſire of wealth;
"With ſteel invades his brother's life by ſtealth;
"Before the ſacred altar made him bleed,
"And long from her conceal'd the cruel deed.
"Some tale, ſome new pretence, he daily coin'd,
"To ſooth his ſiſter, and delude her mind."

DRYDEN.

He obſerves a little lower, that Dido was accompanied in her flight by thoſe perſons, who hated or feared that cruel tyrant (32). Juſtin aſſerts the ſame thing, with the addition of this particular, that they, who fled away, were perſons eminent by their quality; he even calls them Senators. Eliſſa diu fratrem propter ſeclus averſata, ad poſtremum diſſimulato odio, mitigatoque interim vultu, fugam tacitè molitur; aſſumtiſque quibuſdam principibus in ſocietatem, quibus par odium in Regem eſſe, eandemque fugiendi cupiditatem arbitrabatur. . . . . Junguntur et Senatorum in eam noctem præparata agmina (33). i. e. "Eliſſa (Dido) "hated her brother a long while for that crime; but "at laſt, diſſembling her reſentment, and ſhewing "in the mean time a chearful look, ſhe contrived ſe- "cretly to make her eſcape; and imparted her de- "ſign to ſome of the moſt conſiderable perſons, "whom ſhe thought had the ſame hatred againſt the "King, and longed like her to go out of his Do- "minions. . . . . Many Senators joined with her "the night ſhe went away."

(32) Conveniunt quibus aut odium crudele tyranni Aut metus acer erat. Idem, ibid. ver. 361.

(33) Juſtin. lib. 18. cap. 4. p. m. 372.

But here a little difficulty offers itſelf to us. Pygmalion reigned forty ſeven years, and lived fifty ſix years; and it was the ſeventh year of his reign that Dido went away, and built Carthage. This is what the Hiſtorians of Tyre, quoted by Joſephus, tell us; what he did during the laſt forty years of his reign is entirely unknown to us: the Writers who are extant ſay neither good nor ill of him during that time; and what we meet with in Ovid is nothing but a fiction (34). All that Virgil and Juſtin mention of his cruelty relates to the time before Dido's flight. Now he was but ſixteen when ſhe went away. Is it probable then that he had already governed in that barbarous and tyrannical manner? Ought we not to aſcribe ſo many cruelties to ſome Miniſter of State, rather than to that young King? The Cenſurer of Telemachus has hinted ſomething of this objection. The murder of Sichæus, ſays he (35), happened when Pygmalion was but fifteen years old, ſince it happened a year before Dido's flight; and conſequently it was done by the advice of his council, rather than by his order, and from his own accord. I add, that it had been a great prodigy, if his whole reign had been like the deſcription which Virgil makes of it, and had continued nevertheleſs forty years longer after Dido's flight, and for ought we know, ended by a natural death. Juvenal's ſaying (36) is well known.

(34) See the rem. [B].

(35) p. 130, 131.

(36) Ad generum Cereris ſine cæde & vulnere pauci Deſcendunt reges & ſicca morte tyranni. Juven. ſat. 10. ver. 112.

As for that Cenſurer's reply; here follows what I find to blame in it.

X. It will plainly appear to any one, who does but ſlightly examine what he has ſaid (37), that he ſpoke only of Pygmalion, the brother of Dido, and that he did not uſe the leaſt word or expreſſion that might hint he had Pygmalion of Cyprus in view. One cannot therefore well underſtand, why he aſſerts in his reply, that he had obſerved, with all the ancients, that the TWO PYGMALIONS were ſo far from being . . . . diſſolute with regard to the women, . . . that on the contrary they did BOTH abhor and deteſt all women. If a man can but read, he will eaſily perceive the falſity of that propoſition.

(37) See above, rem. [C], quotation (5).

XI. It is ſo falſe, that all the ancients tell us, that Pygmalion, Dido's brother, hated womankind, and that all his delight was to rail againſt the fair ſex, that we may fairly challenge the Cenſurer of Telemachus to quote one ſingle ancient Author, who has aſſerted this; or at leaſt who aſſerted it without ſuppoſing at the ſame time, that Pygmalion King of Tyre, and Pygmalion who fell in love with a ſtatue, were one and the ſame perſon.

XII. It is not true, that both the Pygmalions continued bachelors all their life time: the Pygmalion of the iſle of Cyprus was married to the maiden, into whom PYLADES, a native of Cilicia, [A], was a very famous Pantomime at Rome under the reign of Auguſtus: he improved by new inventions the art of repreſenting theatrical pieces by dancing [B], as I have already obſerved in the article of BATHYLLUS. He wrote even ſome books upon that ſubject (a). One will be able to judge with how much ſkill he performed his part, if one conſiders that Auguſtus having called him back to Rome (b), from whence he had been baniſhed by a faction, the people were ſo well pleaſed at it, that this was one of the reaſons, why they were no longer offended at ſome burthenſome laws, which that Emperor had made. Others do not aſcribe Pylades's baniſhment to the credit of an oppoſite faction (c); they aſſert it was a puniſhment, which Auguſtus himſelf had inflicted upon him, becauſe he had pointed with his finger at whom Venus transformed the ſtatue with which he was in love, and he had a ſon by her (38). I confeſs that Joſephus does not tell us, that Pygmalion King of Tyre had any children: but as he wanted to continue the ſucceſſion of the Kings of Tyre only to that Prince, we cannot infer from his ſtopping there, that that Prince was never married, and did not leave his Kingdom to one of his ſons. The ſilence of Joſephus cannot therefore be urged as a good argument (39) againſt the Archbiſhop of Cambray's fiction, which is that one of Pygmalion's ſons ſucceeded to his Crown againſt his father's will. There is ſomething fallacious in the following words of the Cenſurer. After Pygmalion we meet with no King of the Tyrians till the time of Ithobalus, under whoſe reign Tyre on the Continent was taken by Nebuchadnezzar. . . . So that it is probable, that after Pygmalion's death the Tyrians ceaſed to be governed by Kings, and that perpetual judges were appointed in their ſtead, like the Conſuls at Rome; and that old Tyre met after the death of Pygmalion with the ſame fate, which new or the inſular Tyre met with after the depoſition of Ithobalus. They put judges in his room, who were changed from time to time, and governed the people with a ſupreme authority. After which the Tyrians went to aſk for a King at Babylon, and got Merbalus, who reigned forty years; after his death the Babylonians appointed his brother Iromus to ſucceed him, who reigned many years over the Tyrians, at the time when Cyrus was King of Perſia *. All this is extracted word for word from Joſephus, or rather from Menander and Dius, whoſe words Joſephus tranſcribes (40). Let it be ſo; but it ſhould have been obſerved, that Joſephus quotes from theſe Authors ſuch paſſages only as were neceſſary to confirm by the authority of ſtrangers, what the Jews aſſerted concerning the antiquity and deſtruction of their Temple, &c. He proves by the Annals of the Phœnicians, that Solomon traded with Hiram King of Tyre: and in order to ſhew that Solomon's Temple was an ancient building, he reckons how many years after Hiram's reign Carthage was built. He gives us therefore the ſucceſſion of the Kings of Tyre from Hiram down to Pygmalion, in whoſe time Carthage was built: the ſucceſſion of the following Kings of Tyre being nothing to his purpoſe, he does not mention them: can one infer from his ſilence that the ſucceſſion was interrupted at the death of Pygmalion, that Pygmalion died a bachelor, &c? In another place he had occaſion to confirm by the teſtimony of the Phœnician Hiſtorians what relates to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the liberty granted the Jews to return into their own country. It was needleſs for him to go ſo far backwards as the time, which followed immediately the death of Pygmalion, and therefore he goes no farther back than the time of Ithobalus, under whoſe reign the city of Tyre was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, and gives us the names of thoſe who governed ſucceſſively at Tyre, only from this Ithobalus down to Hirom who reigned there in the time of Cyrus.

(a) Athen. lib. 1. cap. 17. Suidas in Πυλαδης.

(b) Dio, lib. 54.

(c) Sueton. in Auguſto, cap. 45.

(38) See Ovid, in the 10th book of his Metam.

(3) It is urged as ſuch in page 130 of the Telemacomanie.

* Joſ. cont. Appi. p. 1046.

(40) Telemacomanie, p. 131.

XIII. Obſerve that the judges did not ſucceed immediately to Ithobalus, as our Cenſurer pretends; they were not appointed till after the death of Baal, who ſucceeded to Ithobalus, and reigned ten years (41).

(41) Joſephus, contra Appion. lib. 1. p. 1043.

However it be, Joſephus is by no means proper to hinder us from believing, that a ſon of Pygmalion ſucceeded to the Crown at Tyre, and that that city was governed by Kings and not by Judges, ſince the time of that ſucceſſor of Pygmalion, to the time of that Ithobalus, who was contemporary with Nebuchadnezzar.

XIV. Since the Cenſurer refers us to Ovid for what relates to Pygmalion the carver, he ought to have retracted what he aſſerted; namely, that Venus had made him fall in love with a ſtatue, in order to puniſh his contempt for the women; for it is certain that Ovid mentions no ſuch thing: and that on the contrary he repreſents that Goddeſs ſo kind, that ſhe granted Pygmalion's requeſt immediately, by bringing to life that ſtatue, which was the object of his love (42).

(42) See the 10th book of the Metam. ver. 277, & ſeq.

XV. The beſt reply which the Cenſurer could have made was that, which did not come into his head. He might have urged the authority of ſome Writers, who make no difference beween the Pygmalion of Tyre, and the Pygmalion of the iſle of Cyprus, as we have obſerved above (43).

(43) In the rem. [D], of the foregoing article.

[A] A native of Cilicia.] This is plainly to be ſeen in Suidas; the following part of that paſſage, in which the place where he was born was perhaps mentioned, is dark and perplexed; nor have the Critics yet been able to clear it up. Boulenger (1) imagined that there is an inconſiſtency (which is merely chimerical) between thoſe who ſuppoſe Pylades was a Cicilian, and the anthology, which makes him come originally, ſays he, from Thebes in Egypt; whereupon he quotes theſe words;

Βάκχας
Ἐκ Θηβῶν ἰταλὴν ἤγαγε πρὸς θυμέλην Ἀνθρώποις Πυλαάδης.

Id eſt quando Bacchas ex Thebis ad pulpitum Italicum hominibus Pylades adduxit. i. e. "When Pylades ſhewed the Theban Bacchæ on the ſtage in Italy." This ſignifies only that Pylades ſhewed to the Romans the repreſentation of ſomething which was performed at Thebes. But this was never intended to ſignify that he was of Thebes, or that he lived there before he came to Italy: and farther it is plain, that Thebes in Bœotia is only meant here, where Bacchus and his Feſtivals were chiefly ſolemnized. Let us obſerve that ἰταλὴν πρὸς θυμέλην is very well tranſlated, ad pulpitum Italicum, on the ſtage or on the theatre of Italy: but they who have tranſlated it Italicum ad ſacrificium (2), for the ſacrifices of Italy, have committed a very groſs blunder.

(1) Julius Cæſar Bulengerus, de Theatro, lib. 1. cap. 93. folio m. 115 and 117 verſo. You will ſee in the rem. [E], quot. (15), from whence theſe Greek lines are extracted.

(2) They have committed that blunder in Lubin's edit. of the Anthology, in 4to, p. 760.

[B] He improved by new inventions the art of repreſenting theatrical pieces by dancing.] In the article of Bathyllus I have given a general account of the alterations, that were made under Auguſtus in the dances of the Pantomimes. But to be a little more particular in this place I muſt obſerve, that if we may believe St. Jerom, Pylades is the firſt who danced at Rome by the ſound of flutes, and whilſt a band of muſicians was ſinging; and that before him the Pantomimes uſed to dance and ſing at the ſame time (3). Salmaſius does not grant all this (4): he ſhews, that as early as the time of Livius the Poet and Comedian, the dancer was exempted from the fatigue of ſinging himſelf, and that they gave him a boy, who ſung, whilſt another played on the flute (5): but he grants that Pylades is the firſt who took care that the muſicians ſhould ſing and others play on the flute whilſt he was dancing: fiſtulas & chorum ſibi ſaltanti ut præcineret curaviſſe, which agrees very well with the anſwer he made to Auguſtus, who aſked him what he had added to the dancing. Αὐλῶν συρίγγων τ' ἰυγῆς, ὁμαδόν τ' ἀνθρώπων: the ſound of flagelets and flutes, and the ſymphony of men (6): for before him there was but one flute deſigned for the uſe of the Pantomimes, whereas they uſed ſeveral when he performed. Lucian acquaints us that theſe people danced

(3) Pylades Cilix Pantomimus, quum veteres ipſi canerent & ſaltarent, primus Romæ chorum ſibi & fiſtulas præcinere fecit. Hieronymus, in Chron. Euſeb. ad ann. 1995.

(4) Salmaſ. in Vopiſcum, p. 836. edit. Lugd. Bat. in 8vo.

(5) Valer. Max. lib. 2. cap. 4. p. m. 161. See alſo Lucian. de Saltatione, p. m. 925. Tom. 1.

(6) It is the 13th line of the 10th book of Homer's Iliad.

at one of the ſpectators [C]. But it might be that Mecænas, who favoured Bathyllus Pylades's competitor, took hold of that opportunity in order to remove the latter. Pylades had another rival named Hylas [D], who had been his ſcholar. Macrobius acquaints us with ſeveral particulars upon this ſubject (d): he tells us that there was a popular inſurrection occaſioned by the competition (e); and that Hylas dancing one day a hymn which ended with theſe words, the great Agamemnon, expreſſed the thing by the action of a perſon, who ſhould be meaſuring the ſize of a tall man. Pylades, in order to find fault with him, cried out, you make him tall, but not great; whereupon the audience obliged him to dance the ſame hymn. He did it, and when he came to theſe words, the great Agamemnon, he put himſelf in the poſture of a man in a deep meditation (f). As he was once dancing the Tragedy of Hercules, ſome perſons pretended to find fault with his ſteps: whereupon he pulled off his maſk, and told the jeerers, ye fools, do not you ſee that I act the part of a madman? He threw ſome darts that day among the crowd of ſpectators: he threw ſome alſo when he performed the ſame part in Auguſtus's chamber. That Prince was not offended at his being uſed after the ſame manner as the Roman people. All theſe particulars are incomparably more agreeably related in the original (g): the curious readers will do well to conſult it. There are in the Anthology ſome Epigrams to the honour of our Pylades [E]. He left Diſciples behind him, who called themſelves ſucceſſively by his name. We find under Trajan's reign a dancer named Pylades, whom that Prince loved very much (h). We meet with another whom Didius Julianus ordered to dance in the palace, where Pertinax had juſt been murdered (i). Galen mentions a Pantomime, with whom he diſcovered that a certain woman was paſſionately in love, and who was no doubt a Diſciple of our Pylades (k). Gruterus's inſcriptions mention ſome Pantomimes who had the ſame name (l).

(d) Macrobius, Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 7.

(e) See the rem. [E] of the art. BATHYLLUS.

(f) Nihil magis ratus magno duci convenire quam pro omnibus cogitare. Macrob. Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 7.

(g) Apud Monobium, ibid.

(h) Xiphil. in Trajan.

(i) Xiphil. in Did. Juliano.

(k) See Voſſius, Inſt. Poet. lib. 2. p. 184. He refutes Brodæus, who in his notes on the Anthology, has aſſerted, that there were but two Pantomimes named Pylades.

(l) See Scaliger in Euſeb. p. 169. Salmaſ. in Vopiſcum, p. 234, edit. in 8vo.

danced by the ſound of ſeveral other inſtruments, citharæ, cimbalorum, of harps and cymbals, and of a certain ſtamping of the feet, which in Salmaſius's opinion was deſigned for the ſame purpoſe, as what is now called beating time. The ſame Author (Lucian) has alſo obſerved, it was chiefly under Auguſtus that the art of dancing was brought to ſuch a degree of perfection (7). It is an honour for Pylades, qui ferebatur mutaſſe rudis illius ſaltationis ritum, quæ apud majores viguit, & venuſtam induxiſſe novitatem (8). i. e. "Who is ſaid to have altered the ruſtic way of dancing, which was in uſe anciently, and to have introduced a new and agreeable method of performing."

(7) Οὐ παλαι ἀρχαμένη ἐς τοσοῦτον κάλλος ἐπιδιδόναι, ἀλλα καλὲ τὸν Σεβαςὸν μάλιςα. Lucianus, de Saltatione, p. 925. Tom. 1. apud Salmaſ. in Vopiſcum, p. 836.

(8) Macrob. Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 7.

[C] He was baniſhed . . . . becauſe he had pointed with his finger at one of the ſpectators.] Auguſtus muſt therefore have had a great indulgence for thoſe who hiſſed at the players, for that ſpectator was hiſſing at Pylades. Pyladem urbe atque Italia ſummoverit quod ſpectatorem à quo exſibilabatur demonſtraſſet digito, conſpicuumque feciſſet (9). If at this time a player at Paris ſhould revenge himſelf after the ſame manner as Pylades did, he would not be cenſured for it (10). We learn from the News-papers, that they have made very ſevere regulations in France againſt thoſe who pretend to hiſs at the players, and whoſe audacioufneſs was riſen to the higheſt degree. The petition, which a Poet preſented to the King, praying that their rage might be reſtrained, is a very pretty piece of poetry. It was firſt printed in the Mercure Galant, and afterwards in the collection of pieces, which is publiſhed monthly at the Hague. They have inſerted in the Furetieriana an Epigram upon the origin of hiſſing. That piece is aſcribed to an Author, who has gained a great reputation by his Tragedies. But the reputation of the wit who is abuſed in that Epigram, is ſo well eſtabliſhed, that it cannot hurt him in the leaſt (11). In the Dutch edition they have put Hiſtorien inſtead of Hiſtrion (12).

(9) Sueton. in Auguſto, cap. 45.

(10) I write this in the year 1696.

(11) See the Lettres Hiſtoriques, for March 1696. p. 288, 289.

(12) Furetieriana, p. 72.

[D] Pylades had another rival named Hylas.] Macrobius ſpeaks thus. Hylam diſcipulum uſque ad æqualitatis contentionem eruditione provexit: populus deinde inter utriuſque ſuffragia diviſus eſt (13). i. e. "He "taught his ſcholar Hylas ſo well, that at laſt he was "able to vie with him; and the people were afterwards divided in their opinions concerning theſe "two Pantomimes." Some learned men take this Hylas and Bathyllus to be the ſame perſon (14); they pretend that the former of theſe names was given him, becauſe he was as much beloved by his maſter Pylades, as Hylas was by Hercules. In a word, they imagine there was a criminal converſation between them. All this appears to me to be very far fetched, forced and ill grounded. No man ever ſaid that Bathyllus was Pylades's ſcholar, as Macrobius aſſerts of Hylas. Let us therefore obſerve only, that the one has probably been miſtaken for the other with regard to the reaſon, which made Auguſtus reprove Pylades, and for the reſt let us be perſuaded, that Hylas and Bathyllus were two different Pantomimes. See the remark [E] of the article BATHYLLUS.

(13) Macrob. Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 7.

(14) Iſaacus Pontanus, in illum locum Macrobii.

[E] There are in the Anthology ſome Epigrams to the honour of our Pylades.] That which Boulenger and Lubin have miſunderſtood, aſcribes to Pylades ſuch hands as can expreſs every thing, παμφώνους (15). One might make a very large collection, if one would attempt to tranſcribe all the paſſages, in which the Ancients have well repreſented the manual language of the Pantomimes: let us only give here theſe Latin words of Caſſiodorus (16): His ſunt additæ Orcheſtarum loquaciſſimæ manus, linguoſi digiti, ſilentium clamoſum, expoſitio tacita. i. e. "To theſe are added "the ſpeaking words of the Pantomimes, their talk"ing fingers, their loud ſilence, and dumb expoſi"tion:" and theſe Greek words of Nonnus (17), Νεύματα μῦθον ἔχων, παλάμην σόμα, δάκτυλα φωνήν, Their very nod ſpeaks, their hands talk, their fingers have a voice. Let us not quote any more paſſages, and omit St. Cyprian's ſaying, cui ars ſit verba manibus expedire (18). i. e. "Whoſe art conſiſts in expreſſing words "with his hands."

(15) Anthol. lib. 4. cap. 25. num. 8. p. m. 760.

(16) Caſſiod. lib. 4. Variorum.

(17) Nonnus, Dionyſ. lib. 7. ver. 18.

(18) Lib. de Spectac.

PYRRHO, a Greek Philoſopher, born at Elis in Peloponneſus, was the Diſciple of Anaxarchus, and accompanied him as far as India (a). He doubtleſs then followed Alexander the Great, whence the age in which he flouriſhed may be known. He had made painting his profeſſion (b), before he devoted himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy. His opinions did not differ much from thoſe of Arceſilaus [A]; and he almoſt taught, as he did, the incomprehenſibility of all things: on all occaſions he found reaſons or arguments

(a) Diog. Laert. in Pyrrhone, lib. 9. init. num. 61.

(b) Idem, ibid.

[A] His opinions did not differ much from thoſe of Arceſilaus.] Were I to follow punctually Aſcanius Abderites, I ſhould ſay that theſe two Philoſophers did not differ in one ſingle reſpect. Γινωσκεται δοκει φιλοσοφῆσαι τὸ τῆς ἀκαταληψίας καὶ ἐποχῆς εἶδος. εἰσαγαγὼν, ὡς Ἀσκάνιος ὁ Ἀβδηρίτης φησί. Nobiliſſime Philoſophiam tractaſſe videtur, commentus modum, quo de omnibus nihil decerneret, neque quicquam comprehendi poſſe diceret, ut Aſcanius arguments to affirm as well as to deny, for which reaſon he ſuſpended his aſſent after having examined the arguments pro and con; and reduced all his concluſions to a non liquet, let the matter be farther enquired into. Thus he was ſearching for truth all his life time; but he always ſo contrived matters, as never to grant that he had found it. Though he was not the inventor of that method of philoſophizing, it nevertheleſs goes by his name: the art of diſputing on all things, and always keeping one's judgment in ſuſpence, commonly being called Pyrrhoniſm or Scepticiſm. It is juſtly had in deteſtation in the ſchools of Divinity [B], where it endeavours to get new ſtrength, which, at the ſame time, is but Aſcanius Abderites auctor eſt (1). This is aſſerting roundly, that the nature of things, according to Pyrrho, is incomprehenſible, this being Arceſilaus's doctrine. However, I had rather ſuppoſe ſome difference between them, becauſe ſepticiſm does not expreſsly imply incomprehenſibility. They have been called Scepticks, Zeteticks, Ephecticks, and Aphoreticks (2), that is, examiners, reſearchers, men of doubt and ſuſpenſe. All this ſhews that they ſuppoſed it was not impoſſible to find out truth, and did not affirm that it is incomprehenſible. It appears from Aulus Gellius, that they diſapproved of thoſe who aſſert that it is ſo; and in this, according to the Author in queſtion, the Scepticks and Academicks differed (3); they agreed together exactly in all other reſpects, and gave one another the abovementioned names (4). Cum hæc autem conſimiliter tam Pyrrhonii dicant quam Academici; differre tamen inter ſeſe & propter alia quædam, & vel maxime propterea exiſtimati ſunt, quod Academici quidem ipſum illud nihil poſſe comprehendi, quaſi comprehendunt; & nihil poſſe diſcerni, quaſi diſcernunt: Pyrrhonii ne id quidem ullo pacto videri verum dicunt, quod nihil eſſe verum videtur (5). Sextus Empericus has found out another thing in which they differ (6). Arceſilaus aſſerted, that the holding the mind in ſuſpenſe was naturally good, and affirmation naturally bad; however, they were only ſo in appearance, according to Pyrrho: οὐ καλὰ φύσιν ἀλλὰ κατὰ φαινόμενον, non ſecundum naturam ſed ſecundum id quod apparet. After all, both were equally for doubting; and they might have been eaſily reconciled. They ſhould only have been deſired to expreſs themſelves more clearly and ſincerely (7).

(1) Diog. Laert. lib. 9. num. 61.

(2) See Gaſſendi in Libro proœmiali de Philoſophia universè, cap. 8. p. m. 24. See alſo Aulus Gellius, lib. 11. cap. 5.

(3) This muſt be underſtood of the ſecond Academy founded by Arceſilaus.

(4) Aulus Gellius, lib. 11. cap. 5.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) See Voſſius, de Philoſophor. Sectis, p. 107.

(7) See the paſſage of Ariſtocles, apud Euſebium Præpar. Evang. lib. 14. cited by Voſſius, ibid. p. 106.

[B] Scepticiſm is juſtly had in deteſtation in the ſchools of Divinity.] Scepticiſm is of dangerous conſequence with regard to that divine ſcience; for it does not ſeem to be much ſo with regard to Phyſicks or the State. There is little harm in ſaying, that the mind of man is too much bounded, to make any diſcoveries in natural truths; in the cauſes that produce heat, cold, the tides, &c. It is enough for us that we employ ourſelves in ſearching probable hypotheſes, and in making experiments: and I am very certain, that there are very few good Naturaliſts in our age, but will own that nature is an unfathomable abyſs; and that its ſprings are known only to him who made, and who directs them. Thus all theſe Philoſophers are, in that reſpect, Academicks and Scepticks. Society has no occaſion to be afraid of ſcepticiſm, for the followers of it do not ſay, that men ought not to conform to the cuſtoms of their country, practiſe the duties of morality, and reſolve upon thoſe things, on a probable reaſon, without waiting for certainty (8). They were at liberty to ſuſpend their judgments on this queſtion, whether ſuch and ſuch a duty be naturally and abſolutely lawful; but they did not ſuſpend it on this queſtion, whether it ought to be practiſed on ſuch and ſuch occaſions. Nothing therefore but religion can be afraid of ſcepticiſm; it ought to be grounded on certainty; its aim, its effects and uſuages fall to the ground, the inſtant that a firm perſuaſion of its truth is erazed from the mind. But on the other ſide, this need not give us any uneaſineſs; there never was, and there never will be but a ſmall number of people, who are capable of being impoſed upon by the reaſons of the Scepticks. The grace of God in the faithful, the force of education in other men; perhaps ignorance (9), and the natural inclination which men have to be peremptory; all theſe are a buckler impenetrable to the darts of the Scepticks, though the followers of this ſect imagine it to be more formidable than it was anciently. We ſhall now ſee on what grounds they build ſuch a ſtrange perſuaſion.

About two months ſince, a very able man gave me a full account of a conference at which he was preſent. Two Abbes, one of whom knew nothing but the common rote of learning, and the other was an able Philoſopher, diſputed with ſo much warmth, that they at laſt had like to have quarrelled in earneſt. The former had obſerved, (flatly enough) that he could pardon the Philoſophers of the heathen world, for having been wavering in the uncertainty of opinions; but, that he could not conceive how it was poſſible there ſhould be any Scepticks, under the light of the Goſpel. You are in the wrong, replied the other, to argue after that manner. Were Arceſilaus to return into the world, and combat our Divines, he would be a thouſand times more formidable than he was to the Dogmatiſts of ancient Greece: the Chriſtian theology would furniſh him with unanſwerable arguments. All the company were greatly ſurprized at theſe words, and deſired the Abbé to explain himſelf more plainly; not doubting but that he had advanced a paradox which would turn to his confuſion. Here follows the anſwer he made, which he directed to the firſt Abbé. I will give up the advantages, which the new philoſophy has given to the Scepticks. The name of Sextus Empiricus was ſcarce known in our ſchools. The method he propoſed with ſo much ſubtilty, concerning the ſuſpending of our judgments, was as little known as the Terra Auſtralis incognita, when Gaſſendi (10) gave us an epitome of it, which opened the eyes of the publick. The Carteſian Philoſophy has put the finiſhing ſtroke to the work; and none of the ſound Philoſophers are any longer in doubt, now, but that the Scepticks have reaſon to aſſert, that the qualities of bodies which ſtrike our ſenſes are mere appearances. Every one of us may juſtly ſay, I feel heat when I am before a fire, but not, I know that fire is, in itſelf, ſuch as it appears to me. In this form of ſpeech did the ancient Scepticks expreſs themſelves. But, in this age, the new Philoſophers ſpeak in a more poſitive ſtyle. Heat, ſmell, colours, &c. are not in the objects of our ſenſes: they are modifications of our ſouls: we know that bodies are not ſuch as they appear to us. They would willingly have excepted extenſion and motion, but could not do it; for if the objects of the ſenſes appear to us coloured, hot, cold, and emit an odour, though they really are not ſo, why might they not appear to have extenſion and figure; at reſt and in motion, though there ſhould really be no ſuch thing (11)? Farther; the objects of the ſenſes cannot be the cauſe of my ſenſations. I therefore might feel heat and cold; ſee colours, figures, extenſion and motion, though there were not one body in the univerſe. I therefore have not any good proof of the exiſtence of bodies (12). The only proof which could be given me of it is, that God would impoſe upon me, were he to imprint in my mind the ideas I have of body, at the ſame time that there ſhould be really no ſuch thing as bodies (13); but this proof would be a very weak one, it proving too much. Ever ſince the beginning of the world all mankind, except perhaps one out of two hundred millions, firmly believe that bodies are coloured, which at the ſame time is an error. I would aſk; does God deceive mankind with regard to thoſe colours? If he impoſes upon them in that reſpect, he may as well deceive them with regard to extenſion. This laſt fallacy or illuſion will not be leſs innocent, nor leſs conſiſtent than the former with the ſupremely perfect Being. If he does not impoſe on them with reſpect to colours, this doubtleſs will be becauſe he does not impel them irreſiſtibly to ſay, thoſe colours exiſt out of my ſoul, but only, there ſeems to me to be colours there. The ſame will be aſſerted with regard to extent: God does not impel us irreſiſtibly to ſay they do exiſt, but only to judge that we are ſenſible of them, and that there ſeems to us to be ſome. It is no leſs difficult for a Carteſian to ſuſpend his judgment with regard to the exiſtence of extenſion, than for a peaſant to

(8) See Diog. Laert. at the cloſe of Pyrrho's Life.

(9) This is a ſaying of Simonides, thoſe men are not cunning enough to be impoſed upon by ſuch a perſon as I. Balzac uſed to ſay the ſame of the young women in the village where he lived. Ageſilaus complained of his having to do with enemies who did not underſtand the military arts: that his ſtratagems were all employed to no purpoſe; and that he could not overreach unexperienced troops. See Plutarch, near the end of his Life.

(10) In his work de ſine Logicæ, cap. 3. p. 72 & ſeq. vol. 1. of his works, Lyons edit. of 1658.

(11) Abbé Foucher propoſed this objection, in his critique on the Search after Truth. Father Mallebranche made no reply to it, he well knowing the ſtrength of this objection. See the following citation.

(12) Father Mallebranche ſhews, in an explication of the Search after Truth, that it is extremely difficult to prove the exiſtence of bodies, and that faith only can convince us, that there are really ſuch things as bodies.

(13) See chap. 28 of Arnauld's Traite des vrayes & des fauſſes idees, where he confutes the above-hinted at explication of Father Mallebranche, from reaſons all taken from this principle.

but chimerical; but it may be of uſe to oblige man, by the conſciouſneſs of his ignorance, to to forbear affirming that the ſun ſhines, ſnow is white &c. If therefore we deceive ourſelves in affirming the exiſtence of extenſion, God will not be the cauſe of it, ſince you acknowledge that he is not the cauſe of this peaſant's error. Such are the advantages, which theſe new Philoſophers would procure to the Scepticks, but I will not take advantage of them.

Immediately the philoſophical Abbot declared to the other, that if he were deſirous of triumphing over a Sceptick, he muſt begin to prove to him, that truth is certainly diſcoverable by ſome marks, and theſe are commonly called criterium veritatis. You may juſtly maintain to him, that evidence is the ſure characteriſtic of truth; for if evidence was not, nothing in the univerſe could be ſo. Be it ſo, will he ſay; I wanted to have you there. I will ſhew you ſome things which you reject as falſe, which yet are as evident as poſſible. I. It is evident that things which are not different from a third, do not differ one from the other (14): this is the baſis of all our arguments; hereon is grounded all our ſyllogiſms; and yet we are aſſured, by the revelation of the myſtery of the Trinity, that this axiom is falſe. Though you invent ever ſo many diſtinctions, you yet will never be able to ſhew, that this maxim is not contradicted by this great myſtery. II. It is evident that there is no difference between individuum, nature, and perſon; and yet the abovementioned myſtery convinces us, that perſons may be multiplied, and yet individuums and natures will not ceaſe to be one. III. It is evident, that, for a man to be really and perfectly a perſon, it is ſufficient to unite together a human body and a rational ſoul; and yet the myſtery of the Incarnation teaches us, that this is not ſufficient; whence it follows that neither you nor I can be certain whether we be perſons: for if it was eſſential to a human body and a rational ſoul, united together, to conſtitute a perſon, God could never cauſe, that thus united, they ſhould not conſtitute a perſon; it muſt therefore be ſaid, that perſonality is, with regard to them, merely accidental. Now every accident may be ſeparated from its ſubject after ſeveral ways; it is therefore poſſible to God to prevent us, ſeveral ways, from being perſons, though we conſiſt of ſoul and body; and who knows whether he does not employ ſome of thoſe ways to diveſt us of perſonality? Is he obliged to reveal to us the ſeveral ways he diſpoſes of us? IV. It is evident, that a human body cannot be in ſeveral places at the ſame time; and that its head cannot be penetrated, with all the reſt of its parts, under an indiviſible point; and yet we are taught, by the myſtery of the Euchariſt, that theſe two things happen daily (15): whence it follows, that neither you nor I can be certain whether we are diſtinct from other men; and whether we are not now in the Seraglio at Conſtantinople, in Canada, in Japan, and in every city of the world, under various conditions in every place. As God does nothing in vain, would he create a multitude of men, when only one, created in ſeveral places, and informed with various qualities, according to the places, would be ſufficient for his purpoſe? By this doctrine we loſe the truths, which we uſed to find in numbers; for we no longer know how many two and three make; we do not know what identity and diverſity are. If we ſuppoſe that John and Peter are two men, it is only becauſe we ſee them in different places, and becauſe one has not all the accidents of the other. But the foundation of this diſtinction is quite invalidated by the doctrine of the Euchariſt. There perhaps is but one creature, in the whole univerſe, multiplied, in ſeveral places, by production, and the diverſity of qualities; we make a long arithmetical calculation, as though there were a multitude of diſtinct beings (16); but this is only a vain imagination. We not only no longer know whether there are two bodies, but we are even ignorant whether there is a body and ſpirit: for if matter can be pervaded, it is plain that extenſion is no more than an accident of the body; and thus the body according to its eſſence, is an unextended ſubſtance: it therefore may receive all the attributes which we conceive in the mind, the underſtanding, the will, the paſſions, and ſenſations; there therefore is no longer a rule, to diſcern whether a ſubſtance is ſpiritual in its nature, or whether it be corporeal. V. It is evident that the modes of a ſubſtance cannot ſubſiſt without the ſubſtance which they modify; and nevertheleſs we know, by the myſtery of Tranſubſtantiation, that this is falſe (17). This confounds all our ideas; we can no longer define ſubſtance; for if the accident can ſubſiſt without any ſubject, then ſubſtance, in its turn, may ſubſiſt dependently of another ſubſtance, after the manner of accidents; a ſpirit may ſubſiſt after the manner of bodies, as, in the bleſſed Sacrament, matter exiſts after the manner of ſpirits: theſe may be impaſſible as matter is pervadable: now, if by coming from the darkneſs of Heatheniſm to the light of the Goſpel, we have learnt the falſity of ſo many evident notions, and ſo many certain definitions (18), what will it be, when we quit the darkneſs of this life, and riſe midſt all the glories of paradiſe? Shall we not, in all probability, learn the falſity of a thouſand things which now appear to us indiſputable? Let us take advantage by the temerity, with which thoſe who lived before the Goſpel diſpenſation, affirmed, that ſome certain evident doctrines were true, the falſity of which the myſteries of our theology has revealed to us.

Let us now proceed to morality. I. It is evident that we ought to prevent evil, whenever it is in our power, and that it is a crime in us to permit it, whenever it is in our power to prevent it. Nevertheleſs our theology ſhews us that this is falſe; it teaches us, that God does not do any thing unworthy of his perfections, when he permits all the wild diſorders which are in the world, though he might eaſily have prevented them. II. It is evident, that a creature which does not exiſt, cannot be an accomplice in an evil action. III. And that it is unjuſt to puniſh it, as being an accomplice in that action; nevertheleſs our doctrine of original ſin ſhews us the falſity of theſe evidences. IV. It is evident that we ought to prefer what is honeſt to what is profitable; and that the more holy a Being is, the leſs it is allowed to prefer what is profitable to what is honeſt. Nevertheleſs our Divines tell us, that it being at the option of God to chooſe, either a world that was perfectly regular, and adorned with virtues of every kind, and ſuch a world as ours, where ſin and irregularity are predominant; preferred the latter to the former, as ſuiting better the intereſt of his glory. It will be objected to me, that we muſt not meaſure and regulate the duties of the Creator by one of our duties; but if ſuch an objection is ſtarted, the objector will fall into one of the ſnares of his adverſaries. They only want to have you there; their grand aim is, to prove that the abſolute nature of things is unknown to us, and that we only know certain relations of it (19), We know not, ſay theſe, whether ſugar be ſweet in itſelf; all we know is, that it ſeems ſweet to us when we taſte it. We do not know whether a certain action be honeſt in itſelf, and naturally; we only believe that with regard to ſuch a perſon, with reſpect to certain circumſtances, it has the appearance or exteriour of honeſty. But it is another thing in other reſpects and in other relations. Behold then to what that man expoſes himſelf, who ſays that the ideas, which we have of juſtice and honeſty, admit of exception, and are relative. Conſider alſo, that the more we exalt the power or right of God to the privilege of acting contrary to our ideas, the more we ſhall deſtroy the only way we have of proving that there are bodies; this way is, that God does not deceive us; and that he would deceive us, in caſe the corporeal world did not exiſt. To ſhew a whole nation a ſight or ſpectacle, which does not exiſt out of their minds, would be an impoſition. Diſtinguo, (I diſtinguiſh) will it be anſwered; if a Monarch did this, concedo (I grant it;) if God did it, nego (I deny it;) for the rights of God are quite different from thoſe of Kings. Not to mention, that if the exceptions, you take to the principles of morality, are grounded on the incomprehenſible infinitude of God, I can never be certain of any thing; for I can never be able to comprehend the whole extent of the rights and privileges

(14) Quæ ſunt idem uni tertio ſunt idem inter ſe.

(15) I am to obſerve, that theſe are an Abbé's words. I am obliged to give this notice, in this ſecond edition, becauſe I have been told that ſeveral Proteſtants have been offended, to ſee the myſtery of the Trinity, and that of the Incarnation, put in parallel with the tenet of the real Preſence and Tranſubſtantiation.

(16) I am to obſerve, that if a body may be produced in ſeveral places, every other being, ſpirit, place, accident, &c. may be multiplied in the ſame manner; and thus there will not be a multitude of beings, but all will be reduced to one ſole created being.

(17) See the marginal note (15).

(18) Thoſe who hold tranſubſtantiation, place the eſſence of matter in the faculty of receiving extenſion, and ſo of the eſſence of all things: nothing is actual: every capacity is paſſive; now this capacity may conſiſt with ſpirit, &c. which confounds all definitions.

(19) The ſtrength of their Logick, conſiſted in a common place, which was that of relation, the eighth in the order of ten; and by which the Partizans of the Sect ſhew, that we judge of things only by compariſon, which they expreſs thus, πάντα πρὸς τί, omnia ſunt ad aliquid. La Mothe le Vayer, on the Virtue of the Heathens, Tom. 5. p. 217.

to implore the aſſiſtance of Heaven, and ſubmit to the authority of the faith [C]. As the particulars I relate (c) concerning a conference, in which two Abbes diſputed of Scepticiſm, may perplex many of my readers, I deſign to illuſtrate that matter, in a diſſertation at the concluſion of this work. We muſt conſider as ſo many trifling jeſts, or rather as impoſtures, the ſtories related by Antigonus Caryſtius (d), viz. that Pyrrho did not prefer one thing to another; and that neither a chariot nor a precipice could ever make him ſtep ever ſo little backward, or on one ſide; and that his friends who were in

(c) In the rem. [B].

(d) Apud Diogenem Laertium, lib. 9. num. 62.

leges of God. I concluded after this manner. If there was a mark or characteriſtic, by which truth could certainly be known, this would be evidence: now evidence is not ſuch a mark ſince it ſuits with falſities; therefore &c.

The Abbé, to whom this long diſcourſe was directed, could ſcarce forbear interrupting it. It was with prodigious pain he liſtned to it; and when he found that every one was ſilent, he flew into a violent paſſion againſt the Scepticks (20), and did not ſpare the other Abbé, for mentioning the objections or difficulties taken from the ſyſtems of Divinity. This Abbé replied modeſtly, that he knew very well that thoſe objections were very trifling, and mere Sophiſms; but then that it was but juſt that thoſe, who behave with ſo much haughtineſs towards the Scepticks, ſhould not be ignorant of the ſtate of matters. He went on thus: Till now you imagined that it would be impoſſible for a Sceptic to puzzle you; anſwer me therefore: you are forty five years old; you do not doubt of this; and if you are ſure of any thing, it is, that you are the ſame perſon to whom the Abbey of . . . was given, two years ſince. But I will now prove, that you have no good reaſon to be certain of this. I ſhall argue from the principles of our Divinity. Your ſoul was created: God muſt therefore renew its exiſtence every moment; or the preſervation of creatures is a perpetual creation. Who told you that God did not, this very morning, permit that ſoul to relapſe into non-entity; that ſoul which he had continued to create till then, from the firſt moment of your life? Who has told you that he did not create another ſoul modified like yours (21)? This new ſoul is that which you now have. Shew me the contrary, and let the company judge of my objection. A learned Divine, who was preſent, anſwered, and acknowledged, that creation being once ſuppoſed, God could as eaſily create every moment a new ſoul, as produce again the ſame ſoul; but that nevertheleſs the ideas of his wiſdom, and ſtill more the light which his word affords us, are ſufficient to aſſure us, that we have the identical numerical ſoul to day, which we had yeſterday, the day before &c. and we concluded that we ought not to amuſe ourſelves in diſputing with Scepticks, nor imagine that their Sophiſms can be eaſily eluded by the mere force of reaſon; that we ought, in the firſt place, to make them ſenſible of the infirmity of reaſon, in order that this may prompt them to have recourſe to a better guide which is faith. This is the ſubject of the following remark.

(20) Compare this with what La Mothe le Vayer relates in the ſecond part of his Proſe chagrine, Tom. 9. of his works.

(21) That is, with the reminiſcence or memory, which he would have reproduced, had he continued to create the Abbe's ſoul.

[C] It may . . . oblige man . . . to implore the aſſiſtance of heaven, and ſubmit to the authority of faith.] A modern author, who had ſtudied the ſect of the Scepticks more than any other, looks upon it as that which is leaſt oppoſite to the Chriſtian Religion, and which may moſt eaſily admit the myſteries of our Religion (22). He gives ſome reaſons to enforce his opinion, and then proceeds as follows (23). We therefore have juſt reaſon to believe the ſyſtem of the Scepticks, grounded on an ingenuous acknowledgment of the ignorance of human nature, the leaſt repugnant to our belief, and the beſt adapted to receive the ſupernatural light of the faith. In this we advance nothing but what is conformable to the ſoundeſt Divinity, ſince that (†) of St. Deny does not inculcate any point more expreſsly than the weakneſs of the human underſtanding, and its ignorance, with reſpect to divine things in particular. It is thus that this great Doctor explains what God himſelf has pronounced by the mouth of his Prophets (*), who made darkneſs his retreat: for this being ſo, we cannot approach him without entring into that myſterious darkneſs, whence we learn this important leſſon, that he cannot be known any otherwiſe than in a dark manner, covered with ænigmas or clouds; and, as the ſchools ſay, by being ignorant of him. But as thoſe, who have always profeſſed humility and ignorance, will be much better ſatisfied than others with this ſpiritual darkneſs: the dogmatiſts, on the contrary, who never dreaded any thing more than to appear ignorant, are immediately loſt in it; and being ſo preſumptuous as to believe the light of their underſtanding was ſufficient to pierce through darkneſs of every kind, they thereby blind themſelves the more, as they imagine that they advance forward into an obſcurity which human nature cannot pierce. However this be, I think that Scepticiſm is of great benefit to a Chriſtian ſoul, when it prompts him to lay aſide all thoſe magiſterial opinions which St Paul has in ſo much abhorrence. He expatiates more accurately and ſtrongly on this in another book (24).

(22) La Mothe le Vayer, on the Virtue of the Heathens, Tom. 5. of his works, p. 229. See alſo Abbé Foucher's Diſſertations on the Philoſophy of the Academicks.

(23) La Mothe le Vayer, ibid. p. 231.

† Lib. 1. de myſt. pb. c. 1 & 2.

* Poſuit tenebras latibulum ſuum.

(24) In part 2 of his Proſe chagrine, Tom. 9. of his works.

When a perſon is able to well comprehend all the ways of ſuſpending his judgment laid down by Sextus Empiricus, he perceives that this logick is the greateſt effort of ſubtlety, that the mind of man is capable of; but we ſee at the ſame time, that this ſubtlety is no ways ſatisfactory; it confounds itſelf; for were it ſolid, it would prove that it is certain we ought to doubt. There therefore would be ſome certainty; there would be a certain rule of truth. This would ruin that ſyſtem, but we need not be under any apprehenſions that things would come to that; the reaſons for our doubting are themſelves doubtful. How great a Chaos, and how great a torture is this for the human mind! One would therefore conclude, that the unhappineſs of this condition is beſt ſuited to convince us, that our reaſon is one of the miſleaders, ſince, when this faculty diſplays itſelf with the greateſt ſubtlety, it yet plunges us into ſuch an abyſs. The natural conſequence of this is, that we ought to renounce ſuch a guide, and to implore the cauſe of all things to give us a better. This is making a great ſtep towards the Chriſtian religion; it requiring us to expect, from God, the knowledge of thoſe things, which we ought to believe, and ought to do: it requires us to captivate our underſtandings to the obedience of faith. If a man is convinced, that nothing good is to be expected from his philoſophical enquiries, he will be the more prompted to offer up his prayers to God, in order that he would perſuade him of the belief of thoſe truths which we ought to believe, than if he flatters himſelf with the hopes of ſucceeding by reaſoning and diſputing. It is therefore a happy diſpoſition of a man towards faith, when he is ſenſible how defective reaſon is; and hence it is that Paſcal, and ſome other Writers, declared, that to convert Free-thinkers, reaſon ought to be degraded as much as poſſible, and repreſented as a faculty that ought not to be much relied on. Calvin writes admirably on this ſubject, he ſaying as follows in the Liturgy of Baptiſm (25); that is, he thus begins his inſtructions for thoſe, who are to be initiated in the Chriſtian religion. In this (26) therefore God would have us be humble and diſpleaſed with ourſelves; and in this manner he prepares us to implore and require his Grace, in order that all the perverſity and curſe of our nature may be aboliſhed. For we are not qualified to receive it, till we have firſt diveſted ourſelves of all confidence in our own virtue, wiſdom and juſtice, and condemned every thing that is in us. However, after ſhewing us our unhappineſs, he comforts us in like manner by his mercy; he promiſing to regenerate us, by his holy ſpirit, in a new life, which may be to us as an entrance into his Kingdom. This regeneration conſiſts of two parts, viz. DENYING to follow OUR OWN REASON, our pleaſure and will; and CAPTIVATING OUR UNDERSTANDING and heart, to the wiſdom and juſtice of God, we mortify whatever belongs to ourſelves and the fleſh; and then that we FOLLOW THE LIGHT OF GOD, to comply with, and obey, his will, as he inſtructs us to do by his word, and leads us to it by his ſpirit. Be this as it will, ſome perſons of

(25) It is to be obſerved, that this Liturgy is uſed in the churches of the Geneva confeſſion; and therefore the maxims contained in it ought to be conſidered as the general opinion of thoſe churches, and not as the particular opinion of John Calvin.

(26) i. e. By telling us that we muſt be regenerated.

in company with him very often ſaved his life. It can never be thought he was ſo mad as that comes to [D]: however, it cannot be doubted, but that he taught that the honour and infamy of actions, and the juſtice and injuſtice of them, depended only on human laws, and on cuſtom (e). How abominable ſoever this tenet may be, it follows naturally from the ſceptical principle following, that the abſolute and internal nature of objects is hid from us; and that we can be ſure only of what they appear to us in certain reſpects. The ſupineneſs and indifference of Pyrrho was aſtoniſhing [E]. He did not love any thing, nor was he ever angry upon any account (f); and no man in the world was

(e) Idem, ibid. num. 61.

(f) This muſt not be taken in a ſtrict ſenſe; he doubtleſs wiſhed to enjoy health rather than be ſick, &c.

of great abilities aſſert, that nothing can be more oppoſite to religion than ſcepticiſm. " (27). It is the " total extinction, not only of faith but of reaſon; " and nothing can be more impoſſible than to reclaim " ſuch as have carried their wild way of thinking to " ſuch an exceſs. The moſt ignorant perſons may be inſtructed, the moſt obſtinate maybe convinced, and the " moſt incredulous be perſuaded; but it is impoſſible, " I will not ſay, to convince a Sceptick, but to reaſon " juſtly againſt him; it not being poſſible to object " to him any proof, but what will be the groſſeſt of " all ſophiſms, I mean, a begging of the queſtion. " And indeed, no argument can be concluſive, but " by ſuppoſing, that whatever is evident is true, that " is, by ſuppoſing the thing in queſtion: for ſcep- " ticiſm, properly ſpeaking, conſiſts in not admit- " ting that fundamental maxim of the Dogmatiſts " (28)." See Voſſius, who having ſaid that Scepticiſm and Epicuriſm are very repugnant to the Chriſtian religion, confirms his opinion by a paſſage from Clemens Romanus (29). Hinc Nicetas de ſe, & fratre Aquila in epitome Clementis Romani, de geſtis B. Petri p. 56. ed. Adr. Turnebi, in Latina Perionii tralatione ex Pariſienſi editione Sonnii fol. 596. Ἠκριβώσαμεν δὲ καὶ τὰ φιλοσόφων, ἐξαιρέτως τὰ ἀθεώτατα. λέγω δὲ τὰ Ἐπικούρου καὶ Πύῤῥωνος, ἵνα καὶ μᾶλλον ἀνασκευάζειν δυνάμεθα. Accurate etiam ea inquiſivimus, quæ à Philoſophis traduntur: præcipue illa, quæ maxime repugnant pietati erga Deum: Illa, inquam, Epicuri ac Pyrrhonis, quo magis ea refellere poſſemus. *Nempe Nicetas quidem fuerat Epicurcus: Aquila vero Pyrrhonios erat ſecutus, ut apud ipſum eſt Clementem in octavo Recognitionum libro , quod opus Græce non exſtat, ſed Latine ex tralatione Rufini Aquilejenſis (30). i. e. " Hence Nice- " tas, in his epitome of Clemens Romanus, &c. " ſpeaking concerning himſelf and his brother Aqui- " la, ſays, We have made a diligent enquiry into thoſe " things which are advanced by the Philoſophers, ſuch " particularly as are the moſt repugnant to religion; I " mean what Epicurus and Pyrrho have advanced, in " order that we might confute them the more eaſily. For " Nicetas had been of the ſect of the Epicureans, and " Aquila a follower of Pyrrho, as appears from the " eighth book of Clemens Romanus's Recognitions, " which book is not extant in the Greek tongue, but " only Rufinus's Latin verſion of it."

I am to obſerve, that La Mothe le Vayer does not indulge the Scepticks the ſame favour as he did many ancient Philoſophers: the following particulars, copied from him, include ſeveral particulars which ſuit this article. " I deſpair of Pyrrho's ſalvation, " and that of all his Diſciples, who have entertained " the ſame opinion as he did of the Deity. How- " ever, they did not, as ſome perſons have believed, " profeſs Atheiſm. It appears from Sextus Empiri- " cus *, that they admitted the exiſtence of the Gods, " like the reſt of the Philoſophers; that they paid " them the cuſtomary worſhip, and did not deny their " providence. But beſides that, they never acknow- " ledged a firſt cauſe, which might have made them " deſpiſe the idolatry of the age in which they lived; " it is certain that they did not believe any parti- " cular, with regard to the divine nature, but with a " ſuſpenſion of mind, nor confeſſed any thing of " what was ſaid above, except in a doubtful way, " and merely in compliance with the laws and cuſ- " toms of the age and country in which they lived: " conſequently, ſince they have not had the ſmalleſt " ray of that implicit faith, on which we have " grounded the hopes of the ſalvation of ſome Hea- " thens, who have poſſeſſed it together with an ex- " traordinary Grace from Heaven; I cannot ſee there " is the leaſt room for our believing, that any Scep- " tick of that caſt can avoid going to hell (31)."

(27) La Placette, Traite de la Conſcience, p. 377.

(28) This maxim was formerly more powerful, when uſed, for inſtance, by the Stoicks, than it has been ſince, that one may aſſert ad hominem to Divines, that ſome evident propoſitions are falſe. See, in the rem. [B] above, the diſpute of the two Abbots.

(29) Voſſius, de Philoſophorum Sectis, p. 107, 108.

* Fol. 81. 6.

(30) Voſſius, de Philoſophorum Sectis, p. 108.

* Lib. 3. Pyr. hyp. c. 1.

(31) La Mothe le Vayer, of the Virtue of the Heathens, p. 226.

[D] It can never be thought, he was ſo mad as that comes to.] I will again cite la Mothe le Vayer (32). I know it is aſſerted by Antigonus Caryſtius, that Pyrrho would not have ſtirred a ſtep out of his way, neither for a car, a precipice, nor a mad dog; and that he was preſerved from all thoſe diſaſters ſolely by his friends. But why ſhould we give credit to this Antigonus rather than to Ænefidemus, who wrote eight books of the ſect † of the Scepticks or Pyrrhonians, and who affirms that their founder was never guilty of any ſuch mad actions? They indeed are ſo improbable, and it is ſo difficult for a man to perſuade himſelf, that they might have been oppoſed by ſo great a number of Philoſophers, that I ſhould ſcruple to believe them, though they had not been contradicted by any perſon, and that the reſt of Pyrrho's life did not prove them to be falſe. And indeed it is agreed, that he lived till near ninety years of age, the greateſt part of which he ſpent in travelling; he having viſited the Magi of Perſia, and converſed with the Gymnoſophiſts of India. Is it probable, that a man who plunged himſelf into dangers of every kind, had lived to ſo advanced an age, and that he could meet, in all places, friends enough to free him from ſo many evils, which even thoſe who travel with the greateſt prudence and foreſight, find it very difficult to avoid? Be this as it will, he ought to be conſidered as the founder of a mighty ſect, and one who doubtleſs was conſiderable on many accounts. If there even was nothing to alledge in his favour, except what we read in his life, viz. of his being created Pontifex Maximus by his countrymen, this would be ſufficient to prove the calumny of his enemies, it not being probable to ſuppoſe that they would have beſtowed ſo important an office on a man of ſo fantaſtical a caſt . . . (33). He never wrote any thing, ſo that we cannot form a judgment of his capacity from his works. But abſtracted from what we may ſuppoſe from his exalted reputation, the ſole privilege of immunity which the city of Elis, the place of his birth, granted to all Philoſophers upon his account, and the honour he received from the Athenians, by their making him a deniſon of their city (34), an honour they granted to few, ſpeak his conſpicuous merit.

(32) Ibid. p. 213, 214.

† Diog. Laert. Photius in Bibl.

(33) La Mothe le Vayer, of the Virtue of the Heathens, p. 227.

(34) We ſhall ſhew in the rem. [H], that this is falſe.

[E] The ſupineneſs and indifference of Pyrrho was aſtoniſhing.] I will give but one inſtance of it. Anaxarchus falling into a ditch, Pyrrho ſaw him there, and would not lend the leaſt helping hand to get him out, but went on. He was juſtly blamed on that account; for he ought to have helped, on ſuch an occaſion, a man, who was an entire ſtranger to him, much more a profeſſor. The reader will preſently ſee, that the maſter knew more than the diſciple on that head; for Anaxarchus not only made no complaint againſt Pyrrho, and did not approve that any perſon ſhould cenſure him for it, but alſo applauded him for that indolent temper, and his not loving any thing. Could any thing more ſurprizing than this be ſeen among the Friers of La Trape? Καί ποτε Ἀναξάρχου εἰς τέλμα ἐμπεσόντος, παρελθὼν οὐ βοηθήσας· τινῶν δὲ αἰτιωμένων, αὐτὸς Ἀνάξαρχος· ἐπῄνει τὸ ἀδιάφορον καὶ ἄοργον αὐτοῦ. Et cùm aliquando Anaxarchus in ſcrobem incidiſſet, ille pertranſiit nihil ei opem ferens. Idque cùm plerique culparent, Anaxarchus ipſe laudabat, ut indifferenter & ſine affectu ſe habentem (35). This puts me in mind of a repartee mentioned by Abbé de St. Real. I could, ſays he (36), make the ſame reply as did one of the ancients, who being reproached for having very little regard to Philoſophy, though himſelf was a Philoſopher; This very thing, anſwered he, I call philoſophizing. This anſwer was worthy both of Pyrrho and Anaxarchus.

(35) Diog. Laert. in Pyrrhone, lib. 9. num. 63.

(36) Ceſarion, ou Entretiens Divers. p. 31, 32. Hague edit.

Here follows another ſaying. Pyrrho maintained, that to live or die were things equally indifferent. Why do not you die then? (ſays one to him;) for that very reaſon, replied he; it is becauſe life and death are equally indifferent. This particular is not mentioned was more perſuaded than he of the vanity of things [F]. Whenever he ſpoke, he did not much care whether he was, or was not, liſtened to; and though he perceived that his auditors went away, he nevertheleſs uſed to go on (g). He kept houſe with his ſiſter, and divided equally with her the ſmalleſt domeſtic concerns [G]. Thoſe who relate that he was made a deniſon of the city of Athens, for having killed a King of Thrace are greatly tioned by Diogenes Laertius, but Stobæus preſented it. Πύῤῥων ἔλεγε μηδὲν διαφέρειν ζῆν ἢ τεθνάναι· καί τις εἰπόντος πρὸς αὐτὸν, τί οὖν σὺ οὐκ ἀποθνήσκεις, ὁ δὲ, Ὅτι, εἶπεν, οὐδὲν διαφέρει. Pyrrhon ajebat, nihil intereſſe inter vitam & mortem. Et cùm quidam ad eum diceret, cur igitur ipſe non moreris? Quia nihil intereſt, reſpondit (37). Let it not be objected that he would have forgot his maxims, had he been in danger of preſent death. Let it not be ſaid, (37) Stobæus, Sermone 118.

(g) Diog. Laert. ubi ſupra, num. 62.

Era fuor de perigli un ſacripante,
Ma ne perigli havea cara la vita.

"When far from danger he was brave as Hector;
"But fearful as a hare when perils threatned."

He evinced the contrary, when in imminent danger of being ſhipwrecked. Pyrrho was the only perſon who was undiſmayed at the ſtorm; and obſerving that the reſt were ſeized with fear and the deepeſt melancholy, he deſired them, with an undiſturbed air, to look at a hog who was there, and who was feeding as uſual: Such, added he, ought to be the inſenſibility of the wiſe man (38). Τῶν γὰρ ἐμπλεόντων ἰσχυρῶς ταρασσομένων ὑπὸ χειμῶνος, αὐτὸς γαληνός ὢν ἀνέῤῥωσε τὴν ψυχὴν, δείξας ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ χοιρίδιον ἔσθιον, καὶ εἰπὼν, ὡς χρὴ τὸν σοφὸν ἐν τοιαύτῃ καθησύχαι ἀλαζαξίᾳ. Navi aliquando vehebatur & cùm ſocii tempeſtate acti mœſtiores eſſent, ipſe tranquillo animo porcellum in navi edentem oſtendebat, dicens, oportere ſapientem tali animi tranquillitate eſſe (39).

(38) Compare this with the doctrine of Diogenes the Cynic, mentioned by Du Rondel, rem. [C], of the art. PEREIRA.

(39) Diog. Laert. lib. 9. num. 68.

[F] No man in the world was more perſuaded than he of the vanity of things.] He eſpecially deſpiſed mankind, and was for ever repeating the line in which Homer compares men to leaves. Θαυμάζων αὐτὸν, καὶ συνεχὲς λέγων (40),

(40) Idem, ibid. num. 67.

Οἵηπερ φύλλων γενεὴ, τοιήδε καὶ ἀνδρῶν (41).

(41) It is the 146th ver. of Iliad 6.

Miratum eum (Homerum) aſſidueque pronuntiare ſolitum ejus verſiculum, tale quidem genus eſt hominum, quale eſt foliorum. Gaſſendi ſays that he was pleaſed with this compariſon, becauſe it expreſſed the mortality of mankind; and that fickleneſs of their opinions, whereby they are, like leaves, the ſport of every wind. Quaſi exinde ſignificetur non hominum modo, perinde ac foliorum natura caduca, ſed opinio quoque inconſtans & perinde mutabilis ac minimo vento ſunt arborum folia mobilia (42). He took a great delight in thoſe other paſſages of Homer, where men are compared to birds and flies; and in which their infirmities and childiſhneſs are deſcribed (43). Καὶ ὅσα συνεῖναι εἰς τὸ ἀβέβαιον, καὶ κενόσπουδον ἅμα καὶ παιδαριώδεις τῶν ἀνθρώπων. Sicut & cætera illius, quibus infirmitas & inania ſtudia atque pueriles hominum motus indicantur (44). I am ſurprized, it is not ſaid, that he was infinitely pleaſed with the following verſes of Homer;

(42) Gaſſendi, de Logicæ fine, cap. 2. p. m. 70.

(43) Diog. Laert. lib. 9. num. 68.

(44) Idem, ibid.

Τοῖος γὰρ νόος ἐστὶν ἐπιχθονίων ἀνθρώπων,
Οἷον ἐπ' ἦμαρ ἄγῃσι πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν τε θεῶν τε (45).

(45) Homer. Odyſſ. lib. 18. ver. 135. See St. Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. 5. cap. 8.

"The mind of man is juſt as Heaven inſpires it."

It ſignifies, that the mind of man is unſtable; and that God gives them their proviſion of reaſon as a kind of daily bread, which he renews every morning. This agrees admirably well with the hypotheſis or doctrine of the Scepticks. They were for ever making enquiries; were never ſteady; and were ready every moment to argue after a new manner, according as the occurrences happened. A certain Divine does the ſame, if his adverſary may be credited; above all he cannot excuſe his varying, and his perpetual contradictions (46). He ſhews him, that he lays down principles according as he wants them; but that the moment they begin to incommode him, he ſubſtitutes oppoſite ones in their ſtead: and to uſe his words, he reproaches him with reaſoning from hand to mouth, and according to the paſſion whoſe turn it is to command in his ſoul. And yet this Divine is very peremptory; he denies; he affirms magiſterially and expeditiouſly. The Scepticks were not more reſerved on this occaſion than he is bold. A man ſhould not encroach upon their rights, but leave them the privilege of reaſoning from hand to mouth; a privilege they aſſume to themſelves in Cicero (47). By the way, opinions and paſſions are ſo prodigiouſly fickle, that one would conclude that man is a little commonwealth which frequently changes its magiſtrates.

(46) Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, Oct. 1694. p. 72. In the extract of Saurin's book, entitled, Examen de la Theologie de Mr. Jurieu.

(47) Tuſcul. lib. 6. folio 273, D.

[G] He divided . . . . the ſmalleſt domeſtic concerns.] He uſed to carry chickens, hogs, milk, &c. to market to ſell; he uſed to ſweep the houſe and clean the furniture, as if he had been the ſervant maid of the houſe (48). The reaſon of this was, all things were indifferent to him, and he did not think that one thing was better than another. Τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς οἰκίας καθάρσια ἀδιαφόρως, domique indifferenter munditiem curabat (49). However, he was not always the ſame man, he being angry one day with his ſiſter; and when ſome one told him, that his anger did not ſuit with the indolence he profeſſed; do ye think, ſays he, that I will practiſe that virtue for the ſake of a woman; Χολήσας τι περὶ τῆς ἀδελφῆς πρὸς τὸν λαβέμενον εἰπεῖν, ὡς οὐκ ἐν γυναικὶ ἡ ἐπίδειξις τῆς ἀδιαφορίας. Cum ſorori quandoque ſuccenſuiſſet, argueretque illum quiſpiam ut immemorem inſtituti ſui, non, inquit, muliercula documentum erit noſtræ indifferentiæ. The reader muſt not ſuppoſe his meaning to be, that he did not bid adieu to the paſſion of love; this was far from being his thought: he meant, that every ſubject or occaſion did not merit his putting in practice his doctrine, viz. of not being angry at any thing. The cauſe of his anger was highly unworthy a philoſopher, and particularly of ſuch a Philoſopher. He was angry with his ſiſter, becauſe he was forced to buy the things ſhe wanted, in order to offer a ſacrifice; a friend who had promiſed to provide them not having kept his word. This we are told by Euſebius. Φιλίστης δὲ τῆς ἀδελφῆς αὐτῷ θυούσης, ἔπειτα τῶν φίλων τινὸς ὑποσχομένου τὰ πρὸς τὴν θυσίαν, καὶ μὴ παραχομένου τῷ μέντοι Πύῤῥωνι θριαμβεύσαντος, καὶ ἀγανακτοῦντος, ἐπειδὴ ποτε ὁ φίλος ἔλεγεν, ὡς οὐ ποιήσαιτο σύμφωνα τοῖς λόγοις, οὐδ' ἄξια τῆς ἀπαθείας· εἶπεῖν αὐτὸν, ἐν γοῦν γυναικὶ οὐ δεῖ τὴν ἀπόδειξιν αὐτῆς ποιεῖσθαι· καίτοι δικαίως ἂν εἶπεν ὁ φίλος, ὅτι μαλαία καὶ ἐν γυναικὶ, καὶ κυνὶ, καὶ πᾶσιν (50). i. e. "Philiſta his ſiſter preparing a ſacrifice, "a friend of his promiſed to furniſh every thing "neceſſary on that occaſion, but failed to do it. "Pyrrho was then forced to provide thoſe things at "his own expence, and falling into a paſſion on that "account, his friend obſerved to him, that he was "far from following the maxims of his own philo-"ſophy, he not being free from all paſſion or per-"turbation of mind. To this Pyrrho replied, that "women were to be excepted on ſuch occaſions. "Says his friend (very juſtly) this kind of philoſophy "will be of no uſe with regard to women, dogs, "and all other things beſide." The Author, in theſe laſt words, alludes to the anſwer, which Pyrrho made when he was laughed at for running away, to ſave himſelf from a dog. He replied, it is a very difficult matter to put off the man. Ἀντίγονος ὁ Καρύστιος καλὰ τὰς αὐτὰς γινόμενος χρόνους, καὶ ἀναγράψας αὐτῶν [τὸν βίον, φησὶ τὸν Πύῤῥωνα διωκόμενον ὑπὸ κυνὸς, ἀναφυγεῖν ἐπί τι δένδρον· σκωπτόμενον δ' ὑπὸ τῶν παρόντων, εἰπεῖν ὡς χαλεπὸν εἴη τὸν ἄνδρωπον ἐκδῦναι (51). i. e. "Antigonus Caryſtius, who lived in the ſame time, "and wrote their lives, relates, that Pyrrho, to ſave "himſelf from a dog, ran to a tree; and being "laughed at for it by thoſe who were preſent, he "replied, it is extremely difficult to put off the "man."

(48) Diog. Laert. lib. 9. num. 66.

(49) Idem, ibid.

(50) Ariſtocles, apud Euſebium, Præparat. Evangel. lib. 14. cap. 18. p. m. 763.

(51) Idem, ibid. p. m. 763.

[H] Theſe

greatly miſtaken [H]. Moreri has not committed many errors [I].

(b) See the rem. [E].

The equality he put between life and death (b) has been very much applauded by Epictetus, though, in other reſpects, he had Scepticiſm in the utmoſt contempt [K].

☞ For the ſatisfaction of many perſons, we ſhall add ſome reflections to this article of Bayle [A].

PYRRHUS,

[H] Thoſe who relate that he was made a Deniſon of the city of Athens, for having killed a King of Thrace, are greatly miſtaken.] This error was occaſioned by a ſimilitude of names. One Pyrrho, a Diſciple of Plato (52), was made a deniſon of Athens, for having killed Cotys King of Thrace (53). To this is owing the falſity of thoſe who aſſert that our Pyrrho committed this murder, and obtained the juſt mentioned reward (54).

(52) Plut. adverſus Colotem; circa fin. See alſo de laudando ſeipſo, p. 542, and de gerenda Republica, p. 816.

(53) Demoſthenes, adverſus Ariſtocratem, p. m. 445.

(54) Diocles ſays ſo, in Diog. Laert. lib. 9. num. 65.

[I] Moreri has not committed many errors.] Only five. I. Theſe words, Pyrrho was of opinion that men did nothing but by cuſtom, are abſurd. He was not ſo ſtupid as to ſay this. He was ſenſible that ſome Philoſophers aſſerted the natural difference there is between vice and virtue; and that a numberleſs multitude of people do a thouſand things in compliance with the laws. He ought to have expreſſed himſelf thus: Pyrrho maintained, that in reality, nothing was either this or that; but that the nature of things depended on the laws and on cuſtom; that is, that men, by their laws and cuſtoms, declared ſome things to be good, laudable, bad, blame-worthy, &c. This was his Doctrine. If Diogenes Laertius did not mean this, ſo much the worſe for him. I expreſs myſelf in this manner, becauſe his words are not ſo clear, to make his readers believe that the meaning of them is, that mankind by their laws and cuſtoms, make every thing to be ſo or ſo. Καὶ ὁμοίως ἐπὶ πάντων, μηδὲν εἶναι τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, νόμῳ δὲ καὶ ἔθει πάντα τοῖς ἀνθρώποις πράττειν· οὐ γὰρ μᾶλλον τόδε ἢ τόδε εἶναι ἕκαστον. Eadem ratione & de omnibus, nihil verè eſſe: cæterum lege atque conſuetudine cuncta homines facere. Neque enim eſſe quicquam iſtud potius quam illud (55). II. I know not in what author he found, that Pyrrho did not care to be interrupted in his philoſophical meditations. Diogenes Laertius does not ſay this, though he declares him to be fond of ſolitude; and he even ſays, that ſuch as put any queſtions to him were never diſſatisfied with his anſwers (56). III. This error is a ſlight one in compariſon of what follows. It is nevertheleſs confeſſed, that he lived to ninety years of age. This is ſuppoſing, that a man who delights to be alone, and does not love to be interrupted in his meditations, could not live to an advanced age. Moſt perſons, who meditate, earneſtly deſire to be free to carry on their meditations without having the thread or ſeries of them interrupted; for the leaſt interruption breaks the chain of their reflections, and is ſo much loſt time to them; and when a man delights in ſolitude, and is diſpleaſed with company, thoſe, who let him be as much alone as he pleaſes, prolong his life. It may therefore be affirmed, that Moreri has made a very ill application of the word nevertheleſs. IV. It does not appear that Pyrrho was made a Deniſon of Athens: this error was copied from la Mothe le Vayer (57). V. Had Moreri copied faithfully another particular from him, this remark would have ended before now. He ſays, that by the eighth manner of ſuſpending one's judgment, which is that of relation, the Scepticks ſhew, that we judge of things only by compariſon (58). Moreri adds to this the word prejudices or prepoſſeſſions; the Scepticks, ſays he, declare, that we judge only by prejudices or compariſon. A bad disjunctive particle; for the manner hinted at here does not relate to prejudices, but only to ſuch judgments as we form of relative qualities, as weight, hardneſs, bigneſs, ſmallneſs, &c.

(55) Diog. Laert. lib. 9. num. 61. p. 581.

(56) Ibid. num. 64.

(57) See the rem. [D].

(58) La Mothe le Vayer, on the Virtue of the Heathens, Tom. 5. p. 217.

[K] The equality he put between life and death has been very much applauded by Epictetus, though, in other reſpects, he had ſcepticiſm in the utmoſt contempt.] "Epictetus had a peculiar veneration for Pyrrho, becauſe "he put life and death upon a level. He was eſpe- "cially fond of the repartee he made (59), &c. "(60) . . . Though he had a high regard for Pyrrho, "he yet had ſo ſtrange a contempt for the Scepticks, "that he could not endure them. He one day ſaid "to a Sceptic, who endeavoured to prove that the "ſenſes always impoſe upon us: who among you "ever miſtook ſo far, as to go to the mill when he "intended to go to the hot bath? He uſed often to "ſay, * were I a ſervant to the Scepticks, I ſhould "take a pleaſure in plaguing them: they ſhould ſay "to me; Epictetus, pour ſome oil into the bath, I "would pour brine on their heads: if they ſhould "aſk me for barley-water, I would bring vine- "gar. And in caſe they blamed me for this, I "would tell them they were miſtaken, and perſuade "them that vinegar is barley-water, or oblige them "to renounce their opinion (61)."

(29) It is in rem. [E], citat. (38).

(60) Giles Boileau, in the Life of Epictetus, p. 11. 43.

* Arrian. lib. 2. Diſſ. c. 20.

(61) Giles Boileau, in Epictetus's Life, p. 49, 50.

[A] Add ſome reflections to this article of Bayle.] That there are people in the world, who doubt abſolutely of all things, and dare not perſuade themſelves that they think and exiſt, this we cannot figure to ourſelves without ſuppoſing them to be diſtracted. The greateſt part of the Scepticks believe many things; for we cannot quite extinguiſh nature, nor go ſo far as entirely to forget what we are: they therefore are endued with a conſciouſneſs; and they not only are conſcious of their being ſomething, but they likewiſe believe that they have an intercourſe with the reſt of mankind, and they accede to ſeveral truths: this happens always when they are not upon their guard: but the inſtant any queſtion is aſked them, or that they call to mind the law they have laid down to themſelves, viz. of always thinking in a quite different manner from the reſt of mankind, they then will own nothing; they ſeek for evaſions and intricacies, to puzzle themſelves and puzzle others. . . . . There are ſome errors can never triumph entirely over nature; there are ſome prejudices which we defend with warmth, the inſtant the truth of them is conteſted, but which we do not follow, in any manner, the moment we ceaſe to attend particularly to them: we think, we ſpeak, we act directly as if we profeſſed quite oppoſite principles: ſuch, for inſtance, is the condition of a man who denies free will, who has taken it into his head to believe that all things are mechaniſm, (governed by the laws of mechanicks) within, without, in bodies and in ſpirits; for, at intervals, he will deliberate, will weigh the reaſons on both ſides; and, according to the importance of the ſubjects, and the concern he has in them, chooſes to ſuſpend his judgment rather than determine inconſiderately. He is pleaſed with himſelf for any caution he may uſe; he eſteems thoſe who uſes him well, thinks it incumbent on him to be grateful, hates the ungrateful; complains of injuſtice, incivility and haughtineſs; blames thoſe whom he thinks have uſed him ill; loves to make them odious, and to leave them no excuſe if poſſible; publiſhes their defects, and occaſionally inveighs againſt them with the utmoſt ſeverity. But what a farce would all this be, if all things are mechaniſm! I ſhould think it equally ſagacious in a man, who ſhould compliment the North wind, and quarrel with that of the South, when he ſtands in need of one, and the other blows againſt him. If there is no ſuch thing as injuſtice, why ſhould a Sceptick complain when he is treated unjuſtly? But this ſet of people are ever accuſtomed to contradict themſelves: they laugh at the credulity of others, though according to their own principles, they ſhould not ridicule any one, ſince nothing is ridiculous. Although too ſlight a tincture of the ſciences, and too quick a ſurvey of them had made Cicero declare for uncertainty; he yet, by intervals, is himſelf again; when yielding to the voice of nature, he acknowleges that ſome truths are ſo very evident, that it is impoſſible to prove their being otherwiſe. Eſt quædam ita perſpicua veritas, ut eam in firmare nulla res poſſit. . . . Quanquàm omnia alia falſa, incerta ſunt, caduca, mobilia, Virtus eſt una altiſſimis defixa radicibus, quæ nunquam ulla vi labefactari poteſt, nunquam dimoveri loco (1). . . When we perceive that a perſon is quite fixed in this way of thinking, and obſtinately

(1) Cicero, Orat. pro P. Quintio.

PYRRHUS, the ſon of Achilles and Deidamia, daughter of Lycomedes King of the iſland of Scyros, was born in that iſland a little before the war of Troy. He was brought up in it till Ulyſſes and Phœnix fetched him from thence (a), to take him to that famous ſiege after his father's death; and he went thither, though invited to ſtay by the tears of his grand-father on the mother's ſide [A]. The Greeks had been told, that Troy would never be taken, without the ſon of Achilles. He was called Neoptolemus, becauſe he was ſo very young (b) [B]; as the name, Pyrrhus, had been given him

(a) Sophocles, in Philoct. See alſo Homer, Odyſſ. lib. 11.

(b) Euſtath. in Iliad. 19.

obſtinately determined to perſevere in it; that he delights in it, and contemns other people; that man muſt be almoſt as mad as he is, who ſhould attempt to change his way of thinking. We might chain down one who ſhould be ſo frantic as to attempt to tear out his bodily eyes, but how would it be poſſible to bind a man who takes a pleaſure in ſhutting thoſe of his mind; who is for ever making an ill uſe of his free will; and fixes, in that perpetual abuſe, his delight and glory? Such a man ought to be abandoned and deſpiſed, ſince nothing can more deſerve contempt than for a perſon to arm himſelf againſt evidence; for what can be more contemptible in itſelf and more frantic, than to combat, with reaſons, the principles of reaſoning? What is it they pretend to conclude, if they have no principles, and if they are ignorant of the method how ſuch a conſequence is to be drawn, as may be reaſonable and worthy of ſome attention? . . . Were we to look upon ſuch obſtinate and prejudiced men with all the contempt they merit, they perhaps would be aſhamed of themſelves, at leaſt thoſe whoſe minds are not yet depraved by them, would be aſhamed to admire them; but a little warmth of imagination, a certain politeneſs of behaviour, ſome ſhew of erudition, and, above all a ſecret corruption of the heart, and the art with which they diſguiſe and colour vice, procures them the acquaintance and applauſe of many perſons not very conſpicuous for their virtue. . . . That man has carried Scepticiſm to its utmoſt height, and his evil is abſolutely incurable, when, forced by ſuch an evidence as he cannot elude without falling into a ſeries of contradictions, he yet refuſes to acquieſce in it, upon the ridiculous pretence, that another perſon will find out ſuch anſwers and evaſions as he himſelf is not able to hit upon. When a moſt obſcure, and moſt uncertain perhaps of this kind, ſhall prevail, in a man's mind, over the ſtrongeſt and moſt convincing light; I again repeat it, muſt not he who ſhould continue to attempt to recover ſuch a man, be almoſt as frantic as he is? . . . With regard to ſuch, who, through exceſſive fear, from a weakneſs of complexition, or whom the ſophiſms of ſome prevailing fancy have thrown into doubts, perplexity, and ſuſpenſion of mind; in my opinion ſuch ought to be treated like crazy perſons and thoſe who are oppreſſed with melancholy. When a perſon is preyed upon by gloom, and ſeems determined to brood over it, we ought not to cenſure his frenzy directly, nor endeavour too haſtily to cure him of it. It will be better to combat it at a diſtance, and endeavour to amuſe him with a variety of recreations. We ſhall, at laſt, certainly find ſome auſpicious moment, in which the moſt gloomy mortal will conſent to emerge from his melancholy, and abandon himſelf to ſome glimmerings of joy; and even on theſe occaſions, we muſt not inſiſt too much upon his continuing in it, but rather make him return to it by intervals. He muſt be brought, by inſenſible degrees, to reliſh pleaſure; and when he is a little uſed to it, then will be the time to aſk him, if ſuch a ſtate of ſatisfaction and joy is not better than that of a gloomineſs of temper; and afterwards exhort him to ſtruggle with and gain an entire conqueſt over himſelf. In like manner we ought to aſk a man, whoſe mind is ſo unhappy as to be in an obſtinate ſuſpenſion, if he thinks; if he exiſts; if uncertainty is pleaſing to him; if he would willingly extricate himſelf from ſuch a condition; if he is ſenſible of his being in a ſtate of uncertainty; and when a pleaſure ſucceeds an uneaſineſs, he then ſhould be aſked, if both thoſe conditions are alike to him; whether he is certain that the latter is more agreeable than the former. By theſe trials ſuch a man as we are ſpeaking of will be prompted to acquaint himſelf with that evidence which conſtrains, and that ſenſation of truth which convinces, when a perſon is willing to feel it, and give his attention to it. . . . If the Scepticks are in the right, it muſt be confeſſed that mankind are greatly obliged to thoſe, who have impoſed upon them; and who, after flattering themſelves with the thoughts that they knew what they really did not, prevailed ſo far as to eſtabliſh various maxims, and make them paſs for indiſputable. Were it not for ſuch happy errors, we ſhould paſs our lives without any principles or rules; and there is no light, inſtruction or proof, which we ſhould not be ready to abandon, at the firſt whim that ſhould come into our heads; for of what uſe would it be for us to put ourſelves under any reſtraint to follow what perhaps is good; and perhaps is not ſo? Can a man be juſtly accuſed for quitting uncertain maxims? . . . All that Cicero looks upon as dreadful, with reſpect to mankind, in the opinion of thoſe who deny a providence, agrees ſtill more with the Scepticks. In primiſque magna diſſenſio eſt: eaque niſi dijudicetur, in ſummo errore neceſſe eſt homines, atque in maximarum rerum ignoratione verſari . . . quorum ſi vera ſententia eſt, quæ poteſt eſſe pietas? quæ ſanctitas? quæ religio? . . quibus ſublatis, perturbatio vitæ ſequitur, & magna confuſio. Atque haud ſcio, an pietate adversùs Deos, ſublata fides etiam & ſocietas humani generis, & una excellentiſſima virtus, juſtitia tollatur (2). If the Scepticks are in the right, there are no ſuch things as Religion, Piety, Juſtice nor Commerce among mankind; and ſociety muſt neceſſarily be deſtroyed by confuſion and diſorder (3). The corruption of the heart of man is the grand principle of Scepticiſm. We love to make our minds ſquare with our inclinations; and a man who abandons himſelf to the impreſſions of the ſenſes, and the miſleading chimæras of the imagination, which are quite unſetled, never once reproaches himſelf with his own levity, when once he is perſuaded that there is no ſuch thing as a certain rule; and at the ſame time that he lives at random, he applauds himſelf for living conſequentially (4). Addit. by the Tranſlator.]

(2) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. 1.

(3) La Logique de Crouſaz. Tom. 3. p. 211 & ſeq. 3d edit. Amſt. 1725. 12mo.

(4) Idem, p. 232.

[A] Though invited to ſtay by the tears of his grand-father by the mother's ſide.] Tully informs us of this particular, in the 20th chapter of his book de Amicitia, pag. 515 of Grævius's edition. Rectè etiam, ſays he, præcipi poteſt in amicitiis, ne intemperata quædam violentia (quod perſæpe fit) impediat magnas utilitates amicorum, nec enim (ut ad fabulas redeam) Trojam Neoptolemus capere potuiſſet, ſi Lycomedem, apud quem erat educatus, multis cum lacrymis iter ſuum impedientem, audire voluiſſet. i. e. "It may alſo be laid down as "a good rule in the article of friendſhip, not to pre- "vent, as often happens, in a violent manner, any "conſiderable advantages accruing to our friends; "for, (to return back to fables) Neoptolemus would "not have made himſelf maſter of Troy, had he "been prevailed upon by Lycomedes, with whom "he had been brought up; and who beſought him, "with a flood of tears, not to go to the Trojan "war." Langius declares, that there is either a voluntary or involuntary miſtake here, but he is miſtaken. Here follow his words, which may be ſeen in page 515 of Grævius's edition. Quod de Neoptolemo Lælius ait, omnes de Achille narrant. Itaque vel errat per memoriam Cicero: vel, quod potius credo, de induſtria Lælio, ut illa ætate, Græcanicarum fabularum ignorationem concedit: quod etiam in Catone majore factum videmus; tametſi iſte jam ſenex Græcis litteris ſedulam operam navaverit. i. e. "All authors apply "to Achilles, what Lælius relates of Neoptolemus. "Cicero therefore miſtakes, through a defect of me- "mory; or rather, conſidering that age, purpoſely "ſuppoſes Lælius to be ignorant of the Grecian fa- "bles; which circumſtance we alſo find in the elder "Cato, though he, when far advanced in years, ſtu- "died the Greek with great aſſiduity."

[B] He was called Neoptolemus, becauſe he was ſo very young.] Pauſanias (1) gives a moſt wretched reaſon

(1) Lib. 10. p. 343.

him from the colour of his hair (c) [C]. He proved himſelf worthy of the blood from which he ſprung; he being valiant, brutal and fierce. His noble military exploits, and good counſels, have been as wonderful, as it pleaſed Homer and other Poets, a long time after, to make them (d). One of his nobleſt combats was againſt Eurypylus, the ſon of Telephus (e). He killed his antagoniſt, and was ſo much delighted with this victory, that he inſtituted the Pyrrhic dance on that occaſion (f). The Dancers were to be armed Cap-a-pee. He was the boldeſt of all thoſe Greeks who ſhut themſelves up in the Trojan horſe (g); and the intrepidity, he ſhewed on that occaſion, freed them from the fears with which they were ſeized. The night the city was taken, he made a dreadful ſlaughter (h); and even cruelly murthered King Priam [D], regardleſs of his old age, or the ſacred aſylum in which he had ſheltered himſelf. He caſt head-long from the top of a tower, with no leſs barbarity, young Aſtyanax, the ſon of Hector (i); and it was he who ſacrificed, with his own hands, Polyxena, on Achilles's tomb (k). He did not behave with ſo much barbarity towards Andromache, the valiant Hector's widow; he took up with ſome remains of beauty which he diſcovered in her perſon, and made her either his wife or his concubine (l). Authors differ with regard to the country he went to after the taking of Troy. Some ſay that he went and took poſſeſſion of the Kingdom he inherited from his father, viz. Phthia in Theſſaly (m): others relate, that he went directly for Epirus; that he ſettled and founded a State there (n). It is ſaid that Helenus, the ſon of Priam, and a good Sooth-ſayer, who fell to his ſhare in the diviſion of the priſoners, adviſed him to return by land, becauſe of the dreadful ſtorms with which he foreſaw the Grecian fleet would be buffeted (o). It is judged, with probability, that Pyrrhus followed his advice, becauſe we find, that in his way, he made war with Harpalicus, in Thrace (p). He married the beautiful Hermione, daughter of Menelaus and Helena (q), but did not live happily with her. Hermione brought him no children, and grew jealous of Andromache, who had had a ſon by Pyrrhus (r). Jealouſy fired her with a reſolution to make away with her rival (s), and to diſpatch her ſon alſo; but ſhe met with obſtacles on that occaſion; and her deſign being diſcovered, and ſhe dreading her huſband's anger, ſhe liſtened with pleaſure to Oreſtes, who propoſed to ſteal her; convey her back to her father, and marry her; and indeed, ſhe had been betrothed to him before ſhe married Pyrrhus [E]. Others ſay that Oreſtes, firmly determined to take vengeance of his rival, had recourſe to expedients much more fatal than the carrying off his wife, with whom he did not live in good harmony (t); and he either killed, or cauſed him

(c) Servius, in Æn. 2. ver. 469.

(d) Homer, Odyſſ. lib. 11. Quintus Calaber, lib. 7, 8.

(e) Quintus Calaber, ibid.

(f) Heſychius, and Scholiaſtes Pindari, in Pythion, Od. 2.

(g) Homer. Odyſſ. 11.

(h) Virgil, Æn. lib. 2. ver. 500, 550. Quint. Calaber, lib. 13. See alſo Pauſan. lib. 10. p. 343.

(i) Pauſan. lib. 10. p. 342.

(k) Eurip. in Hecub. Lycophr. Ovid. Metam. lib. 13. Seneca, in Troad. Hygin. cap. 110.

(l) Virgil. Æn. lib. 3. ver. 219. & ibi Servius.

(m) Eurip. in Troad. Dictys, lib. 6. Homer. Odyſſ. lib. 4.

(n) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 10. Pindar, Nem. 7. Juſtin. lib. 17.

(o) Servius, in Æn. lib. 2.

(p) See the iſſue of this war in the article HARPALICUS, and in Hyginus, cap. 193.

(q) Hygin. cap. 123.

(r) Pherecydes, apud Schol. Eur. in Oreſte, Pauſ. lib. 1. p. 10.

(s) Euripid. in Androm.

(t) Ovid. Epiſt. Herm. ad Oreſt.

ſon for this, viz. that Phœnix beſtowed this name upon him, becauſe Achilles, his father, had born arms when very young.

[C] The name, Pyrrhus, had been given him, from the colour of his hair.] Some ſay that he was called Pyrrhus, upon another account (2), viz. becauſe his father, when diſguiſed in a female habit at Lycomedes's court, was named Pyrrha (3). This circumſtance could not be very well known to the Grammarians, ſince Tiberius, endeavouring to puzzle them with knotty queſtions, aſked them, among other particulars, what was Achilles's name when he wore a female diſguiſe (4).

[D] He even cruelly murdered King Priam.] This is very finely imaged by Virgil.

> Hoc dicens, altaria ad ipſa trementem
> Traxit, & in multo lapſantem ſanguine nati
> Implicuit comam læva, dextraque coruſcum
> Extulit, ac lateri capulo tenus abdidit enſem.
> Hæc finis Priami fatorum: hic exitus illum
> Sorte tulit (5).

" With that he dragg'd the trembling ſire,
" Sliddering thro' clotted blood, and holy mire,
" (The mingled paſte his murder'd ſon had made)
" Haul'd from beneath the violated ſhade;
" And on the ſacred pile, the royal victim laid
" His right hand held his bloody fauchion bare;
" His left he twiſted in his hoary hair:
" Then with a ſpeeding thruſt, his heart he found:
" The luke-warm blood came ruſhing through the wound,
" And ſanguine ſtreams diſtain'd the ſacred ground.
" Thus Priam fell:" DRYDEN.

The altar hinted at here is that of Jupiter Hircæus (6). All authors indeed do not agree that Priam was murdered there: ſome (7) relate, that Neoptolemus forced him out of his palace; and that having been dragged to Achilles's tomb, his head was cut off, and carried, on the point of a lance, all through the city. Others (8) aſſert, that he was forced out of that Jupiter's temple; and that Pyrrhus, meeting him afterwards at the gate of his palace, ſlew him. Others ſeem to ſay, that Pyrrhus murdered him near an altar dedicated to Mercury (9). Such is the interpretation which the learned Meziriac (10) gives to thoſe words of Quintus Calaber, Ἑρμείῳ πολὶ βωμόν. Rhodomanus tranſlates them thus, ad arum Jovis Hermæi; i. e. " At the altar of Jupiter " Hermæius;" but we ought, very probably, to correct this text, by ſubſtituting Ἑρκείῳ, Hercæi, inſtead of Ἑρμείῳ. See Dauſquejus's notes, page 35, on this poet.

(2) Hygin. cap. 97.

(3) Hygin. cap. 96. Sidonius, Apollin. Carm. 9. ver. 137.

(4) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 71. See ſuch like queſtions in Juvenal, Sat. 7.

(5) Virgil. Æn. lib. 2. ver. 550.

(6) Euripid. in Troad. Senec. Agamemn. Pauſ. lib. 4. p. 127.

(7) Apud Servium, in Æn. lib. 2. ver. 506.

(8) Leſches, apud Pauſan. lib. 10.

(9) Quint. Calaber, lib. 13. ver. 222.

(10) On Ovid's Epiſt. p. 847.

[E] Hermione . . . had been betrothed to him . . . before ſhe married Pyrrhus.] Ovid (11) relates, that Tyndarus, his grandfather on the mother's ſide, had promiſed her to Oreſtes during the ſiege of Troy, in the abſence of Menelaus, who at the ſame time promiſed Pyrrhus that ſhe ſhould be his wife (12). Sophocles, cited by Euſtathius (13), had related this in a tragedy that is loſt. Euripides (14) ſays, on the contrary, that Hermione was promiſed to Oreſtes by Menelaus, to prevent Oreſtes's killing him, as he had killed Clytemneſtra his own mother. Therefore the promiſe of marriage in queſtion was made eight years after the ſiege of Troy. Sophocles, in another tragedy (15), relates theſe incidents in a quite different order. He ſays that Menelaus promiſed Hermione to Oreſtes before the ſiege of Troy; and that he promiſed her to Pyrrhus during the ſiege. Hyginus (16) has followed a particular opinion; viz. that Menelaus, notwithſtanding the promiſe he had made to Pyrrhus, when they lay before the city of Troy, gave his daughter to Oreſtes; and afterwards took her from him, in compliance with his firſt promiſe, when Pyrrhus went to Lacedæmonia, to require the performance of it. Here we have a great variety of opinions; but this is ſo very common a thing, that we ought not to wonder at it. We ſhould rather wonder how authors came to introduce, among facts or incidents, the plot of a tragedy; and that they ſhould relate, as the hiſtory of Hermione and Oreſtes, the fancies of a Poet, in order to fill his play with incidents and the marvellous. Muſt not that man have very little to do, who a thouſand years ſince ſhould think it incumbent on him not to omit, in

(11) Epiſt. Hermione ad Oreſt.

(12) Homer. Odyſſ. 4.

(13) In Odyſſ. lib. 4.

(14) In Oreſte.

(15) In Andromac.

(16) Cap. 123.

him to be killed, even in the temple of Delphi [F]. It is pretty certain that Pyrrhus was killed in it, but we are not equally ſure that he was buried there [G]. He had had three wives; Hermione who brought him no children, Lanaſſa, and Andromache. The two laſt brought him children; but we know not whether the Kings who ſwayed the ſcepter of Epirus, till the Monarch, whoſe Life will be given in the next article, deſcended from the ſons of Lanaſſa, or thoſe of Andromache [H]. Authors are divided on this ſubject; they agreeing only in this, that they ſprung from our Pyrrhus.

in the hiſtory of Cæſar and Pompey, all the circumſtances that Scuderi and Corneille relate concerning the death of thoſe two illuſtrious Romans?

[F] Some ſay that he killed him in the temple of Delphi.] Here is an incident which is accompanied with the fictions of the tragic Poets; for thoſe who relate the various accounts, which are found in writers, with regard to the fatal end of our Pyrrhus, do not omit what is told by Euripides (17), viz. that Pyrrhus, who was gone to Delphi to reproach Apollo with Achilles's death, and to require him to give ſatisfaction for it, returned thither in order to beg pardon for that inſult, and to appeaſe his anger. Other reaſons have been given for this journey. I. That Pyrrhus went to Delph, there to offer the ſpoils of the Trojans (18); II. That he went to the oracle, to enquire by what methods he might get children by Hermione his wife (19); III. That he intended to plunder the temple (20). Be this as it will, he was killed in this temple by Apollo's command (21); and the blow was ſtruck, by a Prieſt whoſe name is tranſmitted to us. This Prieſt's name was Machæreus, Μαχαιρεὺς; and thus we muſt read in the paſſage on Euripides's Scholiaſt (22), where mention is made of Pyrrhus's death. Here follows that paſſage according to the vulgar editions; καὶ ὁρᾷ καλὸν τὸ χρηστήριον κρέα διαρπάζοντας τοὺς Δελφοὺς ἀφαιρεῖται τὰ κρέα αὐτοὺς, ἑαυτὸν δὲ κλείσει μαχαίρᾳ. Now Meziriac (23) corrects in the beginning, ὁρῶν, and at the end αὐτὸν δὲ κτείνει Μαχαιρεὺς; ſo that, inſtead of ſaying that Pyrrhus killed himſelf with his own ſword, we may read, that perceiving that the Delphians, near the place where the oracle ſtood, were forcibly carrying away the fleſh he was going to offer up in ſacrifice, took it from them, and was killed by Machæreus. This cauſe is aſſigned for the quarrel in Pindar's Scholiaſt, and in Pindar himſelf (24). But the moſt common opinion is, that Pyrrhus's death was occaſioned chiefly by Oreſtes (25), either by his attacking him at the head of the Delphians, after having fallaciouſly aſſured them that their only deſign was to prevent the plundering of their temple; or whether he ſuborned ſome aſſaſſins (26) without being preſent at it. Virgil declares that he was killed by Pyrrhus.

Aſt illum ereptæ magno inflammatus amore
Conjugis, & ſcelerum furiis agitatus Oreſtes, Excipit incautum patriaſque obtruncat ad aras (27).
" Till young Oreſtes, pierc'd with deep deſpair,
" And longing to redeem the promis'd fair,
" Before Apollo's altar ſlew the raviſher."
DRYDEN.

The ſame is affirmed by Velleius Paterculus (28) and Hyginus (29).

[G] We are not equally ſure that he was buried there.] For ſome Authors aſſert that his bones were ſcattered on the frontiers of Ambracia. Cujus oſſa per fines Ambraciæ ſparſa ſunt quæ eſt in Epiri regionibus (30). Ovid is of the ſame opinion.

Nec tua quam Pyrrhi felicius oſſa quieſcant,
Facta per Ambracias quæ jacuere vias (31).
" Reſtleſs as Pyrrhus's may be your bones,
" Which, thro' Ambracia's roads, whre ſcatter'd wide."

Boſſieu in his Commentary on theſe two verſes juſtly cenſures Caſaubon and Corradus, for ſuppoſing that they were ſpoken of the Pyrrhus who was engaged in war with the Romans; it being certain, from the teſtimony of three Authors (32), that this Pyrrhus had an honourable burial. He alſo cenſures Reineccius, for applying theſe words to a Pyrrhus who was not the ſon of Achilles. Farther, our Neoptolemus was buried in Delphi. Some declare that his tomb uſed to be ſhewn in the Grove ſacred to Apollo (33). Others obſerve that he was buried under the Temple-gate, but that Menelaus cauſed his body to be removed into the ſacred grove (34). Pauſanias not only ſays, that his tomb was ſeen, at the coming out of the Temple, towards the left hand; but adds, that the Delphians uſed to perform annually certain funeral expiations in his honour (35). They indeed treated him, for a long time, as an enemy, without paying the leaſt honour to his memory; ſince they did not honour him, till he appeared in the heat of the battle, fighting for them againſt the Gauls; when they attempted to take the city and plunder the temple (36). Dictys Cretenſis (37), and ſome other Authors, relate alſo that he was buried in that place.

[H] We know not . . . . whether the Kings, who ſwayed the ſceptre of Epirus, deſcended from the ſons of Lanaſſa, or thoſe of Andromache.] Juſtin informs us, that this Lanaſſa, grand-daughter of Hercules, was ſtole by Pyrrhus, who met her in the Temple of Jupiter Dodonæus (38). He adds, that Pyrrhus had eight children by her, and was ſucceeded by Pialis, his ſon. Meziriac (39) aſſerts againſt him, on the teſtimony of Plutarch, that Lanaſſa was the grand-daughter of Hyllus: now Hyllus was the ſon of Hercules. He obſerves, on the other hand, that according to Pauſanias (40), the ſucceſſor of Pyrrhus was named Pielus, and was Andromache's ſon.

(17) In Androm. Schol. Pind. in Nem. Od. 7. Strabo, lib. 9.

(18) Pindar. Nem. Od. 7.

(19) Pherecydes, apud Schol. Euripid. in Oreſte.

(20) Schol. Pindar. and Strabo, lib. 9. vide etiam Pauſan. lib. 10.

(21) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 13.

(22) In Oreſtem.

(23) On Ovid's Epiſt. p. 855.

(24) Od. 7. Nem.

(25) Euripid. in Androm.

(26) Dictys, lib. 6. Juſtin. lib. 17. cap. 3. Pauſan. lib. 2. p. 72.

(27) Virgil. Æn. lib. 3. ver. 330.

(28) Patercul. lib. 1. cap. 1.

(29) Hygin. cap. 123.

(30) Hygin. ibid.

(31) Ovid. in Ibin, ver. 305.

(32) Val. Max. lib. 5. cap. 1. Plutarch in Pyrrho. Auctor de Viris illuſtribus.

(33) Strabo, lib. 9.

(34) Scholiaſtes Pindari, in Od. 7. Nem.

(35) Pauſan. lib. 10. p. 341.

(36) Idem. lib. 1. p. 4.

(37) Lib. 6.

(38) Juſtin. lib. 17. cap. 3.

(39) On Ovid's Epiſt. p. 861.

(40) Lib. 1.

PYRRHUS, King of Epirus, deſcended from the preceding [A], and famous for the wars he ſuſtained againſt the Romans, was one of the greateſt Captains of antiquity [B]. He was the ſon of Æacides and Phthia, daughter of Menon the Theſſalian. In his infancy he was expoſed to great dangers; for the Moloſſi, who had dethroned Æacides,

[A] Deſcended from the preceding.] See the laſt remark of the preceding article; and the remark [E] of the article ANDROMACHE. Lloyd and Hofman have, for want of a due attention, given into this overſight of Charles Stephens, viz. that Pyrrhus deſcended by the mother's ſide from Achilles; and from Hercules by the father's ſide. Now this was ſaid of Alexander the Great, not of Pyrrhus. He ſhould have ſaid, with a Roman Author (1), the very reverſe.

[B] He was one of the greateſt Captains of antiquity.] He was ſo violent, that thoſe who ſaw his ardour in battle, uſed to ſay, that Alexander was revived in him; and that, whereas other Kings were but the copies of that Conqueror, their maſter, in nothing but their purple habits, their life-guards, wry necks, and the ſtrong tone of their voices; Pyrrhus repreſented him by his valour, and his mighty atchievements. He had writ books on the art military (2), which were an indiſputable proof of his ſkill in encampments, in drawing up an army in order of battle, &c. and he invented the art of teaching that diſcipline, by a kind of game at cheſs (3). He alſo foreſaw early, that if providence indulged him life, he would be the greateſt Captain of his age (4). Hannibal gave him the pre-eminence over all other Captains, when he told Scipio, that Pyrrhus was the firſt; he (Scipio) the ſecond; and himſelf (Hannibal) the the third (5). But it muſt be confeſſed that Livy

(1) Pyrrhus Rex Epeirotarum paterno genere ab Achille, materno ab Hercule oriundus. Aurelius Victor.

(2) Cicero mentions this, Epiſt. Fam. 25. lib. 9.

(3) Pyrrhus peritiſſimus ſtratagematon fuit, primuſque quemadmodum ea diſciplina per calculos in tabula traderetur oſtendit. Donat. in Terent. Eunuch. Act. 4. Scen. 7.

(4) Ant gonus foretold this. Plut. in Vita Pyrrhi, p. 387.

(5) Plut. ibid.

des, and killed all ſuch of his friends as came in their way, endeavoured to ſeize his ſon, at that time ſo young as to be under the nurſe's care; but ſo much diligence was employed in ſaving him, that thoſe, who took care of him, conveyed him, notwithſtanding the purſuits of his enemies, to King Glaucias's court in Illyricum. That Monarch gave him an excellent education, and reſtored him to his Kingdom at twelve years of age. A freſh ſedition breaking out five years after, Pyrrhus loſt his Kingdom, on which occaſion he withdrew to the Court of Demetrius, his brother-in-law (a); he ſhared with him in the memorable battle of Ipſus (b) [C], and behaved there with the moſt ſignal bravery. A peace being concluded between Demetrius and Ptolemy King of Egypt, Pyrrhus was ſent as an hoſtage to the Court of the latter, where he became ſo conſiderable, that he married Antigone, whom Berenice had had by her firſt huſband, before ſhe married Ptolemy. By this alliance he procured ſuch ſuccours of men and money, as enabled him to recover his Kingdom. He ſhared it with the Uſurper (c), but did not long ſway the ſcepter in conjunction with him; for Pyrrhus being informed that the Uſurper intended to poiſon him, was beforehand with him; he inviting him to dinner, and murthering him in cold blood, on that occaſion. Not long after he meditated to ſatiate his ambition, by the conqueſt of Macedonia; the diviſions that reigned between the ſons of Caſſandra furniſhing him with an opportunity for it. Alexander requeſted ſuccours of him againſt Antipater his elder brother, which Pyrrhus granted, but obliged him to pay ſeveral provinces for it. Demetrius, to whom Alexander had alſo ſued for ſuccour, came to him very late, and yet too ſoon, he killing Alexander to prevent him, and got himſelf declared King of Macedon. This occaſioned the breaking out of a war between him and Pyrrhus, in which a battle was fought, where Pyrrhus ſignalized his bravery after a wonderful manner, and gained the victory. The inroad he afterwards made into Macedonia would have been vaſtly ſucceſsful, had he not been forced to retire with precipitation, and with a loſs of part of the army. Notwithſtanding the peace which was concluded a little after, he yet favoured Alexander's ſucceſſors, in the deſign they meditated of invading Demetrius

(a) He had married Deidamia, Pyrrhus's wife.

(b) The year of Rome 452, according to Calviſius.

(c) His name was Neoptolemus.

relates this quite otherwiſe; he ſaying that Hannibal having beſtowed the firſt place on Alexander, and the ſecond to Pyrrhus, aſcribed to himſelf the third. What would you ſay, ſays Scipio then to him, had you overcome me? I then, replied Hannibal, ſhould have thought myſelf ſuperior to Alexander, to Pyrrhus, and all the Captains of the world. It will be proper to cite Livy's words, to ſhew whence he borrowed this incident. Claudius ſecutus Græcos Acilianos libros, P. Africanum in ea fuiſſe legatione tradit: eumque Epheſi collocutum cum Annibale. Et ſermonem etiam unum refert, quo quærenti Africano, quem fuiſſe maximum imperatorem Annibal crederet, reſpondiſſe, Alexandrum Macedonum regem; quòd parvâ manu innumerabiles exercitus fudiſſet, quodque ultimas oras, quas viſere ſupra ſpem humanam eſſet, peragraſſet. Quærenti deinde, quem ſecundum poneret; Pyrrhum dixiſſe . . . Exſequenti, quem tertium duceret; haud dubiè ſemetipſum dixiſſe. Tum riſum obortum Scipioni & ſubjeciſſe, Quid nam tu diceres, ſi me viciſſes? Tum me verò, inquit, & ante Alexandrum, & ante Pyrrhum, & ante omnes alios imperatores eſſe. Et perplexum Punico aſtu reſponſum, & improviſum aſſentationis genus Scipionem moviſſe: quod è grege ſe imperatorum velut inæſtimabilem ſecreviſſe (6), i. e. "Claudius, copying Acilius's Greek works, relates that P. Africanus was "in this embaſſy, and had an interview with Hannibal in Epheſus. He likewiſe informs us of part "of their conference, which is as follows: Africanus "aſking Hannibal whom he thought to be the greateſt Captain; the latter anſwered, Alexander, King of Macedon, and for this reaſon, becauſe he had defeated prodigious armies with only a handful of men; and travelled, beyond all human expectation, to the utmoſt limits of the earth. Scipio then aſking, whom "he thought to be the ſecond; he anſwered, Pyrrhus: "being aſked, whom he judged to be the third Captain, he replied, that himſelf was. Scipio ſmiling "at theſe words, went on thus: But what would you "have ſaid, had you defeated me? I would have declared myſelf, replied Hannibal, ſuperior to Alexander, to Pyrrhus, and to all the Captains that ever "lived. Scipio was ſurprized at this artful anſwer, "and unlooked for compliment made him by the "Carthaginian, in thus ſingling him out from among "all the Generals, and declaring him to ſurpaſs "them infinitely." The reaſons for which Hannibal eſteemed Pyrrhus are as follow: Caſtra metari primum docuiſſe, ad hoc neminem elegantius loca cepiſſe, præſidia diſpoſuiſſe, artem etiam conciliandi ſibi homines eam habuiſſe, ut Italicæ gentes regis externi, quam populi Romani tamdiu principis in ea terra, imperium eſſe mallent (7). i. e. "The art of encampments was firſt "taught by Pyrrhus, no General ever pitched upon "ground for that purpoſe better than he; or knew "better how to lodge garriſons, and win the affections "of men; inſomuch that the nations of Italy choſe "to be governed by him, though a foreign Prince, "rather than be under the Romans to whom they had "been ſo long ſubject." Add to this, that Juſtin declares, that he not only poſſeſt the military virtues, but was alſo very conſpicuous for his probity and ſanctity of life. Satis conſtans inter omnes auctores famu eſt, nullum nec ejus, nec ſuperioris ætatis regem comparandum Pyrrho fuiſſe; raroque non inter reges tantum, verum etiam inter illuſtres viros, aut vitæ ſanctioris, aut juſtitiæ probatioris viſum fuiſſe: ſcientiam certe rei militaris in illo viro tantum fuiſſe, ut cum Lyſimacho, Demetrio, Antigono, tantis regibus, bella gerens, invictus ſemper fuerit. Illyriorum quoque, Siculorum, Romanorumque, & Carthaginienſium bellis, nunquam inferior, plerumque etiam victor extiterit, qui patriam certe ſuam anguſtam, ignobilemque, fama rerum geſtarum, & claritate nominis ſui, toto orbe illuſtrem reddiderit (8). i. e. "It is agreed by all Authors, that no Monarch, "either of the former age, or that in which Pyrrhus lived, was to be compared to him; that we "ſeldom find, even in a King or the moſt illuſtrious "men, more probity or a greater ſanctity of life, "than were conſpicuous in him; and he was ſo exceedingly well ſkilled in military affairs, that he "always came off unconquered with thoſe great "Kings, Lyſimachus, Demetrius, Antigonus. Likewiſe in his wars with the Illyrians, the Sicilians, "the Romans, and Carthaginians, he was never defeated, but generally came off victorious. He "made his Kingdom, which was but of a ſmall extent "and obſcure, famous throughout the world, by his "great name and his mighty atchievements." Cicero alſo applauds him highly for his probity (9.) The reader will find in the remark [L], that Pyrrhus knew how to make a very advantageous uſe of thoſe intrigues, the art of which is ſo very neceſſary to great Captains.

(6) T. Livius, lib. 35. p. m. 652.

(7) Idem, ibid. See alſo Amm. Marcellin. lib. 24. init.

(8) Juſtin. lib. 25. ſub fin. p. m. 452, 453.

(9) Cum duobus ducibus de imperio in Italia decertatum, Pyrrho & Annibale. Ab altero, propter probitatem ejus non nimis alienos animos habemus, alterum propter crudelitatem ſemper hæc civitas oderit. Cicero, de Amicitia, cap. 8.

[C] He ſhared with Demetrius in the memorable battle of Ipſus.] Moreri relates, that at the battle of Ipſus, victory favoured Pyrrhus's ſide againſt Antigonus and Demetrius. All this is falſe; Pyrrhus being then, on Demetrius [D]. The Macedonians abandoned the latter, and declared for Pyrrhus, who, by this means, ſeeing himſelf maſter of Macedonia, ſhared it nevertheleſs with Lyſimachus. He loſt his half of the Kingdom, in the ſame manner as he had gained the whole; the Macedonians abandoning him to join Lyſimachus, who had been born among them. Thus Pyrrhus was reduced to his patrimonial Kingdom; however, he did not ſtay long in it, for being of a reſtleſs diſpoſition, one whoſe time would have lain very heavy upon his hands, had he not employ'd it in invading others, or in defending himſelf [E]; he therefore liſtened with pleaſure to the Tarentines [F], who invited him to croſs into Italy, and there head the troops againſt the Romans. Cineas of Theſſaly, a Diſciple of Demoſthenes, diſſuaded Pyrrhus from this enterprize; but all to no purpoſe, it being decreed by fate, ſic erat in fatis. This Monarch therefore croſſed into Italy with a very ſtrong army (d), and finding that the Romans marched forward, he himſelf advanced as far as Heraclea, near the river Siris [G], without waiting till all the confederate forces were ready; and offered to be Mediator to the Conſul Lævinus, who replied, that the Romans would not accept of his mediation, and did not fear his enmity. He went to take a view of the Roman army, on which occaſion he confeſſed that thoſe Barbarians did not diſcover on the ſame ſide with Demetrius and Antigonus; or to ſpeak more accurately, Pyrrhus fought on that occaſion, only as a volunteer in the army of Demetrius. Hofman commits the ſame error with Moreri.

(d) The year of Rome 473, the laſt of the 124th Olympiad.

(10) See Plut. ubi infra.

[D] He yet favoured Alexander's ſucceſſors, in the deſign they meditated of invading Demetrius.] Pyrrhus was eaſily won by the temptation (10), when the chiefs of the confederacy repreſented to him, that his conduct was far from prudent. He was for keeping ſtrictly to the treaty of peace, at the time that Demetrius ſhould be involved in a mighty war; but this was loſing his opportunity, and giving his neighbouring Monarch time to expect a favourable one for himſelf. Wherefore, (was it ſaid to Pyrrhus) do not you chooſe to win Macedonia from a Prince who is not able to defend it, becauſe of the great number of enemies who will invade him, rather than run the hazard of being obliged to defend your own Kingdom againſt his invaſions, when he ſhall have concluded a treaty of peace? They alſo repreſented to him ſome injurious treatment he had met with from Demetrius, he having juſt before taken his wife from him, and diſpoſſeſſed him of the iſland of Corcyra. To underſtand this, the reader is to know that Lanaſſa, daughter of Agathocles the Syracuſan tyrant, had brought Pyrrhus that iſland in marriage; but perceiving that her huſband paid a greater regard to his other wives than he did to her, ſhe took it into her head to look out for another huſband; and as Demetrius was reputed to engage more eaſily than any other in new marriages, ſhe invited him to come and meet her in the iſland of Corcyra, whither ſhe was retired. He accepted of the invitation, married her, and left a garriſon in the iſland (11). Theſe reaſons were more ſufficient to induce a Prince of ſo ambitious a caſt of mind as Pyrrhus, to violate the treaty of peace. I ſhall obſerve here, by the way, that Antigona brought him a ſon named Ptolemy, who was killed by the Lacedæmonians (12); that Lanaſſa brought him Alexander, who ſucceeded him in the throne, and that he had Helenus (13), whom I ſhall mention in the remark [P], by Bircenna. We ſhall ſpeak of his daughters in the next article.

(11) Extracted from Plut. in Vita Pyrrhi, 388, 389.

(12) See the rem. [B] of the art. CLEONYMUS.

(13) Plut. in Vita Pyrrhi; but Juſtin, lib. 23. cap. 3. ſays that Helenus was the ſon of Agathocles's daughter.

[E] Time would have lain very heavy on his hands, had he not employed it in invading others, or in defending himſelf.] Pyrrhus was inordinately ambitious, and of a reſtleſs turn of mind. Plutarch (14) compares him to Achilles.

(14) In Vita Pyrrhi, p. 390.

Φθινύθεσκε φίλον κῆρ
Αὖτι μένων, ποθέεσκε δ' ἀϋτὴν τε πτόλεμόν τε (15).

(15) Homer. Iliad. 1. ver. 491.

" Pining at ſtaying there;
" His ſoul ſtill panting for dire war and noiſe."

(16) Plut. in Vita Pyrrhi, p. 400.

He was exceedingly well ſkilled in war (16), and executed his deſigns with wonderful courage and vigour; but then he knew better how to win theſe conqueſts, than keep thoſe he had won; becauſe, in proportion as he atchieved any new ones, he meditated mighty deſigns, and entertained freſh hopes, which prevented his taking the proper meaſures to preſerve what he had gained. Ut ad devincenda regna invictus habebatur, ita devictis acquiſitiſque celeriter carebat. Tanto melius ſtudebat acquirere imperia quam retinere (17). Antigonus uſed to compare him to a gameſter, who has a good game, but is unable to make an advantageous uſe of it. The ſame thing was ſaid of Hannibal: Non omnia nimirum eidem Dii dederunt; vincere ſcis Annibal, victoria uti neſcis (18). i. e. " The Gods did not beſtow all things on one " perſon: O Hannibal! You know how to conquer, " but are ignorant of the uſe which ought to be made " of a victory." This defect is not very uncommon; our age has frequently ſhewn us Generals, who did not know how to make a proper advantage of their victories. God orders matters thus, to prevent a nation from being overſpread at once. A thouſand ſayings of the like import might be cited.

(17) Juſtin, lib. 25. cap. 4.

(18) Livius, lib. 23. See alſo Florus, lib. 2. cap. 6. and the cloſe of the rem. [B] of the article CÆSAR.

Non minor eſt virtus quàm quærere parta tueri (19).

(19) Ovid. de Arte amandi, lib. 2. ver. 13.

" 'Tis no leſs virtue
" To keep things when attain'd, than to attain them."

Parari ſingula acquirendo facilius poſſunt, quàm univerſa teneri (20). i. e. " It is eaſier to gain things " ſingly, and by degrees, than to keep all when got."

(20) Liv. lib. 37. See Florus, lib. 2. cap. 17.

[F] He liſtened with pleaſure to the Tarentines.] This people fell out very unſeaſonably with the Romans; and afterwards, though they were inferior to them in power, they yet could never prevail with themſelves to live at peace with them (21). A certain ſet of people called Demagogues, uſed to blow up all things into a flame by their ſpeeches; and ſo vehement were they in inſpiring nothing but warlike thoughts, that they prompted the people to invite a foreign Prince, rather than conclude a peace. Now what was the conſequence of all this? They were forced to ſubmit to the Roman yoke much ſooner than they would otherwiſe have done.

(21) Μήτε εἰρήνην ἄγειν πόλεμον δυνάμενοι μήτε θέσθαι θρασύνοντι καὶ μεγηρία δημαγωγῶν. Pares cum eis armis non eſſent, neque poſſent ea ob ferociam & pravitatem concionatorum ſuorum deponere. Plut. in Pyrrho, p. 390.

I am to obſerve, that the Deputies of the Tarentines repreſented to Pyrrhus the ſervices they had done him in the war againſt the people of Corcyra; and added, that Italy was a finer country than Greece. But I am to obſerve eſpecially, that the Monarch in queſtion grounded his chief hopes of ſucceſs, on his being deſcended from Achilles, and becauſe the Romans were a Colony from Troy (22). We cannot meditate too much on the foibles and ridiculous ſuperſtition of great men.

(22) Pauſan. lib. 1. cap. 12.

[G] As far as Heraclea, near the river Siris.] Florus, in expreſſing himſelf thus, has committed an error with regard to geography. Apud Heracleam & Campaniæ fluvium Lirim, Lævino Conſule, prima pugna (23). i. e. " The firſt engagement was fought at " Heraclea, by Liris a river of Campania, under " the Conſulate of Lævinus." Salmaſius, in his notes on that Author, ſhews plainly that Heraclea was not in Campania, and that Florus has put the river Liris for the river Siris: the latter being in Campania, but not the former. Now, as it is certain that the firſt battle was fought near Heraclea; the error of miſtaking one of theſe rivers for the other, muſt have occaſioned his groſs error of fixing Heraclea in Campania. See Cluverius, Cap. XIV. Lib. IV. of Italia Antiqua. He would have us read thus in Florus: Apud Heracleam & Lucaniæ fluvium Sirim, &c. i. e. " At Herclea and Siris, a river of Lucania."

(23) Florus, lib. 1. cap. 18.

[H] He

discover any thing barbarous in their manner of encamping [H]. Soon after a battle was fought, in which Pyrrhus was in imminent danger, and the event was very doubtful. Each side gave ground several times; but at last victory declared for the Epirots, by the help of their elephants [I], whose smell terrified the Roman horses. The consequences of this victory were very considerable, though Pyrrhus had lost a great number of brave soldiers, and many good Officers. He remained master of the field of battle, and advanced within thirty-six miles of Rome (e). Notwithstanding Pyrrhus's approach, the Romans were not under the least apprehensions; nor did they even divest Lævinus of the Command, though great numbers of people complained of his conduct [K]. Pyrrhus being desirous of concluding a peace, sent Cineas to Rome (f) [L]. The eloquence and engaging carriage of this Embassador had prevailed in some measure upon the Senate; but Appius Claudius, who, by reason of his very advanced age, and his blindness had quite laid aside all concern in the affairs of Government, was carried to the Assembly, made a speech, which occasioned the Romans to declare to Cineas, that if Pyrrhus was desirous of maintaining a friendship with the Republick of Rome, he must first draw his forces out of Italy, and then they would treat with him. The Consul Fabricius was not so unfortunate as Lævinus; and did an action as glorious as if he had won a battle, with regard to the true glory of a nation; which was, to inform Pyrrhus, that his Physician offered to poison him (g). A mighty battle was fought near Asculum (b). Some Historians affirm, that the Epirots won it evidently; others say, that (e) Eutropius says 18, and Florus 20. Victor primo prælio Pyrrhus, says he, cap. 18. lib. 1. Totam trementem Campaniam, Lirim Fregellasque populatus, prope captam urbem à Prænestina arce prospexit, & vicesimo lapide oculos trepidæ civitatis fumo ac pulvere implevit.

(f) The year of Rome 474.

(g) See the rem. [D] of the art. FABRICIUS.

(b) The year of Rome 475.

[H] He confessed that those Barbarians did not discover any thing barbarous in their manner of encamping.] Aurelius Victor makes him say, on this occasion, a thing which, by reason of its transposition, has no sense. Viso, says he, Lævini exercitu eandem sibi ait adversus Romanos, quam Herculi adversus hydram, fuisse fortunam. i. e. "Having beheld Lævinus's army, he said that the same fate happened to him, "with regard to the Romans, as had happened to "Hercules with respect to the Hydra." According to Plutarch (24), Cineas employed this comparison, when he saw with how much ease the Romans recruited their army after the first battle, and the multitude of inhabitants that were still in Rome, after so great a number of fresh levies. It was then just to call to mind the fresh springing heads of the Hydra; but it would have been absurd to entertain such a reflection before the first battle. As Authors seem to have taken an oath, never to agree in their relations, Florus ascribes this very thought to Pyrrhus himself. Video me planè Herculis sidere procreatum, cui quasi ab angue Lernæo tot cæsa hostium capita de sanguine suo renascantur (25). i. e. "It is plain that Hercules and "I were born under the same constellation; for the "Romans, when slaughtered, like the Hydra, spring "up again out of their own blood."

(24) Plut. in Pyrrho, p. 395.

(25) Florus, lib. 1. cap. 18.

[I] By the help of their elephants.] The Romans used to call them boves Lucas, because, as it is related, they first saw them in Lucania, in the time of their war with Pyrrhus (26). Pliny fixes this under the year 472; and observes that, seven years after, some were seen, in a triumph, at Rome. This seems to suppose, that the war in question continued seven years; and we must suppose, according to Pliny, that it ended in 479. Plutarch says that Pyrrhus returned to his native country six years after his leaving it. Calvisius's calculation, which I have put into the margin, traces the beginning of the war at the year 473, and the conclusion of it under 478. But father Labbe places the beginning of it under the year 474, and the end, at the year 480. What a shame it is that authors cannot be agreed in articles of so much importance! By the way, elephants did Pyrrhus both good and harm. They were of great service to him in the first battle. They were little dreaded in the second: the Romans wounded one, and thereby saw that they were not immortal (27). In the third battle they occasioned great disorder in Pyrrhus's troops. Eædem feræ, says Florus, quæ primum victoriam abstulerant, secundam parem fecerant, tertiam sine controversia tradidere. i. e. "The same "beasts, which were the occasion of gaining the first "battle, made the second an equal, a drawn, battle, "and brought us off conquerors in the third." Here we have an historian who did not know that he had said, a few lines before, that Pyrrhus had been totally defeated in the second battle, which he confirms again before he concludes his chapter. He had just before related, that the Romans did not leave off the slaughter till the night put an end to it, and that Pyrrhus was the last who fled: and since he affirms, in the recapitulation of his account, that this monarch's camp was twice plundered, bis exuto castris, he must have applied the first plunder to the second battle. What then can he mean by saying secundam parem fecerant?

(26) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 6. Varro, de Lingua Lat. lib. 6.

(27) Cajus Minucius quartæ legionis hastatus unius proboscide abscissa, mori posse belluas ostenderat. Florus, lib. 1. cap. 18.

[K] Though great numbers of people complained of Lævinus's conduct.] Fabricius used to say, that this loss ought not to be ascribed to the Roman soldiers, but to their General; and that it was not the Epirots who had conquered the Romans, but Pyrrhus who had vanquished the Consul Lævinus (28). Pyrrhus had before bestowed that elogium upon himself, he crying out; O how easy would it be for the whole earth to be conquered, either by Pyrrhus, were the Romans his soldiers; or by the Romans, were Pyrrhus their King! O quam facile erat orbis imperium occupare aut mihi Romanis militibus; aut me rege Romanis (29)!

(28) Plut. in Pyrrho, p. 394.

(29) Florus, lib. 1. cap. 18.

[L] He sent Cineas to Rome.] Any person, who saw the valour which Pyrrhus exerted, would imagine that he was determined to owe all things to his sword; however, such a conclusion would argue very little experience. The greatest warriors have commonly employed intrigues and negotiations (30). It was Pyrrhus's custom to send Cineas before him, in order for him to prepare the way, and smooth the difficulties he might otherwise have met with. Cineas by his eloquence, verified the following saying of Eurypides, that whatever may be effected by the sword, may also be brought about by words (31). Pyrrhus confessed, that Cineas's eloquent speeches had gained him more towns than his sword (32). In my opinion Cicero does not do Pyrrhus justice enough, when he includes him among those (33) against whom the following words of the Poet Ennius was levelled; Semper fuit stolidum genus Æacidarum belli potentes sunt magis quàm sapientipotentes. i. e. "The family of "the Æacidæ were ever foolish; and are more "powerful in war than in wisdom:" and only believes that he understood the meaning of the following ambiguous answer returned by the oracle.

(30) See the rem. [B] of the art. ATTILA.

(31) Ὅτι πᾶς ἑξαιρεῖ λόγος, ὁ καὶ σιδηρους πολεμίων δρᾶσειεν ἄν, Omne id expugnare verba compta ferrum quod minax possit. Plut. in Pyrrho, p. 391, B.

(32) Plut. ibid.

(33) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 2.

Aio te Æacida Romanos vincere posse.

"O Pyrrhus, thou mayst overcome the Romans!"

I shall observe, by the way, that Cicero employs four reasons, to prove that this oracle was invented by Ennius: I. It was never once mentioned by the Greeks. II. Apollo never used to give his answers in Latin. III. He had ceased to pronounce his answers, in verse, in Pyrrhus's time. IV. This Prince would not have been so wrong-headed, as not to know the fallacy of it. But if it should be answered, that Ennius worked up, into a Latin verse, the answer which had been given in Greek prose, it would greatly weaken the force of his argument.

that the ſucceſs was doubtful [M]; and that both ſides ſounded a retreat. Pyrrhus's army was thinned to ſuch a degree, that when ſome perſons came to congratulate him on that occaſion, he replied, ſuch another victory will ruin us. He therefore was overjoyed at having a pretence to turn his arms againſt another power, I mean, to croſs into Sicily (i), whence Embaſſadors had been ſent to him, praying him to free that iſland from the Carthaginian yoke, as well as from ſeveral petty Tyrants. This expedition was, at firſt, prodigiouſly ſucceſsful; but theſe Iſlanders, whoſe too republican ſpirit did not ſuit Pyrrhus's temper, were greatly offended at him, for not behaving with that gentleneſs towards them as he did at firſt: and therefore, the ſame turn of mind, which had prompted them to implore his protection, made them ſoon ſeek another maſter. In this unhappy juncture, he received, very ſeaſonably, ſome letters from the Tarentines, informing him that they were in the greateſt want of his aid; by which means he had a fair pretence to boaſt, that he did not abandon Sicily, but was obliged to go and ſuccour ſome other allies. He found it extremely difficult to croſs over, the Carthaginians over-powering his fleet, and the Mamertini haraſſing his troops after their landing. It was then that Pyrrhus (k), though wounded in the head, ruſhed with ſo much fury on a Barbarian who challenged him, that he ſtruck him on the head with a ſcimiter, and cut his body aſunder [N]. The inſtant he arrived in Tarentum, he marched with the utmoſt expedition againſt the Romans, and loſt a battle near Beneventum (l); after which he reſolved to return to his country, where, though he had met with ſuch various ſucceſs, he yet could not be eaſy, but was for ever engaging in freſh expeditions. That of Macedonia was more ſucceſsful; for he defeated the army of Antigonus the ſon of Demetrius, and diveſted him of the greateſt part of his Kingdom. He next engaged in a war with the Lacedæmonians (m), at the ſolicitation of Cleonymus (n), who was diſſatisfied, becauſe he did not ſway the Lacedæmonian ſcepter; however, they repulſed his vigorous attacks with ſo much bravery, that they obliged him to content himſelf with laying waſte their country, and taking up his winter quarters there. While theſe things were doing, Ariſtias perſuaded him to go to Argos, where a faction was lately broke out between that Ariſtias and Ariſtippus; the latter being aſſiſted by Antigonus. Pyrrhus, though introduced into the city by Ariſtias, yet could not poſſeſs himſelf of it; but was forced to fight in the ſtreets with the inhabitants, and the troops of Antigonus; and here Pyrrhus loſt his life (o), being wounded in the head with a tile [O]. Antigonus treated him with great generoſity [P]. Some very ſtrange things have been related of Pyrrhus,

(i) The year of Rome 475.

(k) The year of Rome 478.

(l) In 478.

(m) In 480.

(n) See the art. of this CLEONYMUS.

(o) In 480, according to Calviſius, or 482, according to Father Labbe.

[M] The ſucceſs was doubtful.] It is not an invention of mankind in this age, for thoſe who are defeated to have recourſe to this ſhift, out of vanity, a falſe ſhame or policy; though poſſibly this ſpecies of inſincerity may be more in vogue now than anciently (34). The Romans did not deny but that Pyrrhus had won the firſt battle; but ſome of their hiſtorians have declared, that both ſides came off with equal advantage in the ſecond battle, or even that Pyrrhus was defeated in it (35). Plutarch quotes two authors, one of whom relates, that the Romans loſt, in the firſt battle, about fifteen thouſand men, and Pyrrhus thirteen thouſand; and the other affirms that the Romans loſt ſeven thouſand men, and Pyrrhus near four thouſand. With regard to the ſecond battle, one ſays that the Romans loſt ſix thouſand men, and Pyrrhus 3505, as appeared from the words of that Prince; the other ſays in general, that fifteen thouſand men were ſlain on both ſides: whence it appears, that Moreri ſhould not have ſaid, that the Romans, in the two firſt battles, ſuſtained leſs loſs than the Epirots. He alſo was miſtaken with reſpect to the date or time to which he applies the following reflection of Pyrrhus, Should we again be conquerors, we are undone: this reflection being made after the ſecond battle. By the way, Plutarch's two Authors differ greatly from Eutropius, who declares that the Romans had the entire advantage in that battle. Pyrrhus, ſays he, vulneratus eſt, elephanti interfecti, viginti millia cæſa hoſtium, & ex Romanis tantum quinque millia. Pyrrhus Tarentum fugatus. i. e. "Pyrrhus was wounded, the elephants were killed, and twenty thouſand of the enemy; and of the Romans, only five thouſand. Pyrrhus was obliged to fly to Tarentum." Frontinus (36) ſuppoſes the ſame number of men to be ſlain.

(34) See the rem. [F] of the art. FABRICIUS.

(35) See the contradiction found in Florus, in the rem. [I].

(36) Stratagemata, lib. 2. cap. 3.

[N] He cut his body aſunder.] Here we have one of the feats of our ancient Knight-errants, who uſed to cleave aſunder, to the very ſaddle-bow, the moſt daring giants. It is certain, that Plutarch has related ſome actions of Pyrrhus, which ſeemed thoſe of a hero of romance, much more than thoſe of a real hero. He did well to ſtrengthen himſelf with the authority of Homer, who ſays ſome-where, that valour is the only virtue, which is ſubject to fantaſtical tranſports and frenzical fits. Τῶν ἀρετῶν μόνην τὴν ἀνδρείαν φορὰς πόλλακις ἐνθουσιώδεις καὶ μανικὰς φερομένην. Fortitudinem unam identidem lymphatico & phanatico motu ferri (37). The northern nations, when Heathens, believed that Odinus, who preſided over wars, breathed or inſpired ſuch a fury, as enabled the weakeſt man to reſiſt ten. Horum primarius Deus erat Odinus, qui res bellicas dirigere credebatur, furoremque hominibus, quem Berſerkicum vocabant, immittere, quo qui correptus erat, vel decem aliis poterat obſiſtere, utut infirmus extra raptum ac debilis (38).

There is another paſſage in Plutarch, which may not improperly be cited here. "(39) Not only in "poetry, as Plato ſays, he who is inſpired and en-"rapt by the muſes, will make the profeſſor of every "other art or ſcience, how laborious and excellent "ſoever he may be, appear ridiculous: (40) but "likwiſe in battle, thoſe who are animated with a "noble reſolution, inſpired with a valour above the "generality of mankind, become invincible, and "cannot be withſtood. This is a martial fury with "which the Gods, according to Homer, inſpire war-"like men.

"His awful words the monarch's breaſt inſpir'd
"With mighty ſtrength.

"And the following:

"He fights with ſo much rage, that ſure ſome God
"Muſt aid him."

[O] Being wounded in the head with a tile.] A woman threw this tile, from a window, on the King's head. The Argivi, to make a miracle of that accident, and to heighten the credulity of the people, gave out that Ceres, in the diſguiſe of a woman, threw that tile. Leuceas the Poet did not omit this tradition, in his hiſtory of the Argivi (41).

[P] Antigonus treated him with great generoſity.] Pyrrhus's head being cut off, fell into the hands of Alcyoneus, who carried it to Antigonus's father, who, the inſtant he knew the head, beat his ſon very ſeverely; called him cruel and barbarous wretch; covered

(37) In Vita Pyrrhi, p. 398.

(38) Acta eruditor. 1690, p. 30. in the extract of Th. Bartholinus's book, Antiquitatum Danicarum de cauſis contemtæ à Danis adhuc Gentilibus mortis.

(39) Plut. de Virtute morali, ſub fin. p. 452.

(40) Περὶ τὰς μάχας τὸ προθυμικὸν καὶ τὸ ἐνθουσιῶδες ἀνυπόστολόν ἐστι καὶ ἀήττητον ὅ καὶ τοὺς Θεοὺς Ὅμηρος ἐμπνεῖν φησι τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, (ὡς εἰπὼν, ἔμπνευσε μένος μέγα ποιμένι λαῶν. καὶ Οὐχ ὅγ' ἀνευθὲ θεῦ τάδε μαίνεται.) In prœliis etiam animo concitati ac furore correpti ſubſiſti ſuperariique nequeunt qualem inſtinctum Homerus ait à diis homini inſeri. Sic ait, atque duci per magnas flamine vires Inſeruit, & rurſum: Non abſque inſtinctu furit hic ita numinis.

(41) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 12, 13.

(p) Extracted from Plutarch's Life of Pyrrhus.

Pyrrhus [Q], as, that he cured the ſpleen with the touch of his right foot; and that his great toe was endued with a divine virtue (p).

vered his face, and wept. He afterwards cauſed this head, and the reſt of Pyrrhus's body, to be honourably interred. Alcyoneus behaved better afterwards; for meeting Helenus, the ſon of Pyrrhus, he treated him in the kindeſt manner, and conducted him to Antigonus, who applauded this action; and told his ſon, that it would have been ſtill more pleaſing to him, had he taken off the wretched mantle which Helenus had on. He afterwards behaved with great friendſhip towards Helenus, and ſent him, well provided with every thing, into the kingdom of Epirus (42).

(42) Ex Plut. ſub fin. Vitæ Pyrrh. See alſo Juſtin. lib. 25. cap. 4. Valer. Maxim. lib. 5. cap. 1.

[Q] Some very ſtrange things have been related of Pyrrhus.] Whenever he was to cure any perſon of the diſeaſe of the ſpleen, he uſed to prepare for it, by ſacrificing a white cock; after which the patient uſed to lye down on the ground, and Pyrrhus preſſed the ſpleen gently with his right foot. He never refuſed to cure the pooreſt people. The patient, after he had ended his ſacrifice, uſed to give him a cock, which he uſed to accept with great pleaſure. His upper gum was one continued bone, with ſome lines in it which ſhewed the number of his teeth. The divine virtue of the great toe of his right foot appeared, when they burnt his body; this great toe being found entire. This we are told by Plutarch (43). Pliny (44) ſays, that this very toe had the virtue to heal; and that, coming out undamaged by the flames, it was buried apart in a Temple. Is there any doubt but that it was honoured as a ſacred relick? Can we afterwards charge the Heathens with not having Kings, who may be put in parallel with ſuch Chriſtian Princes who cured the Jaundice and the King's Evil? Having promiſed elſewhere (45) to mention a falſity relating to Achilles, it will be proper to take notice of it. Camerarius (46) having related, that Pyrrhus's great toe was endued with a divine virtue, and was found entire and undamaged in the midſt of the flames which had conſumed the reſt of the body, adds preſently after, that Homer affirms the ſame thing of Achilles. Caſpar à Reies ſays more than once, but always in general (47), that Pyrrhus's finger cured perſons afflicted with the ſpleen; and adds in one place, that Homer ſays almoſt the ſame thing of Achilles (48). He was miſled by Camerarius; but I ſhould be glad to know who miſled Camerarius. Homer does not ſay any thing like this; and I very much queſtion whether one ancient Author has ſaid it. Pyrrhus's great toe puts me in mind of a ſtory related by the Rabbins, which is mentioned by Agrippa. They ſay that there is a little bone in the body of man, called Luz, which cannot be broken nor burnt; and that our bodies will ſpring out of it at the reſurrection, in the ſame manner as a plant ſprings up again from its ſeed. Eſt in humano corpore os quoddam minimum, quod Hebræi Luz appellant, magnitudine ciceris mundati, quod nulli ruptioni obnoxium, nec igne quidem vincitur, ſed ſemper conſervatur illæſum; ex quo (ut dicunt) velut planta ex ſemine, in reſurrectione mortuorum corpus noſtrum animale repullulaſcet (49). I am obliged, for this paſſage, to Profeſſor Drelincourt; and it is with the higheſt pleaſure that I make a publick acknowledgment of it in this place.

(43) In Pyrrho, p. 384.

(44) Lib. 7. cap. 2.

(45) The rem. [H] of the art. ACHILLEA, about the end of it.

(46) Horar. Succiſivar. Centur. 3. cap. 42.

(47) He never ſays that it was the great toe of the right foot. See his Elyſius Campus, Quæſt. 24. num. 4. and num. 31. and Quæſt. 28. num. 24 and 26.

(48) Quæſt. 28. num. 26.

(49) Agrippa, de occulta Philoſophia, lib. 1. cap. 20. p. m. 32. See the rem. [K] of the art. BARCOCHEBAS, and citat. (42) of the art. NIHUSIUS.

PYRRHUS, King of Epirus, grandſon of the preceding, ſucceeded his father Alexander, and was at firſt under the guardianſhip of his mother Olympias. His minority encouraged the Ætolians ſo as to be unjuſt enough to ſeize upon a part of Acarnania. It was the part which fell to his father's ſhare, when they divided between them the conqueſts they had made. Olympias applied to Demetrius, King of Macedonia: and ſhe gave him her daughter Phthia in marriage, in order to determine him to aſſiſt her effectually. The Hiſtorian (a) leaves us here, without acquainting us with any other conſequences of the attempt of the Ætolians, but the irruption they made on the borders of the Kingdom in the reign of Ptolemy, the brother and ſucceſſor of our Pyrrhus. There muſt be ſomething omitted or wanting here; for there paſſed, no doubt, ſome years between the minority of Pyrrhus and his death. However it be, the Princeſs Olympias had recourſe to too violent means, when ſhe deſigned to put a ſtop to an amorous intrigue of her ſon; for ſhe cauſed his miſtreſs to be poiſoned (b) [A]. Ptolemy, who ſucceeded to his brother Pyrrhus, did not ſurvive him long. Their mother followed them ſoon after, being overwhelmed with grief at the death of her two ſons. There remained but two Princeſſes of the Royal Family, Nereis and Deidamia, the ſiſters of Olympias (c), and the daughters of Pyrrhus, the grand-father of him who is the ſubject of this article. Nereis married Gelon, King of Sicily, and Deidamia was murthered near the altar of Diana, during a ſedition. The Gods, in order to puniſh that crime, afflicted the people of Epirus ſo many different ways, that they were almoſt entirely deſtroyed by famine, and by civil and foreign wars (d).

(a) Juſtin, lib. 28. cap. 1. & ſeq.

(b) Athen. lib. 13. p. 589.

(c) She had married her brother Alexander. See Juſtin, lib. 28. cap. 1. & ſeq.

(d) Juſtin, ubi ſupra.

[A] His mother cauſed his miſtreſs to be poiſoned.] She was of Leucas, and named Tygris (1). Monſieur Boiſſieu (2) exploding all the other explications, which have been given of theſe two lines of Ovid;

Utque nepos dicti, noſtro modo carmine, regis
Cantharidum ſuccos dante parente bibas,

i. e. "That like the grandſon of the King, we have "juſt now mentioned in this Poem, you may ſwallow "the poiſon, adminiſtered to you by your mother." Monſieur Boiſſieu, I ſay, conjectures that our Pyrrhus is meant here, and that his mother Olympias did not ſpare him more than ſhe did his concubine Tygris. If it be ſo, Juſtin was very ſimple to aſcribe the death of that Princeſs to her grief for the loſs of her two ſons. One ought not to give ſo honourable a name to the cruel remorſe of conſcience, which ſhould torture a mother, who had put her own ſon to death.

(1) Athen. lib. 13. p. 589.

(2) In Ibin, p. 65.

PYTHAGORAS, the firſt of the ancient Sages, who took the title of Philoſopher [A]. He flouriſhed in the time of Tarquin, the laſt King of Rome, and not in the time

[A] He is the firſt who took the title of Philoſopher.] Before his time, they who excelled in the knowledge of nature, or who made themſelves commendable by an exemplary life, were ſtyled ſages, σοφοὶ, or wiſe men. Pythagoras thinking that title had ſomething too haughty in it, took another by which he hinted, that he did not pretend to be already poſſeſſed of wiſdom, but only deſired to attain it. He ſtyled himſelf therefore a Philoſopher, that is to ſay, a lover of wiſdom; ſince which time that name has conſtantly been time of Numa [B], as ſeveral Authors pretend. He gained a very great reputation by been given to the profeſſors of natural and moral ſciences. Cicero tells us where that new title firſt took its riſe, the occaſion which gave it birth, and what it ſignifies. A quibus ducti deinceps omnes, qui in rerum contemplatione ſtudia ponebant, ſapientes & habebantur, & nominabantur: idque eorum nomen uſque ad Pythagoræ manavit ætatem: quem, ut ſcribit auditor Platonis Ponticus Heraclides, vir doctus in primis, Phliuntem ferunt veniſſe, eumque cum Leonte, Principe Phliaſiorum, doctè, & copiosè diſſeruiſſe quædam: cujus ingenium, & eloquentiam cùm admiratus eſſet Leon, quæſiviſſe ex eo, qua maximè arte confideret: at illum artem quidem ſe ſcire nullam, ſed eſſe philoſophum: admiratum Leontem novitatem nominis, quæſiſſe, quinam eſſent Philoſophi, & quod inter eos, & reliquos intereſſet, Pythagoram autem reſpondiſſe, SIMILEM ſibi videri vitam hominum, & mercatum eum, qui haberetur maximo ludorum apparatu totius Græciæ celebritate: nam ut illuc alii corporibus exercitatis gloriam, & nobilitatem coronæ peterent: alii emendi, aut vendendi quæſtu, & lucro ducerentur: eſſet autem quoddam genus eorum, idque vel maximè ingenuum, qui nec plauſum, nec lucrum quærerent, ſed viſendi cauſa venirent, ſtudioſeque perſpicerent, quid ageretur, & quo modo: item nos quaſi in mercatus quandam celebritatem ex urbe aliqua, ſic in hanc vitam ex alia vita, & natura profectos; alios gloriæ ſervire, alios pecuniæ: raros eſſe quoſdam, qui, cæteris omnibus pro nihilo habitis, rerum naturam ſtudioſè intuerentur: hos ſe appellare ſapientiæ ſtudioſos, id eſt philoſophos: & ut illic liberaliſſimum eſſet, ſpectare, nihil ſibi acquirentem, ſic in vita longè omnibus ſtudiis contemplationem rerum, cognitionemque præſtare. Nec verò Pythagoras nominis ſolùm inventor, ſed rerum etiam ipſarum amplificator fuit (1). i. e. " After whom all they who applied themſelves to the ſtudy of nature, were held and called " wiſe men; which appellation they went by till the " time of Pythagoras, who, as Heraclides Ponticus, " a moſt learned man, and a Diſciple of Plato, writes, " came to Phlius, where he reaſoned learnedly and " fully upon ſome ſubjects with Leon Prince of " Phlius: who admiring his genius and eloquence, " aſked him to what art he chiefly truſted. Pythagoras anſwered, that he knew no art, but that he was a Philoſopher (a lover of wiſdom) Leon being then ſurprized at the novelty of the name, aſked him who the Philoſophers were, and wherein they differed from the reſt of mankind. Pythagoras replied, that the life of man ſeemed to him like that fair, to which all Greece reſorted, and in which all manner of games were celebrated; for as there ſome endeavoured to diſtinguiſh themſelves, and to win a prize by bodily exerciſes, and others by buying and ſelling had no other view but to get money; and others again, the moſt noble and generous of all, ſought neither applauſe nor love, but came only to ſee the ſhews, and to examine carefully what was done, and how it was performed: ſo we men come into this life from another life and ſtation, as it were out of ſome city to a fair; ſome aim at great reputation, others want to get money; ſome few there are, who reckoning all other things for nothing, apply themſelves diligently to the contemplation of nature: theſe he called the lovers of wiſdom, that is to ſay, Philoſophers. And as in a fair it is moſt generous to be a ſpectator, without pretending to get any thing for one's ſelf; ſo in this life the contemplation and knowledge of things is much preferable to all other ſtudies. Now Pythagoras was not only the inventor of that name, but he has alſo very much improved the knowledge of things themſelves."

(1) Cicero, Tuſculan. Quæſt. lib. 5. cap. 3. Diog. Laert. relates almoſt the ſame thing. See him in Proœmio, num. 12. where he quotes Heraclides Ponticus, ἐν τῷ περὶ τῆς ἀπνοίας, in libro de fœmina ſeptem diebus exanimi, in the book concerning the woman who was ſeven days ſenſeleſs. He obſerves, that that diſcourſe was held at Sicyon. See alſo what he relates in the Life of Pythagoras, where he quotes Soſicrates in Succeſſionibus.

[B] He flouriſhed in the time of Tarquin . . . . and not in the time of Numa.] We cannot aſcertain on what day the name of Philoſopher was firſt uſed; we do not even know in what year it was. We are only told that Pythagoras had that diſcourſe before he went into Italy (2); and the time he went thither is mentioned only in general terms. It was, we are told, under the reign of Tarquin (3). Hanc opinionem (De Immortalitate Animæ) Diſcipulus ejus (4) Pythagoras maxime confirmavit, qui cum regnante Tarquinio Superbo in Italiam veniſſet, tenuit magnam illam Græciam cum honore et diſciplina, tum etiam auctoritate. i. e. " That opinion of the Immortality of " the Soul has been ſtrongly confirmed by his (Pherecydes's) Diſciple Pythagoras, who being come " into Italy under the reign of Tarquin the Proud, " taught there with reputation and learning, and " alſo with great authority." (5) Pythagoras fuit in Italia temporibus iiſdem quibus L. Brutus patriam liberavit. i. e. " Pythagoras was in Italy at the time " when L. Brutus delivered his country from tyranny." The miſtake of thoſe, who have aſſerted that he went into Italy in the time of Numa (6), is very glorious for him, for they fell into that miſtake for no other reaſon, but becauſe they imagined Numa could not have been ſo able a man, and ſo much a Philoſopher as he was, had he not been a Diſciple of Pythagoras. Quinetiam arbitror, ſays Cicero, propter Pythagoreorum admirationem, Numam quoque regem, Pythagoreum à poſterioribus exiſtimatum: nam cùm Pythagoræ diſciplinam, & inſtituta cognoſcerent, regiſque ejus æquitatem, & ſapientiam à majoribus ſuis accepiſſent, ætates autem & tempora ignorarent, propter vetuſtatem, eum, qui ſapientia excelleret, Pythagoræ auditorem fuiſſe crediderunt (7). i. e. " I am apt to think, that becauſe the Pythagoreans were very much admired, King Numa " was thought by poſterity to have been of that ſect: " for being acquainted with Pythagoras's doctrine " and precepts, and having learnt from their anceſtors " how juſt and wiſe that King had been, and not " being well ſkilled in Chronology, becauſe of the " remoteneſs of the times, they imagined that a " man, who excelled in wiſdom, muſt have been a " ſcholar of Pythagoras." Take notice, that Cicero only uſes ſlight conjectures, when he endeavours to perſuade us, that the Romans were acquainted with the tenets and with the reputation of Pythagoras (8). He would not have ſpoke thus, if Pythagoras had been honoured with the right of a Roman citizen, as Epicharmus relates he was (9). Let us obſerve by the by, that the Romans, being ordered by one oracle to ſet up a ſtatue to the braveſt, and to the wiſeſt man of Greece, erected one to the honour of Alcibiades, and another to the honour of Pythagoras (10). Pliny tells us at what time this was done. Invenio, ſays he (11), & Pythagoræ & Alcibiadi, in cornibus Comitii poſitas, cum bello (12) Samniti Apollo Pythius fortiſſimo Graiæ gentis juſſiſſet & alteri ſapientiſſimo, ſimulacra celebri loco dicari: ea ſtetere donec Sylla Dictator ibi Curiam faceret. Mirumque eſt, illos patres Socrati cunctis ab eodem Deo ſapientia prælato Pythagoram prætuliſſe, aut tot aliis virtute Alcibiadem, aut quenquam utroque Themiſtocli. i. e. " I find that there were two ſtatues erected " in the corners of the market-place, the one to " Pythagoras, and the other to Alcibiades, when, " during the war with the Samnites, the Pythian " Apollo had ordered to ſet up two ſtatues in a " publick place, the one to the wiſeſt man of " Greece, and the other to the braveſt. Theſe " ſtatues ſtood there till Sylla the Dictator built " a Court-hall in that place. I wonder that the " Senators preferred Pythagoras before Socrates, who " had been declared, by the ſame God, the wiſeſt " of all men; and as to courage, that they choſe " Alcibiades before ſo many other brave men, or " even that in both reſpects they preferred any to " Themiſtocles." Pliny wonders, you ſee, that the Romans choſe Pythagoras rather than Socrates. But how did he know that they were acquainted with the oracle given in Socrates's favour? After all, it will be found that they choſe the beſt. They may alſo be juſtified by theſe two reaſons (13). They were leſs acquainted with Socrates than with Pythagoras, for the latter had taught a long time in Italy with great reputation; and they were prepoſſeſſed in Pythagoras's favour, becauſe they imagined that Numa had been his diſciple. This was the vulgar opinion; and though it were falſe, yet the Magiſtrates fomented it. This appeared when it was pretended Numa's tomb was found out with his books (14); for it was divulged abroad, that theſe books related to the Pythagorean Philoſophy. Adjicit Valerius Antias libros Pythagoricos fuiſſe: vulgatæ opinioni qua creditur Pythagoræ auditorem fuiſſe Numam: mendacio

(2) Qui cum poſt hunc Phliaſium Sermonem in Italiam veniſſet, exornavit eam Græciam, quæ magna dicta eſt, & privatim & publice, præſtantiſſimis & inſtitutis & artibus. Cicero, Tuſculan. Quæſt. lib. 5. cap. 4.

(3) Idem, Tuſculan. lib. 1. cap. 16.

(4) That is to ſay, of Pherecydes.

(5) Cicero, Tuſculan. lib. 4. cap. 1.

(6) Ovid has followed that falſe tradition in the 15th book of his Metam.

(7) Idem, Cicero, Tuſculan. lib. 4. init.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Plut. in Numa, p. 65.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Plin. lib. 34. cap. 6. p. m. 99.

(12) That war began in the year 411 of Rome, and laſted a long time.

(13) Voſſius, de Philoſoph. ſect. p. m. 39, urges theſe reaſons.

(14) 555 years ſince the beginning of his reign. Plin. lib. 13. cap. 13. and not, about 400 years after his death, as Plut. aſſerts, in Numa, p. 74.

by his wiſdom, and by his virtue, and laboured ſucceſsfully to reform and inſtruct the world. His eloquence muſt have been very powerful, ſince by his exhortations he perſuaded the inhabitants of a great city, who were abandoned to an exceſſive diſſoluteneſs, to forſake their luxury and intemperance, and to live according to the rules of virtue (a). He prevailed even with the Ladies, to leave off their fine dreſſes, and all their ornaments [C], and to make a ſacrifice of them to the chief Deity of the place. He perſuaded his Diſciples to practiſe the moſt difficult things; ſince he made them ſubmit to dacio probabili accommodata fide (15). i. e. "Valerius "Antias adds that they were Pythagorean books, "according to the opinion of the vulgar, who be"lieved that Numa was Pythagoras's diſciple; thus "credit was given to a probable falſity." Caſſius Hemina, and Lucius Piſo followed that vulgar opinion in their writings (16). If I be aſked, why the Romans choſe rather to believe that Numa was Pythagoras's ſcholar, than to give Italy the glory of producing ſo wiſe a King, who owed his philoſophy to the lectures of no foreigner whatſoever; I anſwer, 1. That in all likelihood they did not think of the intereſt of their own country, when they firſt gave riſe to that opinion. 2. They thought perhaps that the great merit of that Prince would be the eaſier credited, if it were ſuppoſed that he had ſo celebrated a man for his tutor. Would it have been eaſily believed, that a Barbarian could arrive at ſo high a degree of capacity, without the aſſiſtance of the Greeks? St. Auguſtin would eaſily have been perſuaded, that Numa was one of Pythagoras's diſciples; for he aſſerts that Thales lived in the reign of Romulus (17). Now we know that Thales and Pherecydes were contemporaries, and that Pythagoras was the diſciple of Pherecydes; ſome even pretend that Thales was alſo the diſciple of Pherecydes (18). It is certain at leaſt, that Anaximander, the diſciple of Thales, and Pythagoras lived in the ſame time (19). None of the commentators upon Diogenes Laertius give us notice of the erroneous tranſlation of theſe words. Φιλοσοφίας δὲ δύο γεγόνασι διαδοχαὶ, ἥ τε ἀπὸ Ἀναξιμάνδρου, καὶ ἡ ἀπὸ Πυθαγόρου. τῆ μὲν, Θαλῆ διακηκοότος (20). i. e. "There have been two ſucceſſions, "or ſects of Philoſophy, the one from Anaximander, "and the other from Pythagoras: Thales was A"naximander's diſciple." It is plain, that the Greek words ſignify, not that Thales was the diſciple of Anaximander, but on the contrary, that Anaximander was the diſciple of Thales.

(a) Juſtin, lib. 20. cap. 4. I give his words in the rem. [C].

Let us conclude this remark with a paſſage from Pliny (21), in which it is aſſerted, that Pythagoras was in Egypt, when Semneſerteus reigned there. This ſeems to be inconſiſtent with what others relate, namely that Pythagoras went into Egypt with letters of recommendation from Polycrates Tyrant of Samos, to Amaſis King of Egypt. This is aſſerted by Diogenes Laertius (22). Father Hardouin imagined (23) he could remove that difficulty, by ſuppoſing that Pythagoras went into Egypt under the reign of Amaſis, and continued ſo long in that country, that he was there even when Amaſis died, and in the reign of his ſucceſſor Semneſerteus. But that ſuppoſition is contradicted by Herodotus, who tells us that Cambyſes conquered Egypt ſix months after the death of Amaſis, to whom his ſon Pſammenitus had ſucceeded (24). One might perhaps ſay indeed, that the name of Pſammenitus was by degrees changed into that of Semneſerteus; and it muſt be obſerved that it ſeems Pythagoras was in Egypt when Cambyſes conquered it; for it ſeems that he was one of thoſe ſlaves, whom that monarch cauſed to be tranſported into Perſia. This could not be proved better than by a paſſage from Apuleius; but one would be obliged to correct it a little, and to change the word Ægyptum (to Egypt) into Ægypto (from Egypt) which would render the author's thought a little too perplexed. It is therefore better to ſay, that from that paſſage it appears only, that Pythagoras was in Ægypt in the time of Cambyſes: ſee the remark [B] of the article ZOROASTER. Here follow Apuleius's words. Sunt qui Pythagoram ajunt eo temporis inter captivos Cambyſæ regis, Ægyptum cum adveheretur, doctores habuiſſe Perſarum Magos ac præcipue Zoroaſtrem, omnis divini arcani antiſtitem: poſteaque à quodam Gallo Crotonienſium principe reciperatum. Verum enim vero celebrior fama obtinet, ſponte eum petiſſe Ægyptias diſciplinas, atque ibi à ſacerdotibus, cerimoniarum incredendas potentias, numerorum admirandas vices, Geometriæ ſolertiſſimas formulas didiciſſe (25). i. e. "Some aſſert, that when "Pythagoras was ſailing to Ægypt among Cam"byſes's ſlaves, he had for his tutors the Perſian "Magi, or wiſe-men, and chiefly Zoroaſter the "chief Prieſt of all their divine ceremonies, and "that he was afterwards inſtructed by one of the "chief men of Croton. But there is a much more "univerſal report, which is, that he went into Æ"gypt of his own accord, to learn the ſciences of "that country, and that the Prieſts there taught "him the incredible efficacy of ſacred ceremonies, "the wonderful properties of the number, and the "moſt ingenious rules of Geometry." John Bernart did not ſucceed very well in his criticiſm upon Pliny, for he urges againſt him the authority of Euſebius, as though he aſſerted that the reign of Semneſerteus began in the 23d olympiad, and ended in the 45th; that is to ſay, that King Amaſis came to the crown about 30 years after the death of Semneſerteus (26). If this were true, it would be impoſſible to clear Pliny, or to reconcile him with Diogenes Laertius. But let us not be concerned for him; John Bernart's account is falſe; Euſebius does not ſpeak of a King of Egypt, who was called Semneſerteus.

(15) T. Livius, lib. 40. p. m. 783.

(16) See Pliny, lib. 13. cap. 13.

(17) Eodem Romulo regnante Thales Mileſius fuiſſe perhibetur unus e ſeptem ſapientibus. Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. 18. cap. 24.

(18) Tzetzes aſſerts it. See his words in Menage in Laert. cap. 1. num. 119.

(19) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. obſerves, that Anaximander flouriſhed chiefly in the time of Polycrates, Tyrant of Samos.

(20) Laert. in Præmio, num. 13.

(21) Is obeliſcus quem Divus Auguſtus in circo magno ſtatuit, exciſus eſt à rege Semneſerteo, quo regnante Pythagoras in Ægypto fuit. Plin. lib. 36. cap. 9. p. m. 296.

(22) Diog. Laert. lib. 8. num. 3.

(23) In hunc locum Plinii.

(24) Herodot. lib. 3. cap. 14.

(25) Apulejus, Floridor. lib. 2. p. m. 351.

(26) Joann. Bernartius, in Boetium de Conſol. Philoſoph. lib. 1. p. 169.

[C] He prevailed . . . with the Ladies to leave off their fine dreſſes and all their ornaments.] All that Juſtin tells us of the reformation of manners, which, Pythagoras introduced into the city of Crotona, is ſo remarkable, that I ſhall not omit one ſingle ſyllable of his diſcourſe. Crotonam venit, populumque in luxuriam lapſum, auctoritate ſua ad uſum frugalitatis revocavit. Laudabat quotidie virtutem; & vitia luxuriæ, caſuſque civitatum ea peſte perditarum enumerabat; tantumque ſtudium ad frugalitatem multitudinis provocavit, ut aliquos ex his luxuriatos incredibile videretur. Matronarum quoque ſeparatam à viris doctrinam, & puerorum à parentibus frequenter habuit. Docebat nunc has pudicitiam, & obſequia in viros; nunc illos modeſtiam, & literarum ſtudium. Inter hæc velut genitricem virtutum frugalitatem omnibus ingerebat, conſecutuſque diſputationum aſſiduitate erat, ut matronæ auratas veſtes, cæteraque dignitatis ſuæ ornamenta, velut inſtrumenta luxuriæ deponerent, eaque omnia delata in Junonis ædem ipſi Deæ conſecrarent, præ ſe ferentes, vera ornamenta matronarum pudicitiam, non veſtes eſſe. In juventute quoque quantum profligatum ſit, victi fœminarum contumaces animi manifeſtant (27). i. e. "He came to "Crotona, where he reclaimed the people from a "luxurious life to frugality and temperance. He "was daily commending virtue; and repreſenting "the evils which attend luxury, and how many cities "had been ruined by that vice; inſpired the multi"tude with ſo much love for temperance, that one "would not have thought ſome of them ever had led a "luxurious life. He alſo taught the women ſeparately "from their huſbands, and the children ſeparately "from their parents; the former he taught chaſ"tity and obedience to their huſbands; the latter he "inſtructed in the practice of modeſty, and inſpired "them with the love of learning. To all he taught "temperance, which is the mother of all virtues. "By his aſſiduous leſſons he prevailed with the Ma"trons to leave off their rich garments, and all their "ornaments, as being the inſtruments of luxury, and "to conſecrate them to Juno in her temple; pur"ſuading them, that chaſtity and modeſty, and not "rich habits, are the true ornaments of women. "How effectual his admonitions were on the young "men appears from his ſubduing the proud and ob"ſtinate hearts of the women." The laſt words of that author are ſomewhat ſatyrical; for he argues thus: Since Pythagoras conquered the obſtinate heart of the fair-ſex, judge from thence how great a progreſs he muſt have made in the reformation of the young

(27) Juſtin, lib. 20. cap. 4. p. m. 395.

to a probation time of ſilence [D], which laſted at leaſt two years, and which he continued ſometimes for five years with regard to thoſe whom he knew to be moſt inclined to talk (b). It appears from what I have obſerved in another place (c), how powerful and effectual his reproofs were. He obliged all his Diſciples to live in common (d): they gave up their right to their inheritance, and laid their whole eſtates down at their Maſter's feet. Men put a criminal conſtruction upon that union, which proved very fatal to them [E]. He took a particular care to reform the abuſes which men committed in matrimony [F]: and he was of opinion, that without this, the publick tranquillity, the enjoyment of liberty, a good conſtitution of the Government, and ſuch other things,

(b) Aulus Gellius, lib. 1. cap. 9.

(c) Above, quotation (27), of the art. HIPPONAX.

(d) See the rem. [E] towards the end.

young men. It is certain, the women's love of finery is ſo ſtubborn (28), that nothing reſiſts more than that, the ſtrongeſt exhortations of the Preachers. See how effectual Capiſtran's ſermons were againſt gameſters (29); we are not told, that he produced the ſame effect with regard to the jewels of the women. Conecte made more conqueſts upon the women's head-dreſſes by the ſtones which the boys threw at them, than by the figures of Rhethorick (30). Here then we have Chriſtian Preachers who cannot do that, which an Heathen Philoſopher executed. But let us not forget the noble action, which the Roman Ladies did in the time of Camillus (31).

(28) See the art. PERIANDER, quotat. (6) and (7).

(29) See above, rem. [E] of the art. CAPISTRAM.

(30) See the art. CONECTE, rem. [D].

(31) See the art. CAMILLUS, rem. [C].

A modern author has given us in a few words the moſt beautiful ſtrokes, that may ſerve to deſcribe Pythagoras's eloquence. "According to the ſame "Porphyry, when Pythagoras came into Italy he "changed the government of a great many cities, "and reſtored their liberty to them. By one ſingle "exhortation he won over to his Philoſophy above "two thouſand men; he taught them to conquer "their paſſions, to ſuppreſs all inclination to avarice "and ambition, to make but one common ſtock of "all they were poſſeſſed of, and to love ſilence, "retirement, and contemplation (32)." Let it not be objected, that I repreſent that Philoſopher here under the character of a rhetorician; this is not my intention; I am fully perſuaded that he exclaimed againſt vice in ſuch orations as were interſperſed with flowers of rhetorick, and compoſed according to the rules and the florid ſubtleties, which the Sophiſts of latter ages uſed. But yet we may aſcribe a wonderful eloquence to him, ſince his diſcourſes proved ſo effectual and perſuading. The ſtrength of that eloquence conſiſted, no doubt, in a grave expoſition of his arguments, and in the weight, which his wiſe and modeſt behaviour added to his words. He preached by his own example; his very ſilence was ſometimes eloquent, and contributed as much as his voice to the reformation he procured, as an ancient Poet has very well obſerved.

(32) Thomaſſin, Methode d'etudier & d'enſeigner la Philoſophie, liv. 1. cap. 15. p. 153.

Annon Pythagoræ monitus annique ſilentes
Famoſum Oebalii luxum preſſere Tarenti (33).

(33) Claudianus, de Mallii Theodori Conſulatu, ver. 156. We muſt read Annon, and not & non, without a point of Interrogation, as in Barthius's edit. Obſerve that Barthius, who is every where elſe ſo prolix, ſays nothing upon this paſſage. Claudianus had ſaid a little before, Quidquid Democritus riſit, dixitque tacendo Pythagoras, ibid. ver. 90.

[D] A probation-time of ſilence.] It was a very ſtrict diſcipline. Ἐξ᾽ ὧν πάντων χαλεπώτατον ἐγκρατευμάτων τὸ γλώττης κρατεῖν (34). That is to ſay, to conquer one's tongue is the moſt difficult victory one can gain. See how they, who can keep their tongue in due time, are commended in Cato's diſtichs (35). Servius mentions the probation time, which laſted five years (36); and here follows what Apuleius remarks concerning the probation time of near five years, which the leſs diſcreet Scholars were made to undergo. Non in totum tamen (Pythagorici) vocem deſueſcebant, nec omnes pari tempore elingues magiſtrum ſectabantur: ſed gravioribus viris brevi ſpatio ſatis videbatur taciturnitas modificata. Loquaciores enim vero ferme in quinquennium, velut in exilium vocis mittebantur (37). i. e. "Nor did the Pythagoreans "entirely loſe the uſe of ſpeech; nor did they "all follow their maſter in ſilence during the ſame "time: it was thought enough for the diſcreet, if "they were condemned to ſilence for a little time; "but [the talkative were forbidden to ſpeak during "almoſt five years; their tongue being, as it were, "ſent into baniſhment."

(34) Jamblichus, lib. 1. cap. 31.

(35) Proximus ille Deo eſt qui ſcit ratione tacere.

(36) Servius in illud, Æn. 10. ver. 564. tacitis regnavit Amyclis.

(37) Apuleius, in Floridis.

[E] Men put a criminal conſtruction upon that union, which proved very fatal to them.] That fellowſhip of ſtudents was reckoned to be a faction, which conſpired againſt the State; ſo that they put threeſcore of them to death, the reſt made their eſcape. Sed tercenti ex juvenibus cum ſodalitii juris ſacramento quodam nexi ſeparatam à ceteris civibus vitam exercerent, quaſi cœtum clandeſtinæ conjurationis haberent, civitatem in ſe converterant, quæ eos, cum in unam domum convenirent, cremare voluit. In quo tumultu ſexaginta ferme periere, cæteri in exilium profecti (38). i. e. "Three "hundred young men being united into a fellowſhip "by an oath, lived together ſeparated from the reſt "of the citizens; this raiſed the whole city againſt "them, as though they were ſecretly contriving a "plot; ſo that as they were one day met together in "the ſame houſe, it was ſet on fire with a deſign to "burn them all; near threeſcore of them periſhed "in the tumult, and the reſt went voluntarily into "baniſhment." It does not appear either from this paſſage of Juſtin, or from what goes before it, whether this ſtorm was raiſed during Pythagoras's life, or after his death. If we lay any ſtreſs upon this whole account, we ought rather to think that this perſecution did not extend to Pythagoras himſelf, than that it did. It ſeems therefore that Juſtin is relating here the ſame particular, which is mentioned by Polybius. Now according to Polybius the Pythagoreans were burnt in Greece ſome time before the war, which Dionyſius, tyrant of Syracuſe, waged againſt the Crotonians (39): it ſeems therefore that they were not burnt in their maſter's life time: for that war of Dionyſius againſt the Crotonians happened one hundred and twenty years after Tarquin was driven from Rome (40). Now Pythagoras went into Italy in Tarquin's reign, and died at Metapontum after he had lived twenty years at Crotona (41). Voſſius obſerves, that Juſtin, Polybius, Porphyry, and Jamblichus, ſpeak of the ſame event (42): now the two laſt aſſert, that two perſons only eſcaped out of the fire, namely, Archippus and Lyſis: this was not therefore, will ſome ſay, a cruelty exerted againſt the ſchool of Pythagoras in his life time, for Lyſis being retired to Thebes was tutor there to Epaminondas (43), who died 145 years after Tarquin was expelled. Theſe are difficulties only, I own it, and not ſtrong arguments againſt thoſe, who would maintain, that the fire, from which Lyſis eſcaped, happened during Pythagoras's life. Obſerve, that according to Plutarch, the two Pythagoreans who eſcaped were Philolaus and Lyſis. He obſerves this in his treatiſe concerning the genius of Socrates (44), and he gives there the name of Cyclonians to thoſe who ſet fire to Pythagoras's College at Metapontum. In another book he calls them Cylonians, and he obſerves that they burnt Pythagoras himſelf. Καὶ ὁ Πυθαγόρου ζῶντος ἐμπρησμὸς ἀπὸ τῶν Κυλωνείων. Quod Pythagoræ vivo à Cyloneis illatum eſt incendium (45).

(38) Juſtin, lib. 22. cap. 4. See the rem. [O].

(39) Polybius, lib. 2.

(40) See Calviſius, p. m. 95, 165.

(41) Juſtin, lib. 20. cap. 4.

(42) Voſſius, de Philoſophor. Sectis, cap. 6. num. 26. p. m. 38.

(43) Diog. Laert. lib. 8. num. 7. Cornelius Nepos, in Epaminonda. Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 3. cap. 17.

(44) Plut. de Socrat. Genio, p. 583.

If you have a mind to know the name of the Author who tells us, that this Philoſopher's ſcholars diveſted themſelves of their property and eſtates, I refer you to this paſſage from Aulus Gellius. Omnes ſimul qui à Pythagora in cohortem illam diſciplinarum recepti erant, quod quiſque familiæ pecuniæque habebat, in medium dabant, & coibatur ſocietas inſeparabilis, tamquam illud fuerit antiquum conſortium, quod re atque verbo appellabatur κοινόβιον (46). i. e. "All they who were "admitted into Pythagoras's ſchool, uſed to put all "their eſtates and money together for the uſe of them "all: thus they formed an inſeparable fellowſhip, as "it were like that ancient ſociety, which both was, "and was likewiſe called a Community of Living."

(45) Idem, de Stoicor. Repugn. p. 1051.

(46) Aul. Gell. lib. 1. cap. 9. See alſo Diog. Laert. lib. 8. num. 10.

[F] He took particular care to reform the abuſes which were committed in matrimony.] He repreſented that the deſign of the union of both ſexes was to produce lawfully another ſelf: that men muſt endeavour to get children well ſhaped, ſtrong and healthy; that one ought to uſe them to labour and ſobriety, and keep them from venereal pleaſures, till they be things, to which he applied himſelf with the utmoſt zeal [G], were not ſufficient to make twenty years old, and exhort them afterwards to indulge themſelves in thoſe pleaſures but ſeldom and from time to time. Neceſſum eſſe ut pueri & virgines in laboribus & exercitationibus, omnibuſque tolerantiæ ac temperantiæ generibus congruentibus educentur ; ut conveniens victus ipſis adhibeatur, & laborum amans, temperans, & continens eorum vita ſit : ut de uſu rei venereæ ſero erudiantur ; ac pueros ſic inſtitui & educari oporteat, ut intra viceſimum ætatis annum talem congreſſum nullo modo quærant. Cum autem ad ætatem Veneri maturam perverenerint, hac raro utendum eſſe ; incontinentiam enim, bonamque corporis habitudinem, rarius conjunctas eſſe (47). He loudly condemned thoſe, who indulge themſelves in the venereal act, after they have eat too much, and much more thoſe who do it when they are in liquor (48). He required from the huſbands not only that they ſhould forſake their concubines, but alſo that they ſhould behave towards their wives according to the rules of chaſtity and modeſty. They did neither ; but we are told that his proofs touched them to the quick, and that they laboured zealouſly to reform themſelves. Fertur & Pythagoras Crotoniatas à pellicum & illegitimarum fœminarum conſuetudine abduxiſſe ; maritos etiam monuiſſe, ut erga uxores ſuas caſti & pudici forent : quo factum, ut Crotoniatæ omnem incontinentiam & luxuriam, quæ tum temporis in urbe, ceu peſtis, graſſabantur, è medio tollere laborarint (49). The inhabitants of Crotona led a very diſſolute life ; they married only for form's ſake ; they took wives ad honores, they neglected and deſpiſed them, and adhered only to their concubines. This was giving a bad example ; ſuch a conduct might be of dangerous conſequence : they did not conſider it was to be feared leſt their wives ſhould imitate them, and perhaps they did not much care whether they did it or not. The maxim frangenti fidem frangatur eidem (he who violates his faith, muſt expect the ſame from others towards him) is but too often followed with regard to conjugal fidelity. This was a diſorder which Pythagoras undertook to reform. If we may believe Juſtin, the force of his inſtructions was ſufficient for that purpoſe : but ſome Authors hint that they proved ineffectual, and that he was obliged to employ a more powerful method ; which was his pretending that he deſcended into hell, where he had ſeen thoſe huſbands tormented, who did not pay the conjugal duty to their wives. This made him very much conſidered. Φησὶ δὲ Ἱερώνυμος καταβῆναι αὐτὸν εἰς ᾅδου τήν τε Ἡσιόδου ψυχὴν ἰδεῖν πρὸς κίονι χαλκῷ δεδεμένην καὶ τρίζουσαν· τήν δὲ Ὁμήρου, κρεμαμένην ἀπὸ δένδρου, καὶ ὄφεις περὶ αὐτὴν, ἀνθ' ὧν εἶπε περὶ θεῶν. κολαζομένους δὲ καὶ τοὺς μὴ θέλοντας συνεῖναι ταῖς αὐτῶν γυναιξί. καὶ δὴ καὶ διὰ τοῦτο τιμηθῆναι ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν Κρότωνι. (50). Hieronymus relates that he (Pythagoras) went into Hell, where he ſaw the ſoul of Heſiod tied with chains to a pillar of braſs, and lamenting ; and the ſoul of Homer hanging on a tree, and ſurrounded with ſnakes, as a puniſhment for what he had feigned concerning the Gods. He ſaw alſo thoſe tormented, who would not lye with their wives. For theſe reports he was very much eſteemed at Crotona. This ſtory is no doubt the ſame with that which Hermippus relates. He obſerves (51) that this Philoſopher being arrived in Italy, ſhut himſelf up in a ſubterraneous habitation, after he had deſired his mother to keep an accurate regiſter of all that ſhould come to paſs. Having confined himſelf there sa long as he thought proper, his mother conveyed her regiſter to him according to their former agreement. He took notice of the dates, and of the other circumſtances of the events ; he got out of that place with a pale and lean face ; he called the people together, and told them that he came from Hell, and in order to perſuade them of it, he related to them what happened in the city ; he made the whole audience ſigh and weep, ſo much were they moved by his diſcourſe ; they did not queſtion but he was a divine man, and committed their wives to his care to be inſtructed by him. It was no doubt on this occaſion that he frighted the bad huſbands, by repreſenting to them, that they, who refuſe to their wives the careſſes they owe them, are puniſhed very ſeverely in Hell. It is probable that he mentioned alſo the puniſhment which is inflicted on diſſolute women ; and we ought to think this was one of the reaſons, which determined the inhabitants of Crotona to ſend their wives to his ſchool. Obſerve well the contradiction of which that great maſter was guilty : he taught on the one hand the doctrine of the Metempſychoſis, without confining himſelf to the three tranſmigrations of the ſoul mentioned by Pindar (52) : and on the other hand he dared to aſſert, that he had ſeen the ſoul of Homer, that of Heſiod, &c. cruelly tormented in Hell. The Metempſychoſis was inconſiſtent with Hell, as he declares in Ovid.

O genus attonitum gelidæ formidine mortis,
Quid Styga, quid tenebras, & nomina vana timetis,
Materiem vatum, falſique pericula mundi ?
Corpora ſive rogus flamma, ſeu tabe vetuſtas
Abſtulerit, mala poſſe pati non ulla putetis (53).

" Theſe I would teach, and by right reaſon bring " To think of death as but an idle thing.
" Why thus affrighted at an empty name,
" A dream of darkneſs, and fictitious flame ?
" Vain themes of wit, which but in Poems paſs,
" And fables of a world, that never was.
" What feels the body, when the ſoul expires,
" By time corrupted, or conſum'd by fires ?"
DRYDEN.

But he choſe rather to gain authority, and to enable himſelf to extirpate the diſſoluteneſs of the people by contradicting himſelf, than to follow a well connected method of dogmatizing, which had not been ſo uſeful.

I have aſſerted that he did not confine himſelf to the three tranſmigrations mentioned by Pindar ; and ſhall give a plain proof of that aſſertion from Ovid's Verſes, which I ſhall quote hereunder (54). Forcatulus is therefore in the wrong to aſſert the contrary. Conſtat, ſays he (55), Druidum imitatorem Pythagoram, deſultoriam animarum migrationem nonniſi tertiam aſſeruiſſe. Nam ſi perenni ſerie animas in alia atque alia corpora tranſcripſiſſet, quis quæſo locus fuiſſet Elyſiis campis, ut cæli ſedibus ? quod miror ſatyricis ſcriptoribus ſalſis admodum inſulsè derelictam. Quicumque, inquit Pindarus, ter in utraque vitâ à vitiis alieni fuerunt, viam ſibi à Jove deſtinatam adiere ad Saturni urbem. Ἔνθα μακάρων νῆσοι ὠκεανίδες αὖραι περιπνέουσιν, ἄνθεμα δὲ χρυσῷ φλέγει, id eſt, Ubi beatorum inſulam Oceanides auræ circumflant, & flores aurei fulgent. i. e. " It is " certain that Pythagoras, who imitated the Druids, " held that the ſoul paſſed but three times out of one " body into another. For if he had ſuppoſed a con- " tinual tranſmigration, what occaſion had there been " for the Elyſian Fields, or for the celeſtial Seats ? " I wonder the ſmarteſt ſatyrical Writers were ſo " ſilly as not to level their ſtrokes againſt ſuch a ſup- " poſition. They, ſays Pindar, who in their three " lives have abſtained from vice, go to the city of " Saturn, through the way which Jupiter has deſign- " ed for them, where breezes from the ocean blow " about the happy iſland, and golden flowers ſhine " around."

[G] The things to which he applied himſelf with the utmoſt zeal.] His love for the publick good determined him to carry his inſtructions even into the palaces of great men (56). He was ſenſible that if he could inſpire the Princes and chief Magiſtrates with good Principles, he could eaſily make the reſt of mankind reap a great advantage from his philoſophy. He had the happineſs and glory to train up ſuch Diſciples, as proved excellent Legiſlators, a Zaleucus, for inſtance, a Charondas, and ſome others (57). When we mention a Legiſlator, we ſay a man, who muſt be looked upon as the beſt preſent that can be made to civil ſocieties. They who have made laws are more worthy of admiration, and of an immortal praiſe, than the greateſt Conquerors : and yet their name is not tranſmitted down to us with the ſame buſtle as that of a Cyrus and of an Alexander. It is becauſe our mind not being capable to know wherein true grandeur conſiſts, applies erroneouſly the notion of

(47) Omeiſius, in Ethica Pythag. p. 38. ex Jamblicho, in Vita Pythag. lib. 1. cap. 31.

(48) Idem, p. 39. exeodem, ib.

(49) Jamblichus, ibid. cap. 27. apud Omeiſium, ibid. p. 40.

(50) Diog. Laert. lib. 8. num. 21. p. 505.

(51) Apud Diog. Laert. ibid. num. 41. p. 521, 522. See alſo the Scholiaſt on Sophocles ; Monſ. Menage upon this paſſage of Laert. p. 372, 373, quotes his words.

(52) Olym. Ode 2.

(53) Ovid. Metam. lib. 15. ver. 153.

(54) In the rem. [M].

(55) Forcat. de Gallor. Imperio & Philoſophia, lib. 1. p. m. 90.

(56) Πυθαγόρας τοῖς πρωτεύουσιν Ἰταλιωτῶν. Plut. cum principibus viris Philoſopho eſſe diſputandum, p. 777, A.

(57) See Jamb. in Vita Pythag. lib. 1. cap. 30.

make private perſons happy. It is ſurpriſing that a Philoſopher ſo well ſkilled in Aſtronomy, in Geometry, and in the other branches of Mathematicks, as he was, ſhould have taken a delight to deliver his moſt noble precepts under the veil of enigmatical figures: that veil is often ſo thick, that it has afforded the Interpreters a large field for their conjectures [H], ſo that they have put upon them as many myſtical ſenſes as they pleaſed. Some take the order he gave not to eat any beans, in a literal ſenſe [I]. There of it to ſuch actions as make a great noiſe in the world: it cannot diſtinguiſh what is great, from what is pompous and ſplendid (58); and thus the life of a man, who applies himſelf to remedy the inward diſorders of a State by uſeful laws, does not make a great impreſſion upon our mind, becauſe ſuch a work is performed gently. But when a man conquers Cities and Provinces, when he puts millions of men to death, when he reduces ten times as many to poverty and want, he acquires ſo great a fame, that the remoteſt poſterity never mentions his name but with admiration and rapture. However, it will be for ever a great glory to Pythagoras, with thoſe who know how to judge right of things, that he furniſhed the world with ſome good Legiſlators. This is a glory which returns back upon philoſophy itſelf, as Seneca has very well obſerved. Poſtquam, ſurrepentibus vitiis, in tyrannidem Regna verſa ſunt, opus eſſe cepit Legibus, quas et ipſas inter initia tulere ſapientes. Solon . . . . Licurgus . . . . . Zaleuci Leges, Charondaque laudantur; hi non in foro, nec in conſultorum atrio, ſed in Pythagoræ tacito illo ſanctoque ſeceſſu didicere jura, quæ florenti tunc Sicilia, et per Italiam Græciæ ponerent (59). i. e. "The vices creeping in "afterwards, Kingdoms were turned into tyrannical "Governments, ſo that it began to be neceſſary to "enact laws, which in the beginning were made by "the wiſe men or Philoſophers, by Solon . . . . by "Lycurgus . . . . The laws of Zaleucus and of "Charondas are alſo famous. Theſe men did not "ſtudy at the bar, or in a Counſellor's chamber, but "in the holy and ſacred receſs of Pythagoras: there "they learned thoſe laws which they eſtabliſhed in "Sicily, which was then in a flouriſhing condition, "and throughout Italy where the Greeks had ſettled." Pythagoras applied himſelf alſo very zealouſly to ſuppreſs the wars which aroſe in Italy, and thoſe domeſtick factions which diſturbed the cities (60). He often uſed to ſay, we ought to wage war, only againſt theſe five enemies, the diſtempers of the body, the ignorance of the mind, the paſſions of the heart, the ſeditions in cities, and diſorders of families. Theſe are five monſters which we ought to fight againſt with fire and ſword, without giving them any quarter. Suſtuliſſe penitus omnes diſcordias, non à notis ſolum & familiaribus, eorumque poſteris ad aliquot ſecula, ſed ab omnibus omnino Italiæ atque Siciliæ civitatibus, tam inteſtinas quàm externas, auctor eſt Porphyrius in ejus Vita: qui addit, hoc apophthegma crebrò ei in ore fuiſſe, Fugandum omni conatu, & igni atque ferro, & quibuſcumque denique machinis præcidendum; à corpore quidem morbum; ab anima ignorantiam; à ventre luxuriam; à civitate ſeditionem; à familia diſcordiam (61). It is no wonder that the inhabitants of Crotona would have their Senate follow the advices of ſo excellent a man. It is Valerius Maximus who aſſerts it, in order to prove that Pythagoras's authority was acknowledged even out of his ſchool. Pythagoræ tanta veneratio ab auditoribus tributa eſt; ut quæ ab eo acceperant, in diſputationem deducere nefas exiſtimarent: Quinetiam interpellati ad reddendam cauſſam; hoc ſolum reſpondebant, Ipſum dixiſſe: Magnus honos, ſed ſchola tenus. Illa urbium ſuffragiis tributa eſt. Enixo Crotoniatæ ſtudio ab eo petierunt ut ſenatus ipſorum, qui mille hominum numero conſtabat, conſiliis ſuis uti paterentur (62). i. e. "Pythagoras's ſcholars had ſo great "a veneration for him, that they looked upon it as "a crime to call into queſtion any thing he had "taught them: and when they were required to "give ſome reaſons for what they admitted, the "only anſwer they made was, he has ſaid it: this was "indeed a great honour to him, but confined within "his ſchool. There was another honour conferred "upon him by the ſuffrages of whole cities. The Crotonians begged moſt earneſtly of him, that their Senate, which conſiſted of a thouſand men, might "be guided by his councils." The ſame Author tells us that ſeveral cities in Italy felt the happy effects of this Philoſopher's ſtudies (63).

(58) See Pliny the younger, Epiſt. 16. lib. 3. where he ſhews alia eſſe clariora, alia majora.

(59) Seneca, Epiſt. 90. p. m. 369. See Peter Petit's Miſcellaneæ Obſervationes, p. 265.

(60) See the Letter which it is pretended he wrote to Anaximenes, apud Laert. lib. 8. num. 49.

(61) Menagius, in Laert. lib. 8. num. 50.

(62) Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 15. num. 1. in Externis.

(63) Plurimis & opulentiſſimis urbibus effectus ſuorum ſtudiorum approbavit. Idem, ibid. cap. 7. num. 2. Externor.

[H] It has afforded the interpreters a large field for their conjectures.] See for inſtance what they have obſerved upon this precept of Pythagoras, do not ſit down upon the Chœnix, Chœnici ne inſideas; ſee it, I ſay, in the diſſertations, to which I have referred in another place (64). That ſymbolical method of teaching was very much uſed in the Eaſt and in Egypt: Pythagoras had no doubt borrowed it from thence. He returned from his travels loaded with the ſpoils of learning which he had gathered in all the countries he had viſited. It is pretended that he reaped a plentiful harveſt particularly among the Jews, and that he learnt many things from Ezekiel and Daniel. It is even aſſerted that his Tetractys is the ſame thing with the name tetragrammaton, an ineffable name, which abounds with myſteries, if we may believe the Rabins. Conſult the learned Monſieur Huet. Adde, ſays he (65), & veri perſimilem conjecturam Seldeni, & Wendelini, qua mirificam illam Pythagoræ τετρακτὺν ipſum eſſe ſuſpicantur Dei nomen τετραγράμματον, יהוה, atque ejus notitiam à Daniele jam ſene Pythagoram, cum in Babylonia degeret accepiſſe. Danieli adjungi poterat & Ezechiel, ut oſtendam infrà. Others pretend, that this Tetractys, that great object of veneration, and by which they ſwore, was nothing but a myſterious manner of dogmatizing by numbers (66). Conſider theſe words from the Acta Eruditorum for the year 1685, page 204, in the extract of an Engliſh book of John Turner. Ex hac ipſa tamen gentilium notitia inſcite à quibuſdam colligi ait, Pythagoræorum Tetractyn quam tam reverenter habuerunt, & per quam jurare etiam ſoliti leguntur, eſſe unum idemque cum nomine tetragrammato, quod à Judæis ipſis acceperint. . . . . Aliam proinde viam demonſtrat Autor tetractyn iſtam explicandi, deſumptam puta à methodo Pythagoræorum myſtica, qua dogmata ſua fere per numeros certos indicare & explanare fuerint ſoliti. i. e. "He obſerves that from this knowledge of the Hea"thens ſome infer unſkilfully, that the tetractys of the "Pythagoreans for which they had ſo great a vene"ration, and by which, we read, that they were "wont to ſwear, is the ſame with the name compoſ"ed of four letters, which they borrowed from the "Jews themſelves. . . . . The author ſhews us "therefore another manner of explaining that te"tractys, namely by the myſtical method of the "Pythagoreans, who uſed to expreſs and explain "almoſt all their doctrines by numbers." Let us not forget to obſerve, that Pythagoras and his followers had a two-fold method of teaching, the one confined to the initiated, the other deſigned for the ſtrangers and profane: the former was plain and undiſguiſed; the latter was ſymbolical and enigmatical. See on this ſubject, the 13th chapter of the book of John Schefferus Profeſſor at Upſal, de natura & conſtitutione Philoſophiæ Italicæ. This book was printed at Upſal in the year 1664, in 8vo.

(64) In the art. EPICURUS, rem. [L].

(65) Huet. Demonſtr. Evang. propoſit. 4. cap. 2. num. 8. p. 89. edit. Lipſ. 1694. See alſo Sir John Marſham's Chron. Canon. Ægyptiac. ſæc. 9. p. m. 277, 278.

(66) Διὸ καὶ ἐφθόγγυντο οἱ Πυθαγορικοὶ, ὡς μεγίστε ὁρκε ὄντος τῆς τετράδος, Οὐ μὰν τὸν ἱμετέρᾳ ψυχᾷ παραδόντα τετρακτύν.
Παγὰν ἀενάου φύσεως ῥιζώματ' ἔχουσαν.
Itaque ſanctiſſimum jusjurandum Pythagorei quaternario ſunt complexi, quam tetractyn vocant.
Per tibi noſtræ animæ præbentem tetrada juro
Naturæ fontemque & firmamenta perennis.
Plut. de Placit. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. 877, A.

[I] The order he gave not to eat any beans.] They, who take that prohibition in a literal ſenſe, alledge, among other reaſons, that Pythagoras was inſtructed by the Egyptians, and did even ſuffer himſelf to be circumciſed that he might be admitted into their moſt ſecret myſteries. Διʼ ὃς καὶ περιετέμετο, ἵνα δὴ καὶ εἰς τὰ ἄδυτα καταλθὼν, τὴν μυστικὴν παρ' Αἰγυπτίων ἐκμάθοι φιλοσοφίαν: For whoſe ſake (the Egyptian Prophets) he alſo was circumciſed, that he might be admitted into their moſt ſecret places, and learn their myſtical Philoſophy (67). Now the Egyptians abſtained from beans; they ſowed none, and if they happened to meet with any that were grown without being ſown, they would not touch them (68). Their Prieſts carried ſuperſtition ſtill farther, they would not ſo much as caſt an eye upon that kind of pulſe, they held it polluted, and would rather have eat the fleſh of their parents, than to taſte of any beans. Θᾶττον ἂν τὰς κιφαλὰς

(67) Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. 1. p. 302.

(68) Herodotus, lib. 2. cap. 37.

There are few perſons of thoſe ancient times who travelled as much as he has done.

κεφαλὰς φαγεῖν φασι τῶν πατέρων ἢ κυάμους. Dicunt ſe parentum capita citius eſuros quam fabas (69). Whence it is inferred, that we ought to believe that Pythagoras, who was the diſciple of thoſe people, prohibited literally that kind of pulſe. Several grave authors among the ancients underſtand this prohibition in that ſenſe. Some have aſſerted, that he choſe rather to be killed by thoſe who purſued him, than to make his eſcape by croſſing a field ſown with beans (70), ſo much did he reſpect or abhor that plant. Ariſtoxenus is, I think, the only author, who aſſerts that Pythagoras uſed often to eat beans. Ariſtoxenus muſicus vir literarum veterum diligentiſſimus, Ariſtotelis philoſophi auditor, in libro, quem de Pythagora reliquit, nullo ſæpius ligamento Pythagoram dicit uſum quàm fabis : quoniam is cibus & ſubduceret ſenſim alvum, & lævigaret. Verba iſta Ariſtoxeni ſubſcripſi. Πυθαγόρας δὲ τῶν ὀσπρίων μάλιστα τὸν κύαμον ἐδοκίμασε λίαν κινητικόν τε γὰρ εἶναι, καὶ διαφορητικόν. διὸ καὶ μάλιστα κέχρηται αὐτῷ (17). i. e. " Ariſtoxenus the Muſician, " a man well verſed in antiquity, and the diſciple of " Ariſtotle, wrote a book concerning Pythagoras, in " which he obſerves, that Pythagoras uſed to eat no " kind of pulſe oftner than beans, becauſe they eaſe " the belly by degrees, and looſen it." Our learned men do not make much account of this authority of Ariſtoxenus : they ſuppoſe that he was miſtaken ; they look upon Pythagoras's abſtinence from beans as an unqueſtionable matter of fact, and inquire into the reaſons of it. Ariſtotle hints four or five reaſons of that abſtinence : he pretends that Pythagoras prohibited the uſe of beans, either becauſe they reſemble the privy part, or becauſe they reſemble the gates of hell, or becauſe they prompt men to venery, or becauſe they reſemble the nature of the univerſe, or becauſe they were uſed in the election of the Magiſtrates (72). They who take that prohibition to be a moral precept, and that Pythagoras meant it in an allegorical ſenſe, imagine, that he deſigned thereby to forbid his diſciples to meddle with the government. The ground of this opinion is, that in ſome cities men gave their votes with beans when they were about chooſing the Magiſtrates. Others pretend that Pythagoras intended to prohibit the venereal pleaſure. Here follows a paſſage from Aulus Gellius ; it is extracted from the chapter in which the author relates and approves Ariſtoxenus's account. Videtur autem de κυάμῳ non eſſe tacto cauſam erroris fuiſſe, quia in Empedocli carmine quo diſciplinas Pythagoræ ſecutus eſt, verſus hic invenitur :

Δειλοὶ, πάνδειλοι, κυάμων ἀπὸ χεῖρας ἔχεσθαι.

opinati enim ſunt plerique κύαμον legumentum vulgo dici. Sed qui diligentius anquiſitiuſque carmina Empedocli arbitrati ſunt, κυάμους hoc in loco teſticulos ſignificare dicunt ; eoſque more Pythagoræ opertè atque ſymbolicè κυάμους appellatos, quia ſint εἰς τὸ κυεῖν δεινοῖ καὶ αἴτιοι τοῦ κυεῖν ; & genituræ humanæ vim præbeant, idcircoque in Empedocli verſu iſto non à fabulo edendo, ſed à rei venereæ proluvio voluiſſe homines deducere (73). i. e. " It ſeems " that the miſtake of not eating beans is owing to " the following line, which is to be met with in " Empedocles, who followed the philoſophy of Py- " thagoras, They are miſerable, very miſerable who uſe " beans. Moſt perſons imagined that by the word " beans (κυάμων) the pulſe ſo called was meant here. " But they, who have examined Empedocles's poems " with more care and attention, have judged that " by κυάμους we muſt underſtand here the Teſticles ; " which, after the manner of the Pythagoreans, are " called thus ſymbolically, and obſcurely ; becauſe " they ſerve to the propagation of mankind ; ſo " that Empedocles, in the line before us, warns us, " not againſt the eating of beans, but againſt the uſe " of venereal pleaſures." Mauro, in a poem in which by the name della Faba (of the beans) he means ſomething obſcene (74), joins together the opinion of Ariſtoxenus, and the contrary opinion. He pretends that Pythagoras prohibited the uſe of beans, that is to ſay, the venereal pleaſure, and yet that there was no food he uſed more commonly than beans : he practiſed himſelf what he forbad others to do ; and this conduct is very common, if we may believe Mauro.

Non fè Natura mai coſa sì ghiotta
Che ſenza quaſi romperla co i denti
Pare, ch'ogni perſona ſe la inghiotta.
Furon certi Filoſofi prudenti,
De' quali fù Pitagora il maeſtro,
Che vietava la Fava a quelle genti.
Eran ribaldi, e ladri da capeſtro.
Che ingannavan con arte gli ignoranti.
E poi ſe re mangiavano un caneſtro.
Così fanno hoggi certi mormoranti,
Che ogni perſona ſepeliſcon viva,
Chimando amore, Venere i furfanti.
Riprendono in altrui la vita attiva,
Et eſſi ogn'hor di veſpro, è di mattino
Hanno in uſo l'attiva, e la paſſiva.
Così Maometto già per torre il vino,
Seppe perſuader provincie, e regni
Co'l ſuo ſottile ingegno, e diavolino.
Gli parue, che i plebei non foſſer degni
Di quel liquore, e così ſempre al mondo
Sovra la forza ſon ſtati gl'ingegni.
Pitagora, c'havea peſcato al fondo,
E de le coſe la ragion ſapea,
Ogni gran ſavio fea parer ſecondo.
E de le Fave nemico parec,
Ma ſe ne confortava il guſto, e'l tatto,
E d'altra coſa quaſi non vivea (75).

Cicero hints that the eating of beans was prohibited, becauſe they prevented fore-boding dreams : for they heat the blood too much, and by irritating the ſpirits, they do not leave the mind in that eaſy and quiet ſituation which is neceſſary for the ſearch of truth. Ex eadem item opinione M. Cicero in libro de divinatione primo, hæc verba poſuit : Jubet igitur Plato ſic ad ſomnum proficiſci corporibus affectis, ut nihil ſit quod errorum animis perturbationemque afferat. Ex quo etiam Pythagoreis interdictum putatur, ne faba veſcerentur : quod habet inflationem magnam is cibus tranquillitatem mentis quærentibus contrariam (76). Hæc quidem M. Cicero (77). i. e. " According to the " fame opinion, Cicero, in his firſt book concerning " Divination, writes thus. Plato adviſes men to go " to reſt with their bodies ſo affected, as not to diſturb " the mind, nor to lead it into any error. For which " reaſon it is alſo thought that the Pythagoreans were for- " bidden to eat beans, becauſe that food is apt to heat " them too much, which is not good for thoſe who en- " deavour to have an eaſy mind. Thus far Cicero." The learned Windet has enquired into the reaſons of that abſtinence, more learnedly and deeply than any other Author. He examines chiefly the opinion of thoſe, who think that by the beans are meant the gates of Hell. We have obſerved above, that one of Pythagoras's reaſons was, that the beans are like thoſe gates. Windet explodes the opinion of thoſe who have aſſerted, that by κύαμος, Pythagoras meant a woman's breaſt, or a man's teſticles (78). He adheres to the literal ſenſe ; but he confeſſes that beans were prohibited from a principle of chaſtity. He diſplays a great deal of learning upon that ſubject ; he ſhews, that according to Pythagoras's way of ſpeaking, to deſcend into Hell was to be begotten ; and ſignified nothing elſe but the change which the ſoul undergoes, when ſhe leaves the ſuperior regions, to be united upon earth, with an organiſed body. Cum autem ἅδης (localiter) ſit regio naturæ corruptibilis, hinc Pythagoricis animæ cæleſte ſolum vertentes atque ἴῶσαι εἰς γένεσιν dicuntur etiam καταλθεῖν εἰς ἅδου (79). He ſhews that beans having no joints or knots in their ſtalks, are thereby like the gates of Hell, through which the ſouls have always a free paſſage, when a body is begotten. He adds, that as Pythagoras conſidered this Life as a kind of death, or of baniſhment, he endeavoured to diſſuade men from begetting children, and would have them labour to return to their celeſtial abodes (80). Atque in eo Portæ Inferni ſimilis eſt Faba, διὰ τὸ ἀγόνατον εἶναι, quod genuum expers ſit, ut loquitur Ariſtoteles (81), vel διὰ τὸ δι' ὅλου τετρῆσθαι, καὶ μὴ ἐγκόπτεσθαι ταῖς μεταξὺ τῶν γονάτων ἐμφράξεσιν, id eſt, prodterea quod penitus perforetur, nec articulorum

(69) Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhonic. Hypotypoſ. lib. 3. p. 156. See alſo St. Chryſoſtom, Homil. 2. in Joann.

(70) See the rem. [P], quot. (128)

(71) Aul. Gell. (lib. 4. cap. 9. p. m. 131.

(72) Ariſtoteles, in libro de Fabis, apud Diog. Laert. in Pythagora, lib. 8. num. 34.

(73) Aul. Gell. lib. 4. cap. 11. p. m. 131.

(74) See the art. MOLZA, rem. [D].

(75) Mauro, Capitolo in lode della Fava, folio 76 verſo, in a collection of Rime piaccevoli, printed at Vicenza, 1603.

(76) Cicero ſays, Inflationem magnam is cibus tranquillitati mentis quærenti vera contrariam. Aul. Gell. muſt have truſted to his memory, when he quoted that paſſage.

(77) Aul. Gell. lib. 4. cap. 9. p. 131.

(78) Eſt qui nixus parum firmo tibicine de papillis muliebribus intellexit ; alii teſtes operte ſignificari volunt, alii, alia quæ parumper attinet deſpicere. Ja. Windet, de Vitæ functorum Statu, p. 791. edit. Londin. 1677.

(79) Idem, ibid. p. 106.

(80) Idem, p. 110, 111.

(81) Apud Diog. Laert. lib. 8. num. 34. Ἢ ὅτι ἅδου πύλαις ἀγόνατον γὰρ μόνον. Sive quod inferni januis (ſimiles ſint fabæ) ſolæ enim geniculatæ non ſunt.

(e) See Apuleius, in Floridis.

done (e). Some perſons thought him an eminent Magician [K]: we ſhall ſee upon what grounds. We ſhall likewiſe obſerve, that Naudé juſtifies him [L]. I have an hundred things ſtill to remark, but am obliged to be ſhort, and I omit every thing that may ticulorum ſive geniculorum obicibus intercipiatur: perinde ac porta inferni nunquam oppeſſulata animabus εἰς γένεσιν κατιούσαις in generationem deſcendentibus perpetuo patet. Pythagoras ergo Fabas vetando, cavit à generatione continua ac perpetua; inſinuans ſuis, ſatius fuiſſe pollutum corruptibilis hujuſce regionis hoſpitium nunquam intrâſſe, ſed quando id integrum jam non fuerit, ſaltem ut admiſſi quàm primum generationem ſiſtant, atque ad ſuperiora redire nitantur. He refutes thoſe, who imagine that the diſciples of Pythagoras were forbidden to eat beans becauſe it is an unclean food: It was, ſays he, for holy and myſterious reaſons, which they revealed to no man (82). Some of them choſe to die rather, than to declare ſo great a ſecret. A Pythagorean woman cut off her tongue, that ſhe might have no reaſon to fear leſt the cruelty of torments ſhould make her ſpeak (83). ipſum autem Pythagoram ferunt ſe vita potius ſpoliandum perſequentibus ultrò ſtitiſſe, quam per Fabetum fuga ſibi conſulere voluiſſe. Jamblichus decem, Suidas quinquaginta Pythagoreis itidem factum memorat. Myllias Crotoniata mori maluit, quàm Dionyſio cauſas exponere propter quas Pythagorei Fabis abſtinerent. Perinde etiam eſt quod de ipſo Pythagora refert Suidas. Malliæ uxor Timycha, in ſimilem quæſtionem veniens, ſuam ſibi linguam præmordit, ne, tormentis victa, cogeretur τῶν ἐχεμυθημένων τί ἀνακαλύψαι, arcanorum quidpiam detegere, referente Jamblicho (84). Monſieur Menage quotes a paſſage from the life of Saint Artemius, in which we read, that Theano the diſciple and wife of Pythagoras, refuſing to declare the reaſons for which ſhe abſtained from beans, was put to death; but ſhe had her tongue cut off before ſhe underwent that puniſhment (85).

(82) Nimis autem populariter dictum eſt Ægyptios & Phereatas ipſumque Pythagoram Fabas utpote immundas adſpernatos: cum revera non ob immunditiem ſed ob ſacras rationes abſtinuerint. Windet, de vita functorum Statu, p. 81.

(83) Compare with this, what the Courtezan Læna did at Athens. Plin. lib. 34. cap. 8. p. m. 322. Athenæus, lib. 13. p. 596. Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 41. Polyænus, lib. 8. mention it. See Father Bouhours, Entretien du Secret, p. m. 197, 198.

(84) Idem, Windet, de vita functorum Statu, p. 84.

I ſhall obſerve by the way, that the School of Salerno, in René Moreau's edition, forbids to eat beans: Manducare fabam caveas, facit illa podagram. i. e. "Forbear to eat beans, for they give the gout." The large and learned collections, which that Phyſician has publiſhed upon this precept, deſerve to be conſulted. The reader will meet there with many obſervations concerning Pythagoras.

[K] Some take him to have been an eminent Magician.] Let us quote the apology for the great men, who have been accuſed of Magick. He has been deemed a ſorcerer and a wizard, becauſe he had lived firſt a great while in Egypt, and had applied himſelf to the reading of Zoroaſter's books, whence he learnt, as we may gueſs, the properties of certain herbs, which he called Coraceſia, Callicia, Menais, Corinthas, and Apronix, *the two firſt of which being put into water made it freeze; the two next were very good remedies to cure the bite of ſerpents; and the laſt blazed on a ſudden from what diſtance ſoever it was expoſed to the fire; as alſo becauſe in one of his ſymbols he expreſsly forbid the uſe of beans, which, according to the ſame ſuperſtition, he uſed to boil; and then expoſed them for ſome nights to the moon, till by the great power of Magick they were turned into blood, which he made uſe of afterwards, to perform that other trick which Cælius Rhodiginus * mentions from Suidas, and from the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes's Comedy, entitled* the Clouds, who aſſert that this Philoſopher uſed to write with blood upon a concave glaſs whatever he pleaſed; and that expoſing thoſe letters to the full moon he could read, on the diſk of that planet, all that he had wrote on his glaſs. To which may alſo be added, that he appeared with a golden thigh at the Olympick games, that he cauſed the river Neſſus to bow to him, that he ſtopped an eagle in her flight, that he tamed a ſhe-bear, that he killed a ſnake, and drove away an ox which was trampling a field ſowed with beans, and that he did it only by the ſecret virtue or power of ſome words. And farther, that he appeared on the ſame day and at the ſame hour, in the city of Crotona, and in the city of Metapontum; and that he foretold future events with ſo much certainty, that many perſons think he was called Pythagoras, becauſe his anſwers were not leſs certain and true than thoſe of Apollo Pythius. That paſſage is extracted from Naudé's Apollogie des grands hommes accuſes de Magie, chap. XV, page 215. He tells us in page 214, that we may infer all this from Jamblichus, from Pliny, from Tertullian, from Origen, from St. Auguſtin, from Ammianus Marcellinus, from the Jeſuit Delrio, and from Boiſſardus.

(85) Θεανὼ δὲ, ἡ τότε γαμετὴ καὶ μαθήτρια, μὴ θέλουσα τὴν αἰτίαν κατειπεῖν, δι' ἣν τοὺς κυάμους οὐκ ἐσθίουσι, τὴν γλῶτταν ἐκτμηθεῖσα πρότερον, καὶ αὐτὴ προαπόλλυται, &c. Vita Sancti Artemii, in Codic. MS. Bibliothecæ Colbertinæ, numero 82. p. 48. Apud Menagium Notis in Diog. Laert. lib. 8. n. 50. p. 378.

* Lib. 9. cap. 23.

[L] The Sieur Naudé clears him of that imputation.] Conſult his Apology for the great men charged with Magick; I ſhall extract only the following paſſage from it. "The arguments which are grounded on "that Philoſopher's forbidding to eat beans, and on "the method he uſed, to turn their juice into blood, "can be as eaſily confuted as the preceding; ſince "Reuchlin juſtly laughs at all the ſilly things which "many fooliſh and brainleſs heads have invented "with regard to that prohibition, ſuch as might be "the fancy of Hermippus in Diogenes, who imagined that Pythagoras choſe rather to ſuffer himſelf to be killed near a field ſowed with beans, "than to make his eſcape through it. And if it be "true that he prohibited them, it was for no other "reaſon but the firſt of the five which Monſieur "Moreau urges † in the paſſage which we have "quoted from his Commentary on the ſchool of Salerno (86) . . . . We may alſo ſay, that there was "nothing extraordinary in his turning beans into "blood; ſince the ſame Monſieur Moreau ſhews "very plainly in his Commentary already mentioned, "that according to the principles of the Chymiſts, "who put the ſimilitude and reſemblance for the "cauſes of the action, it is a thing that can be done, "and may be accounted for by natural cauſes; though "we nevertheleſs ought not to imagine, that Pythagoras made uſe of that elixir of beans, or of human blood, to write upon his concave glaſs. For "beſides that there is no reaſon why he ſhould have "uſed blood, rather than any other liquor, Campanella * proves by very ſolid arguments, that this "operation is abſolutely impoſſible; and when Agrippa † boaſted that he knew that ſecret, and "when Noel des Comtes  related, that they knew "at Paris, at night, what happened in the day at the "Caſtle of Milan, the former ſaid it only out of "vanity and to gain a reputation, as we ſhall fully "demonſtrate in the chapter relating to him; and "the account of the latter is a mere ſtory, and a falſity invented by thoſe who pretended that theſe two "great Princes (87) uſed magical arts together with "their arms, as Ninus and Zoroaſter, Pyrrhus and "Cræſus, Nictanebus and Philip of Macedon, are "ſaid to have done formerly. Which ſhould make "us judge, that all that is related concerning Pythagoras's concave glaſs is as falſely aſcribed to him "as the ſuperſtitious arithmetick, and the wheel of "onomanty; or that if he did ever practiſe it, it "was certainly ſome art and cunning trick or device: "and to conclude with Suidas, παίγνιον διὰ κατόπτρου (88), an illuſion performed by the means of a glaſs. . . "Nor is there any occaſion to dwell much longer "upon what is related of Pythagoras, namely, that "by pronouncing certain words he killed a ſnake, "which did a great deal of damage in Italy; for "Boiſſardus who cites Ariſtotle as his voucher for "that ſtory, does not quote the book from which "he extracted it; and if we enquire more deeply into the truth of the matter, we ſhall find it entirely falſe; ſince it has no other foundation but the "ignorance of thoſe who change the name of Socrates into that of Pythagoras, and who take for "a matter of fact a fabulous ſtory which is related, "of the former, in a book of the cauſes and properties of the Elements, which Patricius * ſhews to "have been erroneouſly aſcribed to Ariſtotle. But "that overſight of Boiſſardus might be eaſily excuſed, if he had not committed a much greater and "more remarkable blunder, by quoting Plutarch in "the life of Numa, as his authority for the ſtory of "the Ox, which Pythagoras † cauſed to go out of "a field of beans, after he had whiſpered ſome words "in the ox's ear. He had done better to confeſs "that he tranſlated this ſtory from Cœlius Rhodiginus, who indeed, in the beginning of his chapter,

† Cap. 19.

(86) Naudé, Apolog. des grans Hommes accuſez de Magie, p. 225, 226.

* Liv. 4. de ſenſu c. 16.

† Lib. 1. de occult. Philoſoph. c. 6.

 Lib. 3. c. 17. Mytholog.

(87) See the art. FRANCIS I. rem. [K].

(88) Naudé, Apolog. des grans Hommes accuſez de Magie, p. 226, 227.

* Diſcuſſion. Peripal. tom. 1. lib. 3.

† Lib. 19. cap. 7.

may be found in Moreri. However, though we find the metamorphoſis there, I ſhall inſiſt

" chapter quotes Plutarch, but for quite another thing " than that ſtory, of which you will never find that " Plutarch ever ſaid a word (89)."

(89) Naudé, ib. p. 237.

I imagine that the Reader will be well pleaſed to meet here with the Greek words of the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes, as they have been corrected by the learned Meziriac. I ſhall cloſe this diſcourſe, ſays he (90), with a pretty obſervation, which the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes's Comedy of the Clouds, and Suidas make on theſe words. Θετταλὴ γυνὴ (the Italian woman) concerning a wonderful piece of magic with regard to the moon. Here follow the Scholiaſts own words. Ἔστι δὲ καὶ Πυθαγόρειον παίγνιον διὰ τῆς κατόπτρου τοιοῦτον. πληροσελήνου τῆς σελήνης οὔσης, εἴτις ἔσοπτρον ἐπιγράψειεν αἵμασι ὅσα βούλεται, καὶ προσιπὼν ἑτέρῳ, σταὶς κατόπιν αὐτοῦ, δεικνὺς πρὸς τὴν σελήνην τὰ γράμματα, κἀκεῖνος ἀτενίσειεν ὁ πλησίον εἰς τὸν τῆς σελήνης κύκλον, ἀναγνοὶς πάντα τὰ ἐν τῷ κατόπτρῳ γεγραμμένα, ὡς ἐπὶ τῆς σελήνης γεγραμμένα. There is a ſport invented by Pythagoras which is performed by the means of a glaſs after this manner. The moon being at the full, ſome one writes what he pleaſes with blood upon a glaſs, and having given notice of it to another, he ſtands behind him, and turns the letters written on the glaſs towards the moon; the other, looking earneſtly upon the moon, reads all that is written on the glaſs, as if it were wrote upon the moon. I have corrected two errors in that paſſage, putting πληροσελήνου the full of the moon, inſtead of προσελήνου the wane of the moon, according to the opinion of the learned Meurſius, in his book of the games of Greece, who has taken that correction from Suidas; I have alſo put ἀτενίσειεν inſtead of ἀτενίσαι. As for Suidas, he ſeems to have only tranſcribed that paſſage word for word. But there are many errors in all the printed books of that Author. You will meet with the correction of theſe errors in Meziriac. Conſult the remarks on the Berger Extravagant (91). i. e. The " fooliſh Shepherd." Noel le Comte's ſtory (92) has been tranſcribed into many books, ſo true is it, that to publiſh any thing from a mere hearſay is wronging the publick. There are but too many Authors who receive it from one another as a matter of fact. Becauſe the Monk St. Romuald had inſerted that ſtory into his Chronological Treaſure, Father L'Enfant inſerted it into his general Hiſtory of all the Ages of the new law. The manner, ſays he (93), of acquainting abſent perſons with what happens, without any magical practice, is as follows: You muſt write it in a large letter upon a glaſs, and preſent it to the moon, which will ſhew the writing to one in a diſtant place who obſerves the moon in another glaſs. Thus when Francis I. was at war with Charles V. for the Dutchy of Milan, they knew at Paris the very night what had happened in the day time (94). If an Author related ſuch things only to laugh at them, he would avoid being cenſured. It is after that manner that John Leo has related a ſtory which was commonly told in Egypt. Among the Ptolemy's, ſays he (95), there was formerly a King of Alexandria, who in order to make that city ſecure and impregnable, and that he might without any danger avoid the powerful attempts of his enemies, cauſed a pillar to be ſet up, on the top of which was put a large reflecting mirrour of ſteel, the property of which was ſuch, that all the enemy's ſhips which ſailed by that pillar (the mirrour being uncovered) were miraculouſly ſet on fire; and it was only for that purpoſe he had ſet up that pillar near the entrance of the Port. But it is ſaid, that when the Mahometans came there they ſpoiled that mirrour, ſo that it came to loſe its property, which was no leſs wonderful than unuſual, and they had the Pillar taken away. A ridiculous ſtory this, which is fit only to be told to children, and not to thoſe who have any judgment. Add to this what I have obſerved in the remark [L] of the article HERCULES, and theſe words of William Bouchet. The mirrour of that woman muſt have been enchanted, and made with the deviliſh magic of Toledo, ſince the inhabitants of Rhodes could ſee the ſhips which were ſailing to Syria or to Egypt, in a Mirrour which hung from the neck of the ſun on their Coloſſus (96).

(90) Meziriac, ſur les Epitres d'Ovide, p. 607, 608.

(91) Upon the 7th book, p. m. 321.

(92) See his Mythologie, liv. 3. chap. 17. p. m. 253.

(93) David l'Enfant, a Dominican Frier, Hiſt. generale de tous les Siecles, under the 21ſt of June, p. 347. He quotes the Treſor Chronolog. p. 519. Tom. 1.

(94) See hereunder, the rem. [Q].

(95) Jean Leon, Deſcription d'Afrique, folio 358, of the Antwerp edit. 1556. I make uſe of the French tranſlation made by John Temporal.

(96) Guillaume Bouchet, Serée 19. p. m. 171, 172.

The ſtory of Noſtradamus's Mirrours is not much better than the foregoing. Men will have it, that he ſaw in aſtrological mirrours thoſe future events, which is pretended he has ſo luckily foretold. Fuit, qui narravit, ſpeculis quibuſdam Aſtrologicis Noſtradamum ad has prædictiones uſum. Nam, qui arcaniora Phyſica & Aſtrologica cognita habent, ajunt è metallis, tanquam Planetis terreſtribus, eadem configuratione, qua Planetæ in Thematibus Natalitiis ponuntur, ſub certis conſtellationibus ſpecula fieri poſſe, in quibus futura cernantur. Talia ſpecula non pro hominibus tantum, ſed & nationibus, urbibus, ſeculis ut illi ajunt, fabricari poſſunt (97). i. e. " There is one, who relates, that Noſtradamus uſed " aſtronomical mirrours to foretel future events. For " they, who are acquainted with the ſecrets of Natural Philoſophy and Aſtrology, pretend, that it " is poſſible to make mirrours in which one may ſee " future events; provided theſe mirrours be made of " ſome of the metals, which are, as it were, terreſtrial planets, and of the ſame figure in which the " planets are placed in the calculation of Nativities, " and under certain conſtellations: theſe mirrours " ſerve to foreſee future events, relating not only to " private perſons, but alſo to cities, nations, future " ages, as they ſay."

(97) Marhoffius, Polybiſt. lib. 1, cap. 10. p. 96.

*(a) It has been aſſerted in a ſatyr againſt the Jeſuits entitled, De ſtudiis abſtruſioribus Jeſuitarum, (of the moſt ſecret ſtudies of the Jeſuits) " that father Coton uſed " to ſhew to King (Henry the Great) in a ſtarry (or " Aſtrological) Mirrour all that was tranſacting at the " Courts, and in the cabinets of all the Princes upon " earth *:" and the Jeſuit, who acquaints us with that particular, confutes that ſtory with great warmth. Nicholas Paſquier relates another ſtory much like that; and takes notice, that he does not tell it with a deſign to turn it into ridicule, but he relates it in the graveſt manner in the world in a letter which is full of the Prognoſtications which did forebode the death of Henry the Great. I am ſo much the more willing to tranſcribe his ſtory here, that it is related with all its circumſtances, and conſequently moſt proper to make the Reader ſenſible how ridiculous it is. " The " late Queen-Mother (Catharine de Medicis) ſays " Paſquier †, being deſirous to know, whether or " not all her children ſhould be raiſed to the Throne, " a Magician, in the caſtle of Chaumont, ſituated " on the bank of the river Loir, between Blois and " Amboiſe, ſhewed her in a great room, in the circumference of a circle which he had drawn, all " the Kings of France which had been and were to " be for the future, who turned as many times about " the circle as they were to reign years, and when " Henry the third had made fifteen turns, the late " King appeared ſtrong and healthy, who made " twenty turns, and as he was finiſhing the twenty-" firſt, he diſappeared. After him came a little " Prince, about eight or nine years old, who made " thirty-ſeven or thirty-eight turns; after which all " things vaniſhed away, becauſe the late Queen-mother would not ſee any more of it." Obſerve, that his pretended enchantment is erroneous the moment it enters upon futurity. He ſays, truly enough, that Henry III. made fifteen turns, and Henry IV. twenty, and diſappeared at the twenty-firſt, becauſe this was wrote after the event : but when he comes to ſpeak of Lewis XIII. he is out. He makes him perform thirty-ſeven or thirty-eight turns, which ſuppoſes that he was to reign till the year 1647 or 1648. Whereas all the world knows that he reigned only till the year 1643. The Author of a ſmall pamphlet, entitled, Remarques ſur le Gouvernement du Royaume durant les Regnes de Henry IV, de Louis XIII, & de Louis XIV, (Obſervations on the adminiſtration of the kingdom during the reigns of Henry IV, Lewis XIII, and Lewis XIV) printed at Cologne for Peter Martou * in 1688, in 12mo, relates that ſtory thus. It is reported that ſhe (Catharine de Medicis) made uſe alſo of the inchantments of her Diviners, in order to know the ſucceſſors of her ſon: and that by the means of a Mirrour they made thoſe appear before her, after the family of the Valois was extinct. The firſt who appeared was Henry IV; but ſhe entertained an implacable hatred and averſion againſt that Prince, and endeavoured continually after that time to deſtroy him, by all the artifices ſhe could

* Reponſe Apologet, à l'Anti-Coton, p. 141.

† Letires de Nicolas Paſquier, p. 10.

 His book was publiſhed in 1623. The letter bears no date; but it appears that it was wrote ſoon after the death of Henry IV.

* This is a fictitious name.

infiſt a little upon it [M]. I believe, that it was on account of this opinion, that he diſapproved of the ſacrifices of beaſts; and it is obſerved, that he adored an altar, upon which no victim had been ſacrificed; that he adored it, I ſay, as a place which had not been could imagine. Notumque furens quid fœmina poſſit. It is well known what an enraged woman is capable to do; there is nothing but ſhe finds means to execute it. But God delivered that Monarch from all her ſnares. After King Henry IV, the Mirrour ſhewed her Lewis XIII, and Lewis XIV with a Majeſtic ſhape and countenance. After whom appeared in the Mirrour a band of Jeſuits, who were in their turn to be maſters of the kingdom of France. She would not ſee any more of that ſhew, and was even like to have broke the mirrour in pieces; however it was preſerved, and ſeveral perſons aſſert that it is ſtill kept in the Louvre †. It is very plain that this account is nothing but Nicholas Paſquier's ſtory reviſed and improved. But do not you wonder with how much boldneſs it has been falſified. I. Henry IV is there made to appear the firſt, whereas Paſquier makes all his Predeceſſors appear before him. II. The ſtory is carried on to Lewis XIV, and even beyond him, whereas he had carried it only to Lewis XIII. III. It is hinted that this happened in the Louvre, whereas Paſquier ſays it was at Chaumont on the river Loir. IV. Here they ſpeak of a mirrour or looking-glaſs, and he mentions only a circle. V. They pretend the mirrour is preſerved, which, they ſay, is ſtill in the Louvre. VI. They aſſert, that Catharine de Medicis would have broke the looking-glaſs; whereas Paſquier ſays only, that ſhe would not ſee any more of the ſhew. I ſay nothing of the reflection which is there ſo wittily brought in, and contradicted immediately after; nor of that fine prediction in behalf of the Jeſuits, the falſity of which appears ſo plainly at this time; nor of what is ſo ridiculouſly aſſerted concerning the cauſe of Catharine de Medicis's animoſity againſt Heny IV. It is well known that ſhe had other reaſons to hate him. It will perhaps be thought that this is dwelling too much on ſuch trifles; but it is not ſo uſeleſs, as ſome perſons may imagine, to refute thoſe kinds of traditions, and to trace them up to their original; ſince we meet daily with perſons ſo credulous as to believe them, and to relate them without any ſhame. How many perſons are there, for inſtance, who have read the latter of theſe two accounts, without knowing, or ſo much as ſuſpecting it was only an improvement of Paſquier's ſtory? Such is the fate of thoſe ſorts of traditions, many additions are made to them in time; ſo that we may very well apply to them this ſaying, vires acquirit eundo. CRIT. REM.

† Remarques ſur le Gouvernement du Royaume, &c. p. 15 and 16.

[M] I ſhall dwell a little upon the metempſycoſis.] It is pretended that Pythagoras boaſted in that reſpect of a moſt particular privilege; for he boaſted that he remembered what bodies his ſoul had animated before he was Pythagoras; but he did not go higher up than the ſiege of Troy. He had been firſt Æthalides the reputed ſon of Mercury, and having got leave to beg of that god whatever he pleaſed, he prayed that he might remember every thing even after his death. Some time after he was Euphorbus, and was wounded by Menelaus at the ſiege of Troy. After the death of Euphorbus he was Hermotimus, and then a fiſher-man of Delos named Pyrrhus, and at laſt he was Pythagoras, a man who remembered all thoſe tranſmigrations, what he had ſuffered in hell, and what the other ſouls ſuffer there (98). Here is a little contradiction (99): for if the ſouls when they have a body go into another, they do not go into hell. In Ovid our Philoſopher does not go up higher than Euphorbus.

(98) Ex Heraclide Pontico, apud Laert. lib. 8. num. 4 and 5.

(99) Compare with this what is obſerved above towards the end of the rem. [F].

Morte carent animæ, ſemperque priore relictâ
Sede, novis domibus vivunt, habitantque receptæ.
Ipſe ego (nam memini) Trojani tempore belli
Panthoides Euphorbus eram: cui pectore quondam
Hæſit in adverſo gravis haſta minoris Atridæ.
Cognovi clypeum lævæ geſtamina noſtræ
Nuper Abantæis, templo Junonis, in Argis (100).

(100) Ovid. Metam. lib. 15. ver. 158.

" Even I, who thoſe myſterious truths declare,
" Was once Euphorbus in the Trojan war;
" My name, and lineage I remember well,
" And how in fight by Sparta's King I fell.
" In Argive Juno's fane I late beheld
" My buckler hung on high, and own'd my former
" ſhield." DRYDEN.

O the happy memory of the man, does Lactantius cry out here merrily! O miram, & ſingularem Pythagoræ memoriam. O miſeram oblivionem noſtrum omnium, qui neſciamus, qui ante fuerimus; ſed fortaſſe vel errore aliquo, vel gratia ſit effectum, ut ille ſolus lethæum gurgitem non attigerit, nec oblivionis aquam guſtaverit. Videlicet ſenex vanus (ſicut otioſæ aniculæ ſolent) fabulas tanquam infantibus credulis finxit. Quòd ſi benè ſenſiſſet de iis, quibus hæc locutus eſt, ſi homines eos exiſtimaſſet, nunquam ſibi tam petulanter mentiendi licentiam vendicaſſet. Sed deridenda hominis leviſſimi vanitas (101). i. e. " Oh, the wonderful and remarkable " memory of Pythagoras! Oh, the wretched forget- " fulneſs of us all, we do not remember what men " we have been formerly. But it happened perhaps " by a miſtake, or by a particular favour, that he " alone eſcaped the gulf of the river Lethe, and did " not drink of the waters of oblivion. But indeed that " ſilly old man (as idle old women uſe to do) was " telling ſtories as it were to credulous children. For " if he had had a good opinion of thoſe he ſpoke " to, if he had thought them men, he would never " have dared to lie ſo ſhamefully. But we muſt " only laugh at the boaſting of that moſt trifling old " man." Lactantius ought not to have queſtioned whether Pythagoras aſcribed his memory to a favour of the gods, ſince he might have read it in Heraclides: and beſides this, will ſome ſay, we may eaſily imagine that Pythagoras prevented the objections, which other men could urge againſt him from their not remembring a ſtate of pre-exiſtence. Here follows an anſwer to that objection. In ſome reſpects it is not probable that he was bold enough to boaſt of ſuch a thing: he muſt have had, as Lactantius obſerves, an exceſſive contempt for the reſt of mankind. But if you turn the tables, you will not find herein any thing that claſhes with probability. He had gained ſo great a reputation, and had ſo often tried the blind docility and exceſſive credulity of his hearers, that he might very well hope and expect that they would grant every thing he ſhould aſſert concerning his memory. If you have a mind to know his tranſmigrations ſince the death of Pythagoras, do but look into the following paſſage, and you will ſee there, that at the third removal he was a Courtezan Pythagoram vero ipſum ſicuti celebre eſt Euphorbum primo ſe fuiſſe dictitaſſe; ita hæc remotiora ſunt his, quæ Clearchus & Dicæarchus memoriæ tradiderunt, fuiſſe eum poſtea Pyrandrum, deinde Callicleam, deinde fœminam pulchra facie meretricem, cui nomen fuerat Alce (102). i. e. " It is publickly known that Py- " thagoras himſelf ſaid, he had been firſt Euphor- " bus; but what Clearchus and Dicæarchus relate " is not ſo well khown, namely that he has been " ſince Pyrander, then Callicles, and afterwards a " beautiful Courtezan named Alce." Let us obſerve, that Pythagoras was not the inventor of the doctrine of the tranſmigration of ſouls; he learnt it from the Egyptians (103). This made him ſpoil the beautiful inſtructions he had received from Pherecydes concerning the immortality of the ſoul, and which made ſo deep an impreſſion upon his mind, that on a ſudden he left off his trade of a wreſtler, to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy. Quis nunc extremus idiota, vel quæ abjecta muliercula non credit animæ immortalitatem, vitamque poſt mortem futuram? Quod apud Græcos olim primus Pherecydes Aſſyrius cum diſputaſſet, Pythagoram Samium illius diſputationis novitate permotum ex athleta in Philoſophum vertit (104). i. e. " What ſimple and illiterate man or mean woman is " there, who do not believe the immortality of the " ſoul and a future life? Which point being firſt " maintained

(101) Lactant. divin. Inſtitut. lib. 3. cap. 18. p. m. 196.

(102) Aul. Gell. lib. 4. cap. 11. See above the article PERICLES, quotat. 186.

(103) Herodotus, lib. 2. cap. 123. where he does nevertheleſs omit the name of Pythagoras. But Diod. Sicul. lib. 1. ſub fin. does not omit it.

(104) Auguſtin, Epiſt. 3 p. m. 9.

been profaned or polluted [N]. I have not mentioned Pythagoras's country, becauſe there is a great variety of opinions upon that ſubject; ſome will have him to be a Tyrrhenian; others repreſent him as a Syrian; others that he was born in the iſle of Samos, and others in the iſle of Cephalenia (f), &c. (g). Nothing can be formed among the Pagan Philoſophers nobler, than what he ſaid concerning God, and the end which we ought to aim at [O]; and probably he would have carried his orthodoxy much farther, if he had had courage enough to expoſe himſelf to martyrdom. The circumſtances of his death

(f) At Samos, a city of that iſle.

(g) See Farnaby, in Ovid. Metam. lib. 15. ver. 60.

" maintained among the Greeks in diſputation by " Pherecydes the Aſſyrian, Pythagoras the Samian " was ſo touched by the novelty of the ſubject, that " from a wreſtler he turned philoſopher."

[N] It is remarked, that he adored an altar. . . . . as a place, which had never been profaned or polluted.] It was an altar dedicated to Apollo in the iſle of Delos. Read the following words of Macrobius (105). Conſtat, ſicut Cloatius Verus ordinatorum libro ſecundo docet, eſſe Deli aram; apud quam hoſtia non cæditur, ſed tantum ſollemni deum prece venerantur, verba Cloatii hæc ſunt: Deli ara eſt Apollinis Γενήτορος, in qua nullum animal ſacrificatur: quam Pythagoram velut inviolatam adoraviſſe produnt. . . . . Meminit hujus aræ & Cato de liberis educandis in hæc verba: Nutrix hæc omnia faciebat in verbenis ac tubis ſine hoſtia, ut Deli ad Apollinis Genitivi aram. " It is certain, " as Cloatius Verus tells us in L. II. Ordinat. that " there is an altar at Delos, on which no victim is " ſacrificed, but the people worſhip the Deity in a " ſolemn prayer. Cloatius's words are: At Delos is " an altar of Apollo Γενήτορος, on which no animal is " ſacrificed, and which Pythagoras is ſaid to have adored " as unpolluted. . . . . Cato mentions this altar in " his book of the education of children, in the following words: The nurſe performed all this with " vervain and trumpets without a victim, as at the " altar of Apollo Genitivus at Delos."

(105) Macrob. Saturn. lib. 3. cap. 6. p. m. 316.

[O] Nothing can be found among the Pagan Philoſophers finer than what he ſaid concerning God, and the end, which we ought to aim at.] He owned the unity of God; for he ſaid, that unity was the principle of all things, and that from it ſprung the ſubject which it employed as matter, and that its agency upon matter was the cauſe of numbers, figures, the elements, the viſible world, &c. Ἀρχὴν μὲν τῶν ἁπάντων, μονάδα. ἐκ δὲ τῆς μονάδος ἀόριστον δυάδα, ὡς ἂν ὕλην τῇ μονάδι αἰτίῳ ὄντι ὑποκεῖσθαι, (106). Omnium rerum id quod unum eſt, eſſe initium; ex eo geminum quod infinitum eſt, profectum tanquam materiem illi ipſi uni, quod cauſa eſt, ſubjectum eſſe, &c (107). He ſays, that this unity was God, Good, the underſtanding and the mind. Τὴν μὲν μονάδα θεὸν, καὶ ἀγαθὸν, ἥτις ἐστὶν ἡ τοῦ ἑνὸς φύσις, αὐτὸς ὁ νοῦς. Unitatem Deum ac bonum quæ ſit Unius natura, ipſa mens (108). Caſaubon the younger (109) cites a paſſage of Stobæus, which ought to be corrected. Πυθαγόρας τῶν ἀρχῶν τὴν μὲν μονάδα θεὸν καὶ τ' ἀγαθὸν. ἥτις ἐστὶν ἡ τοῦ νοὸς φύσις· ὁ αὐτὸς ὁ νοῦς· καὶ τὴν ἀόριστον δυάδα, καὶ τὸ κακὸν περὶ ἣν ἐστιν τὸ ὁλικὸν πλῆθος. Stobæus had taken this from Plutarch (110); we ought therefore to ſtrike out τοῦ νοὸς, and inſert τοῦ ἑνός. Pythagoras's doctrine is not ſo orthodox in this paſſage as in that of Diogenes Laertius; for according to Plutarch he admitted two independent principles, unity and binary, and he aſcribed to the former the divine eſſence, goodneſs, underſtanding, and to the latter the nature of demon, evil, matter. We ſhall judge more advantageouſly of his opinion, if we take it from Clemens Alexandrinus. Οὐκ ἀποκρυπτέον οὐδὲ τοὺς ἀμφὶ τὸν Πυθαγόραν, οἳ φασιν, Ὁ μὲν Θεὸς, εἷς· χ' οὗτος δὲ οὐχ ὡς τινες ὑπονοοῦσιν, ἐκτὸς τῆς διακοσμήσεως, ἀλλ' ἐν αὐτῇ ὅλος, ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ κύκλῳ, ἐπίσκοπος πάσης γενέσεως, κράσις τῶν ὅλων· ἀεὶ ὤν, καὶ ἐργάλας τῶν αὐτοῦ δυναμίων καὶ ἔργων ἁπάντων, ἐν οὐρανῷ φωσὴρ, καὶ πάντων παλὴρ, νοῦς καὶ ψύχωσις τῷ ὅλῳ κύκλῳ, πάντων κίνασις (111). i. e. " Nor are Pythagoras's followers " to be paſſed over in ſilence, who aſſert, that God " indeed is one, but not ſo, as ſome imagine, as if " he were out of the adminiſtration of the world, " but he is wholly in it, in the whole circle, the " ſuperintended over all generation, the diſpoſer of " all things, who always exiſts, and employs his " powers in the work, the author of all the heavenly motions, the father of all things, the mind and " animator of the whole circle, and the ſource of " all motion." The misfortune is, that Pythagoras in repreſenting God as the mover of the univerſe, and the ſoul of the world, aſſerts that our ſouls are portions of the Deity. The objection propoſed to him upon this point in Cicero is not to be anſwered. Nam Pythagoras, qui cenſuit (Deum) animum eſſe per naturam rerum omnem intentum & commeantem, ex quo noſtri animi caperentur, non vidit diſtractione humanorum animorum diſcerpi & dilacerari Deum: & cùm miſeri animi eſſent, quod pleriſque contingeret, tum Dei partem eſſe miſeram: quod fieri non poteſt. Cur autem quicquam ignoraret animus hominis, ſi eſſet Deus? quomodò porrò Deus iſte, ſi nihil eſſet niſi animus, aut infixus, aut infuſus eſſet in mundo (112). i. e. " For " Pythagoras who thought that God is a mind per- " vading all nature, from which our ſouls are ta- " ken, did not ſee, that by the diſtraction of human " ſouls, the Deity ſuffers a diſcerption and dilacera- " tion; and when human ſouls are miſerable, which " happens to be the caſe of moſt of them, then " part of the Deity is miſerable, which is impoſſi- " ble. But how can the mind of man be ignorant " of any thing, if it be God? How can God, if he " be nothing but the ſoul, be infixed or infuſed in " the world?" St. Epiphanius aſcribes to this Philoſopher an opinion, which is very abſurd, viz. that he aſcribed to God a corporeal and organical nature, God being nothing but the heavens, and making uſe of the ſun and moon as two eyes, and ſo with regard to other parts of the firmament (113). But here follows a ſentiment, which is abſolutely true, Clemens Alexandrinus compares it with St. Paul's words. There is none wiſe but God, ſaid Pythagoras (114). The author of the Jewiſh antiquities ſeems greatly ſatisfied with what ſeveral Philoſophers, and particularly this, thought concerning the nature of God; and he does not doubt, that they would have ſpoken ſtill more orthodoxly, if they had not been apprehenſive of perſecution; for, as Plato ſays, it is not ſafe to declare to ignorant perſons the truth concerning the divine nature. Καὶ γὰρ Πυθαγόρας καὶ Ἀναξαγόρας καὶ Πλάτων, καὶ οἱ μετ' ἐκείνους ἀπὸ τῆς σοᾶς φιλόσοφοι, καὶ μικροῦ δεῖν ἅπαντες οὕτω φαίνονται, περὶ τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ φύσεως πεφρονηκότες. ἀλλ' οἱ μὲν πρὸς ὀλίγον φιλοσοφοῦντες εἰς πλῆθος δόξαις προκατειλημμένον τὴν ἀληθειαν τοῦ δόγματος ἐξενεγκεῖν οὐκ ἐτόλμησαν. . . . Αὐτὸς δὲ Πλάτων ὁμολόγησεν, ὅτι τὴν ἀληθῆ περὶ θεοῦ δόξαν εἰς τὴν τῶν ὄχλων ἄγνοιαν οὐκ ἦν ἀσφαλὲς ἐξενεγκεῖν. Pythagoras enim, & Anaxagoras, & Plato, & poſt illos philoſophi Stoici, & pæne cuncti, videntur de divina ſapuiſſe natura. Sed hi quidem ad breve philoſophantes, populo ſuperſtitionum opinionibus jam præoccupato veritatem dogmatis proferre timuére (115). . . . . Ipſe ſiquidem Plato confeſſus eſt, quia veram de Deo opinionem propter ignorantiam plebis proferre ſecurum non eſt (116). The ſame Joſephus aſſerts, that Pythagoras ſurpaſſed in piety and wiſdom all the ancient Philoſophers (117). We muſt not omit the following obſervation of Plutarch; when he ſhews the conformity between the ſentiments of Numa and Pythagoras, he ſays that Numa would not have the Deity repreſented by images, and that God, according to Pythagoras, is an impaſſible nature, which does not fall under the ſenſes, and can only be the object of the underſtanding (118). Οὔτε γὰρ ἐκεῖνος αἰσθητὸν ἢ παθητὸν, ἀόρατον δὲ καὶ ἀκήρατον καὶ νοητὸν ὑπελάμβανεν εἶναι τὸ πρῶτον. Neque enim ille ſenſui aut ulli dolori expoſitum rerum principium eſſe, ſed inviſibile, incorruptum, ſola mente exiſtimavit apprehenſibile (119).

With regard to the end of our actions and ſtudies, nothing can be ſeen more admirable or Chriſtian, than what Pythagoras has ſaid; for he would have the ſtudy of Philoſophy tend to make men like to God. Πρὸς τὴν θείαν ὁμοίωσιν ἀνάγει, καὶ τῆς Πυθαγορικῆς φιλοσοφίας τὸν τελειότατον σκοπὸν ἐκκαλύπτει (120). i. e. " They lead men to a reſemblance of the Deity, and " ſhew the moſt perfect end of the Pythagorean " Philoſophy."

(106) Diog. Laert. lib. 8. num. 25.

(107) Thus Aldobrandini tranſlates it at the beginning of his notes on theſe words of Laert. See alſo Meric Caſaub. upon Laert. ibid. num. 83.

(108) Plut. de Placitis Philoſ. lib. 1. cap. 7. p. 881.

(109) Not. in Diog. Laert. in Alcmæone, lib. 8. num. 83.

(110) After what has been cited from Plut. we read, Τὴν δ' ἀόριστον δυάδα δαίμονα καὶ τὸ κακὸν, περὶ ἣν ἐστι τὸ ὑλικὸν πλῆθος. ἐστὶ δὲ καὶ ὁρατὸς ὁ κόσμος. Infinitam autem binarii naturam, genium & malum unde eſt multitudo materiæ, & viſui expoſitus mundus.

(111) Clem. Alexandr. in Admonit. ad Gentes, p. 47, C. See alſo Juſtin Martyr, Orat. ad Gentes, p. 58.

(112) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. p. m. 41. Conſult Minucius Felix, who ſays p. m. 151. Pythagoræ Deus eſt animus per univerſam rerum naturam commeans, & intentus: ex quo etiam animalium omnium vita capiatur. Lactantius ſays the ſame thing, lib. 1. cap. 5. p. m. 14.

(113) Epiphan. Hær. 15. p. 14.

(114) Apud Clement. Alexandr. Stromat. lib. 4. p. 477.

(115) Joſephus, contra Appion. lib. 2. p. 1071.

(116) Idem, ib. p. 1076.

(117) Σοφία καὶ τῇ περὶ τὸ θεῖον εὐσεβείᾳ πάντων, ὑπειλημμένος δυνηκεῖν τῶν φιλοσοφησάντων. Sapientia & divina pietate Philoſophos omnes excellens. Idem, lib. 1. contra Appion. p. 1046.

(118) Plut. in Numa, p. 65.

(119) Idem Plut. ibid. B.

(120) Hierocles, in Præfatione ad Carmina aurea circa finem. See alſo Stobæus, Eclog. 11. cap. 3. where he ſays, Σωκράτης, Πλάτων ταῦτα τῷ Πυθαγόρᾳ, τέλος ὁμοίωσιν θεοῦ. Socrates & Plato quemadmodum Pythagoras finem dixerunt, dei ſimilitudinem.

death are variouſly related [P]. I ſhall mention ſome Authors, who have treated of his opinions [Q]. What relates to him as a Phyſician, may be ſeen in the Hiſtory of Phyſick (b).

(b) Printed at Geneva in 1696, and written by D. L. C. D. M. that is, David le Clerc, M. D. He is brother to Mr. le Clerc, Profeſſor at Amſterdam.

I would add to what I have ſaid concerning the fable of his Mirrours (i), a ſtory, which I have juſt read in a News-Writer [R].

(i) In th... [L].

PYTHEAS,

" Philoſophy." This is the encomium given to a poem, which contains the Doctrines of that philoſopher. They conſiſted of two parts, which might be compared to the purgative method, and the unitive method, of which our Myſtics have ſaid ſo many fine things. Hierocles, qui commentarios eruditiſſimos in Carmen Aureum Pythagoræ reliquit, ſtatim ab initio de Pythagorica Philoſophia diſſerens, appellat eam κάθαρσιν καὶ τελειότητα, purgationem, & perfectionem. Quæ duo cum ſubindicent officium ipſius duplex ac propoſitum, ut loco alio monſtravi, duplicem videri poſſunt Pythagoras & Pythagorici habuiſſe philoſophiam, quarum illa ſit καθαρτική, hæc vero τελική, illa, quæ purgat à malis, ſeparat à materia & corpore, liberat à vinculis & carcere; hæc, quæ perficiat, evehat & reportet ſurſum, & εἰς τὸ εἶδος τῆς πρόσθεν ἕξεως, ut loquitur Hierocles, id eſt habitus prioris formam inducat, ſimileſque faciat Deo. . . . . Id quod ipſe indicat Hierocles in ſequentibus, quando dicit, περιέχει (carmen aureum) πάσης φιλοσοφίας πρακτικῆς καὶ θεωρητικῆς τὰ καθόλου δόγματα, δι' ὧν ἄν τις ἑαυτὸν καθαρὸν ἀπολάυσι καὶ τὴν πρὸς θεὸν ὁμοίωσιν ἐντυχήσειε. Continet philoſophiæ omnis practicæ ac theoreticæ decreta ſumma quibus quis & purgare ſe, & ſimilem deo facere valeat (121). The author whom I quote, cites (122) ſeveral paſſages, which ſhew, that according to this Philoſopher, the acquiſition of truth was the only means of obtaining the reſemblance of God; but that to know the truth it was neceſſary to ſearch for it with a mind, purified, and ſuperior to the paſſions of the body; whence he concludes what we are going to read: Ex iis quæ ſuperiori capite attulimus, manifeſtum eſt, philoſophiam Pythagoricam id habere ſibi maxime propoſitum, ut ad quandam ſimilitudinem cum Deo ſectatores ſuos ducat; id vero fieri aliter non poſſe, quam ſi veritati atque ſapientiæ pura integraque mente incumbatur (123). i. e. " It is evident from " what we have produced in the preceding chapter, " that the Pythagorean Philoſophy had this point " chiefly in view, to lead its followers to a reſem- " blance of God; which could be done only by pur- " ſuing truth and wiſdom with a pure and ſound " mind." Let us add to this the teſtimony of the anonymous writer of Pythagoras's life. He ſays (124), that the followers of this Philoſopher taught, that man is perfected by three methods: 1. By converſing with the Gods; for during this converſation he abſtains from all evil actions, and becomes like the Gods as far as it is poſſible. 2. By doing good to others; for this is the property of God, and an imitation of God (125). 3. By leaving this life. The nobleſt gifts, which Heaven has made for man, are, according to Pythagoras, to ſpeak truth, and to do good offices: theſe two things, ſaid he, reſemble the works of God (126).

(121) Joannes Schefferus, de natura & conſtitutione Philoſophiæ Italicæ, cap. 10. p. 78.

(122) Ibid. cap. 7.

(123) Idem, ib. cap. 8. p. 56.

(124) Apud Photium, Codice 249, p. 1313.

(125) Δεύτερον ἐν τῷ εὖ ποιεῖν. Θεῷ γὰρ τοῦτο καὶ θείας μιμήσεως. Deinde bene de aliis merendo: Dei enim hoc proprium eſt, in eoque Deum imitatur. Photius, ibid.

(126) Ælianus, var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 59.

(127) Diog. Laertius, lib. 8. num. 39.

(128) Aul. Gell. lib. 1. cap. 9.

(129) Laert. lib. 8. num. 39.

(130) Ἀλῶναι μᾶλλον ἢ πατῆσαι· ἀναιρεθῆναι δὲ κρεῖττον ἢ λαλῆσαι. Capi præſtat quam bas dare preſſum, cædique ſatius eſt quam quicquam loqui. Idem, ib. Meric Caſaub. conjectures, that inſtead of λαλῆσαι we muſt read εἰλύσαι vagari, to wander wretchedly.

(131) Idem, ib. num. 40.

(132) Idem, ib.

[P] The circumſtances of his death are variouſly related.] He lived at Crotona at Milo's houſe with his diſciples, and was burnt there. A man whom he would not admit in that ſociety, ſet fire to the houſe (127). It is probable, that the phyſiognomy of the man was not a good one; for Pythagoras admitted none as his ſcholars whoſe countenance did not pleaſe him, after he had examined it according to the rules of art. This was his firſt ſtep. Jam à principio adoleſcentes qui ſeſe ad diſcendum obtulerant, ἐφυσιογνωμόνει. Id verbum ſignificat, mores naturaſque hominum, conjectatione quadam de oris & vultus ingenio, deque totius corporis filo atque habitu, ſciſcitari. Eum, qui exploratus ab eo idoneuſque fuerat, recipi in diſciplinam ſtatim jubebat (128). Some ſay (129), that he was ſuſpected of contriving to uſurp the government; and that to prevent this deſign, the people of Crotona ſet fire to his houſe. He eſcaped through the flames, and left the city; but entring into a field of beans, he ſtopped, and choſe rather to be killed than to open his mouth, and to ſpoil the beans (130). According to Dicæarchus (131) he fled to the temple of the muſes at Metapontus, and died there of hunger after having faſted forty days. Others ſay (132), that upon his return from a voyage, which he had taken to the iſle of Delos, in order to cloſe the eyes of his maſter Pherecydes, and to bury him, he put an end to his own life by abſtaining from food. According to others (133) he conducted all his diſciples to the aſſiſtance of the Agrigentines againſt the Syracuſans; and being defeated was killed as he was flying round a field of beans. This does not agree either with the eighty years, which he is ſaid (134) to have lived, or the ninety years (135), much leſs with the ninety nine years (136), or the hundred and four years (137), which others aſcribe to him. See with reſpect to all theſe particulars the learned collections of Menage (138). He does not forget to quote Arnobius, who affirms, that Pythagoras was burnt alive in a temple. Pythagoras Samius ſuſpicione dominationis injuſta vivus concrematus in fano eſt: numquid ea, quæ docuit vim propriam perdiderunt, quia non ſpiritum ſponte, ſed crudelitate appetitus effudit (139)? i. e. " Pythagoras the " Samian upon an unjuſt ſuſpicion of an intent to " uſurp the government was burnt alive in a " temple. Did what he taught loſe its force, " becauſe he did not die a natural but a violent " death?" Juſtin intimates, that he died a natural death at Metapontus, whither he had retired after having lived twenty years at Crotona; that he died there, I ſay, ſo greatly admired, that his houſe was converted into a temple, and he was honoured as a God. Cum annos viginti Crotonæ egiſſet, Metapontum migravit, ibique deceſſit, cujus tantæ admiratio fuit, ut ex domo ejus templum facerent, eumque pro Deo colerent (140). Valerius does not go ſo far; but he declares expreſsly againſt thoſe, who ſay, that he was ill treated. Cujus ardentem rogum plenis venerationis oculis Metapontus aſpexit: oppidum Pythagoræ quam ſuorum cinerum nobilius clariuſve monumento (141). i. e. " Me- " tapontus ſaw his funeral-pile with eyes of venera- " tion; a city more noble and famous for the aſhes " of Pythagoras than its own."

(133) Idem, ib.

(134) Idem, ib. num. 44.

(135) Idem, ib.

(136) Tzetzes, Chil. 11. ver. 366.

(137) Anonymus, apud Photium, p. 1313.

(138) Menagius, in Diog. Laert. p. 371 & ſeq.

(139) Arnobius, lib. 1. p. 23.

(140) Juſtinus, lib. 20. cap. 4. p. 396.

(141) Valerius Max. lib. 8. cap. 7. num. 2. in Ext.

St. Epiphanius was groſsly miſtaken when he ſaid, that Pythagoras died in the country of the Medes (142).

(142) Epiphanius, Hær. 15. p. 14.

[Q] Some Authors who have treated of his doctrines.] I confine myſelf to the Moderns. William Canterus tranſlated into Latin the fragments of Pythagoras, collected by Stobæus Eraſmus (143), Philip Beroaldus, Gyraldi, Claudius Minos, Francis Berni, Nicolas Scutelli, and ſome others, have written notes upon the ſymbols of this Philoſopher. Conſult alſo Lipſius (144), Ritterſhuſius's Commentaries on Malchus; Holſtenius's Diſſertation De Vitâ & Scriptis Pythagoræ; Rodericus de Caſtro's Pythagoras; Paganinus Gaudentius De Pythagoreâ animarum tranſmigratione; Ambroſius Rhodius's Dialogue De Tranſmigratione; Claudius Lignier's Diſſertation de ſecta Pythagoricâ; Mark Mappus's Theſis de Ethicâ Pythagoræ, maintained at Straſburg under Profeſſor Schallerus; Schilterus's Diſſertation De diſciplinâ Pythagoricâ; John Scheffer's book above quoted; the book entitled Ethica Pythagorica (145), written by Magnus Daniel Omeis, Profeſſor at Altdorf. The reader may likewiſe ſee La Mothe le Vayer's book of the Virtue of the Heathens. It is thought that Pythagoras's golden Verſes are the work of his ſcholar Lyſis. An ancient Philoſopher of Alexandria named Hierocles wrote a Commentary upon them; we have it commented upon by Caſaubon the younger. We have alſo Commentaries upon the ſame verſes by Vitus Amerbachius, Theodore Marcilius, Henry Brem, Michael Neander, John Straſilius, William Diezius, and Magnus Daniel Omeis. I had omitted the treatiſe of Joachim Zehnerus (146).

(143) In the beginning of his Chiliads of Proverbs.

(144) Manuductio ad Philoſoph. Stoic. lib. 1. Diſſertat. 6.

(145) Printed at Altdorf, 1693.

[R] A ſtory, which I have juſt read in a News-Writer.] " A modern Author has aſſerted, that " the late Marſhal Schomberg commanding the " French troops in Portugal, when the Kingdom " threw off the yoke of the Spaniards, wrote what " paſt in that country upon a glaſs, and holding it " up to the moon, Cardinal Mazarin, who was at " Paris, by the means of a teleſcope, read in that

(146) Paſtor at Superintendens Schleugenſis. He publiſhed at Leipſick, in 1603, Vitam & Fragmenta Pythagoræ.

PYTHEAS, was born at Marſeilles: to aſcertain the time when he lived with the greateſt accuracy, we muſt place him, I think, in the age of Alexander the Great [A]. He wrote geographical works [B], which were probably nothing elſe but an account of his

(147) Extracted from p. 63 of a little book, entitled, La Clef du Cabinet des Princes de l'Europe, ou Recueil Hiſt. & Politiq. ſur les matieres du tems, for July 1704. It is thought that this book was printed at Luxemburg: in the title page it is ſaid, printed for James le Sincere, at the ſign of Truth.

(148) See the Memoirs of Fremont d'Ablancourt, p. 12.

(1) Voſſius, de Philologia, p. 55. in his treatiſe de Hiſt. Græc. he adds, p. 467, vel certe proximus huic tempori fuit: or he lived at leaſt very near that time.

(2) In Indice Plinii.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. p. 110.

(4) Apud Strabon, lib. 1. p. 71.

(5) See hereunder, the rem. [F].

(6) Strabo, lib. 1. p. 71.

"Planet all that the Marſhal wanted to inform him "of: if this ſecret was as true as it is fabulous, &c. "(147)." Since the News-Writer paſſes a right judgment of this pretended ſecret, I have only taken notice of the anachroniſms of his account. Marſhal Schomberg did not arrive in Portugal till November 1661 (148). Cardinal Mazarin had been dead eight months; and Portugal had above ten years before thrown off the yoke of Spain.

[A] To aſcertain the time when he lived with the greateſt accuracy, we muſt place him . . . in the age of Alexander the great.] Voſſius does not confine himſelf to ſo general a determination. He makes him live under Ptolemy Philadelphus (1). Father Hardouin follows him in this (2). Moreri reckons that time to be the year 440, or 445 from the building of Rome: he ought to have known that the firſt year of Ptolemy Philadelphus's reign is, according to Calvius, the year of Rome 468. There are reaſons to think that Pytheas flouriſhed before that time. Voſſius has ſhewed that Eratoſthenes wrote after Pytheas (3); but he has not urged the ſtrongeſt proof: he has only proved it by this obſervation, namely that Polybius, having choſen among other Geographers, Dicæarchus, Eratoſthenes and Pytheas for the objects of his cenſure, aſſerts (4) that Eratoſthenes wrote the laſt of all. There is in the ſame page a more deciſive proof than this; ſince Strabo relates there, that Polybius wondered Eratoſthenes could believe what Pytheas wrote. Polybius's ſurprize was ſo much the greater, as he obſerved that Eratoſthenes gave credit to ſome particulars which Dicæarchus diſbelieved. Pytheas therefore was already an author before Eratoſthenes and Dicæarchus wrote their books of Geography (5). We ſhall draw ſome inferences from it below. But before that, I muſt give my opinion concerning the paſſage, in which Strabo judges that Polybius's way of reaſoning, which we have ſeen juſt now, is ridiculous. He miſtook perhaps Polybius's meaning. I am apt to think that that able man reaſoned thus: Dicæarchus is a very credulous author, who has committed an hundred blunders; and yet he would not believe ſeveral particulars related by Pytheas: we may therefore wonder that Eratoſthenes, who came after him, gave credit to thoſe very particulars, which he ſaw were exploded by Dicæarchus. Now here follows the reaſoning which Strabo imputes to Polybius: Dicæarchus is a very judicious author, who ought to ſerve as a guide; it is therefore very ſtrange that Eratoſthenes ſhould have given credit to Pytheas with regard to thoſe particulars which Dicæarchus did not believe. ſuppoſe that Polybius argued after that manner, Strabo might very well ridicule him, conſidering the vaſt number of errors, which Polybius had cenſured in Dicæarchus's writings; but, once more, I would not be poſitive that he took Polybius's meaning right. I wiſh we might verify it by examining his own books; they would acquaint us with many other particulars the knowledge of which is loſt to us with thoſe books. I ſhall take notice by the by of a miſtake in the Latin tranſlation of Polybius. The whole ſtrength of this repetition, μήτε Δικαιάρχῳ πιστεύσαντι, (Dicæarchus himſelf not believing it) is entirely enervated in that tranſlation. In order to give the full ſenſe of that paſſage the tranſlator ſhould have preſerved the ſame repetition which is in the original. The reader will be able to judge of it, if he will take the trouble to examine the following quotation. Ἐρατοσθένη δὲ τὸν μὲν Εὐήμερον Βεργαῖον καλεῖν, Πυθέᾳ δὲ πιστεύειν· καὶ ταῦτα δὲ μὴ τῇ Δικαιάρχῳ πιστεύσαντι. Τὸ μὲν οὖν μὴ τε Δικαιάρχῳ πιστεύσαντι, γελοῖον ὥσπερ ἐκείνῳ χρήσασθαι κάνονι προσῆκον καθ' ὃ τοσούτους ἐλέγχους αὐτὸς προφέρεται (6). i. e. "Eratoſthenes, whom he calls "Euemerus Bergæus, gives credit to Pytheas, though "Dicæarchus himſelf did not believe it. Theſe "words, though Dicæarchus himſelf did not believe it, "are ridiculous, as though it were fit to follow him "as a guide, whom Polybius himſelf found guilty "of ſo many blunders." However all this be, we learn at leaſt from thence, that the books of Pytheas were wrote not only before thoſe of Eratoſthenes, but even before thoſe of Dicæarchus. Now it is well known that this laſt ſtudied under Ariſtotle, and that he dedicated a book to Theophraſtus, Ariſtotle's favourite diſciple. It is therefore very probable that Pytheas lived before the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, ſince his writings preceded thoſe of Dicæarchus, who muſt have been an old man under that Prince's Reign. For he came to the crown the laſt year of the 123d Olympiad; Ariſtotle left off teaching before the end of the 114th Olympiad (7), and his ſcholars were generally grown men. We learn from Pliny that Pytheas had publiſhed his works before Timæus publiſhed his own (8): for the latter relates on the credit of the former what I have obſerved concerning Amber (9). But neither Timæus, nor Eratoſthenes, who both wrote after Pytheas, can prove any thing againſt Voſſius, becauſe they lived ſo long (10), that they might have read Pytheas's account, though they had been publiſhed only under Ptolemy Philadelphus; and it is well known that an author, who quotes what he read in another, may yet be older than him, and even die before him: ſo that one cannot draw any certain inference concerning the time when Pytheas lived from Timæus and Eratoſthenes writing later than he has done. The beſt argument we can have for placing him before the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus muſt be borrowed from his being quoted by Dicæarchus. Voſſius did not remember this when he placed Dicæarchus before Pytheas (11). If Sanſon, one of the beſt Geographers of the XVIIth century, had examined this point of Chronology, he would not have aſſerted that Pytheas mentioned the converſations, which the father of Scipio Africanus had with the Deputies of Marſeilles, in the year of Rome 532 (12). One of Pytheas's lies, in Polybius's opinion (13), was his aſſerting that none of the inhabitants of Marſeilles could acquaint Scipio with any remarkable particulars concerning Britain. We have cenſured in the Article ABBEVILLE the other miſtakes of Sanſon upon this ſubject. We have only to obſerve here, that by that Scipio he ought not to have underſtood him who landed at the mouth of the Rhone, in order to watch Hannibal's motions; ſince it is not poſſible that Pytheas ſhould have wrote after that voyage of Scipio, conſidering that his works were read by Dicæarchus the diſciple of Ariſtotle: for there are at leaſt an 100 year between the time when Ariſtotle left off keeping a ſchool, to the beginning of the ſecond Punic war. It would be, doubtleſs, a difficult taſk to determine who that Scipio was, who, according to Pytheas, inquired for ſome particulars concerning Britain of the inhabitants of Marſeilles, of thoſe of Narbonne, and of thoſe of Corbilon, but it was certainly not the father of him who conquered Carthage. I wonder that father Labbe did not cenſure that miſtake of Monſieur Sanſon, nor do I think he was in the leaſt inclined to ſpare him purpoſely. He might alſo have cenſured him with regard to the diſtance of near an hundred years, which he ſuppoſes between Pytheas and Polybius (14). This is inconſiſtent with his own ſyſtem, in which he ſuppoſes that Pytheas wrote his relations after the year of Rome 532; which was but 16 years before Polybius was born (15). It muſt even be ſaid, according to that ſuppoſition, that Pytheas was not yet come back from his travels in the year 532: for if he had been returned the Deputies of Marſeilles would have had ſomething to anſwer to the Roman Conſul's queſtions.

I give my readers notice here, that Monſieur Sanſon, the worthy ſon of the great Geographer, has done me the favour to ſend me a copy of the anſwer to father Labbe, which his father had prepared for the preſs, concerning thoſe antiquities. That anſwer is learned and ingenious. I ſhall meet, I hope, with ſome opportunities to make extracts from it.

[B] He wrote Geographical works] The Scholiaſt on Apollonius (16) mentions a book of Pytheas entitled

(7) Apollodorus, apud Diog. Laert. in Ariſt.

(8) Plinius, lib. 37. cap. 2.

(9) Above, in the Text of the next page, quotation (e).

(10) Eratoſthenes lived 80 years. He was born in the 126th Olympiad, and died in the 146th. See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. p. 108. Lucian makes him live 82 years, and makes Timæus live 96 years. Now ſince Timæus wrote an account of the war which Pyrrhus waged againſt the Romans, he muſt have lived under Ptolemy Philadelphus.

(11) De Philolog. cap. 11. num. 7. Moreri quotes erroneouſly, de Philoſ. cap. 11. num. 6.

(12) Nicolas Sanſon, Recherches des Antiquit. d'Abbeville.

(13) Apud Strabon, lib. 4. p. 131.

(14) Sanſon, Recherch. des Antiq. d'Abbeville, p. 85.

(15) He was born in the year of Rome 548. See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. p. 122.

(16) In lib. 4.

his travels. He abuſed in a very ſtrange manner this maxim, he who comes from remote countries may ſafely tell lies; for he related a thouſand falſe ſtories concerning the Northern Countries: he knew very well that there were but few eye-witneſſes to contradict him; but poſterity at leaſt has not left his impudence unpuniſhed. Strabo falls moſt ſeverely upon him on ſeveral occaſions (a). Polybius cenſured him very bitterly. Theſe two Authors could not bear he ſhould relate with impunity, that in the iſle of Thule [C] at ſix days diſtance from Great Britain towards the North, and in all thoſe quarters there was neither land, nor ſea, nor air, but a compound of the three, which was much like the Sea-Lung [D], and on which the ſea and earth hung, and which ſerved to keep all the parts of the univerſe together, nor was it poſſible, ſaid he, to go thither, either on foot, or in a ſhip. He boaſted to have ſeen that ſubſtance which was like the Sea-Lung, and for the reſt he confeſſed that he ſpoke of it only from hearſay. He boaſted alſo that he had travelled over all the countries in Europe which are ſituated on the ocean, from Cadis as far as the Tanais, which Polybius could not believe of an inconſiderable private man, as he was, not very well provided with money (b). However it is confeſſed at leaſt, that he was pretty well acquainted with the properties of the Northern countries as to their ſituation with regard to the ſun (c), and what he aſſerted (d) that the Barbarians ſhewed him the place where that Planet went to reſt, and that there were countries in which the night laſted but three hours, and others in which it continued but two hours, does by no means ſavour of any thing fabulous, and is infinitely more honourable to him than another particular which Pliny relates after him; namely, that there was an iſland a day's journey diſtant from the country of the Guttones, a people of Germany, who uſed amber inſtead of wood for fuel (e). The reader will do well to conſult the apology, which Peter Gaſſendi wrote for Pytheas [E], at Monſieur de Piereſc's requeſt. Theſe two illuſtrious Gentlemen of Provence were deſirous to exalt the glory of their own country, by keeping up the reputation of a Writer, who was born at Marſeilles. Gaſſendi, though a very learned man, was yet miſtaken in his conjectures concerning that Author [F]; But notwithſtanding this we may learn many things from his Apology. We ought

(a) Πυθέας ἀνὴρ ψευδίσατος ἐξήτασται. Pytheas was a notorious liar. Suid. lib. 1. p. 43. See alſo p. 44. and lib. 2. p. 71, 79. lib. 4. p. 139.

(b) Φησὶ δ' αὐ ὁ Πολύβιος ἄπιστον καὶ αὐτὸ τοῦτο πῶς ἰδιώτῃ ἀνθρώπῳ καὶ πένητι τοσαῦτα διαστήματα πλωτὰ καὶ πορευτὰ γένοιτο. Polybius ſays it is impoſſible to believe that a private man, who was even in want, ſhould have travelled ſo far by ſea and by land. Strabo, lib. 2. p. 71.

(c) Strabo, lib. 4. p. 139.

(d) Apud Geminum, Iſagog. ad Phænom.

(e) Incolas pro ligno ad ignem uti eo, proximiſque Teutonis vendere. Plin. lib. 37. cap. 2.

titled γῆς περίοδος, The circuit of the earth. In the abridgment of Artemidorus the Epheſian, printed with the ancient Geographers, Pytheas is placed in the number of thoſe, who have deſcribed the circumference of the world, periplum orbis (17). The deſcription of the iſle of Thule was probably a part of that work. His book de Oceano is quoted by Geminus. Nicholas Sanſon (18) is not the only one who had a mind to vindicate Pytheas againſt Strabo's cenſure. We ſhall ſee very ſoon that Gaſſendi took very much to heart the defenſe of that ancient inhabitant of Marſeilles.

(17) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. p. 110.

(18) Retherches des Antiq. d'Abbeville, p. 85.

[C] That in the iſle of Thule.] As I have proved by ſolid arguments that Pytheas publiſhed his books about the time of Alexander, I may give up one of the arguments, which father Vavaſſeur urges againſt Photius. I have refuted another in the article ANTONIA (19). Photius conjectures, that Antonius Diogenes was not much poſterior to the reign of Alexander the great. To which father Vavaſſeur objects, among other things, that he does not think the iſle of Thule was much known at that time (20). You muſt know that that Antonius Diogenes was the author of a Romance, entitled Incredibilia de Inſula Thule, (incredible things concerning the iſle of Thule). It is no matter if that iſland was unknown to the vulgar, or in general, if it was not much known. For when ſuch a traveller, as Pytheas was, had publiſhed an account of that iſland, this was enough to engage ſome romantick writer to take it into his head to make that iſland the ſcene of his chimerical narrations. I do not examine whether or not Photius be in the right: it is enough for me that he is not well refuted.

(19) A Roman family, rem. [B].

(20) Suſpicio quoque eſt nondum cognitam vulgo Thulen inſulam de qua illi feruntur inſcripti libri. Vavaſſor, de lud. Dict. p. 148, 149.

[D] Like the Sea-lung.] La Mothe le Vayer obſerves (21), that it is a Spongius Zoophyte, to which the Italians have given a very obſcene name; and after having related, that Pytheas aſſerted that that matter was what kept the univerſe together, and that he had had the impudence to ſpeak of it as of a thing he had ſeen with his own eyes, he mentions to us an honeſt Anchoret, who boaſted that he had been at the world's end, and who ſaid, that he was obliged to bend his ſhoulders very much, becauſe the heaven and the earth unite together in that extremity of the world.

(21) Lettre 89. Tom. 11. of his works, in 12mo. p. 255.

[E] The Apology which Peter Gaſſendi wrote for Pytheas.] The occaſion of it was as follows. When Monſieur de Piereſc cauſed the ſolſtitial elevation of the ſun to be obſerved at Marſeilles in the years 1636, they compared the proportion they found between the ſhadow and the needle of the dial, they compared it, I ſay, with the proportion which Hipparchus ſays (22) was found by Pytheas. Gaſſendi was deſired to write upon that aſtronomical operation, and to vindicate Pytheas at the ſame time againſt Strabo's invectives. Voluit rurſus (Piereſkius) ut quoniam Strabo multa congeſſit adverſus Pytheam, ipſe in gratiam comprovincialis apologiam conſcriberem, purgaremque virum qui primus Thulen inſulam demonſtravit, & quo non habet Occidens totus quem antiquiorem in doctis habeat (23). i. e. "As Strabo has urged a great many things againſt "Pytheas, Peireſc would have me write a vindi- "cation of this our countryman, and clear him, "who is the firſt that diſcovered the iſle of Thule to "us, and who of all the learned muſt be moſt eſteem- "ed in the Weſt." What Gaſſendi wrote in Pytheas's defenſe is to be met with in the fourth volume of his works (24). He was ſure not to forget to obſerve that Cleomedes ſtyles Pytheas a Philoſopher; and that Hipparchus having cenſured Eudoxus for aſſerting that there is a certain ſtar, which never moves out of its place, and which is the pole of the world, commends Pytheas for teaching that the pole is a place void of ſtars, and which makes as it were a ſquare with the three ſtars next to it. Hipparchus, after the example of Eratoſthenes, improved his geography by Pytheas's labours; and it is no wonder if the latter was miſtaken with regard to the Tanais, conſidering the ignorance of mankind in thoſe times as to the ſituation of the Pontus Euxinus, of the Caſpian Sea, and of the Palus Mæotis. When Alexander was arrived on the banks of the Caſpian Sea, he was thought to be arrived on the ſhore of the Pontus Euxinus. Gaſſendi adds ſeveral other obſervations to theſe in behalf of Pytheas. The reader may have ſeen in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (25), that Olaus Rudbecks took this traveller's part with a great deal of zeal.

(22) Apud Strabon. lib. 2. p. 78.

(23) Gaſſendus, in Vita Peireſk. lib. 5. Oper. Tom. 5. p. 327.

(24) p. 524, & ſeq.

(25) For the Month of February 1685, p. 133.

[F] Gaſſendi was miſtaken in his conjectures concerning that Writer.] He imagined that the people of Marſeilles being aſhamed of having no anſwer to make to Scipio's queſtions concerning Britain, and encouraged alſo by his counſels, reſolved to ſend ſome perſon to view that country, and choſe for that purpoſe Pytheas who was a good mathematician. The Republick of Marſeilles was already powerful at ſea, and minded trade very much: ſhe might therefore have a mind to enquire whether the diſcovering of theſe unknown countries might be of any ſervice to her Commerce. This removes the objection ſtart-ought not to miſtake our Pytheas for the Athenian Orator of that name, who was contemporary with Demoſthenes [G].

ed by Polybius; we ought not to think it ſtrange that Pytheas being a poor private man could little bear the expence of ſo great a voyage. And without ſuppoſing this one might anſwer, that a company of merchants, or ſome rich citizen, pitched upon Pytheas for diſcovering thoſe countries, and furniſhed him with all that he wanted for that purpoſe. If Gaſſendi had ſaid no more than this, I would have nothing to cenſure in his Apology: but he aſſerts, that the perſon who aſked the inhabitants of Marſeilles what they knew of Britain, at the time of the ſecond Punic War, which began in the 140th Olympiad, was either Scipio Africanus, or the father or the uncle of that Scipio. This cannot be true, ſince Dicæarchus had read Pytheas's travels. In order to evade that argument Gaſſendi aſſerts that Strabo's words may be taken in the following ſenſe: namely, that Dicæarchus might have diſliked Pytheas's relation: but it is certain, that this was not Strabo's meaning; his participle πιστώσας (26), and the whole ſtreſs of this argument are inconſiſtent with that explication. Godfrey Wendelinus, to whom Gaſſendi wrote theſe things, anſwered to his queſtion at what time Pytheas lived, that it was in the time of Alexander the Great; which he proved, 1. By Dicæarchus's railleries againſt Pytheas. 2. By the familiarity in which Timæas the enemy of Agathocles lived with Pytheas at Marſeilles during his baniſhment. Whence Wendelinus infers that Pytheas lived before Agathocles (27). That conſequence is not well drawn; for though a traveller lives familiarly with a baniſhed perſon, it does not follow from thence that he was older than the man who baniſhed that perſon. And beſides, here is one of thoſe, who make an Author ſay much more than he really ſaid: Wendelinus refers us to Pliny (28), where we read only, that Timæus believed what Pytheas related concerning amber.

(26) See above, the rem. [A].

(27) See Gaſſendi's works, Tom. 6. p. 483.

(28) Lib. 37. cap. 2.

[G] We ought not to miſtake our Pytheas for . . . . him who was contemporary with Demoſthenes.] Father Hardouin (29) applies to the Pytheas of Marſeilles, what Plutarch relates of a Pytheas in the Life of Demoſthenes, page 855. But the Pytheas whom Plutarch mentions in that paſſage was certainly the ſame Athenian Orator whom he ſpeaks of in page 849, where he obſerves that Pytheas ridiculed Demoſthenes becauſe his Orations were too elaborate (30). In the Life of Phocion (31) he ſpeaks of the ſame Pytheas as of an Orator who was a great talker, and very impudent, and whom Phocion was obliged to check. Suidas gives him the ſame character, and tells us that he made his eſcape out of priſon, where his creditors kept him, and that he retired into Macædonia. Plutarch relates, that Pytheas being fled from Athens took ſanctuary with Antipater, and did him all the ſervice he could by his orations. He had at that time great quarrels in Arcadia with Demoſthenes, who though baniſhed did nevertheleſs join with the Athenian Embaſſadors to perſuade the cities of Greece to confederate together againſt Antipater, whoſe cauſe Pytheas defended (32).

(29) In Indice Plinii.

(30) See Ælian. Hiſt. Dio. lib. 7. cap. 7. he mentions him alſo in lib. 14. cap. 28.

(31) p. 751.

(32) Plut. in Demoſt. p. 858.

Plutarch, in his Precepts concerning the Government of a Commonwealth, relates a quick repartee of that man. As Pytheas the Orator, ſays he (33), was oppoſing the honours they would decree to Alexander, ſome perſon aſked him, how dare you to ſpeak of ſuch great things, you that are ſtill ſo young? Why, replied he, Alexander, of whom by your decrees you make a God, is younger ſtill than I am.

(33) Plut. de gerenda Reipub. p. 804. Mr. Bayle quotes Amyot's French tranſlation. See alſo Plut. in Apophth. p. 187.

PYTHIAS, the daughter of Ariſtotle, was married three times, firſt to Nicanor, according to her father's laſt will [A]; then to Proclus deſcended from Demaratus King of Lacedæmon, and laſtly to Metrodorus the Phyſician, who was the Diſciple of Chryſippus of Cnidus, and the Maſter of Eraſiſtratus. The two ſons (a) ſhe had by her ſecond huſband ſtudied Philoſophy under Theophraſtus. The ſon ſhe had by Metrodorus was named Ariſtotle (b) [B]. It appears from ſome ſentences, which are aſcribed to her [C] that her Father had given her a very good education. Obſerve that PYTHIAS was the name of her mother.

(a) The one was called Procles, and the other Demaratus.

(b) Extracted from Sextus Empiricus, adverſus Mathematic. cap. 12. p. 51.

[A] She was married . . . . to Nicanor, according to her father's laſt will.] We do not meet with that particular in Sextus Empiricus; but we read there that Ariſtotle, after his father and mother's death, was educated at the houſe of Proxenus a native of Atarnea, and that in order to requite that kind ſervice he educated Nicanor the ſon of Proxenus, made him learn all that was proper for him to know, and adopted him, and ordered even by his laſt will that his daughter Pythias ſhould marry him (1).

(1) Extracted from Ammonius, in Vita Ariſtot. init. See alſo Ariſtotle's Laſt Will, in Diog. Laert. lib. 5. n. 12. and Caſaubon's Note.

[B] The ſon ſhe had by Metrodorus was named Ariſtotle.] Pliny was miſtaken with regard to that genealogy; for he imagined that Ariſtotle's daughter had a ſon, who was the Phyſician Eraſiſtratus. Horum placita, ſays he (2), Chryſippus ingenti garrulitate mutavit, plurimumque & ex Chryſippo diſcipulus ejus Eraſiſtratus Ariſtotelis filia genitus. i. e. "Chryſippus by "his immenſe prating has altered their tenets, and after "him his Diſciple Eraſiſtratus the ſon of Ariſtotle's "daughter." Let us conſider the Greek words of Sextus Empiricus. Τρίτῳ δὲ Μητροδώρῳ ἰατρῷ, Χρυσίππου μὲν τοῦ Κνιδίου μαθητῇ, Ἐρασιστράτου δὲ ὑφηγητῇ· ὃν γίνεται παῖς Ἀριστοτέλης. Tertio autem Metrodoro Medico, (Pythias filia Ariſtotelis nupſit) Chryſippi quidem Cnidii diſcipulo, præceptori autem Eraſiſtrati, cui natus eſt filius Ariſtoteles (3). It is not an eaſy matter to miſtake the ſenſe of theſe words: any one may perceive with a little attention that they ſignify, that this Ariſtotle was the ſon of Metrodorus the Phyſician and of Pythias: but we may think that all the Authors, who mentioned the marriages of Ariſtotle's daughter did not place their words in a proper order, and expreſſed themſelves after ſuch a manner, that a reader, who did not conſider their words with much attention, might imagine they meant, that Eraſiſtratus was the ſon of Metrodorus and Pythias. Let us ſuppoſe that they ſaid; Τρίτῳ δὲ Μητροδώρῳ ἰατρῷ Χρυσίππου τοῦ Κνιδίου μαθητῇ, ὃν Ἐρασίστρατος, γίνεται παῖς Ἀριστοτέλης. Tertio autem Metrodoro Medico (Pythias Ariſtotelis filia nupſit) Chryſippi Cnidii diſcipulo, cujus Eraſiſtratus diſcipulus (4) natus eſt filius Ariſtoteles. We may eaſily apprehend, that if a reader be a little abſent, he may imagine that Eraſiſtratus was the ſon of Pythias. How do we know but Pliny followed an Author who had placed his words thus, or in an order more proper ſtill to miſlead a reader. Take notice of the Latin tranſlation I have tranſcribed; it makes us think at firſt that Eraſiſtratus was the father of Ariſtotle. However it be, I chooſe rather to adhere to theſe conjectures, than to Father Hardouin's (5). He imagines that Eraſiſtratus had been adopted by Pythias, as the Emperor Galba was adopted by his ſtep-mother. He muſt therefore ſuppoſe that Eraſiſtratus was the ſon of Metrodorus; but Sextus Empiricus makes him only his Diſciple.

(2) Plin. lib. 29. cap. 1. p. m. 663.

(3) Sextus Empiricus, adv. Mathematicos, p. 51.

(4) That word is often omitted, and to be ſupplied, when the Greeks ſpeak of the ſucceſſion of the Philoſophers.

(5) Harduin. in Plin. lib. 29. cap. 1. p. 664.

[C] Some ſentences which are aſcribed to her.] She ſaid among other things that the fineſt colour that can be ſeen on the face of a man was that of ſhame or modeſty. Celebrantur quidem multa dicta Pythiados filiæ Ariſtotelis graviſſima, ut appareat eandem ipſam non tam in gremio educatam quam in ſermone patris, quo nemo unquam fuit vel acumine præſtantior, vel feſtivitate & lepore politior, vel ſuavitate conditior. Ex illis autem id etiam accepimus, nullum eſſe pulcrius coloris genus in facie hominis ingenui quam id quod ob verecundiam ſuperveniret (6). i. e. "They report many grave "ſayings of Pythias, Ariſtotle's daughter, by which "it appears that ſhe was educated not ſo much in "her father's lap, as by his diſcourſes and learning; "for no man was ever more ingenious, witty, and "agreeable, than Ariſtotle. Among her ſayings "the following has been tranſmitted down to us; "namely, that it is impoſſible to behold a finer "colour upon an honeſt man's face, than that which "is occaſioned by modeſty." See Eraſmus, in the VIIIth book of his Apophthegms (7).

(6) Petrus Alcyonius, in Medice Legato poſteriore, folio h 1 verſo.

(7) p. m. 621.

Q.

QUELLENCE (CHARLES DE), Baron of Pont in Britany, made a great figure under the name of Soubiſe among the Reformed in the reign of Charles IX. He took the name of Soubiſe in the year 1568 when he married Catharine de Parthenai, the only daughter of John de Parthenai Lord of Soubiſe. I have mentioned in another place (a) ſome circumſtances in which he ſhewed his courage, and I have related how he defended himſelf againſt the murderers on St. Bartholomew's-Day (b), by whoſe hands he fell at laſt: the curioſity of ſome Ladies of the Court with regard to his naked body, which was placed with many others before the Louvre, has already been mentioned (c). The action of impotency, which was brought againſt him [A], and which will give me an opportunity to quote ſome paſſages from a book, which

(a) In the art. SOUBISE (John de Parthenai.)

(b) Above, quot. (8), of the art. PARTHENAI (Catharine de).

(c) Ibid.

[A] The action of impotency which was brought againſt him.] Thuanus aſſerts poſitively, that it was his mother-in-law, and not his wife, who brought that action againſt him. Monſieur Varillas ſays the ſame in the two editions of his Charles IX. Mezerai, not minding enough the conſequences, ſays of the wife, what Thuanus ſaid only of the mother-in-law: I have cenſured him upon that account (1), for the honour and reputation of Catharine de Parthenai. For though a woman may enter ſuch an action againſt her huſband without expoſing her reputation, yet it is certain that ſhe is more commended for not commencing ſuch a ſuit, eſpecially when ſhe is ſo young as the heireſs of Soubiſe was at that time. There are ſome actions (2), which are not a ſin, which do not render a perſon infamous, neither de jure, nor de facto, and which nevertheleſs it were better not to do than to do: they have ſomething in them which tarniſh a perſon's reputation; ſo that an hiſtorian ought to take care not to impute ſuch actions to thoſe who have not committed them; he is not allowed to want accuracy in that reſpect, to take the daughter for the mother, or one ſiſter for another. The more celebrated an hiſtorian is, the more careful he muſt be; for when he is very famous, he becomes a publick ſpring, and ſerves inſtead of a record to an infinite number of writers diſperſed throughout the whole earth. How many learned men will there be, who will not think they could be miſled by following Monſieur Mezerai (3)?

(1) In the rem. [C] of the art. PARTHENAI (Catharine de).

(2) In the ſchools they call certain qualities, perfectio ſimpliciter ſimplex. Every quality melior ipſa quam non ipſa, is of that kind.

(3) Franciſcus Quelletrius Dux e Britannia, cui ab uxore Catharina Parthenia Subizia impetentiæ accuſato divortium intentabatur. Ulr. Huber. Hiſt. Civil. Tom. 2. p. 353.

I have obſerved ſomething in another place (4) which may ſerve to excuſe the Lady de Soubiſe, and what ſhe did againſt her ſon-in-law does certainly want an apology. A time of perſecution as that in which ſhe lived, was not a proper ſeaſon for ſuch proceedings. A Church under affliction, and in arms at the ſame time, and which is in that condition for no other reaſon but to ſupport the Reformation of Doctrines and Manners, ought not to call a young huſband before Judges of a contrary Religion for the ſake of impotency. It is even certain that actions of that kind are at all times and in all places very little to the honour of thoſe who enter them: and whether they come to get another huſband or not, they are generally objects of riallery and contempt for the remainder of their life. And not without ſome reaſon: for the ſteps they are obliged to take are ſo inconſiſtent with modeſty, that virtue which is the ornament and the crown of their ſex, and without which they cannot have the leaſt ſhare in the glory of this world, that one cannot eſteem a woman, who is capable of taking ſuch ſteps.

(4) Above, rem. [C], of the art. PARTHENAI (Catharine de).

We may ſay of thoſe women, without going beyond the bounds of indulgence, what has been ſaid with a little too much ſeverity of thoſe widows who marry again. I ſhall make uſe of Monſieur du Vair's expreſſions (5). Jerom, to Marcella, ſays, that ſecundas nuptias non appetimus, ſed concedimus, we do not approve a ſecond marriage, but only ſuffer it, by a certain indulgence, which is not quite free of ſome diſgrace. As though he ſaid, with the law, indulgentia quos liberat notat, A diſpenſation from the law ſtains the reputation of thoſe to whom it is granted . . (6) In whatſoever words this ſaying of the Apoſtle be expreſſed, juniores viduæ nubant, let young widows marry, it ought to be underſtood by an indulgence granted to the incontinency of ſome women, ut maritum potius accipiant quam diabolum, & ſciant ſibi non tam maritos datos quam adulteros imputatos, that they may receive an huſband rather than the devil, and they muſt know that it is not ſo much an huſband that is given them, as an adulterer that is impoſed upon them, as St. Jerom ſays to Salvina. Or as St. Cyprian obſerves, aliud eſt ad veniam ſtare, aliud eſt ad gloriam pervenire; to obtain mercy is one thing, and to arrive at the glory of heaven is another. There is a great difference between ſaying that their incontinence ſhall not be accounted to them as a ſin, and ſaying that it ſhall be accounted to them for righteouſneſs. This is the leſs ſevere judgment that can be paſſed on thoſe women, who enter an action of impotency, conſidering the way of proceeding they are obliged to follow in ſuch a caſe.

(5) Du Vair, p. 820 of his works, edit. of Geneva, 1617.

(6) Idem, p. 824, 825.

I. It is a great matter for a woman to confeſs publickly that ſhe cannot contain herſelf. Now every woman, who commences ſuch a ſuit, declares before all the world, that ſhe labours under that defect: ſhe delivers a deed or inſtrument of it (7) which is lodged among the publick records, and which affords matter of riallery to all the jeſters, and makes even the new huſband tremble. For if he happens to be under a neceſſity to take a long journey, or if he labours under a diſtemper which continues a great while, how can he depend upon the virtue of a wife, who has confeſſed her incontinency before all the world?

(7) Take notice that I do not pretend to aſſert, that they make ſuch a confeſſion in as many words. I know very well, that generally they ſpeak only of their deſire of getting children. But the world is not to be impoſed upon with this; they put ſuch a conſtruction upon it as I have hinted.

II. The examination, which muſt be ſtood out before the Judges, is ſo tickliſh and ſo uneaſy to a woman of honour, that one cannot have a good opinion of a virgin who is capable to get over ſuch difficulties, and to anſwer to ſuch particulars. I ſay virgins, becauſe they who accuſe their huſbands of impotency, do almoſt always boaſt that they have ſtill their maidenheads: and they muſt indeed boaſt of it, when they are married for the firſt time, as is generally the caſe. A certain Counſellor did once prodigiouſly puzzle the Plaintif. He aſked her in the preſence of ſeveral perſons, whether her huſband had coaxed her, kiſſed her, hugged her? She anſwered, Yes. And who told you that this is not all? did the lawyer aſk her? How come you to know the reſt? Who taught it you? If you have got your maidenhead ſtill, as you pretend, you ought not to know that your huſband is impotent; and if you know it, it is a ſign that you have tried what other men can do. He preſſed this ſo home to her, that he made her bluſh, and forced her to confeſs that ſhe was not able to anſwer to ſuch puzzling queſtions. Let us tranſcribe the whole Latin paſſage which contains this ſtory. Erumpit interdum inverecunda intemperies mulierum . . . . Erumpit, inquam, impudens, et in facie erubeſcentium populorum, genialis tori revelat & denudat arcana, & de mariti frigiditate conqueritur, allegans hanc ſufficientem & evidentem repudii vel divortii cauſam, quod ſemivir eſt & inutilis matrimonio, qui non eſt promptus ad coitum. Eleganter quidem Gaufridus de Heroum villa, familiaris meus, unius talium in cauſa hujuſmodi confudit audaciam, Cum enim ei patronus datus eſſet à judice celebraturo ut putabatur divortium, & mulier generoſa audientibus amicis & ſuffragatoribus, advocato ut ſit diligentius merita cauſæ ſuæ exponeret, ſcrutatus eſt ab ea vir prudens, an alium maritum quandoque habuerit, Quod cum illa negaſſet, quæſivit which was publiſhed in the year 1612, was the true cauſe of that curioſity. Thuanus does quæſivit iterum an adhuc virgo eſſet, dicens: hoc ſibi inquiſitu, & ſcitu perneceſſarium, ne à diſcreto judice caperetur occaſione aliqua in ſermone. Illa vero hoc (verecunde tamen, eo quod ſibi non bene credebatur) aſſeruit. Et ille, an ſimul de noctu dormire conſueverint, & ſe invicem oſculari & amplexari maritus & ipſa, inquiſivit. Quæ omnia cum illa fateretur: unde ergo, inquit patronus, noſti virgo pudiciſſima, prudentiſſima, pudoratiſſima, quod efficacem tecum virum non impleverit, & totius matrimonii jura non perſolvit? Quis te docuit, quid ſit coitus, ut eum tecum coiiſſe neges, inter tot oſcula, tot amplexus, qui te pro libitu quoties voluit pertractavit licentia maritali? Nam & quædam animantia certum eſt ſe invicem oſculando miſceri. Alia ſe tenuiter tangendo concipiunt. Et ſunt qui ſuo gravidante calore, ab aere temperato imprægnantur, & pariunt. Hic illa tandem erubuit, hoc ſolum dicens, ſe quid ad hujuſmodi captiones hiſceret, non habere (8). i. e. " The women's diſgraceful and " immoderate appetites will ſometimes break out . . . " They break out with impudence, I ſay, when a " wife reveals the myſteries of the nuptial bed before " a whole body of people bluſhing at her indiſcretion, " when they hear her complain of her huſband's im- " potency, urging as a ſufficient reaſon for a divorce " that he who is not capable of carnal copulation is " but half a man, unfit for marriage. Walfrid de " Heronville a friend of mine did once in a cauſe of " that kind wittily confound the impudence of a " woman. He was appointed her Council by the " Judge, who, it was thought, would pronounce a " ſentence of divorce; and as ſhe was to expoſe to " him the merits of her cauſe, before her friends " and favourers, as it is uſual, he, like a prudent " man, aſked her whether ſhe had ever been married " before; to which ſhe replied, no; then he aſked " whether ſhe was a virgin, for it was, ſaid he, ne- " ceſſary for him to know it, leſt he ſhould give a " prudent judge ſome occaſion to take him by his " own words. She declared ſhe was a virgin, tho' " ſhe ſaid it with ſome ſhame, becauſe ſhe perceived " that they did not believe her. Are you uſed to lye " with your huſband, continued he, do you hug and " kiſs one another? She confeſſed it: how then " came you to know, aſked he again, you that are " a moſt baſhful, chaſte, and prudent virgin, that " he has not done with you the duty of a perfect " man, that he has not performed all the nuptial " rites? Who taught you what copulation is, that " you dare to aſſert he never knew you carnally, " among ſo many kiſſes, ſo many embraces from a man " who uſed you with all the freedom of an huſband? " For it is certain that there are ſome animals which " are copulated together only by kiſſes; ſome con- " ceive by a mere touch; and there are ſome who, " when their heat is come to a certain degree, are " impregnated by a moderate air, and bring forth " young ones. Here the woman bluſhed at laſt, and " ſaid only, ſhe had nothing to anſwer to ſuch cap- " tious queſtions."

(8) Joan. Saresberienſis, in Policratico, ſive de nugis curialium, & veſtigiis Philoſophorum, lib. 8. cap. 11. p. m. 504, 505.

III. A woman muſt reſolve to ſuffer her moſt ſecret parts to be viſited and examined: all the other proofs being too weak, the judges have recourſe to this, and order to view the parts: the woman is ſearched by ſkilful perſons in order to know whether ſhe has been deflowered or not. Where is the modeſty and ſhame of thoſe women who dare to commence a ſuit, which is to be attended with ſuch conſequences? What an impudence muſt they not put on? There was in the beginning of the reign of Lewis XIII. an Advocate of the Parliament of Paris, who wrote very ſtrongly againſt that practice of ſearching women: he urged two arguments againſt it, the one that it is ſhameful, the other that it is uncertain. This is at preſent, ſays he (9), the firſt thing which is ordered in thoſe ſuits, when the marriage was contracted with a maiden: after ſuch a ſearch the woman being declared a virgin, and not deflowered, this is taken for a full proof of the huſband's impotency, and a ſufficient reaſon for diſſolving the marriage. . . . . (10) Such a ſearching is ſhameful, and inconſiſtent with that chaſtity which ought to be peculiar to the female ſex; and is conſequently odious and to be avoided; for there is nothing muſt be dearer to a woman than modeſty. Gratia verecundiæ mulieris ſuper aurum, the grace of modeſty in a woman is more valuable than gold, ſays the Author of Eccleſiaſticus in the 7th chapter, and chiefly in one who ſtyles herſelf a maid and a virgin; quæ ſeipſam debet erubeſcere, & nudam videre non poſſe, who muſt be aſhamed of herſelf, and not bear to ſee herſelf naked, ſays St. Jerom, Epiſtola citata ad Lætam, de inſtitutione filiæ, in his Epiſtle to Læta, of the education of a daughter: and St. Ambroſe his 64th Epiſtle, nihil ſanctius in virgine quàm verecundia, there is nothing more ſacred in a virgin than modeſty; and in the firſt book of Offices, Eſt pudicitiæ comes verecundia, modeſty is the companion of chaſtity: and again in his book of the education of a virgin, the firſt chapter, in virgine eſt dos quædam verecundia, quæ taciturnitate cognoſcitur, modeſty is a kind of dowry to a virgin, and is known by her ſilence; ſo that ſhe who complains of her huſband's impotency, and in order to be divorced from him, ſuffers other men to uncover her, to behold and handle thoſe parts which nature bids her conceal, muſt be reputed an impudent and ſhameleſs woman . . . (11) A woman (ſays Herodotus in the beginning of his hiſtory) puts off her modeſty together with her ſhift, and St. Cyprian, De habitu virginum, tractatu 2. Simul cum amictu corporis, pudor ponitur. Pliny in the ſeventh book of his natural hiſtory, chapter the 17th obſerves, that the body of men who are drowned, are always found ſwimming on their back, with their face upwards, but the bodies of women on their belly with their face downwards, as though nature, being careful of their modeſty, would hide thoſe parts in them, which cannot be decently ſeen. Quaſi pudori defunctarum parcente natura. Nay, that undreſſing and ſtripping of them was formerly a kind of puniſhment, as Nicephorus obſerves in the ſeventh chapter of his Hiſtory, and Tacitus, in his book concerning the manners of the Germans (De Moribus Germanicorum) where he ſpeaks of the puniſhment inflicted on adulterous women. For that reaſon only, ſeveral perſons have diſliked and condemned that practice of ſearching the women. St. Ambroſe, in that ſame 64th Epiſtle, where he reproves Syagrius, Biſhop of Verone, for ordering a Nun to be ſearched, who was accuſed of diſſoluteneſs, has theſe words. Quid ſibi velit, & quo ſpectet quod Obſtetricem adhibendam credideris non poſſum advertere; itane ergo liberum erit accuſare omnibus, & cum probatione deſtiterint, petere genitalium ſecretorum inſpectionem? & addicentur ſemper ſacræ virgines ad hujuſmodi ludibria, quæ & viſu & auditu horrori & pudori ſunt? Quæque in alienis auribus ſine damno pudoris reſonari non queunt, ea poſſunt ſine ejus tentari verecundia (12)? i. e. " I cannot conceive " for what reaſon you thought it neceſſary to make " uſe of a midwife; ſhall it then be free to all per- " ſons to accuſe, and when they want proofs to " make good the charge, to demand the ſearching " of the ſecret parts? Shall ſacred virgins be ſentenced " to undergo ſuch ſhameful trials, which it is an a- " bomination and a diſgrace to ſee or to hear? And " can ſuch things be tried upon them without affect- " ing their modeſty, which it is impoſſible to relate " to others, without detriment to theirs." You ſee that that great man abhorred even to hear of ſuch a ſearch, ſo far was he from approving it; adding, that he never read any where that maidens were ſearched. Nor do we find that the Romans, who were ignorant of nothing that is reaſonable with regard to manners, ever uſed that method to convict their Veſtals, when they were ſuſpected and accuſed of inceſt, though they were very ſtrict in the examination of that crime, and puniſhed it ſeverely. . . . (13). Whence it may be inferred, that in ſuch a caſe, the Romans did not cauſe the women to be ſearched, in order to know the truth of the matter, and to gather from thence a proof, either of their virginity, or of their being deflowered, as is practiſed at this time; they rejecting that method of ſearching, either becauſe they thought it too uncertain, and not ſufficient, or becauſe they judged it ſhameful, and inconſiſtent with the women's modeſty, for which they had ſo great a regard, that the ſame Valerius Maximus, in the firſt chapter of his ſecond book, ſpeaking of Spurius Carvilius, who divorced his wife, becauſe ſhe was barren, obſerves that the

(11) Ibid. p. 69.

(12) You will meet in Monſ. Du Pin's Bibl. Tom. 2. p. 278 of the Dutch edit. with a very accurate and beautiful abſtract of that Letter of St. Ambroſe to Siagrius.

(9) Vincent Tagereau, Diſcours de l'Impuiſſance de l'homme & de la femme, chap. 4. p. 57. edit. of Paris 1612.

(10) Ibid. p. 58.

(13) Tagereau, Diſcours de l'Impuiſſance, p. 63.

does not ſay, that the Queen mother would examine on the Baron's naked corps whether that the Romans would not ſuffer that ſhe ſhould be ſearched or touched in the leaſt. Quo matronale decus, munimento verecundiæ tutius eſſet, in jus vocanti corpus ejus attingere non permiſerunt, ut inviolata manus alienæ tactu relinqueretur. Wherein they do not follow their example, who, in ſuch actions of divorce, order immediately, that the wife ſhall be ſearched, though they might with more decency and reaſon begin with ſearching the huſband, which not proving ſufficient, they might then order to ſearch the wife; without going ſo faſt, and having them both ſearched at the ſame time, and without any interval, that they might come the ſooner to a ſeparation, as though it were a very preſſing affair, which could not be delayed, without great prejudice to the publick.

IV. A woman muſt reſolve to ſubmit to the Congreſs, for the other methods of trying a man's impotency do almoſt always fail. Now it is not to be conceived how a woman who is not loſt to all ſenſe of ſhame and modeſty, can without horror think of the circumſtances of a Congreſs: for after the parties have ſworn (14), that they will endeavour honeſtly and without any foul play to perform the matrimonial functions, neither party labouring to prevent it in the leaſt, and alſo after the Viewers have ſworn, that they will give a true and faithful account of what ſhall have paſſed in the Congreſs, they all *retire into a room prepared for that purpoſe, where the huſband and the wife are again ſearched; the huſband in order to know whether he does not labour under ſome diſtemper. . . . . The wife, in order to view her ſecret parts, and to know by that means the difference of her opening and dilatation before and after the Congreſs, and whether the intromiſſion be performed or not. In * ſome caſes (as in that of De Bray* (15),) the parties are viewed quite naked from head to foot, every part of their body is examined, etiam in podice, in order to find whether or not there be any thing in them that might promote or prevent the Congreſs; the man's ſecret parts are waſhed with luke-warm water (to what purpoſe I cannot tell) and the woman is put to her waiſt into a bath, in which ſhe continues ſome time (16) This being done the man and the woman go together into a bed at noon day, in the preſence of the Viewers, who ſtay in the room, or (if the parties, or either of them require it) they retire into the next wardrobe or gallery, leaving nevertheleſs the door upon the jar; and as for the Matrons they ſtay near the bed, the curtains being drawn, and then it is the huſband's buſineſs to prove himſelf a man by a carnal copulation with his wife, and performing the intromiſſion, when often (17) . . . . Laſtly the parties having been ſome time in bed, as for inſtance an hour or two, the Viewers being called in, or coming of their own accord, if they be weary, as it is often the caſe, ſi ſint viri (when they are men) they draw near, and opening the curtains they aſk what has paſſed between the parties, they ſearch the woman again, in order to know whether ſhe be more open and dilated, than when ſhe went to bed, and whether the intromiſſion be performed, and alſo an facta ſit emiſſio, ubi, quid, & quale emiſſum. All which is not done without a wax-light, and a pair of ſpectacles for thoſe who uſe them on account of their old age, nor without very obſcene and odious inquiries: then they draw up an account or verbal proofs of what paſſed at the Congreſs, or rather of what they themſelves pleaſe, and preſent it to the Judge, who is in a room or hall of the ſame houſe, with the Proctors and Practitioners of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, waiting for the end of the Comedy. This is not all, if the huſband ſucceeds in his attempts he is permitted to call the Viewers to witneſs it. Anthony Hotman obſerves, that Doctor Hoſtienſis adviſed the Midwives to uſe hot water to waſh the bodies of the women they ſearch, in order to take off all that might be reſtrictive. Which Panormus repeats after him in cap. Fraternitatis de frigid. & malef. (18). The Advocates for the Congreſs pretended to make an advantage of that practice, but Anthony Hotman aſſerts that it is proper to miſlead us. When we urge againſt them, ſays he (19), the artifices which ſome women uſe in order to make themſelves narrower, they make no account of it, ſaying that by waſhing the body before it is ſearched, all vaniſhes away, and the truth appears. We have ſeen nevertheleſs in our time, that a woman of no great quality, having entered an action of impotency againſt her huſband, which ſhe dropt afterwards becauſe ſhe proved to be with child, had made herſelf artificially ſo narrow, on account of the examination and ſearch ſhe was to undergo, that ſhe could not be delivered afterwards without the aſſiſtance of a Surgeon. And Præpoſitus in cap. conſultationis de frigidis & malef. and after him the author of the book, entitled Sylva Nuptialis, lib. 2. ampliatione 5. relate that a woman in Italy made herſelf ſo narrow in order to pleaſe her huſband, that afterwards neither he, nor any other man could have to do with her. Here follows another paſſage from the Advocate of Paris (20). De Bray, who is ſo much talked of, and of whoſe trial caſes have been printed on both ſides, ſiniſtrum tantum habebat teſticulum ex defecta naturali, and at the firſt Congreſs (for he went to it twice in the ſame day) arrexerat ſufficienter ad coeundum, ac ſubſtantiam ſeroſam & aquoſam extra vas emiſerat, quæ non poterat dici verum ſemen, ſed non intromiſerat, *according to the report * of three Phyſicians, three Surgeons, and three Matrons who were preſent. However the judges, without minding that natural deformity, nor the imperfection of the ſeed, ordered, before they gave a final ſentence, that † De Bray ſhould come again to the Congreſs, if he pleaſed (hinting thereby that he had not done enough, ſince the intromiſſion was wanting) and as he declared that he would not go any more to the Congreſs, becauſe his party had twice prevented him from performing the buſineſs, he was divorced for no other reaſon but for want of the intromiſſion at the Congreſs; and it is to be obſerved that when he went † to the Congreſs the ſecond time, the Judges warned him that in caſe he performed the intromiſſion he ſhould call the Viewers that they might ſee it, and bear witneſs to it. Whence it appears that in ſuch law ſuits, they do not mind the nature of the ſeed, nor whether the man* arriget, etiam ſufficienter ad coeundum, but that they require and demand an intromiſſion before witneſſes, which is a very indecent thing. Was not that Civilian in the right to aſſert (21) that a Congreſs is not only more proper to oppreſs the truth than to make it known? but that it is alſo indecent and brutiſh? Is he not in the right to oppoſe the impudence of thoſe women who demand it, to thoſe remains of ſhame and modeſty which are to be obſerved even in publick ſtews. Even publick proſtitutes, ſays he (22), lock themſelves up, and hide themſelves. Eſt aliqua etiam proſtitutis modeſtia, ſays the ſame Seneca, & illa corpora publico objecta ludibrio aliquid, quo infelix patientia lateat, obtendunt, adeo quodammodo lupanar verecundum eſt. i. e. "Even proſtitutes have ſome modeſty, and thoſe "bodies, which are expoſed to publick ſhame, are "covered with ſome thing that conceals what they "wretchedly bear: ſo that there is ſome modeſty "even in publick ſtews;" and Ovid ſays,

Ignoto Meretrix corpus junctura Quiriti,
Oppoſita populum ſubmovet ante ſera.

i. e. "A proſtitute who is to lye with an unknown "Roman, keeps the people off by ſhutting her door." He quotes alſo (23) this beautiful paſſage from St. Auguſtin. Opus ipſum quod libidine peragitur, non ſolum in quibuſque ſtupris ubi latebræ ad ſubterfugienda hominum judicia requiruntur: verum etiam in uſu ſcortorum (quam terrena Civitas licitam turpitudinem fecit) quamvis id agatur quod ejus Civitatis nulla lex vindicat, devitat tamen publicum etiam permiſſa & impunita libido conſpectum, & verecundia naturali, habent proviſum Lupanaria ipſa ſecretum, faciliuſque potuit impudicitia non habere vincula prohibitionis, quam impudentia removere latebra illius fœditatis. Quid concubitus conjugalis qui ſecundum matrimonialium præſcripta tabularum procreandorum fit cauſa liberorum? nonne & ipſe, quamvis ſit licitus & honeſtus, remotum ab arbitris cubile conquirit? nonne omnes famulos, atque ipſos etiam Paranymphos, & quoſcumque ingredi quælibet neceſſitudo permiſerat, ante mittit foras quam vel blandiri conjux conjugi poſſit? Nec ipſi filii, ſi qui jam inde nati ſunt, teſtes fieri permittuntur. i. e. "That work which is performed out of luſt requires "ſecrecy; not only in thoſe kind of pleaſures, where-"in men avoid to be diſcovered, but even in publick "ſtews, the frequenting of which, though ſhameful

"in

(14) Tagereau, Diſcours de l'Impuiſſance, p. 123.

* This appears from the report of the laſt Congreſs, dated April the 21ſt, 1578.

(15) He was a Treaſurer. See Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. 1. p. m. 97, 98.

(16) See for what reaſon, hereunder, quot. (18).

(17) See the reſt of this paſſage hereunder, quot. (31).

(18) Ant. Hotman, Traite de la Diſſolution du Mariage. Tract. 1. p. 47.

(19) Ibid. in the 2 Traite, p. 34. See alſo p. 47 of the 1ſt treatiſe.

(20) Tagereau, Diſcours de l'Impuiſſance, p. 30, 31, 32.

* That report is dated April the 11th, 1578.

† That order is dated the 14th of May following.

† This appears from the reports, and from the verbal proceſs of the ſecond Congreſs.

(21) See the 7th chap. of his treatiſe.

(22) Ibid. p. 153. In p. 157, he quotes theſe lines of Martial, lib. 1. Epigr. 35. (and not 91 as he writes). Et meretrix abigit teſtem veloque ſeraque. Raraque Summenii fornice rima patet.

(23) Ibid. p. 154, 155, quoting the 18 chapt. of the 4th book de Civit. Dei.

that action was well grounded or not: nor do our other celebrated Hiſtorians relate it. It

" in itſelf, is yet permitted by the civil ſociety; and " notwithſtanding it be not puniſhable by any law, " yet on thoſe occaſions men avoid to do publickly, " what is permitted and lawful. So that through a " natural modeſty, private places are provided even " in bawdy houſes; and it was eaſier for diſſoluteneſs " not to be prohibited, than for impudence to ſhew " itſelf out of thoſe retreats in which alone thoſe " obſcene actions are perpetrated. What ſhall we " ſay of the nuptial rites, which by the laws of ma- " trimony are deſigned for the procreation of chil- " dren? Though they be lawful and honeſt, yet do " not they require a bed-chamber into which no wit- " neſſes are admitted? Are not all the ſervants, the " very bride-men and bride-maids, and all they, " who by being relations or friends were ſuffered to " enter the room of the new-married couple, put out " of doors, before the bridegroom does ſo much as " give a kiſs to his bride? The very children, if " there be any, are not ſuffered to be witneſſes to their " parent's embraces."

Such are the proceedings, which the heireſs of Soubiſe was obliged to ſubmit to, when ſhe went to law with the Baron du Pont. They would ſtain the reputation of the illuſtrious mother of the Duke of Rohan, of that heroine who ſignalized herſelf at the ſiege of La Rochelle; they would ſtain her reputation, I ſay, if it could be ſuppoſed, that in her moſt tender years, ſhame and modeſty did not prevent her to commence ſuch a ſuit againſt her huſband, in which ſhe was obliged to act ſo diſhonourable a part. Wherefore I have taken a great deal of care to clear her, by charging her mother with all that contrivance: I have alſo endeavoured to excuſe her mother. When I have aſſerted that all theſe proceedings were to be ſubmitted to at that time, I aſſerted it with reſpect to the decree of the Parliament of Paris, which on the 18th of February 1677, forbad all civil and eccleſiaſtical Judges, for the future, to order the proof of the Congreſs in caſes relating to matrimony (24). It is ſurpriſing, that a body, which always conſiſted of ſuch wiſe men, ſhould have thought ſo late of abrogating a cuſtom like that. " There have been many more " marriages declared void during an hundred years " that the Congreſs was eſtabliſhed in France, than " was ever ſeen before. Wherefore the Parliament " of Paris having judged at laſt, that the Congreſs " is an enemy to chaſtity, and no true proof of a " man's virility, did on the 18th of February 1677, " by a ſolemn decree, forbid, &c (25)." Theſe are the words of a very able Phyſician, who had juſt been ſaying, " (26) That the Congreſs, which was for- " merly aboliſhed by the Emperor Juſtinian, as being " inconſiſtent with the holineſs of Chriſtianity, has " been eſtabliſhed again only by ſome curious perſons " of our age. For it is an infamy to both ſexes, and " a diſgrace to our time; and I queſtion whether " we could meet with any inſtances of it in hiſtory, " but ſuch as are ridiculous. It is a law which is " prejudicial to chaſtity; and is too hard and too " injurious to man. He muſt ſhew to all the world, " thoſe parts, which nature took ſo much care to " hide, and ſeek even for witneſſes, which we avoid " when we follow the dictates of nature. For what " ſhame is it not to ſhew at noon-day, what we take " care to conceal, even during the darkneſs of night? " It is nothing but a pretence to divorce, and an " effect of the laſciviouſneſs and impudence of the " women. They put it into the head of Judges to " order a trial, which is as uncertain, as it is inde- " cent. There is hardly perhaps one man in a thou- " ſand, who can come off with flying colours from a " publick Congreſs." It is a long while ſince this abuſe was complained of. The Civilian I have quoted, and who lived in the beginning of the 17th century, ſhewed very ſtrongly the injuſtice of that cuſtom. Seeing the diſorder encreaſing daily, he endeavoured to put a ſtop to it. And ſince divorces, ſays he (27), occaſioned by the impotency of the men, are at this time more frequent than ever, though there be not more frigid men now, than in former days, they having always been pretty few, (ſuch at leaſt, the impotency of whom ſome ſign can diſcover, when they are ſearched, whether the defect be natural or accidental,) and of ten divorces, there will hardly be one inſtance, in which ſome defect could be diſcovered in the man by ſearching him, which makes many people wonder and complain; I have carefully examined, whence this could proceed. He obſerves, that there were many perſons, who countenanced thoſe diſſolutions of marriages. Not being able to conceive that the man or the woman who complains of the other's impotence, could be ſo impudent and ſo unconſcionable, as to demand a divorce without any reaſon, the moment ſuch an action is entered, they paſs their judgment too inconſiderately, and condemn the accuſed as impotent; and if he be a man, who out of ſhame, or for ſome other reaſons refuſes the Congreſs, or, if he ſubmits to it, does not perform the intromiſſion, they look upon him immediately as impotent, ſaying, that if they were in his ſtead, they would effectually ſhew their ſtrength and courage, which, perhaps, they would be puzzled to do, if they were in his caſe, on account of the ſhame, the fear, the vexation, and the hatred, which ſuch an act is unavoidably attended with, and which prevents its execution (28). He enters into a particular account upon this ſubject, which is very curious, and very well reaſoned. I ſhall tranſcribe it here, without fearing that judicious perſons will take it amiſs; for why ſhould they be angry to find in this place, what a grave author publiſhed at Paris with the King's licenſe above fourſcore years ago (29), with no other view but to inſpire men with horror for indecent and unlawful cuſtoms. " (30) It is indeed a ſtrange and almoſt " incredible thing, that ſuch an action, which was " condemned by the heathens on account of its " ſhamefulneſs, and its being againſt nature (that is " to ſay, againſt ſhame and modeſty, which accord- " ing to St. Auguſtin, are naturally in all men) " ſhould have been admitted among the Chriſtians " and by Miniſters, in whoſe conduct there ought to " appear a greater decency than in that of other " men. It is true, that it is not long ſince that " method began to be in uſe; which was firſt in- " troduced (as we may preſume) by ſome impudent " man, who having an action of impotency entered " againſt him, demanded a Congreſs, boaſting that " he ſhould prove himſelf a man in it; which might " have been granted him rather from a probability " of ſucceſs, than for any good reaſon. It was per- " haps alſo introduced with a view to deter the wo- " men from commencing ſuch ſuits, that they might " not be reduced to make ſuch a ſhameful trial. " But that practice ſerved neither to prove the men's " ability, nor to deter the women from entering ſuch " actions againſt their huſbands: on the contrary, " it has rendered them more bold ſtill, becauſe they " knew that the intromiſſion, which is required in " the Congreſs to prevent a divorce, is intirely in " their power, no man being able to perform it " without their conſent either voluntary or forced " (31), and that it is a ſure and infallible method " to carry the cauſe and be divorced. And (what " is worſe) it is become a cuſtom and conſtant prac- " tice, to order the Congreſs in thoſe ſuits for a di- " vorce on account of a man's impotency, the ancient " forms being omitted or neglected on thoſe occa- " ſions, ſo far that the men are obliged to go to " the Congreſs upon pain of impriſonment, if they " will not go to it voluntarily, or conſent to a ſepa- " ration: which is ſo abſurd, that one could never " believe it, if one did not ſee it. Now ſuch a prac- " tice being eſtabliſhed without any good reaſon, " ought not to have been followed nor continued. " Quod enim non ratione introductum eſt, ſed errore primum, deinde conſuetudine obtentum eſt, in aliis ſimilibus obtinere non debet. 1. Quod non ratione. De legibus & ſenatus-conſultis. Beſides the ſhame which a " Congreſs is attended with, and which is ſufficient " to prevent the execution of it, the following cir- " cumſtances render it impoſible: namely, the fear " a man ſtands in of ſo many perſons, who ſee, ſearch " and handle him, on whoſe report his reputation, " his ruin or his preſervation depend; as alſo the " fear he is under not to perform what he has un- " dertaken, and which is of ſo great conſequence " to him: his vexation occaſioned by that ſhameful " action

(24) Venette, Tableau de l'Amour Conjugal, p. 579. See alſo the Journal des Savans, for the 5th of July 1677. p. 208, of the Dutch edit.

(25) Nicholas Venette, Doctor of Phyſick, the King's Profeſſor of Anatomy and Surgery, and Dean of the Phyſicians aggregated to the Royal College of la Rochelle, p. 578, of the Tableau de l'AmourConjugal, 7th edit, 1696. That edit. is more complete and more correct than all the former. The Author has added a Preface to it, which deſerves to be read. I have quoted it in the art. JOUBERT, rem. [C].

(26 Ibid. p. 577.

(27) Tagereau, Diſcours de l'Impuiſſance, p. 7 and 8.

(28) Ibid. p. 9 and 10.

(29) The 2d edit. of Tagereau's book, which I make uſe of, was printed in the year 1612, and the firſt in the year 1611.

(30) Ibid. p. 159, & ſeq.

(31) He ſays, p. 125, that in the Congreſs there ariſe often ſhameful and ridiculous quarrels, the man complaining that his party will not ſuffer him to do it, and hinders the intromiſſion; ſhe denying it, &c.

It might nevertheleſs be true, that ſhe caſt an eye upon his ſecret parts with that view, and there are books in which ſhe is charged with it [B], and even with giving orders to look

" action brought againſt him, which makes him a " laughing-ſtock to all the world. The hatred he " entertains againſt his wife, who expoſes him to " ſo troubleſom a ſuit, whereas ſhe ought to have " promoted his happineſs and his reputation. Add " to this the compulſion which is uſed againſt him, " for he muſt be ſent to priſon, unleſs he goes to " the Congreſs of his own accord, or conſents to be " parted from his wife. All which things being real " remedies againſt love, and inconſiſtent with the " chief act of it, which requires ſecrecy, boldneſs, " kindneſs, and a mind undiſturbed with ſhame, " fear, hatred and vexations, theſe things, I ſay, " render the effect and execution of the Congreſs " extremely difficult, nay abſolutely impoſſible, as " Ambroſe Paré has obſerved in the 28th book of " his works, of the 6th edition, where he treats Of " the affinity there is between the impotency of men, and " of women, which is not in former editions, which " I obſerve that the reader may not be miſtaken. " A man muſt be deſtitute of all ſhame and fear, " worſe than the very brutes, to execute the Congreſs " notwithſtanding all theſe impediments. Conſidering " alſo (as St. Auguſtin obſerves in the ſame 14th " book of the city of God, chapter 23) that copu- " lation does not depend upon our will alone, " &c."

Mr. Venette is too polite a man to be angry with me for thinking that he is miſtaken in what he obſerves concerning Juſtinian. I have heard very learned Civilians ſay, that there is not the leaſt footſtep of a congreſs in the ancient laws, and that it is an abomination invented in theſe latter ages. Let us quote Vincent Tagereau again (32). " Now, tho' " marriage be indiſſoluble by its firſt inſtitution, " and by the Law of the Goſpel, unleſs by the " death of either party, in ſuch a manner at leaſt " as that the ſeparated parties be at liberty to marry " again, and though we do not find that among " the Jews, the Greeks, and the Romans, with " whom divorces were in uſe, there was any law " concerning the marriage of frigid perſons, except one " among the Athenians made by Solon, by which it " was lawful for a woman married to a man unable " to know her carnally, to lye with whom ſhe pleaſed " of her huſband's relations; and another among the " Romans, made by the Emperor Juſtinian, near " thirteen hundred years after the building of Rome, " (we meeting with none made before) by which he " is the firſt who, out of favour rather than accord- " ing to reaſon and to the law of God, gave the " women leave to part with their huſbands and di- " vorce them for their impotency, as he made ſeve- " ral other laws in the women's favour, at the per- " ſuaſion of the Empreſs Theodora, who had an " abſolute influence over him, and made him do " what ſhe pleaſed, as the ſame Bodin writes in the " paſſage of his Republic, quoted above (33), and " in the ſecond chapter of the fifth book; yet the " Canoniſts, after the example of Juſtinian, have " granted ſuch a liberty to the women, in caſe of " the huſband's impotency, that they marry another " man after they are divorced; having alſo given " the ſame liberty to men married with women who " are too narrow, which Juſtinian had not done, there " being hardly any ſuch women."

The Counſellors, who in the year 1677 pleaded for . . . . aſſerted that the Congreſs had no foundation either in the authority of the laws, or in the opinion of the Civilians. That neither in the civil nor in the canon law do we meet with the ſearching, nor with the Congreſs: that it is practiſed no where but in France, and only about an hundred and twenty years ago. That the books of the ancients afford us but two ridiculous inſtances that can ſupport it (34).

Monſieur Venette's miſtake is owing probably to ſome tranſpoſition of ideas in his mind, which made him miſunderſtand Juſtinian's law. That Emperor would not ſuffer that the age of puberty in boys ſhould be any longer determined by inſpecting their ſecret parts. He fixed it at the age of fourteen whether they were vigorous or not. He looked upon the practice which had been in uſe till that time, as a very indecent one. He thought himſelf under an obligation to improve upon the modeſty of the Romans, who prohibited to determine the age of puberty by inſpection with regard to maidens (35); but they did not prohibit it with regard to boys.

Theodoret has very much exclaimed againſt Plato's laws, by which it was enacted, not only that young maids, and elderly women, ſhould perform quite naked the exerciſes proper for men, but alſo that there ſhould be inſpectors, who in order to judge of the age of puberty in both ſexes ſhould make young men and women ſtrip (36). Τὴν δὲ τῆ τῶν γάμων χρόνῳ ξυμμετρίαν δικασὴς σκοπῶν κρινέτω, γυμνὰς μὲν τὰς ἄῤῥενας, γυμνὰς δὲ ὀμφαλῶ μέχρι θεώμενος τὰς γυναῖκας. Judex vero inſpiciens judicet quænam ætas celebrandis nuptiis conveniat: eamque ob rem nudos mares, nudaſque umbilico tenus fœminas inſpiciat (37). To act fairly Theodoret ſhould not have overlooked the Legiſlator's caution with regard to the maidens which he would have ſtripped to the navel only (38). Theoret, I ſay, ought to have argued againſt that law of Plato thus limited as it is, but he argues againſt it, as though there were no limitation added to it. He urges firſt what was ſaid by the wife of King Candaules, that a woman, who pulls off her ſhift, ſtrips herſelf of her modeſty at the ſame time; whence he infers that that Philoſopher and law-giver taught brides to give over all ſhame. Τοιγαρῦν ὁ φιλόσοφος τὰς νυμφευομένας γυμνοῖ τῆς αἰδοῦς, καὶ ἀναίδειαν ἐκδιδάσκει. Quare philoſophus pudore ſponſas exuit, & impudentiam docet (39). Theodoret's way of arguing has not here all the accuracy and exactneſs which is required from a good dialectician; but what he obſerves againſt the Platonic inſtitution concerning the dances and ſhews, where the two ſexes might come naked, is well grounded. Οὐ γάρ πω μόνον εἰς ἀναίδειαν ἐπαιδοτριβοῦντο γυμνούμενοι καὶ γυμνουμένους ἄνδρας θεώμενοι, ἀλλὰ καὶ πολλὰς ἀλλήλοις ἀφορμὰς προυξένουν ἀκολασίας· τῶν γὰρ δὴ γυμνῶν σωμάτων ἡ θεωρία καὶ τοὺς ἄνδρας, καὶ τὰς γυναῖκας εἰς ἔρωτας ἐκτόπους ἠρέθιζεν (40). For theſe women being naked, and beholding naked men were not only thereby taught to be impudent, but they offered alſo each other many opportunities to be incontinent; for the ſight of naked bodies could not but inſpire both the men and the women with a criminal love. This confirms the remarks I have made in another place (41). But it muſt be obſerved that the laws of Plato were not put in practice as thoſe of Lycurgus were. They were only projected laws, which, as Theodoret obſerves (42), were not even received in that Philoſopher's own country: ſo that it cannot be ſaid, that Juſtinian was obliged to ſuppreſs the abuſes, which that father of the Church has condemned. Let us cloſe this remark with a paſſage from the Menagiana, in which we find that the abuſe of the Congreſs had ceaſed being ſo common. They who love to hear that publick ſcandals become leſs, will be edified by reading this. " An Official in the time of " Monſieur de Gondy, whoſe name I do not call to " mind, told me that during forty years he exerciſed " the functions of his office, he ordered the Congreſs " but once. It was to a Miller; and as he was do- " ing his duty perfectly well in that trial, his wife " told him, Jacob, why did not you do ſo when we " were at home, it would have ſaved us the trouble of " coming here (43)? "

[B] There are books in which ſhe is charged with it.] John Lætus Profeſſor at Franeker (44) that the Queen gave orders to look for the corps of Soubiſe, a Gentleman ſuſpected of impotency, and that after it was found ſhe conſidered the ſecret parts of it with a great fit of laughter, in the preſence of a great many of her ladies. " Subiſii nobilis qui frigidæ & " minimè ad procreandam ſobolem aptæ naturæ eſſe " dicebatur cadaver juſſit inveſtigari Regina, inven- " tum (45) pudenda illius, cum ſuarum pediſſequarum " numeroſo comitatu non ſine magno & effuſo riſu in- " ſpexit." Could a particular of that kind be unknown to d'Aubigné? and if he had known it was it poſſible for him to omit it in his hiſtory? His ſilence is certainly here a deciſive proof; the more, becauſe

(32) Tagereau, Diſcours de l'Impuiſſance, p. 4 and 5.

(33) That is to ſay, in the 3d chapt. of the 1ſt book.

(34) Journal des Savans, for July the 5th, 1677. p. 208, of the Dutch edit.

(35) Pubertatem autem veteres quidem non ſolum ex annis, ſed etiam ex habitu corporis in maſculis æſtimari volebant. Noſtra autem Majeſtas dignum eſſe caſtitate noſtrorum temporum exiſtimans, bene putavit: quod in fœminis etiam antiquis impudicum eſſe viſum eſt, id eſt, inſpectionem habitudinis corporis, hoc etiam in maſculos extendere. Et ideo noſtra ſancta Conſtitutione promulgata, pubertatem in maſculis poſt decimum quartum annum completum illico initium accipere diſpoſuimus: antiquitatis normam in fœminis bene poſitam, in ſuo ordine relinquentes, ut poſt duodecim annos completos viripotentes eſſe credantur. Inſtitut. lib. 1. tit. 22.

(36) Theodor. de Græc. Affect. lib. 9. p. m. 615.

(37) Idem, ibid. p. 616.

(38) We muſt underſtand that it was by beginning from the head.

(39) Theodor. de Græc. Affect. lib. 9. p. m. 616.

(40) Idem, ibid.

(41) In the art. LYCURGUS.

(42) De Græc. Affect. lib. 9. p. 615.

(43) Menagiana, p. 291, 292, of the firſt Dutch edit.

(44) Compend. Hiſt. Univerſ. p. m. 424. He quotes De ſtatu relig. in Gallia. We ſhall ſee in the following rem. the words of the Author he quotes.

(45) Theſe words are here a ſolœciſm.

look for the Baron du Pont's corps among the reſt of the ſlain [C]. I ſhall relate in a note, why I give that Gentleman the name of QUELLENEC [D].

The paſſages which I have quoted in the firſt remark of this article have raiſed complaints from many perſons, and made them aſſert with a great deal of warmth, that there were inſufferable obſcenities in thoſe paſſages. I was always of opinion that they did not take things right; and yet I was almoſt determined to omit thoſe paſſages in this ſecond edition, as ſome perſons adviſed me for whom I have a very great regard. But other perſons not leſs judicious have diſſuaded me from it, and told me that the reaſons I have given for my conduct were a very good excuſe, and that it would be enough if I did but give here my Apology, which has already been ſeen in a ſmall pamphlet. I follow that advice, and ſhall give thoſe reaſons hereunder [E]. I ſhall add to them an inſtance taken from becauſe he obſerves that the Ladies conſidered in Soubiſe whether he was incapable of marriage, becauſe there was an action againſt him upon that account (46). Varillas would not have concealed that action of the Queen-mother; for he does not ſpare her with regard to things leſs important or more important than this. Speaking of the Siege of Rohan he obſerves (47) that the Queen Regent was blamed for carrying the King her ſon into the forts as ſoon as they were taken, as though ſhe had deſigned to uſe that young Prince to the ſight of murder and ſlaughter; and they found fault with her for examining with too great curioſity the naked body of a dead maiden, who had dreſſed herſelf in men's clothes, in order to encreaſe the number of thoſe who defended the place: ſo much are men inclined to forgive no fault to the great. Another Profeſſor of Franeker aſſerts, that the Queen examined very attentively whether there were any marks of impotency on Soubiſe's corps (48).

[C] . . . . and even with giving orders to look for the Baron du Pont's corps among the reſt of the ſlain.] This is an aggravating circumſtance: I do not anſwer for it; let the Author who relates it name his vouchers. It is a Proteſtant Writer. Rex, Regina, fratres & Regius comitatus frequens ſub veſperam Lupara egrediuntur, ſtragis illius per urbem effuſæ conſpiciendæ cauſa. Subixius vir nobilis, frigidæ & minimè ad procreandam ſobolem aptæ naturæ eſſe dicebatur: illius cadaver juſſit inveſtigari Regina, & pudenda illius, cum ſuarum pediſſequarum numeroſo comitatu, inſpicit, non ſine magno & effuſo riſu (49).

[D] The name of Quellenec.] Thus Monſieur Varillas calls him in the 2d edition of his Charles IX. Now as that edition has been corrected according to the remarks of Monſieur d'Hoſier the greateſt genealogiſt in France (50), we cannot queſtion but we muſt call thus the Baron du Pont who was married to the heireſs of Soubiſe. That name is quite diſfigured in moſt of the Hiſtorians, which is probably owing to an error of the preſs. The printers of Thuanus put Quellevetum Pontium (α) inſtead of Quellenecum Pontium; which made Monſieur de Mezerai name this Baron Quellevé-Pontivy: this was committing two blunders. For Pontivy was a Lord of the Houſe of Rohan: this laſt blunder is not in the Abregé Chronologique, but only in the large Hiſtory. Let us obſerve by the by, that in his abridgment he calls the ſame perſon Francis, whom he had named Charles in his large Hiſtory. In Thuanus, and in the ſecond edition of Varillas the Baron du Pont is called Charles: this therefore was, I think, his true name. Varillas in his firſt edition made uſe of the word Kuellevé. This was again a blunder of the printers of Thuanus. The ſpelling of that name being altered was owing probably to people's remembering that ſeveral noble families in Britany wrote their name with a K. A celebrated Author has ſaid lately, Franciſcus Quelletrius, Dux è Britannia (51).

* (α) In the Index Thuani, drawn up according to the Geneva edition, we read Quellinecus Pontius. CRIT. REM.]

[E] I ſhall give thoſe reaſons hereunder. I queſtion whether any of my readers do ſtill remember two pamphlets printed in the year 1597, the one with this title, Jugement du Public . . . ſur le Dictionaire Critique. i. e. "The opinion of the Public . . . . "concerning the Critical Dictionary;" the other "entitled, Reflections ſur . . . le Jugement du Public. i. e. "Reflections upon . . . the opinion of the "Public, &c." It is the latter of thoſe two pamphlets which contains the Apology, I was adviſed to inſert in this place, and which was thought proper to remove all the ſcruples of my readers. I wiſh with all my heart it may produce ſo good an effect. Here then follows what I anſwered to my Cenſurer (52). "To the three inſtances he has urged may be added "what he obſerves againſt the article in which I "tranſcribe ſome paſſages from Tagereau's book. "He could not chooſe a more ill grounded cauſe to "complain, for I ſhall ſhew in a proper time and "place, that I had all manner of right to inſert "into my work what relates to the Congreſs. As "an Hiſtorian I had a right to relate, that Quellenec "was accuſed of impotency, and that it was his "mother-in-law, and not his wife, who entered an "action againſt him. I owed that obſervation to "the truth of the matter, in behalf of an Heroine "of our party. As a faithful Hiſtorian I was under "an obligation to cenſure thoſe who caſt a blemiſh "on that Lady's reputation, by pretending that in "her moſt tender age ſhe commenced a ſuit of that "kind. This was declaring that I do not think it "honourable for a woman to engage herſelf in ſuch "proceedings. Every Author has a right to urge "the reaſons why he admits of ſuch or ſuch an opi-"nion. And therefore, as the Commentator of my "own text, I might, and was even obliged to alledge "the arguments on which I grounded my opinion, "and conſequently to quote what Tagereau has pub-"liſhed againſt the practice of thoſe times. We "pretend to appear more wiſe than our fathers, and "in reality we are leſs ſo. That Advocate in the "Parliament of Paris did eaſily obtain a licence to "publiſh a work in which he expoſed all the abomi-"nations of the Congreſs, and in Holland they will "raiſe a thouſand clamours againſt an Author, who "tranſcribes ſome paſſages from that work. Is not "this having a reſpect for perſons, which is ground-"ed only on a falſe notion of the mind, or on the de-"pravation of the heart? But will thoſe people ſay, "that Advocate entered into theſe particulars with "no other deſign but to perſuade the Judges to put "a ſtop to a practice which is ſo inconſiſtent with "modeſty, and ſo proper to give occaſion to an un-"juſt ſentence. And do not I declare, even with "the utmoſt indignation, that it was an infamous "practice, becauſe it enervates and roots up the prin-"ciples of ſhame, the moſt valuable ſpring of cha-"ſtity. Is it poſſible to take the beſt ſide of the "queſtion with more zeal, and more vigorouſly than "I have done in that article? And beſides this, had "I not a right, as an Hiſtorian, to give an account "of thoſe proceedings, which have been a long time "in uſe in the Parliament of Paris, and which are not "yet abrogated every where elſe. The manner of "proceeding in civil and criminal matters belongs cer-"tainly to hiſtorical facts; and if it has ſomething "ſingular and remarkable in it, there are many tra-"vellers, and many Writers of hiſtorical Relations, "who endeavour to be particularly acquainted with "it. How great a pleaſure had it not been for "Pietro della Valle, if he had met in Perſia with a "book, which could acquaint him with an odd "cuſtom as well as Tagereau could acquaint him "with all the particulars of a Congreſs. I aſk whe-"ther the verbal proceſſes or the verdicts of juries "and matrons in certain cauſes, are pieces to be "rejected or neglected by thoſe who are making "accurate compilations concerning the practices and "cuſtoms of a certain country? Furetiere was not "writing

(46) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Tom. 2. p. 545.

(47) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX. lib. 4. under the year 1562.

(48) Cujus cadaver cum reliquis ante Regiam projectum, a Regina ejuſque puellis diligenter, ſi nota impotentiæ appareret, inſpectabatur. Huber. Hiſt. Civil. Tom. 2. p. 353.

(49) Commentar. de Statu Religionis & Reipubl. in Regna Galliæ. part. 4. folio m. 39 verſo.

(50) See the Letter publiſhed by Mr. de Larroque, in his Critique de Varillas.

(51) Huber, Hiſt. Civil. Tom. 2. p. 353. printed at Franeker, in the year 1692.

(52) Reflexion ſur un Imprimé qui a pour Titre Jugement du Public, &c. p. 3 and 4.

from Juſtus Lipſius's approbation of a piece compoſed by a lawyer, who, in a cauſe concerning the diſſolution of a marriage [F], was obliged to relate obſcenities, and who did even make himſelf a little more merry than his ſubject abſolutely required. They, who " writing an hiſtorical Dictionary attended with a " Commentary upon it, but a grammatical Dictionary, " and yet he has made uſe of ſuch verbal proceſſes; " who did ever murmur againſt it? . . . . Monſieur " Menjot . . . . who was a very honeſt man, has " inſerted many obſcenities in a Diſſertation upon " the uterine fury, and upon barrenneſs. It were " ridiculous to blame him for it, ſince as a Phyſician " he had a right to do it, and his ſubject required " and ſuffered it. Now I muſt tell them that a " compiler who relates and comments has the ſame " right, with a Phyſician, with an Advocate, &c. " and as occaſion offers, he may make uſe of their " verbal proceſſes, and of the technical words. If " he be giving an account of the divorce of Lotha- " rius and Tetberga, he may give extracts from " Hincmarus Archbiſhop of Rheims, who wrote " down all the obſcene actions which were proved " during the courſe of the proceedings. One ſhould " never judge of an Hiſtorian who is at the ſame " time a Commentator of his own work, before one " be acquainted with the laws of Hiſtory, and the " privileges of a Commentator. If theſe Gentlemen " had read Andrew Tiraqueau's Commentary upon " the Laws of Matrimony, they would have met there " with a much greater heap of obſcenities. And " yet he was a Councellor in the Parliament of Paris, " and one of the moſt illuſtrious men of the laſt " Century, both for his learning and for his virtue."

[F] Juſtus Lipſius's approbation of a piece compoſed by a Lawyer, who in a cauſe concerning the diſſolution of a marriage.] Sebaſtian Rouillard, one of the moſt learned Advocates in the Parliament of Paris, pleaded in the year 1600 for a Gentleman, whom his wife had accuſed of impotency. She had carried her cauſe before the Official of Sens, and afterwards again before the Delegates of the Primacy of Lyons. The huſband appealed from their ſentence, and obtained Commiſſaries from the holy apoſtolical See, to give a final judgment, without farther appeal. Rouillard, who was his Counſellor, publiſhed a Capitulaire auquel eſt traicté qu'un homme nay ſans teſticules apparens, & qui ha neantmoins toutes les autres marques de virilité: Eſt capable des œuvres du Mariage. i. e. " A treatiſe, in which it " is proved, that a man, whoſe teſticles do not ap- " pear, and who has nevertheleſs all the other ſigns " of virility, is capable to perform the buſineſs of a " huſband." The Gentleman was born thus, and it was upon that defect his wife grounded the charge of impotency. He aſſerted that he had conſummated the marriage; not by the ridiculous means ſhe ſuppoſed, but by the natural ſtrength of his ſex (53). He demanded to be ſearched, and to carry his proofs as far as it was poſſible, he offered the ſtrongeſt and moſt common argument that is uſed on thoſe occaſions, I mean, that he propoſed a Congreſs, in order to demonſtrate that he was a man, that he had the erection, intromiſſion, and emiſſion, which were diſputed to him (54). The Judges had ordered neither the ſearching, nor the Congreſs, the wife having repreſented that both theſe methods offended her modeſty (55). Rouillard drew from the huſband's offers, ſuch conſequences, as he judged moſt to the purpoſe; he expatiated at large on the functions of the teſticles, according to the doctrine of the Philoſophers, and according to the anatomical obſervations. He did not make uſe of circumlocutions, nor of covered expreſſions: he made uſe of the technical words with the utmoſt liberty, and interſperſed his diſcourſe with very ſmutty Latin lines, but which were very ingeniouſly applied. One would think he never recedes from a grave ſtyle, and yet the whole piece abounds every where, with merry jokes, and pretty free ſtrokes of wit. He ſent a copy of it to Juſtus Lipſius, who wrote him the following anſwer. Ita, ita, venit ad nos libellus tuus, Deum immortalem! venuſtus, lepidus, & pro ipſa re libellus (56). . . . . Sed ô te (auſim dicere?) nequam! Novios, Pomponios, Titinnios, Petronios, quidquid hoc genus Atellanas, Mimos, Satyras ſcripſit, vincis aut æquas. Imo uno vincis, quod ſalvo pudore & probitate jocaris. Quid jocaris? ſerio loqueris, & de illo quod Græci Neceſſarium vocant, neceſſario, atque id apud judices, agis. Meum & meorum riſum! quâ fronte, quam ſubſtricta aure, Caſſii & Catones veſtri hæc audiunt? . . . . Extra jocum, argutus tuus libellus & in re ſeria, nec ſeria, ſerio doctus (57). i. e. " Yes, I have received your little book; good " God, how pretty and witty it is! It is indeed a ſa- " tyr. . . . . But oh you wicked man, if I dare call " you ſo! you excel above, or at leaſt equal Novius, " Pomponius, Titinnius, Petronius, and all the others " who ever wrote plays, farces, or ſatyrs. Nay, you " have the advantage of them in this, that you jeſt " without going beyond the bounds of modeſty and " honour. What do I ſay, you jeſt? You ſpeak ſe- " rioufly, and you handle that ſubject, which the " Greeks call the neceſſary thing, as you ſhould, " ſpeaking before the Judges. Lord! with what " face, with what attentive ears muſt your grave Ma- " giſtrates, your Caſſii and your Cato's have heard " you? . . . . Without joking, your book is very " ſmart, and in a ſubject at the ſame time both ſe- " rious and merry, it is ſeriouſly learned." In another letter he declares ſolemnly, that he has commended Rouillard's Capitulary without irony, and that he had not any deſign to caſt the leaſt reproach upon the Author's morals, which he knew to be blameleſs, and of the utmoſt innocence. Ego te, cum Varrone hoc dicam, modo ſcænatili tetigerim? ὦδ' ὡς ὄναρ. Joci fuerunt innoxii, puri, & niveos dicam, quia & frigus, credo, habuerunt. De moribus tuis ne mihi verbum, ſcio ſanctos eſſe: aut ſcripta tua mihi mentiuntur, character ille interioris mentis (58). i. e. " ſhould I have " uſed you after the manner of the ſtage-players, to " quote an expreſſion of Varro? No, not even in my " dream. Your jokes were harmleſs, innocent, and " I may ſay, like ſnow, for I imagine that they had " ſome coldneſs in them. But for your morals, I " have not ſaid a word of them. I know they are " pure and holy, unleſs your writings deceive much, " which do generally ſhew the inward character of " the mind." Obſerve, that Lipſius had already ſet up for a Bigot, when he wrote this, and yet he paſſed a very judicious and equitable ſentence upon Rouillard's Capitulaire. I do not know whether the wife's Counſellor publiſhed his pleadings; but tho' he had been never ſo baſhful and modeſt, he could not have avoided to utter a thouſand groſs obſcenities. His Factum, or his Anſwer to Rouillard, would have acquainted us with many particulars of that trial. I know but very few of them. See the margin (59).

I muſt obſerve, that Rouillard and Tagereau, did not follow the ſame principles. The intereſt of the cauſe, which Rouillard pleaded, made him aſſert, that the practice of the Congreſs, and the ſearching of the ſecret parts, was juſt and reaſonable. So that, ſays he (60), " all theſe circumſtances concurring to- " gether, this was a ſufficient reaſon for the Judges " to order what the ſaid Appellant offered to un- " dergo, ſince he aſſerted that he had known his " wife carnally, and in ſuch a caſe, a man muſt be " credited, ſtandum eſt verbo viri, qui dicit ſe uxorem " cognoviſſe cap. continebatur de deſponſat. impub. con- " ſidering that the man is the head of the wife, " and ought to enjoy that privilege above her; add " to this, that the preſumption of the law is in his " favour, namely, that he has known his wife, gloſſ. " cap. inſpicimus de regul. in 6. cap. literas ë de pre- " ſumpt. . . . . At leaſt, in order to remove that " preſumption, it is neceſſary, that the Matrons or " Midwives ſhould depoſe the contrary, and that by " ſearching the ſecret parts of the wife, they ſhould " have found her a virgin: cap. propoſuit ë de probat. " Now they are ſo far from urging this at the trial, " that on the contrary the defendant, after many " diſſimulations, acknowledges that ſhe was deflower- " ed by her huſband; and as ſhe pretended it was " not done by any act of manhood, of which a " judgment might be formed by inſpecting the parts, " ſhe would not conſent to be ſearched, nor would " the Judges order it, though the Appellant demanded " it moſt earneſtly, and with the greateſt importuni- " ty

(53) Rouillard, Capitulaire, p. 8.

(54) Ibid. p. 9.

(55) Ibid. p. 40.

(56) Lipſius, Ep. 66. Centuriæ ad Germanos & Gallos, p. m. 697.

(57) Idem, ibid. p. 698.

(58) Idem, Epiſt. 75. ejuſdem Cent. p. 707.

(59) It appears from theſe two Letters of Lipſius, that Rouillard pleaded for a Baron, and carried the cauſe. I am apt to think, it was on this occaſion that Julian Peleus, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, wrote the treatiſe De ſolutione matrimonii ob defectum teſtium non apparentium. See the laſt break of this remark [F].

(60) Rouillard, Capitulaire, p. 39.

who will not be ſatisfied with what I urge in my own defenſe, are deſired to conſider that it would have been to no purpoſe to leave out of my ſecond edition the paſſages from Tagereau, for his book is by no means ſcarce, and is to be met with entire in an alphabetical compilation, and conſequently in a work which is very much like a Dictionary. Laurence Bouchel, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, has inſerted it at length in his Bibliotheque du Droit François (Bibliotheque of the French Law) in the letter S. under the word Separation (d). He is not blamed for adopting the whole book of Tagereau, why then ſhould I be cenſured for tranſcribing ſome paſſages from it? Is it becauſe men are more nice and ſcrupulous at this time, than they were in his? I ſhall anſwer that objection

(d) I have been acquainted with this by Monſ. Marais, Advocate of the Parliament of Paris.

(61) Rouillard, Capitulaire, p. 41.

" ty . . . . (61). As for the Congreſs, which that " Lady ſays ſhe refuſed out of ſhame ;

" Ah ſi cubitum locus exigit, omnibus illum
" Deliciis imple & ſit procul inde pudor.

" If the place invites you to lye down, fill it with all " manner of pleaſures, and let ſhame be baniſhed " from thence. For duelling is indeed prohibited by " the edicts, to prevent men from revenging themſelves with offenſive arms. But there is no law againſt a duel between man and wife, of which the " half ſweet and half ſour deeds tend only to reſtore " peace and love between them. However it be, in " the preſent caſe, it is bellum juſtum, as Livy ſaid, " quia neceſſarium, a juſt war, becauſe it is neceſſary : " neceſſity renders that lawful, which otherwiſe would

(62) Ibid. p. 43.

" be unlawful in itſelf . . . . (62). The Congreſs " is the moſt common and moſt certain trial that can " be made in ſuch a caſe, wherein an action of impotency is entered againſt a man, as Lucian obſerves in his Eunuch. Nec inimicum videri debet " probationis genus, quod ſolum eſt, ſaid Quintilian, in " his 7th declamation, i. e. That kind of trial muſt " not be thought unjuſt, which is the only one that can " be made. It is at leaſt admitted in the Biſhop's Courts in France, and the Parliament has allowed " it by ſeveral decrees, particularly by that of January the 20th, 1597, given againſt one, who being " ſued for want of teſticles, refuſed to ſubmit to the " Congreſs. . . .

(63) Ibid. p. 44.

(63) The greateſt precaution that " can be taken, is to come immediately to the actual trial. Nec enim de veritate dubitari poteſt, quoties " cum incertis experimenta conveniunt, æquumque eſt " non ſemper auribus ſed & oculis credere. i. e. When " experiments confirm what was uncertain before, the " truth of it can no longer be queſtioned : it is reaſonable not to truſt always to our ears, but alſo to our " eyes ; eſpecially when we are determined to it by " ſo great a good as peace is, which will much more " excuſe a lawful copulation, though performed publickly, than all the ſhameful actions done in the " dark, can palliate an unlawful divorce. Otherwiſe it would be abſurd, that in order to try a cauſe " of adultery, one ſhould admit the teſtimony of him " who ſhould depoſe that he had ſeen ἄῤῥεν ἐν ἄῤῥεσι, " that in order to prevent the ſuppoſition of a delivery, the civil laws ſhould permit the inſpection of " the woman's ſecret parts, and that they prove the " validity of a marriage, (which is a much more important affair) men ſhould diſlike to ſee impactum " Thyrſum horto in Cupidinis, The tree of love planted in " Cupid's garden."

Theſe reaſons, and many others which he urges, are not by a great deal ſo ſtrong as the arguments which Tagereau urges on the other ſide of the queſtion. I imagine, that if Rouillard had pleaded ſome months after for a woman, who out of modeſty refuſed to ſubmit to be ſearched, and to undergo the trial of the Congreſs, he would then have urged the maxims with Tagereau, and have effectually refuted himſelf. This is the fate of Lawyers : they are under a neceſſity to argue now after this manner, and then after another manner, according as they have different cauſes to plead (64), and obſerve, that for quite contrary ſubjects, they quote the ſame authorities. You have ſeen above (65), how Tagereau quotes the authority of St. Cyprian and St. Ambroſe againſt the practice of ſearching : and you ſhall ſee now how Rouillard quotes the ſame Authors to juſtify that practice (66). " Nor is it to any purpoſe for " his wife, who pretends too late to modeſty, where " it is no longer neceſſary, to urge that it would be a " ſhame for her to ſuffer her ſecret parts to be ſearched, " or to ſubmit to the congreſs ; for ſhe muſt now " undergo that ſhame, ſince ſhe is the cauſe of all " the evil.

" Quàm bene diſpoſitum terris ut dignus iniqui
" Fructus conſilii, primis authoribus inflet.

i. e. " How well is it ordered upon earth that the Au- " thors of a wicked deſign ſhould be the firſt that feel " the bad conſequences of it. Add to this, that in ſuch " a caſe it is cuſtomary to ſearch the woman, ſo that " it cannot be ſaid there is any fraud required in " what is agreeable to the common law. For we learn " from St. Cyprian in his Epiſtles, from St. Auguſtin, " and from St. Ambroſe, that in caſes of virgins being deflowered, recourſe is always had to the in- " ſpection of the parts : we even find in St. Cle- " ment Alex. 7. ſtrom. and in Suidas under the word " Jeſus, that the Virgin Mary ſuffered it, it being " ordered by the Sanhedrim of the High Prieſt that " ſhe ſhould be ſearched in order to know whether " or not ſhe had continued a virgin, and whether " our Lord, whom they deſigned to receive into " their Order, ſhould be matriculated in their re- " giſters, under the name of the ſon of Joſeph, or " under the name of the living God, and of a Virgin-mother. Chaſſaneé (67) gives a full account " of it in the fourth part, Catalogi gloriæ mundi, " diſtinct. 6." Rouillard has made uſe of an artifice of his trade. The Fathers whom he quotes condemn the practice of ſearching, they teſtify therefore that it was in uſe. He quotes them to prove it was in uſe, and omits the reſt. This is not fair : one muſt not thus cut an authority in two, and here we may very well apply the maxim of the Civilian Celſus. Incivile eſt niſi tota lege perſpecta, una aliqua particula ejus propoſita judicare vel reſpondere (68). i. e. " It is not well to judge and paſs ſentence upon " the producing of part only of a law without conſidering the whole."

(67) It is certain that Chaſſanée, p. m. 824, gives a large account of this : but obſerves that Clemens Alexandr. lib. 7. Strom. p. m. 756, does not mention the Sanhedrim, he ſays only, μετὰ τὸ τεκεῖν αὐτὴν μαιεύσαν, φασί τινες παρθένον ἀνηθῆναι. Some ſay, that after ſhe was delivered, ſhe was ſearched by Midwives, and found a virgin.

(68) Leg. incivile 24 D. de Legibus.

There is one thing in which both the Counſellors agree, namely in deploring and lamenting the multitude of ſuch actions of impotency entered againſt huſbands. " (69) Her relations . . . . had unjuſtly " . . . . prompted her to commence that ſuit for " diſſolving her marriage with him, becauſe of his " pretended impotency, and for ſome other facts " which are mere ſtories, and which ſhe had done " better to conceal

" quam protinus urbi
" Pandere res alta ſylvâ & caligine merſas.

(69) Rouillard, Capitulaire, p. 5 and 6.

" than to diſcover to an whole city ſuch things as " ought to be buried in darkneſs and oblivion. How- " ever the misfortune of the appellant is, that the " corruption of this age has given a full ſcope to " ſuch proceedings, dedit hanc contagio labem, & dabit " in plures. Whereas during twelve hundred years " that modeſty poſſeſſed the mind and covered the " face of the matrons of France, there have hardly " been ſo many trials of that kind, as there are at " this time, now they are become ſo frequent, that " there are daily ſome . . . . (70) The Appellant, " from a ſenſe of the misfortune of this age, in " which the women upon very ſlight pretences " divorce and part from their huſbands, will " only repreſent to you this complaint of Tertullian. Ubi eſt illa felicitas matrimoniorum qua per " ſexcentos ferme annos nulla repudium domus ſcripſit ? " at nunc in fœminis præ auro nullum eſt leve mem- " brum præ vino nullum eſt liberum oſculum, repu- " dium vero quaſi votum eſt, & matrimonii fructus. " i. e. Where is now that happineſs of matrimony,

(70) Ib. p. 46.

" which

(64) Compare what is obſerved above, remarks [B] and [C], of the art. ANTHONY (Mark) the Orator.

(65) In the rem. [A], num. 3.

(66) Rouillard, Capitulaire, p. 49.

(e) In the rem. [G].

(f) The Bibl. du Droit François, written by Bouchel, was reprinted at Paris in the year 1667. See the Journal des Savans, for May the 16th, 1667. p. m. 196.

jection in an explanation at the end of this work, and I obſerve here before hand, that I have given notice that the work I quoted was printed in the year 1612. Should men wonder, or take offence, becauſe the ſtyle of ſuch a work is now obſolete? I add that even at this time there are obſcenities in cauſes of that kind which are pleaded in a full Court [G], and that though the Judges be Divines, they do not reform it. They cannot do it, nor will they make any uſe of the obſervations of the Author, whom I have quoted (e). See the margin (f). To conclude, as the Epoch of thoſe practices, which have ſomething ſingular and extravagant in them, is a particular which the curious are glad to be acquainted with, I thought it would be of ſome uſe to ſet down here what the Authors tell us concerning the Epoch of the Congreſs [H].

QUETIF

" which during almoſt ſix hundred years was ſuch, that " no divorce was heard of? But now nothing pleaſes " in a woman but her gold, no kiſſes are ſo acceptable " as wine. A divorce is the wiſh of married people, and " as it were, the very deſign of matrimony. Which is " of moſt pernicious conſequence both to the pub- " lick, and to private perſons." Thus far Rouillard; compare this with what we have quoted above from Tagereau (71).

(71) Quot. (27).

If it be aſked to what purpoſe all theſe paſſages from Rouillard are here tranſcribed? I anſwer, 1. They prove that the moſt venerable Courts of Judicature have ſuffered the Lawyers to expreſs themſelves plainly upon obſcence ſubjects. 2. They ſhew how far the approbation of a great Critick (72) went, which I have given as an inſtance. 3. They confirm ſome of Tagereau's obſervations, or they ſerve to clear up that whole matter, by the oppoſition of the arguments, which are urged on both ſides. If it be replied that I have not the ſame right theſe Lawyers had, I ſhall reply in my turn, that it ought to be as lawful for me, as it is for the compilers of decrees and ſentences, to telate the arguments, which a Counſellor has urged. The very nature of my work, which contains a narration, and a critical commentary upon it, requires it. A compiler who would give at this time, either a diary of the hearings, or a Journal of the Court of Juſtice, and who begins his account with the celebrated cauſes, which were tried in the beginning of the XVIIth century, might very well give the ſubſtance of Roulliard's Capitulary, in the very words of that author. He would perhaps think it more proper to uſe a more modern ſtyle inſtead of the old French; but no man can juſtly blame thoſe, who quote for their vouchers the very words of the original authors, rather than a tranſlation. This is the method which I was determined to follow conſtantly.

(72) Juſtus Lipſius.

(73) Monſ. Marais, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.

Since this was printed a perſon of worth (73) has acquainted me with the following particulars; 1. That the Baron of Argenton married with Magdalen de la Chaſtre was the perſon for whom Roulliard publiſhed his Capitulary. We may know by this the ſenſe of theſe words of Juſtus Lipſius's letter to that Counſellor. (74) Quid autem ille Baro? te patrono vir erit, aut fiet? . . . . Unum tamen etiam quæro, vel te augure Cominæos (75) nobis radicula hæc propagabit? Cui tamen favere me fateor, ob ſacrum illud nobis nomen. Illius autem miſereor, quæ tua opera fortaſſe Tantali aliquo fato contabeſcet. i. e. " What ſhall I ſay " of tnat Baron? You being his Counſellor, he ſhall " be or become a man. I only beg leave to aſk " even of you as of an augur; Will that little " ſprout ever bring forth any young Commines? " For I confeſs, that for the ſake of that ſacred name, " I am concerned for him. But I pity her, who " will perhaps meet with the fate of Tantalus, and " pine away by the ſide of an unkind huſband." 2. That there is an edition of Roulliard's Capitulary which contains more than that, I have made uſe of. Mine is in 8vo, and has but 47 pages, the other is a large 12mo, and contains 139 pages. There is in page 139 a ſonnet made by the author, and in another page which is not numbered, we meet with the following Epigram, (74) Lipſius, Epiſt. 66. Centuriæ ad Germ. & Gallos, p. 698.

(75) All the world knows that Philip de Comines was Baron of Argenton.

Ad Lectorem.

Hæ ſi ſcripta putes parum ſeverè
Fruſtra te mihi præbeas ſeverum.
Nam quis ſchemate nî Thalaſſionis
Inumbrare queat Thalaſſionem?
Ergo quamlibet obſtrepente Momo
Fas ſit porrigier manu pudica
Quod ſolum datur auribus pudicis.

i. e. " If you think this is not wrote gravely enough, " yet if you be ſevere upon me it will be to no " purpoſe: for who can deſcribe the rites of " the nuptial bed, but with ſuch expreſſions as are " proper to repreſent them. Whatever therefore " Momus may ſay, let it be lawful for me to offer " with a chaſte hand, what is deſigned only for " chaſte ears."

[G] There are obſcenities in cauſes of that kind, which are pleaded in a full Court.] Here follows a paſſage from a letter written by Monſieur Bouſault to the Biſhop of Langres. " I have often wondered, that " you, who are our Lords the Prelates, ſhould ſuffer " the Judges of your Courts to be Prieſts, or that the " cauſes are not pleaded there privately, conſidering " the many free things that muſt be heard there, " which do generally degenerate into downright ob- " ſcenities. I never had the curioſity to go thither, " but I have heard ſo many different perſons ſpeak of " thoſe Courts, and what they have told me of them " appeared to me ſo free, that they are probably " Courts, from which all modeſty is baniſhed. I " want no other proof of it but the occaſion which " gave riſe to theſe lines.

" Dans une Officialité
" Ces jours paſſez une Soubrette
" Paſſablement belle & bien faite,
" Et d'une robuſte Santé;
" Avec la Bienſéance ayant fait plein divorce,
" Dit qu'un vieux Médecin l'avoit priſe par force,
" Qu'il falloit ou le pendre, ou qu'il fût ſon Mary:
" Et comment, dit le Juge, a-t-il pû vous y prendre?
" Vous éte, vigoureuſe, il falloit vous deffendre;
" L'avoir égratigné, dévisagé, meurtry:
" J'ay, Monſieur, luy répondit-elle,
" De la force quand je querelle:
" Mais je n'en ay point quand je ry.

" The ſenſe is; A certain chamber-maid, pretty hand- " ſome and very healthy and ſtrong, having loſt all ſenſe " of ſhame, complained the other day before the Biſhop's " Court, that an old Phyſician had raviſhed her by main " force, ſo that he muſt either be hanged, ſaid ſhe, or " marry me. How could he do it by main force, ſaid " the Judge; you are very ſtrong, you ought to have " defended yourſelf, you ſhould have ſcratched him, pulled " out his eyes, and diſfigured his face. Sir, replied the " maid, I have ſtrength enough when I quarrel, but " none at all when I laugh.

" Was not that maid really raviſhed by main force, " ſince ſhe was a laughing all the while (76)?" All that can be done is only to leſſen the exceſs; but whenever a cauſe of adultery, of impotency, of maintaining baſtards, of making a woman reparation for her loſt honour, it will be impoſſible for the Judges not to hear obſcenities. An Advocate of Paris (77) has bitterly exclaimed againſt the cuſtom which is ſtill tolerated in the Court of Juſtice of pleading during the Carnaval what they call the ſmutty cauſe. But if that abuſe was reformed, there would ſtill be many cauſes which differ from that only as more from leſs.

(76) Bourſault, Lettres nouvelles, p. 173, 174. Dutch edit.

(77) Named Martin Huſſon. See his book de Advocato, printed at Paris in the year 1666. It is mentioned in the Journal des Savans, for April the 15th, 1666. p. 178, of the Dutch edit.

[H] What the Authors tell us concerning the Epoch of the Congreſs.] We have ſeen above (78) when it was abrogated in the whole diſtrict of the juriſdiction of the

(78) Above, quotat. (24).

the Parliament of Paris. We may aſſert poſitively it was on the 18th of February 1677. But the epoch of its introduction is uncertain. Some authors ſay it is a practice, which began to be in uſe only towards the middle of the XVIth century, and that the ancients did not uſe it. We have refuted the Phyſician, who imagined, that the Emperor Juſtinian aboliſhed it. That Emperor " (79) in Code * de repudiis, declares that if a man and a woman have " lived two years together, without conſummating " the marriage (80), it muſt be diſſolved. In the " 22d novel (81) he prolongs the term of two years " to three, beginning from the day on which the " nuptials were celebrated. That novel adds a remarkable reaſon, which ſhews that nature ought " not to be forced by a trial not only ſhameful, but " ſometimes over-haſty, edocti namque ſumus ex iis quæ ante hoc provenerunt, quoſdam amplius quam biennium temporis non valentes, poſtea potentes oſtenſos miniſtrare filiorum procreationi. i. e. For we know from what has happened before, that ſome, who had been two years without being able to perform their part, have afterwards proved themſelves men by begetting children. This is all we meet with in the Civil Law, concerning the charge of impotency. The common law agrees in this reſpect with the civil law, and all its determinations upon this ſubject are confined within two different kinds . . . . . (82) However another kind of proof has alſo been made uſe of, namely the ſearching of the parts; it is allowed by ſeveral conſtitutions, and particularly in the chapter Literas de frigidis; but we muſt make two important reflections upon this. The firſt . . . . . The ſecond . . . . that if by ſearching the parts the marriage appear to have been conſummated, there is no occaſion to confirm it by any other proof. This is the deciſion of the gloſs on the chapter propoſuiſti de probationibus. And even as to that ſearching, the way of proceeding is as follows. The huſband is ſearched firſt; if he be found capable, they do not go any farther; the woman is ſilenced; and even againſt her own will they ſpare her modeſty, which the raſhneſs of her pretenſions had already but too much affected. But if after ſearching the huſband, there remain ſome doubts concerning his abilities, then the woman is ſearched, but only in caſe ſhe had not been married before. The Canon † requiſiſti goes farther ſtill; it enacts that if the ſearching of the huſband prove favourable to him, the marriage cannot be broke, though he himſelf ſhould confeſs his impotency . . . . . Theſe are all the proofs we meet with in the civil and canon law; in the civil law the Triennium, or three years time; in the canon law, the affirmation of the parties concerned, with that of ſeven of their relations, and at all extremity, the ſearching of their parts. The laws require no more than this: there is not the leaſt mention made of the Congreſs . . . . (83) The Congreſs . . . . owes no doubt its riſe to nothing but the raſhneſs of ſome young man, who having required it in the Court, the Judges ſurprized at the novelty of ſuch a requeſt imagined at firſt that it could not be refuſed. So that as one inſtance gives riſe to another, that bad practice of the Congreſs has been eſtabliſhed inſenſibly. Thus all the authors, who have handled this ſubject *, ſpeak of it, and among others Anthony Hotman, a celebrated advocate in the Parliament of Paris, towards the end of the laſt Century. He aſſerts, that when he wrote his work it was but forty years ſince that practice was eſtabliſhed. . . . . The writings of the Ancients afford us but two inſtances proper to ſupport it; and even thoſe inſtances are both equally ridiculous. The one is in Lucian, who relates, that one Bagoas being deſirous to be received in an aſſembly of Philoſophers, his manhood was called into queſtion; whereupon it was propoſed to try him that way. A propoſal anſwerable to the impudence, with which that Author ſo often charges the falſe Philoſophers. The other inſtance is to be met with in Petrus Ancharanus, upon the chapter Litteræ †, in which he relates, that a certain Officialof Venice being willing to try a man charged with impotency, had him ſhut up in a room with a common proſtitute, upon whoſe report he unmarried him. " Ancharanus has not ſaid that ſuch an example was " to be imitated; and indeed it has not been followed in his own country, nor in the other parts of " Italy, nor in Spain, nor in the Low-Countries. " The other nations admit nothing but the ſearching " of the parts in a cauſe of impotency, and we do " not find by the writings of their Civilians, that the " Congreſs was in uſe among them."

The chronological account, which is given us here, as though it were extracted from a book of Anthony Hotman, is there more general than it is reported. Here follows that Author's words (84). The argument which is urged to vindicate the Congreſs, grounded on the practice of former times, cannot be traced up higher than about thirty or thirty five years. And it is very probable, that it was introduced not ſo much by the order of the Judges, as by a reſolution of the parties, who of their own accord offered to ſubmit to that trial, in which caſe it is ſaid, nullas eſſe judicis partes, it is none of the Judges buſineſs. 1. Si convenerit. De jud. And that practice, (with ſubmiſſion to better advice) ought not to be made a cuſtom, to be publickly authoriſed: on the contrary, if it were tolerated formerly, it is better to reform it now, as has been done with regard to many affairs of the ſame kind. " As for the Congreſs, " ſays he in another place (85), which practice was " introduced about thirty five or forty years ago, tho' " at firſt ſight it ſeems proper to diſcover the truth " in caſe of the impotency of a man, and (if I may " ſay ſo) repair the error that may have been committed in the ſearching, which, perhaps, had not " been ordered ſo ſoon, had it not been for the Con " greſs that was to follow it, yet that practice being " ſeriouſly conſidered, and not with a prepoſſeſſed " mind, and without attention, will appear not only " indecent and even brutiſh, but alſo uſeleſs, on ac" count of the circumſtances which attend it, and " render the effect and execution of it impoſſible." The Author who ſpeaks thus died in the year 1696. But I do not know the true date of this work (86). I have only the Paris edition of it, printed in 1610. So that I cannot aſcertain the Epoch we are enquiring for. All I can ſay is, that if we admit the authority of that Writer, we cannot place it higher than the year 1540. You may have obſerved, that he maintains the ſame Theſis with Tagereau. He goes even farther than him with regard to obſcenities. So that we have here a new inſtance, and a very illuſtrious one too, of the liberty men have to expreſs themſelves in a ſmutty manner, when the ſubject they handle requires it; and when they endeavour to ſuppreſs a filthy abuſe, and very inconſiſtent with publick decency. Hotman is ſaid to have compoſed that work, in behalf of a relation of his, who had appealed from a ſentence by which a Congreſs was ordered (87), and who was caſt. Rouillard reproaches him with this in the edition in 12mo of his Capitulary. The Judges ought to have been blamed for the loſs of that cauſe, and not the Counſellor, who urged ſo many ſtrong arguments againſt that new practice, that he deſerved to have a ſentence given agreeable to his pleadings and demands. He did not forget to obſerve, that the proceedings in a Congreſs are the ſubject of numberleſs jokes and ſilly diſcourſes in all converſations. " The moſt prudent men have al" ways endeavoured to find out the mildeſt and leaſt " ſhameful remedy: whereas it ſeems, that at this " time, men make no account of the rules of honour, " modeſty, and decency, and have a mind to favour " a brutiſh impudence; and what is a greater ſhame " ſtill, in ſome ſuits the men have ſearched the wo" men, and women have been admitted to ſearch " the men; which has occaſioned ſo much banter " and raillery, that ſuch proceedings have afforded " matter for ſmutty ſtories, and merry jokes in many " places: whereas all that relates to law proceedings " ought to be treated ſeriouſly, with fear and reve" rence (88)." Among many other arguments he urges the following, namely (89), that it was never obſerved that the Viewers reported, mulierem fuiſſe carnaliter à viro cognitam at the Congreſs: it is ſaid indeed, that on one or two occaſions the woman cried out as though her huſband had hurt her very much, and that the by-ſtanders hearing this, adviſed the parties to agree and return together, which they did, and the woman

(79) Journal du Palais, 5th part, p. 23.

* L. 10.

(80) The words of the law are, ſi maritus coire minime propter naturalem imbecillitatem valeat.

(81) The Novel calls that agere quæ à natura viris data ſunt, and in Greek, πράττειν τὰ παρὰ τῆς φύσεως ἀνδράσι διδόμενα, to perform what nature gave man to perform. I have this obſervation from Monſieur Marais.

(82) Journal du Palais, 5th part. p. 24.

† Quæſt. 33.

(83) Journal du Palais, p. 25.

* Vincent Tagereau, Anthony Hotman, Peleus, Anne-Robert.

† In the Decretals de frigidis.

(84) Ant. Hotman, Traiſté premier de la diſſolution du mariage pour l'Impuiſſance & froideur de l'homme ou de la femme, p. 59.

(85) Idem, 2d Traiſté, p. 58.

(86) See the rem. [B] of the art. ROBERT.

(87) Journal du Palais, 5th part. p. 20.

(88) Ant. Hotman, Traiſté premier, p. 63.

(89) Ibid. au ſecond Traiſté, p. 63.

QUETIF (JAMES), a Pariſian, and Dominican Frier, was reputed a man of great learning. He publiſhed ſome books [A]; and had employed a great number of years in drawing up a Bibliotheque of the Writers of the Dominican Order, when he was ſnatched away by death, at Paris, in the Convent of the Reform, in St. Honore's Street, the ſecond of March 1698, aged fourſcore years (a).

(a) Extracted from a letter of Mr. Pinſſon des Rielles.

man never complained afterwards. Which is as much as to ſay, that the parties having agreed together after the action was entered, and they had been ſearched, they were adviſed to uſe that expedient, by which it might appear that the woman had not complained without reaſon, ſhe being ſtill a virgin, and reported to be ſuch, and that the huſband was not in the wrong to maintain that he was not frigid; thus the reputation of the woman's ſincerity was ſaved, and her report held to be true, and all parties were pleaſed. He does not condemn the ſearching leſs ſtrongly, than he does the Congreſs, though without mentioning the many occaſions in which the Edict of the Prætor de ventre inſpiciendo was infringed afterwards (90).

(93) Journal du Palais, 5th part. p. 20.

[A] He publiſhed ſome books.] Here follow the titles of them: Concilii Tridentini Canones, editio aucta, cui acceſſit Index accuratus Legatorum, Patrum, & Oratorum. Item Index Librorum prohibitorum, Paris 1666, in 12mo. Hieronymi Savonarolæ Epiſtolæ ſpirituales & aſceticæ ex Italico in Latinum verſæ. Item Vita Savonarolæ à Joanne Franciſco Pico, cum Notis. Compendium Revelationum Savonarolæ & Additiones quibus varia ad hanc vitam acta, epiſtolæ, diplomata, inſtrumenta publica, ſcriptorumque monumenta, apologiæ &c. referuntur (1), Paris 1674, three volumes in 12mo. Petri Morini Pariſienſis Opuſcula & Epiſtolæ primum editæ, Paris 1675, three volumes, in 12mo. See the ſelect Letters of Mr. Simon (2) concerning this Peter Morin, and this edition of his tracts.

(1) See Journal des Savans, of the 20th of January 1676, p. 23. Dutch edit.

(2) p. 241 & ſeq.

QUILLET (CLAUDIUS), a native of Chinon in Touraine, was a good Latin Poet in the 17th Century. I mentioned elſewhere (a) the reaſon which obliged him to retire into Italy. I add, in this place, that being in Rome, and "frequenting the houſe "of Marſhal d'Etrées, the French Embaſſador, he entered into that family in quality "of Secretary of the Embaſſy (b) [A]." I know not what it was that made him angry with Cardinal Mazarin; but it is certain that he ſpoke very unhandſomly of his eminence [B], in a Poem he publiſhed in 1655 (α). This Cardinal was no ways offended at the inſult; and was ſo eaſily ſatisfied with the Author's excuſes that he promiſed him an Abbey [C]. The Poem I am ſpeaking of contains ſome particulars, which have been ſtrongly cenſured by Baillet, in the ſtrongeſt terms [D]. Abbot Quillet wrote ſome other

(a) Rem. [E] of the art. GRANDIER.

(b) Sorberiana, p. 173, Dutch edit.

[A] He entred into that family in quality of Secretary of the Embaſſy.] "Mr. de Lionne concluded "with him for that employment, which Quillet "got; when de Lionne, for want of better employ-"ment, entred into the ſervice of Cardinal Mazarin, "after Quillet had refuſed to engage in it, who "made the worſt choice, as the event ſhewed; the "one of them dying without having raiſed himſelf "higher, whereas the other happily attained to the "moſt exalted employments in the State (1)." Theſe particulars are curious enough, but I cannot ſay whether they are exactly true.

(1) Sorberiana, under the word Quillet, p. m. 173.

[B] It is certain that he ſpoke very unhandſomely of his eminence.] The reader may ſee what he ſays againſt him, in the ſequel of the Menagiana (2).

(2) p. 131, 132, Dutch edit.

§ (α). The firſt edition of the Callipædia of Claudius Quillet was printed at Leyden in 1655, 4to; the ſecond at Paris in 1656, 8vo; the third in England in 1708, 8vo; and the fourth at Leipſic in 1709, 8vo, though the title ſays, Pariſiis apud Thomam Joly. The firſt edition bears the following title: Calvidii Læti Callipedia, ſive de pulchræ prolis habendæ ratione, Poema, Ludgd Batav. 1655, in 4to. And the laſt under the following title: Cl. Quilleti Callipædia, ſeu de pulchræ prolis habendæ ratione. Poema didacticon cum uno & altero ejuſdem Autoris carmine. Juxta exemplar excuſum Pariſiis, apud Thomam Joly, 1709, in 8vo. Coſtar greatly applauds this poem of Quillet, pag. 860, Letter 334, Tom. I. of his Letters, pag. 862, Letter 335 of the ſame tome, and pag. 598, Letter 250 of Tom. II. REM. CRIT.]

[C] Cardinal Mazarin . . . was ſo eaſily ſatisfied with the author's excuſes, that he promiſed him an Abbey.] This particular deſerves to be related at length, as we find it in the ſequel of the Menagiana (3). "Mr. Quillet's Callipædia, diſguiſed under the name "of Calvidius Lætus, is a very beautiful Latin poem. "Some diſguſt he entertained, prompted him to in-"troduce ſome verſes in it againſt Cardinal Mazarin "and his family. He got his work printed in Hol-"land. The Cardinal being informed of this, ſent "to ſpeak with Quillet; when, inſtead of ſhewing "any reſentment on that occaſion, he only complain-"ed, in the moſt gentle terms, for making ſo free "with his character, as he had done in that poem. "You are ſenſible, added he, that I have long had "an eſteem for you, and that, if I have not beſtow-"ed any marks of my favour on you, the reaſon is, "becauſe they have been extorted from me by a "parcel of importunate people with whom I am "perpetually ſurrounded; but I promiſe to collate "you to the firſt Abbey that ſhall be vacant. Quil-"let, ſtruck with the Cardinal's generoſity and good-"neſs, fell on his knees and begged his pardon, pro-"miſing to correct his poem in ſuch a manner as ſhould "give him ſatisfaction; beſeeching him at the ſame "time, to permit him to dedicate it to his eminence, "and the Cardinal conſented to it. Accordingly, "he printed that ſecond edition corrected, in 8vo, "at Paris in 1656, and dedicated it to the Cardi-"nal, who, a little before, had given him a conſi-"derable Abbey, which, however, death did not "permit him to enjoy long. The firſt edition of "this book, which is the ſcarceſt, is printed at "Leyden, in 4to, 1655; but that of Paris contains "more."

(3) p. 130, 131. See Coſtar's Letters, Tom. I. p. 176.

[D] The poem I am ſpeaking of contains ſome particulars, which have been ſtrongly cenſured by Baillet, in the ſtrongeſt terms.] Here follows what he ſays of it (4). "This Abbot, intending to teach men how "to get pretty children, has endeavoured to reduce "all the precepts of that new art into four books, "in Latin verſe, entitled Callipædia. Though he "does not inform the publick how he gained his "knowledge of ſo many rare particulars; it was "nevertheleſs obſerved, that, for an Abbot (5), he "knew more on this article than the moſt experi-"enced among the Laity, and that he was capable "of teaching even nature herſelf . . . . (6). It is "ſaid that ſome paſſages in it are finely touched; "but that it alſo contains ſome deſcriptions, concern-"ing procreation, which are abominable, and un-"worthy a man who has any ſenſe of modeſty; and "that he ſeems, every where, to glory in his hav-"ing read Petronius. For this reaſon we muſt con-"ſider, as mere compliments of civility, the elogi-"ums which Coſtar forms of Callipædia, in a letter "he wrote to the author (*)."

(4) Jugemens ſur les Poetes, art. 1511.

(5) According to the Menagiana, above, citat. (3), he was not an Abbot when he wrote that poem.

(6) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les poetes, art. 1511.

* It is the 250th Letter of Tom. 2. of Coſtar, p. 598, 599.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have read the Callipædia, printed at Paris in 1656 (7), the title of which runs thus: Cl. Quilleti Callipædia ſeu de pulchræ prolis habendæ ratione Poema didacticon. Cum uno & altero (8) ejuſdem Authoris carmine. The preface points out thoſe particulars, which were added to

(7) Mr. Bouhier has been ſo good as to ſend it me.

(8) Theſe two poems are an epiſtle ad Eudoxum, in hexameter verſe, and an elegy in obitum Petri Gaſſendi.

other works which were never publiſhed [E]. [He died in September 1661 *.]

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. p. 979. vol. 4.

to the Paris edition, which are more in number than thoſe that were ſuppreſſed. The verſification of this poem is very beautiful, and the author appears therein to have ſtudied Lucretius much more than Petronius. Thoſe were not miſtaken, who told Baillet that the author ſpeaks very plainly of what relates to procreation; but it is falſe to aſſert that this is unworthy a man, who has any ſenſe of modeſty; Abbot Quillet ſaying nothing but what is found in grave authors who have wrote on Phyſic. I cannot ſay whether he had any other tutors; but I am perſuaded we may learn, barely by the reading of the moſt ſerious writers, all the precepts laid down by him. He ſtyles himſelf Abbas Dudavillæus, at the end of the privilege; and Abbas D. S. in the dedication.

(9) In the catalogue of thoſe perſons who preſented him with books.

[E] He wrote ſome other works which were never publiſhed.] Abbot des Marolles having mentioned (9) the Poem entitled Callipædia, and ſome other Latin and French verſes which Quillet had made him a preſent of, goes on thus: He had wrote another long Latin poem, in twelve books, entitled Henriciados, in honour of King Henry IV; but I do not know whether this work, or his tranſlation of all Juvenal's Satyrs in French verſe, will ever be publiſhed; ſince editions of the fineſt poems by the ableſt writers muſt be paid for now; and thoſe which are printed, of which there are great numbers even in Latin, are ſcarce read. I ſhall not ſpecify them, which, were I to do, it would ſurprize my readers. I believe the following words of Coſtar relate to the Henriciad. "I am ſorry you have taken "from me the words convoiter (to covet) and convoi- "tiſe (coveting or deſire). For I would employ them "to very good purpoſe, to expreſs the paſſionate de- "ſire I have to read the ſequel of your divine La- "tin poem, the beginning of which you favoured "me with. If the remainder is equally beautiful, "it exceeds the beautiful Callipædia, as much as that "charming poem is ſuperior to all the compoſitions "written in this age. What an entertainment, Sir, "will it be for me, if you keep your word; and "bring me hither four thouſand as fine verſes as "thoſe I juſt now read (10)?"

(10) Coſtar, Letre à l'Abbé Quillet. It is the 250th, of Tom. 2. p. 598.

QUINTUS CURTIUS RUFUS, wrote a Hiſtory of Alexander. It is a beautiful work, and finely writ; and therefore it is not juſt to ſuppoſe it writ by ſome Author in the middle age [A]: but we may juſtly wonder that no one mentioned it before the 15th

[A] To ſuppoſe it wrote by ſome author in the middle age.] Here follows a paſſage from Guy Patin. "Are "you certain that Quintus Curtius lived under Tibe- "rius? ſome ſay it was under that of Auguſtus, from "the beauty of his Latin diction; and others under "Veſpaſian, with ſome appearance of reaſon. I for- "merly learnt of a maſter, who had a peculiar way of "thinking with regard to Quintus Curtius. He ſaid "that Quintus Curtius was only a romance; that the "Latin indeed was very beautiful, but that there were "a great number of geographical errors in it. . . . "This maſter uſed to tell us, that this book was writ "by a learned Italian, about three hundred years a- "go. That none of the ancients had cited Quintus "Curtius, and that it was a ſuppoſititious name. That "mention is there made of the river Indus, the Ganges, "and other parts of India, that were unknown to the "ancients who lived before Ptolemy, who is the firſt "and moſt ancient Author who mentioned China "under the word Sinæ. . . . . But this is a contro- "verſy, . . . which I hope will be cleared up in the "edition now printing in Holland, of the noble work "of the late Mr. Voſſius, on the Latin Hiſtorians "(1)." Some particulars in this paſſage ought juſtly to be criticiſed. I. It is falſe to aſſert, that the Indus, the Ganges, and other parts of India, were unknown before the age in which Ptolemy lived; for Strabo and Pliny, who lived, the one under Auguſtus, and the other under Veſpaſian, ſpeak of theſe two rivers; and Ptolemy lived under Marcus Aurelius. II. What kind of argument is the following? Quintus Curtius mentions ſome rivers, that were unknown to the ancients who lived before Ptolemy; conſequently this book was writ about the middle of the 14th century? Can it be denied, that at the very time in which Ptolemy flouriſhed, people might have ſpoke of the rivers and provinces mentioned by him? III. Since Quintus Curtius did not employ the word Sinæ, to ſignify China, there was no reaſon for obſerving, that no perſon had uſed that word before Ptolemy. I am to obſerve, that Patin's letter is dated the 15th of September, 1650; and that, in a letter dated the 14th of June of the ſame year, he ſpeaks as having read Voſſius's work; wherefore then does he mention it here as a book that was in the preſs? By the way, Guy Patin's Schoolmaſter is not miſtaken, when he affirms, that none of the ancients had cited Quintus Curtius. We cannot ſufficiently wonder at this ſilence, which is a moſt peculiar misfortune. The Hiſtorian in queſtion has this in common, with many others, that we neither know his age nor country; not to mention that his work has been mutilated and corrupted. But he perhaps is the only deſerving Author whom no one has quoted during ſo many ages (2). Acidalius was a little angry at it. Illa autem, ſays he

(1) Patin, Letter 44 p. 186, 187, Tom. 1.

(2) This is more than what I ſaid concerning PATERCULUS. (See the cloſe of the rem. [B], of the art. PHÆDRUS) and of QUINTUS CALABER, in his art. citat. (7).

(3), vix omnino quemquam calamitas extra Curtium afflixit, ut reliquorum ſcriptorum nemo mentionem ejus uſquam, vel uno verbo, certam dico mentionem, & indubitatam faciat, ad unum omnibus tacentibus, quaſi de compacto ut conſpiraſſe videantur ad ſupprimendum hominis nomen, ad famam prorſus opprimendam. In hoc quis non indoleat? quis non miretur, & indignetur? i. e. "Curtius was "almoſt the only Author, who has been ſo unfortu- "nate as ſcarce to be mentioned in a certain and un- "doubted manner, by a ſingle Author; all of them "being ſilent on that head, inſomuch that one "would be apt to conclude, they had all conſpired "together to ſuppreſs his name, and throw the deep- "eſt vail over his reputation. What man, who con- "ſiders this, is not ſtruck with grief, ſurprize and in- "dignation?" Father le Tellier is ſurprized at this ſilence; and takes it to be the reaſon why this Hiſtory was thought to be writ by a modern. Hic mirari cum Acidalio licet ſingulare Curtii fatum, quod ſcriptor Nobiliſſimus, & nihilo primis inferior, non ſolum communi illa temporum injuria duobus truncatus libris, aliis quoque locis mutilus, plurimis depravatus ad nos pervenerit: verum etiam, quod nulli forte præterea contigit, tam multis ætatibus ignotus latuerit, ſicut ante ſeculum à Chriſto nato decimum nemo omnium repertus ſit qui vel per tranſennam Curtii hiſtorici, ſcriptæve ab illo hiſtoriæ mentionem injecerit. Quæ res, opinor, nonnullos adduxit, ut ſuſpicarentur non genuinum Curtii ac vetuſtum, ſed ſuppoſititium recentioris cujuſquam ſcriptoris fœtum eſſe, qui poſt renatas litteras, felici veterum imitatione eximiam ſcribendi facultatem adeptus, opus hoc ſuum Romano ſub nomine prodire voluerit (4). i. e. "I here may wonder with "Acidalius, at the ſingular fate of Curtius, viz. that "this moſt noble writer, who was no ways inferior "to thoſe of the greateſt reputation, ſhould yet not "only be tranſmitted to us, (by the uſual inclemen- "cy of time) imperfect in two books, but be muti- "lated in other places, and corrupted in many; but "likewiſe, which poſſibly never happened to any o- "ther Author, that he ſhould lye concealed and un- "known, during ſo many centuries; ſo that, before "the tenth century from Chriſt's nativity, not a ſin- "gle Author is found, who makes the leaſt tranſient "mention of Quintus Curtius, or the Hiſtory written "by him. This circumſtance, I preſume, induc- "ed ſome perſons to ſuſpect, that we are not "poſſeſſed of Curtius's ancient and genuine work, "but only of the ſuppoſititious compoſition of a more "modern Writer, who, after the revival of litera- "ture, having acquired a beautiful manner of wri- "ting, by a happy imitation of the ancients, pub- "liſhed this piece of his under the name of a Ro- "man Author." We might infer from theſe words, that this Hiſtorian began to be cited in the 10th century, and yet this Dauphin Scholiaſt does not name

(3) Valens Acidalius, Animadv. ad lib. 4. Curtii.

(4) Michael le Tellier, in præfat. ad Quint. Curtium in uſum Delphini.

15th Century (a). We ought not to wonder ſo much at our meeting with incredible incidents in it, as that we do not find more. The Author was even ſo prudent, as to obviate the reproach, which he feared would be made to him, viz. of his being too credulous [B]. It would have been ſtill better, had he related fewer prodigies; and oftener obſerved that he did not believe all the particulars related by him. I obſerved elſewhere (b), that a King of Naples was cured by the peruſal of his book. We have a moſt beautiful verſion of his work (c). The learned Freinſhemius made very fine Commentaries on this Hiſtorian; he alſo wrote a Supplement, conſiſting of the two firſt books, and ſome other paſſages that are loſt. The Preface (d) of Father Michael le Tellier, the Jeſuit, ſhews, that we have greater reaſon to believe he lived under the Emperor Claudius, than under Veſpaſian. At the ſame time that I take notice of Moreri's errors, I ſhall have occaſion to mention ſome other things [C]. Cardinal du Perron

(a) See in the rem. [A] the words of Father la Tellier, and the reflections I make on them.

(b) Citat. (11), of the art. NAPLES (Alphonſus I. King of).

(c) By Vaugelas.

(d) Ad Qu. Curt. in uſum Delphini.

any perſon who ſpeaks of him before the 15th century; Anthony Panormita being the oldeſt Author produced by him, in the catalogue of the teſtimonies given in honour of Quintus Curtius. This catalogue is much more ample in Freinſhemius; and yet it does not ſpeak of one Author prior to Panormita (5). I know not why Abbé de la Roque, in his Journal des Savans, of the 18th of April, 1678, makes Father le Tellier ſay, that no Writer, before the middle of the 15th century, has ranked Quintus Curtius among the Hiſtorians (6). It is certain that this Jeſuit does not ſay the 15th century, but the 10th; I have cited his words (7). The argument he employs againſt thoſe, who are of opinion that this Hiſtory of Alexander was drawn up ſince the reſtoring of polite literature, is not convincing. He ſays that one Gaultier wrote a poem, entitled, Alexandreis, which very often conſiſts entirely of Quintus Curtius's words put into verſe, and that this Poet lived in the 12th century. Quorum conjecturam vel una refellit Gualteri Belgæ Alexandreis, jam inde uſque a duodecimo æræ Chriſtianæ ſeculo condita, ex unius ſæpe Curtii vocibus in verſum redactis (8). Could it not be anſwered, that a modern Author being deſirous of writing a Hiſtory of Alexander, and publiſhing it as a work of Quintus Curtius, made very great uſe of Gaultier's poem, and turned into proſe all ſuch parts of it as he pleaſed? With regard to myſelf, who cannot think that any learned man of the 15th century was capable to write Latin with ſo much beauty, and with that air of antiquity which we find in Quintus Curtius; theſe are reaſons ſufficient to perſuade me, that the Author of this Hiſtory was prior to Suetonius. I therefore approve thoſe who cenſure Angelus Decembrius, for having ſaid that Quintus Curtius borrowed many particulars from Arrian (9). I am ſenſible that Iſaac Pontanus, a man of great learning, very much approved the opinion of Decembrius, but he was not infallible. Nos quoque, ſays he (10), poſt Decembrium aliquot ad varios datis epiſtolis . . . idem adſtruximus ac demonſtravimus poſt ævum Trajani & Adriani claruiſſe, & Taciti inſuper maximi Authoris imitatorem eſſe, ejuſque non ſemel verba ac dictionem expreſſiſſe, & uſum ſubinde iis vocibus quæ non niſi ab authoribus ejus ævi uſurpantur. i. e. "I likewiſe, after Decembrius, have laid down and demonſtrated the "ſame thing, in ſome letters to various perſons, "viz. that he flouriſhed after the time of Trajan "and Adrian; particularly that he imitated that "great Author Tacitus, he ſometimes employing "his very words and phraſes; and alſo ſuch words "as were uſed only by the Authors of that age." This is affirming directly, that Quintus Curtius flouriſhed after the age of the Emperor Adrian; how comes it then that Pontanus, in two other letters (11), endeavours to ſhew, that the paſſage of this Author, which ſome apply to Auguſtus, and others to Claudius or Veſpaſian, ought to be underſtood of Trajan?

I will conclude this remark with a paſſage from Vigneul Marville. "Some criticks, ſays he (12), "imagine that the name Quintus Curtius was forged "by an Italian wit, who wrote this Hiſtory or Ro"mance about three hundred years ago. What proof "there is of this I know not; but a ſure circum"ſtance is, none of the ancients mention him. But "taking this for granted, it is ſurprizing that a man, "who wrote beautiful Latin, and who had compoſed "a book capable of immortalizing himſelf, had he "made himſelf known, ſhould have ſacrificed his glory "to an imaginary Quintus Curtius, who could not enjoy it. A learned man endeavoured formerly to "perſuade me, that the name of this Author, who "was an Italian, is latinized in that of Quintus Cur"tius. This might be ſo; but what man can ex"plain that emblem? It would be too late to attempt "it now."

(5) I am informed, by a letter of Mr. de la Croſe, of Berlin, that Johannes Sarisburienſis, in the 12th century, and Michael Scot, in Menſa Philoſophica, in the 13th century, cite Quintus Curtius.

(6) Abbé de la Roque, having ſpoke the words cited by me, and ſome other particulars, continues thus; Father le Tellier, after this remark, examines, &c. This proves that he aſcribes to him all he had ſaid before.

(7) I am to obſerve, that the Journal of Trevoux, for May 1705, p. 811. ſhews that there is a typographical error in the paſſage of Father le Tellier; and that we muſt read it thus; ante Seculum a Chriſto nato quintum decimum.

(8) Michael le Tellier, in præf. ad Q. Curtium.

(9) Græcorum & Arriani conſtat hiſtoria, ex quorum fontibus hic ſcriptor . . . opus ſuum excudit. Ang. Decembrius, de Politia Litteraria.

(10) Joh. Iſacius Pontanus, Epiſt. ad Wicquefortium. This is the 75th of thoſe publiſhed by Matthæus in Leyden in 1695.

(11) Written to Voſſius. Theſe are the 87th and 97th of the ſame collection of Matthæus.

(12) Vign. Marville, Mélanges, Tom. 2. p. 302, Dutch edit.

[B] He was even ſo prudent, as to obviate the reproach, which he feared would be made to him, viz. of his being too credulous.] I borrow this from la Mothe le Vayer's judgment on the principal Hiſtorians, pag. 204. Tom. III. of the 12th edition of his works. He ſays that Arrian is one of the moſt cautious Authors in relating ſurprizing particulars or prodigies; but that Quintus Curtius is more ſo. "We need no other "proof of this, than what they write concerning "one or two miraculous fountains which ſpring up "the inſtant Alexander had pitched his camp near "the river Oxus. Arrian ſays, that the one was of "oil, and the other of clear water, without ſuggeſt"ing to his reader's mind, the leaſt ſcruple with re"gard to the truth of ſuch a ſtory. Quintus Cur"tius *, who does not ſpeak of the fountain of oil, "relates that, as men were digging wells, a foun"tain was diſcovered in the King's tent; and that it "being late before it was perceived, a report was "ſpread that it was a new one; Alexander himſelf "being very deſirous of having it thought, that it "was owing to the favour of Heaven, and a gift "which God had beſtowed upon him (13). To ſhew "evidently the circumſpection, which this Author al"ways employed in treating of ſuch particulars as "might juſtly be ſuſpected, I will here tranſcribe "the words added by him to the relation he gives of "the dog in the Kingdom of Sophita, who ſuffered "himſelf to be cut to pieces rather than let go his "hold of a lion. Equidem, ſays he †, plura tranſcribo, quam credo. Nam nec affirmare ſuſtineo de quibus dubito, nec ſubducere quæ accepi. I indeed tranſcribe more particulars than I give credit too; for "I neither can affirm what I myſelf doubt of, nor "conceal what was told me by other people. We "muſt apply this paſſage to that paſſage in the ſame "book, where, when Ptolemy was ſick, a ſerpent "pointed out to Alexander, in his ſoundeſt ſleep, "the herb that would cure him. And indeed, when "an Author ſhews by ſuch cautions, that he does "not deſire to impoſe on the reader's credulity, he "may write any thing, as I before ſhewed in the "chapter on Livy."

* Lib. 7.

(13) Compare this with the remark [B] of the art. PHASELIS. Q. Curtius's words, lib. 7. cap. 10. num. 14. are remarkable. In ipſo tabernaculo regis conſpectus eſt fons, quem quia tarde notaverant ſubito extitiſſe finxerunt rexque ipſe credi voluit donum Dei id fuiſſe.

† Lib. 9.

[C] At the ſame time that I take notice of Moreri's errors, I ſhall have occaſion to mention ſome other things. I. He had no good reaſon for beſtowing on Quintus Curtius the title of Roman Knight; this title not being given to the Quintus Curtius, in Cicero, the Curtius Rufus in Tacitus, nor the Quintus Curtius Rufus of Suetonius, three men, one of whom, in the opinion of ſome learned perſons, was our Hiſtorian. II. The excellency of his ſtyle is no good reaſon for his doubting, whether he did not live before Livy; on the contrary, this very conſideration ſhould make one ſuppoſe that he was not prior to Livy, but his contemporary. It is more eaſy to meet with a harſh ſtyle, before Livy's time, than in the age in which he lived; for was it not the golden age of the Latin diction? III. Quintus Curtius does not make a digreſſion, in his tenth book, or elſewhere, with regard to the facility of the age he lived in; it ſhould have been on the felicity. I mention this only to ſhew Moreri's careleſſneſs; he copying, without the leaſt judgment, the very errors

Perron was too great an admirer of Quintus Curtius [D].

Nothing could contribute more to leſſen the prodigious eſteem which any man might have for him, than the remarks publiſhed by Mr. le Clerc, and entitled, Judicium de Quinto Curtio. Theſe are annexed to his work de Arte Critica, and prove demonſtratively, that this famous Hiſtorian had committed ſeveral great faults; his ignorance in Aſtronomy and Geography, his contradictions, his irregular deſcriptions, his ill taſte in the choice of matters, his negligence with regard to the dates in which events happened, &c. Moſt of theſe faults would be found in almoſt all the ancient Hiſtorians, was a perſon capable, or would give himſelf the trouble, to animadvert on them with ſeverity. I don't know whether it might not be obſerved, that the ignorance he has ſhewn in ſome particulars is a proof that he did not live in theſe latter ages; for a man of the 14th or 15th century, who had been capable of writing that Hiſtory of Alexander, muſt have had more talents than were neceſſary for compoſing it in the firſt century; he muſt have poſſeſt the moſt ſhining qualities, and grown old in ſtudy. Could he have been ignorant of what was univerſally known at that time, viz. that the moon is not eclipſed both when it is new and full (e)? Now this is one proof of Quintus Curtius's ignorance.

(e) Q. Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 10.

of the preſs. This had crept into La Mothe le Vayer (14), which he copied faithfully, though he might eaſily have perceived the correction that was wanting. IV. Suetonius does not ſay, that Quintus Curtius Rufus, a famous Rhetorician, lived under Tiberius. What he ſaid of this Rhetorician is not come down to us; we knowing that he has ſpoke of him, by a catalogue found in a manuſcript. Voſſius perhaps is not miſtaken, in conjecturing, from the age of thoſe who proceed and follow the Rhetorician, in the catalogue in queſtion, that he lived under Tiberius (15); but it does not follow that it is right to affirm, that Suetonius placed him under that Emperor. V. It ſhould not have been aſſerted, that the Q. Curtius Rufus of Suetonius, is the ſame Curtius Rufus mentioned by Tacitus (16). The Curtius of Tacitus was, a gladiator's ſon, and was raiſed to the Conſulate without ever having taught rhetoric (17). VI. Moreri had no reaſon to be ſurprized, that Quintilian, as he mentioned every Hiſtorian of any figure, in the tenth book of his Inſtitutions, written under Domitian, is entirely ſilent with regard to Quintus Curtius's Hiſtory. What is there ſaid of Quintilian is falſe; he ſpeaking of but four Hiſtorians at moſt; for which reaſon his ſilence is no manner of ſervice with regard to thoſe who alledge this as a proof, that Quintus Curtius had not publiſhed his book yet. Quod argumentum . . . . validius ſemper mihi viſum eſt, quam quod à Quintiliani ſilentio petunt adverſarii. Quaſi vero hiſtoricorum catalogum Fabius texuerit, qui quatuor admodum ex iis appellavit: ſuperſtites autem, in quibus eſſe potuit Curtius, conſulto prætermiſerit (18). VII. We likewiſe may conſider as a new error what is ſaid in the following words; which cannot (19) be accuſed, but by ſuppoſing that this work had not yet been publiſhed in his time. All theſe errors are in La Mothe le Vayer (20). VIII. Raderus did not write a Supplement, but Commentaries, on Quintus Curtius. I ſay nothing of the falſe citations (21). I ſhall obſerve occaſionally, that the Supplements of Chriſtopher Bruno were publiſhed in 1545. This Author taught the Belles Lettres in Munich, and dedicated his Quintus Curtius to the Duke of Bavaria. Poſſevin (22), and James Gourdon (23) affirm, that Quintianus Stoa had ſupplied whatever was wanting in Quintus Curtius, but Freinſhemius never ſaw that Supplement (24). Others affirm, that Quintianus Stoa never wrote any (25). I will add what Colomeſius obſerves with regard to the edition of Quintus Curtius, Lugduni apud Paulum Frellon, 1615 in 12mo. "This edition, ſays he (26), which is little known, "has this peculiar to it, that, beſides the common "Supplements aſcribed to Chriſtopher Bruno, a Ba"varian Monk; it contains others, copied from a "manuſcript in the library of St. Victor, by John "Maſſon, Archdeacon of Bayeux, brother to Papy"rius Maſſon, well known among the learned. Theſe "Supplements, the Author of which the two Maſſons "could not diſcover, were writ by Francis Petrarch, "if we may credit Scaliger in the ſecond Scaligerana. "In Bibliotheca S. Victoris, ſays he, primus liber Q. "Curtii erat, ſed deprehendi eſſe compoſitum à Petrarcha." I ſhall add farther, that Vaſſan wrote one day to Goldaſtus, that the firſt book of Quintus Curtius would be ſoon publiſhed. Eſt in manibus Pap. Maſſonii liber ille 1. Quinti Curtii hactenus deſideratus, quem ubi primum publicaverit tibi exhibebo (27).

(14) It is in my edit. in 12mo, of La Mothe le Vayer's works, Paris 1681. p. 197. Tom. 3.

(15) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 152.

(16) Tacit. Ann. lib. 11.

(17) Before he was raiſed to any high employment in the government, he was in the ſervice of the Governor of Africa. Tenuis adhuc & obſcurus obtinenti Africam comes hæſerat. Plin. Epiſt. 27. lib. 7.

(18) Michael le Tellier, in Præf. ad Q. Curt.

(19) i. e. Quintilian's ſilence.

(20) Tom. 3. of his works, p. 197, 198.

(21) Moreri cites Pliny's Epiſt. 7; but it ſhould be Epiſt. 27; and Voſſius, lib. 2; but it ſhould be lib. 1.

(22) In Bibl. Selecta.

(23) In Chronol. cap. 20. num. 31. apud Freinſh. Proleg. cap. 3.

(24) Freinſhem. ibid.

(25) La Mothe le Vayer, Oeuvres, Tom. 3. p. 199.

(26) Colomeſius, Bibl. choiſie, p. 184, 185.

(27) See Letter 31, of the collection of Letters written to Goldaſtus, publiſhed in 1688.

QUINTILIAN (MARCUS FABIUS), was a native of Calagurris, or Calahorra, in Spain (a). It is pretended that he was brought to Rome by Galba (b), but it is certain that he taught Rhetorick in that city with great reputation. He was the firſt who taught it there publickly, and at the expence of the Government (c); but he was diſcharged from that painful employment after having exerciſed it twenty years (d). He was ſo unhappy as to labour under many domeſtick afflictions, which had liked to have tired out his patience, and forced him to complain of the cruelty of his fate [A]. He regretted

(a) Aſſerat uſque licet Fabium Calagurris alumnum. Auſonius, in Profeſſorib. p. 145. That city now ſtands on the Ebro, and is now called Calahorra.

(b) Chronic. Euſebii, ſub Olymp. 211. p. m. 162. See rem. [E].

(c) Ibid. ſub Olymp. 216. p. 164.

(d) Poſt impetratam ſtudiis meis quietem quæ per viginti annos eruditis juvenibus impenderam. Quintil. Præf. lib. 1.

[A] He was ſo unhappy as to labour under a great many domeſtic afflictions . . . . . which forced him to complain of the cruelty of his fate.] He loſt his wife, who was but nineteen, and was inconſolable for her death. He beſtows the higheſt applauſe on her. Omni virtute quæ in fœminas cadit functa, inſanabilem attulit marito dolorem . . . . illi dolori quem ex matre optima atque laudem omnem ſupergreſſa, paucos ante menſes ceperam gratulor (1). She left him two ſons, one of whom died at five years old, and the other at ten, who was the oldeſt, and poſſeſſed extraordinary talents: beſides, fortune had already prepared his way

(1) Quintil. Præf. lib. 6. p. m. 267.

regretted particularly a ſon, aged ten years, who was ſnatched away by death, and was a child of extraordinary hopes (e). He did not only lay down rules for juſt ſpeaking, but exhibited his eloquence at the bar; pleaded for Queen Berenice in her preſence (f), and was judged to be ſo able a Lawyer, that his pleadings were writ down in order for their being ſold to the Bookſellers [B]. Some imagine that he was Conſul [C]; but it

(e) See the rem. [A].

(f) Quintil. Præf. lib. 4. cap. 1. p. m. 168.

way for attaining the higheſt dignities, a man who had been Conſul having adopted him; and another who was Prætor, and his uncle by the mother's ſide, would have made him his ſon-in-law. Tene conſulari nuper adoptione ad omnium ſpes bonorum patris admotum, te avunculo prætore generum deſtinatum, te omnium ſpe Atticæ eloquentiæ candidatum ſuperſtes parens tantum ad pœnas, amiſi? Quintilian's affliction was very great, at the ſight of ſo many loſſes; he would have left off writing, and have thrown into the fire all his compoſitions. He was afraid he ſhould be charged with being hard hearted, in caſe he ſhould employ, thence forward, his tongue in any thing, but in enveighing againſt Heaven. He did not omit ſaying, that there is a malicious and jealous Being, who does not ſuffer very promiſing children to be long lived. It will be neceſſary for me to quote his words, to ſhew, how great a looſe the wiſeſt of the Heathens gave to their impatience. Tunc igitur optimum fuit, infauſtum opus, & quicquid hoc eſt in me infelicium literarum, ſuper immaturum funus conſumpturis viſcera mea flammis injicere, neque hanc impiam vivacitatem novis inſuper curis fatigare. Quis enim mihi bonus parens ignoſcat, ſi ſtudere amplius poſſum? ac non oderit hanc animi mei firmitatem, ſi quis in me eſt alius uſus vocis, quàm ut incuſem deos, ſuperſtes omnium meorum? nullam terras deſpicere providentiam teſter? ſi non meo caſu, cui tamen nihil objici, niſi quòd vivam, poteſt: at illorum certè, quos utique immeritos mors acerba damnavit (2). . . . . Juro per mala mea, per infelicem conſcientiam, per illos manes numina doloris mei; has me in illo vidiſſe virtutes ingenii, non modò ad perſpiciendas diſciplinas, quo nihil præſtantius cognovi, plurima expertus, ſtudiique jam tum non coacti; (ſciunt præceptore) ſed probitatis, pietatis, humanitatis, liberalitatis; ut prorſus poſſit hinc eſſe tanti fulminis metus; quòd obſervatum ferè eſt, celerius occidere feſtinatam maturitatem; & eſſe neſcio quam, quæ ſpes tantas decerpat, invidiam; ne videlicet ultra quàm homini datum eſt, noſtra provehantur (3). i. e. "The beſt thing to have been "done then was, to have caſt into the fire, which "was to conſume my bowels, that impropitious "work, and all the unhappy learning I am maſter "of; nor any longer fatigue my impious long life "with new ſtudies. For what worthy parent will "forgive me, ſhould I be able to ſtudy any more? "And will not abhor the ſtrength of mind I poſſeſs, "if I ſhould make any other uſe of my voice, than "to exclaim againſt the Gods, for permitting me to "ſurvive my whole family, and to declare that no "providence preſides over mankind? If not on my "own account, to whom not a ſingle objection can be "made, except that I am ſtill living; yet certainly on account of thoſe, who, though ſo extremely "deſerving, were ſnatched away cruelly by an untimely death. . . . I ſwear by my calamities, by "my gloomy reflections, by thoſe ſhades the deities "of my affliction; that I perceived a vaſt genius "in him, not only for receiving inſtruction, in "which no one ſurpaſſed him; but alſo that he "likewiſe poſſeſſed the virtues of probity, piety, humanity, and liberality; ſo that the dread of this thunder-"ſtrokes might ariſe from the following obſervation, "that whatever comes ſuddenly to maturity as ſud-"denly decays; and that a certain envy blaſts ſuch "mighty hopes, leſt we ſhould go beyond thoſe "bounds which are preſcribed to man." However, he changed his mind with regard to his work; he continuing and completing it.

(2) Quintil. Præf. lib. 6. p. m. 267.

(3) Idem, ibid. p. 268.

[B] His pleadings were wrote down, in order for their being ſold to the bookſellers.] There were, at this time, certain perſons in Rome, who, by the help of ſhort-hand, would carry away an entire ſpeech, tho' the orator ſpoke ever ſo faſt. This art is now known and practiſed in England better than in any other country in the world. Thoſe who uſed to take the pains to write in this manner, all the ſpeeches they heard at the bar, did not do it always out of curioſity; they being ſometimes prompted by avarice, to procure valuable pleadings, in order to ſell them to the bookſellers. This ſometimes did a prejudice to authors; they finding that the writer had forgot ſome valuable particulars; by which means the works that appeared under their names were imperfect. This was Quintilian's caſe, as he himſelf informs us, after ſpeaking of a plea, which a youthful ambition had prompted him to communicate to the publick. Id eſt in cauſa Nævii Apruniani ſolum quæſitum, præcipitatane eſſet ab eo uxor; an ſe ipſa ſua ſponte jeciſſet. Quam actionem equidem ſolam in hoc tempus emiſeram, quod me ipſum feciſſe ſeductum juvenili cupiditate gloriæ fateor. Nam cæteræ, quæ ſub nomine meo feruntur, negligentia excipientium in quæſtum notariorum corruptæ, minimam partem mei habent (4). i. e. "The only "quære in the cauſe of Nævius Aprunianus was, "whether he threw his wife headlong, or whether "ſhe voluntarily caſt herſelf down. This is the only "pleading I have yet publiſhed, to which I will "own I was induced by a youthful thirſt after glo-"ry. For as to the reſt, which go under my name, "as they were corrupted by the negligence of the "writers, whoſe only view was gain, they contain "but very little of what I can call my own."

(4) Quintil. Inſt. lib. 7. cap. 11. p. m. 321, 322.

[C] Some imagine that he was Conſul.] They ground their ſuppoſition on the following words of Auſonius: Quintilianus conſularia per Clementem ornamenta ſortitus, honeſtamenta nominis potius videtur quam inſignia poteſtatis habuiſſe (5). i. e. "Quintilian hav-"ing obtained, through the favour of Clemens, the "conſular ornaments, ſeems to have poſſeſſed the "trappings or honour of the title rather than the "marks of the power." Vinetus, on this paſſage, ſays, that Marcus Arricinus Clemens, and Titus Flaccus Clemens, after having enjoyed, for ſome time, a great ſhare in Domitian's favour, loſt it afterwards to ſuch a degree, that he put them to death. He does not know which of the Clemens's procured Quintilian the honour mentioned by Auſonius; but he adds, that it was not the ordinary Conſulſhip, becauſe no mention is made of it in the Faſti. It therefore muſt have been only another Conſul's ſubſtitute (6). Vinetus might have grounded his conjectures on Flavius Clemens, as will be ſeen below. The abovementioned paſſage of Auſonius is confirmed by the following verſes of Juvenal:

(5) Auſon. in Gratiar. Actione, p. m. 712, 713.

(6) Vinet. in Auſon. p. 713.

Unde igitur tot
Quintilianus habet ſaltus? exempla novorum
Fatorum tranſi: felix, & pulcher, & acer,
Felix, & ſapiens, & nobilis, & generoſus
Appoſitam nigræ lunam ſubtexit alutæ:
Felix, orator quoque maximus, & jaculator,
Et ſi perfrixit, cantat bene: diſtat enim, quæ
Sidera te excipiant modo primos incipientem
Edere vagitus, & adhuc à matre rubentem.
Si fortuna volet, fies de rhetore conſul,
Si volet hæc eadem, fies de conſule rhetor (7).

(7) Juven. Sat. 7. ver. 188.

"From whence then comes Quintilian's vaſt
"eſtate?
"Becauſe he was the darling ſon of fate;
"And luck, in ſcorn of merit, made him great.
"Urge not th' example of one ſingle man,
"As rare as a white crow, or ſable ſwan.
"Quintilian's fate was to be counted wiſe,
"Rich, noble, fair, and in the ſtate to riſe:
"Good fortune grac'd his action, and his tongue;
"His colds became him, and when hoarſe he ſung.
"O, there's ſtrange difference, what planets ſhed
"Their influence on the new-born infant's head!
"'Tis fate that flings the dice; and as ſhe flings,
"Of Kings makes pedants, and of pedants Kings."

Mr. CHARLES DRYDEN.

We learn, at leaſt, from this paſſage, that Quintilian attained to riches and honours; but Juvenal inſinuit is more certain that he was Preceptor to the grandſons of Domitian's ſiſter [D]. It is not very certainly known, whether he was ſon or grandſon to the Orator mentioned by Seneca the Father [E]. Several Criticks aſcribe to this Orator the declamations publiſhed ates, that good fortune contributed to it, as much, or more, than merit. If the 32d epiſtle of the 6th book of Pliny, was wrote to our Quintilian, we have no room to believe, that Juvenal had reaſon to take notice of the wealth of this rhetoric-profeſſor. Pliny affirms, that the perſon he wrote to was not very rich (8). He does not think he is able to fit out his daughter in ſuch a manner as may be ſuitable to be married to a man of figure; for which reaſon he makes her a preſent of a handſome ſum of money, in order that ſhe may enter her huſband's houſe in an honourable manner (9). Cùm tamen ſit nuptura honeſtiſſimo viro, Nonio Celeri, cui ratio civilium officiorum neceſſitatem quandam nitoris imponit, debet ſecundum conditiones mariti, veſte, comitatu augeri: quibus non quidem augetur dignitas, ornatur tamen, & inſtruitur (10). i. e. "As ſhe is going to be married to a perſon of "eminence, Nonius Celer, who is obliged, on ac- "count of his employment, to make ſome figure, ſhe "ought to have clothes and attendance ſuitable to "her huſband's rank: for though theſe do not in- "hance a perſon's worth, they yet illuſtrate and ſet "it off." It might be objected, that the father of this young Lady was not our Quintilian; for one would have concluded, that Pliny would have taken ſome notice of the advantage he had had in being his pupil, and he wrote to his profeſſor. Farther, it might be ſaid, that Quintilian having loſt a wife and two ſons, repreſents himſelf as a perſon whom the Gods had deprived of his whole family (11). He even ſays that his wife died at nineteen years of age, after having brought him two ſons (12). Would he have wrote in this manner, if he alſo had a daughter by her? But theſe reaſons are no ways demonſtrative. Quintilian, perhaps, married again; and might have had the daughter, mentioned by Pliny, by his ſecond wife. His circumſtances might have been very much leſſened after the time that Juvenal wrote his 7th ſatyr. This Poet might even have conſidered him as very wealthy in compariſon of the other rhetoricians; and Pliny might have looked upon him as but in indifferent circumſtances, in proportion to the family in which the young Quintiliana was going to marry. I am to obſerve, that he was certainly one of Quintilian's pupils (13); but then he might write to him without mentioning that circumſtance.

(8) Te porro animo beatiſſimum modicum facultatibus ſcio. Plin. Epiſt. 32. lib. 6. p. m. 400.

(9) Tanquam parens alter puellæ noſtræ confero quinquaginta millia nummum. Idem, ibid.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Quintil. Præf. lib. 6. Inſt. Orat.

(12) Nondum expleto ætatis undeviceſimo anno duos enixa filios. Idem, ibid.

(13) Plin. Epiſt. 14 lib. 2. and Epiſt. 6. lib. 6.

[D] He was preceptor to the grandſons of Domitian's ſiſter.] He himſelf teſtifies this by the following paſſage: Cum mihi Domitianus Auguſtus ſororis ſuæ nepotum delegaverit curam, non ſatis honorem judiciorum cæleſtium intelligam, niſi ex hoc quoque oneris magnitudinem metiar (14). Moreri does not tranſlate this paſſage juſtly, when he ſays, that this Emperor committed to Quintilian's care, the education of his nephews. Barthius would have committed the ſame error, if, by the word nepotis, he did not underſtand grandſon, as he very probably does (15). He nevertheleſs is miſtaken: the writer who drew up the contents of the chapters in Quintilian, affirms that this rhetorician taught the ſons of Domitian's ſiſter. This is pretending to ſettle this matter, with regard to the pupils, better than Quintilian himſelf. But, (will it be objected to me) where ſhall we find theſe grandſons of Domitian's ſiſter? I anſwer, that it is very probable they were the two ſons of Flavius Clemens, couſin german to that Prince. From their infancy he had declared them, as it were, publickly for his ſucceſſors, giving one of them the name of Veſpaſian, and the other of Domitian (16). It is therefore probable that he gave them, for preceptor, the greateſt maſter who was in Rome at that time, I mean Quintilian. It will be objected to me, that Flavius Clemens was married to Domitian's ſiſter, and conſequently that his ſons were not the grandſons of that Emperor's ſiſter. Philoſtratus will be cited, who affirms that the wife of Flavius Clemens was Domitian's ſiſter (17). To this I anſwer, that Philoſtratus ought not to be ſo ſoon credited as Dión, who only ſays, that ſhe was this Prince's relation. Τὸν Φάβιον Κλήμεντα ὑπατεύοντα καίπερ ἀνεψιὸν ὄντα ᾗ γυναῖκα ᾗ αὐτὴν συγγενῆ ἑαυτῷ Φλαβίαν Δομιτίλλαν ἔχοντα καλίσφαξεν ὁ Δομιτιανός (18). i. e. "He put to death Fabius Cle- "mens the Conſul, though his couſin-german, and "the huſband of Flavia Domitilla, firſt couſin to Do- "mitian." Farther, I ſhall obſerve that Domitilla, Domitian's ſiſter, was not living when Flavius Clemens was put to death; and yet Philoſtratus affirms, that the wife of this Flavius was baniſhed after her huſband's death. He therefore is miſtaken, when he affirms that ſhe was Domitian's ſiſter. Suetonius informs us, that Flavia Domitilla brought her huſband Veſpaſian but three children, viz. Titus, Domitian and Domitilla; and that he loſt his wife and his daughter before he was Emperor (19). I ſuppoſe that Domitilla, Veſpaſian's daughter, left a daughter who was wife to Flavius Clemens. According to this ſuppoſition, the ſons of Flavius Clemens, pupils to Quintilian, are the grandſons of Domitian's ſiſter, a relation which Quintilian expreſsly gives them. There was a long interval enough, between Domitilla's death to the Empire of Domitian, to authorize me to aſſert, that Domitilla's grandſons were old enough to be Quintilian's pupils, in that reign; for I may very well be allowed to ſay, that Veſpaſian's daughter died long before he came to the empire, which was not till he was threeſcore. The inſcription Flavia Domitilla Imp. Cæſaris Neptis (20) ought to be underſtood, as Triſtan obſerves, not of a daughter of Veſpaſian, but of a daughter of Domitilla, ſiſter to Titus. In fine, I ſay that he who raiſed Quintilian to the conſular dignity was called Clemens. Now he beſtowed that honour on him, to reward Quintilian for teaching, as appears by the view Auſonius had in mentioning this particular. Conſequently either the father of Quintilian's pupils, or one of his pupils muſt have beſtowed that reward; whence I infer, that the pupils of this rhetorician were ſons to Flavius Clemens; and conſequently that this Flavius had married a daughter of Domitian's ſiſter. I am ſurprized that neither Caſaubon (21) nor Marcilius who criticiſed him (22), took notice of Philoſtratus's error. Both of them approve his ſaying, that the wife of Flavius Clemens was Veſpaſian's daughter, and that ſhe lived at the time that this Flavius was put to death. Now this is expreſly contradicted by Suetonius (23).

(14) Quintil. Præf. lib. 4. Inſt. Orat.

(15) Sic Domitianum adulatur Quintilianus curæ Nepotum ejus admotus. Barthius, in Statium, Tom. 3. p. 1592.

(16) Suet. in Domit. cap. 15.

(17) Ἐτυχε μὲν γαρ Κλήμεντα ἀπεκτονὼς . . . ᾧ τὴν ἀδελφὴν τὴν ἑαυτῷ ἐδέδωκει. Cum Clementem . . cui ſororem ſuam nuptum dederat occidiſſet. Philoſt. in Vita Apollonii, lib. 8.

(18) Xiphil. in Domitiano, p. m. 236.

(19) Suet. in Veſpaſ. cap. 3.

(20) It is in Gruterus, p. 355.

(21) Caſaub. in Suet. Domit. cap. 15.

(22) Theodor. Marcilius in Suet. ibid.

[E] It is not very certainly known, whether he was ſon or grandſon to the orator mentioned by Seneca the father.] This orator muſt have lived under Auguſtus, Seneca the father ſpeaking of him as a perſon then dead, and whoſe reputation was extinct (24). Now Quintilian was very young, when Domitius Afer, who died under Nero, was far advanced in years (25). It is therefore not very juſt to make him ſon to a man who flouriſhed under Auguſtus. It were better to ſay that he was his grandſon; but perhaps it might be objected, that he mentions his father as an orator (26), without once ſpeaking of his grandfather. Some good criticks (27) aſcribe neither to Quintilian's grandfather nor father the declamations publiſhed by Pithoeus. Thoſe pieces, ſay theſe, have not the caſt of the Auguſtan age; and it is no ways probable that the compoſitions of Quintilian, mentioned by Seneca, are come down to us; whilſt other works wrote in the ſame age, and much more finiſhed, are loſt. They obſerve that, according to Seneca, all Quintilian the orator's reputation died with him (28). If they conclude from thence, that he had not publiſhed any books, they argue wrong; how many authors are there all whoſe fame and glory die before them, or at leaſt at the ſame time with them? I muſt not omit this remark: Quintilian's father uſed to plead cauſes; he therefore lived in Rome, ſay ſome writers; wherefore then is it affirmed, in Euſebius's chronicle, that Galba brought Quintilian, from Spain, to Rome? Was it the cuſtom, for a man ſetled in Rome, to leave his children in one of the provinces? Tillemont (29) ſhews, that theſe are not convincing objections, but he nevertheleſs acknowledges the error in Euſebius's chronicle. He ſhews it is therein falſly aſſerted, that Galba carried Quintilian to Rome in the year 69; he ſhews it, I ſay, for

(23) In Veſpaſ. cap. 3.

(24) Seneca, Controv. lib. 5. in Præf.

(25) Domitio Afro quem adoleſcentulus ſenem colui. Quintil. lib. 5. cap. 7. p. 212.

(26) Idem, lib. 9. cap. 3. p. 432.

(27) See Faber's notes on Seneca's Controverſies, lib. 5. in Præf.

(28) Quorum fama cum ipſis extincta eſt. Seneca, ubi ſupra.

(29) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. 2. p. 873, 874. Bruſſel's edit.

lished by Ugolinus Parmenſis, and afterwards by Petrus Pithoeus [F]; but the Inſtitutiones Oratoriæ are univerſally allowed to be the production of our Quintilian. Poggius diſcovered the manuſcript of them in a manner that deſerves to be related [G]. It would have been of the utmoſt prejudice to the literary world, had Quintilian's works been loſt; he being an excellent Author; and it were to be wiſhed, that all perſons who ſet up for Authors, would, before they take up the pen for that purpoſe, read him very attentively. I am extremely ſorry that I did not know the importance of this advice, till it was too late. La Fontaine, who was ſo great a Judge of things of merit, had a prodigious eſteem for this Rhetorician. See, in his poſthumous works (g) the verſes, which he ſent to the Biſhop of Avranches, upon preſenting him with the tranſlation of Quintilian, by Horatio Toſcanella. Mr. Nicolle the Father, and Abbe de Pure, have given French for this reaſon; Quintilian heard Domitius Afer in Rome, who died in 59. Obſerve that Tillemont does not employ a good proof. He cites a paſſage which imports, not that Quintilian heard Domitius Afer plead, but that a particular pleading of that author was greatly eſteemed (30). He ſhould have quoted another paſſage (31). He will not have any ſtreſs laid on Martial's omiſſion, and I confeſs that it cannot be conſidered as a demonſtrative proof; but it is nevertheleſs a very ſtrong objection againſt thoſe who aſſert that Quintilian was a Spaniard. Martial took a great pleaſure in mentioning the illuſtrious men of Spain, and in obſerving that they were natives of the country. Now would he have forgot to obſerve the ſame thing with regard to a perſon of Quintilian's eminence? Would he have ſpoke in ſuch a manner as would have induced his readers to conclude that Quintilian was born in Rome, rather than perſuade them of the contrary?

(g) p. 52. Dutch edit.

Quintiliane vagæ moderator ſumme juventæ,
Gloria Romanæ Quintiliane togæ (32).

" Quintilian, chief director of our youth;
" The Roman gown's beſt ornament and grace."

I leave this to the reader's judgment; but I muſt obſerve, that this paſſage in Martial does not prove Quintilian to have been a native of Rome; and that thoſe, who concluded, from a paſſage in Trebellius Pollio, that he was a citizen of Rome (33), have reaſoned falſly. Fuit autem, viz. Poſthumius the younger, (quod ſolum memoratu dignum eſt) ita in declamationibus diſertus, ut ejus controverſiæ Quintiliano dicantur inſertæ, quem declamatorem Romani generis acutiſſimum, vel unius capitis lectio prima ſtatim fronte demonſtrat (34). i. e. " He was ſo eloquent an orator, (which is the " only circumſtance that deſerves to be remembered) " that his controverſies are ſaid to have been inſert- " ed in Quintilian, who, as inſtantly appears by the " reading of a ſingle chapter, was the moſt ſubtle " declaimer among the Romans." Theſe are Trebellius Pollio's words, which ſignify no more than this, that Quintilian was a Latin rhetorician. He is there mentioned in oppoſition, not to the writers of the provinces, but the Greeks (35).

[F] The declamations publiſhed by Ugolinus Parmenſis, and afterwards by Petrus Pithoeus.] He publiſhed only an hundred and thirty ſix. Peter Pithoeus, made a more correct edition of them in 1580, more correct, and enlarged by nine declamations never publiſhed till then. Voſſius obſerves this in one of his books (36); but in another, he makes no diſtinction (37) cujus declamationes CXLV à Tideo Ugolino primùm editas, ex veteri codice reſtituit P. Pythæus (38). Moreri has followed this guide in a paſſage where he ought to have forſaken him. By the way, I will not forget to obſerve, that Voſſius did wrong in not informing us at what time Ugolinus Parmenſis lived (39); and for not taking notice that Peter Ayrault publiſhed (40) Quintilian's declamations before they were publiſhed by Peter Pithoeus. He boaſts of this in his treatiſe on paternal power; Quintilian, ſays he (41), whom I firſt publiſhed, and the learned Pithœus afterwards.

[G] Poggius diſcovered the manuſcript of them, in a manner that deſerves to be related.] This was in the Abby of St. Gal, at the time of the holding the Council of Conſtance. The Quintilian which was then in Italy was horridly mutilated: Ita lacerum ita circumciſum, ut nulla forma, nullus habitus hominis in eo recognoſceretur. The reader will ſuppoſe that the publick was overjoyed to hear that Poggius had diſcovered the entire manuſcript. He gave immediate notice of it, but the letter was not printed; it being annexed to a manuſcript of Quintilian in the library of Milan, as we are informed by father Mabillon, who has given us the curious fragment of that letter. Fortuna quædam fuit, cum ſua, tum maxime noſtra, ut cum eſſemus Conſtantiæ otioſi, cupido inceſſerit viſendi ejus loci, quo ille recluſus tenebatur. Eſt autem monaſterium ſancti Galli, prope urbem hanc millibus paſſuum viginti. Itaque nonnulli animi laxandi, & ſimul perquirendorum librorum, quorum numerus maximus ibi eſſe dicebatur, gratia eo perreximus. Ibi inter confertiſſimam librorum copiam, quos longum eſſet recenſere, Quintilianum reperimus, adhuc ſalvum & incolumem, plenum tamen ſitu, & pulvere refertum. Erant enim in bibliotheca libri illi, non ut eorum dignitas poſtulabat, ſed in teterrimo quodam & obſcuro carcere, fundo ſcilicet unius turris, quo ne vita quidem damnati detruderentur. . . . . Reperimus præterea libros tres primos & dimidiatum quarti C. Valerii Flacci Argonauticῶν; & expoſitiones, tamquam thema quoddam, ſuper octo Ciceronis orationibus Q. Aſconii Pediani eloquentiſſimi viri, de quibus ipſe meminit Quintilianus. Hæc mea manu tranſcripſi, & quidem velociter, ut ea mitterem ad Leonardum Aretinum & Nicolaum Florentinum: qui cum à me hujus theſauri adinventionem cognoviſſent, multis à me verbis Quintilianum per ſuas litteras quam primum ad eos mitti contenderunt (42). i. e. " It was his godd fortune, but " eſpecially mine, that whilſt we were paſſing our " time unemployed in Conſtance, we were deſirous " of ſeeing the place in which he was immured. It " is the monaſtery of St. Gall, ſituated about twenty " miles from this city. Some of us went thither, " to unbend our minds, and ſearch for books, of " which we were told there were great numbers in " that place. There, among a vaſt heap of books, " to mention all which would be too tedious, we " found Quintilian quite ſafe and ſound, but muſty " and covered with duſt. For the books, which com- " poſed this library, were not ranged proportionably " to their merit, but depoſited in a filthy dark dun- " geon at the bottom of a tower, in which a crimi- " nal ſentenced to die would not be impriſoned. . . . " We there found alſo the three firſt books, and half " the fourth, of Valerius Flaccus's Argonauticks; and " Expoſitions on eight of Tully's Orations, by Q. " Aſconius Pedianus, a very eloquent man, who is " mentioned by Quintilian himſelf. I tranſcribed " theſe ſwiftly with my own hand, to tranſmit them " to Leonard Aretinus, and Nicholas Florentinus, " who hearing of the treaſure I had found, were " very urgent with me to ſend them Quintilian as " ſoon as poſſible." By the way, we need but read a letter of Petrarch (43) to know the very imperfect condition, in which Quintilian had always appeared till that time. One Gaſparinus Bergamenſis, who taught polite Literature in Milan, was greatly to be pitied; he taking vaſt pains about this maimed manuſcript, before a more perfect one was diſcovered (44). Here follows a miſtake of Varillas. " Poggio, ſays he " (45), had the good fortune to diſcover the Inſti- " tutions, and nineteen firſt declamations of Quinti- " tilian, as he was ſearching the ſhop of a German " grocer, who was going to make them waſte paper, " in order to wrap up goods in them (46); and thoſe " who know that this was the only copy extant, will " think themſelves eternally obliged to Poggio's " memory on that account." Mr. de Larroque has ſhewn, that it is a great miſtake to ſuppoſe there was but that copy extant of Quintilian. His words are as

(30) He quotes chap. 1. book 10. of Quintilian, where are theſe words; nobis pueris inſignes pro Voluſeno Catulo Domitii Afri, Criſpi Paſſieni, Decimi Lælii orationes ferebantur.

(31) That I cited in citation (25) above.

(32) Martial. Epigr. 90. lib. 2.

(33) Catanæus, in Plin. Epiſt. 14. lib. 2. p. m. 120, 121, is one of them.

(34) Trebellius Pollio, in Poſth. juniore, p. 260. Tom. 2. Hiſt. Aug. Script.

(35) As in the following words of Pliny, chap. 12. book 1. Rationem quidem defectus utriuſque (Solis ac Lunæ) primus Romani generis in vulgus extulit Sulpicius Gallus. . . . . Apud Græcos autem inveſtigavit primus omnium Thales.

(36) Voſſius, in Inſt. Orat. lib. 1. cap. 11. p. m. 198, 199.

(37) Idem, de Rhetorices natura, p. 105.

(38) It ſhould be Pithœus.

(39) He lived in the 15th century. Philelphus ſpeaks of him. See Reinſius, Epiſt. 63. ad Daumium, p. 167.

(40) At Paris in 1563.

(41) Ayrault, p. m. 271. See alſo his Diſſertat. de la nature & mutation des Loix, p. m. 189.

(42) Mabillon, in Muſeo Italico, Tom. 1. part. 1. p. 211.

(43) That which he wrote to Quintilian.

(44) Volaterran. lib. 21. p. m. 772, 773.

(45) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 163.

(46) P. Jovius, in Elogior. cap. 10. p. m. 30, ſays only, ita ut & ei quoque (Pogio) Quintiliannum in ſalſamentarii taberna reperſum debere fateamur. Paul Jovius is miſtaken, and Varillas ſtill more ſo; Quintilian being found in the abbey of St. Gal.

French verſions of it. The moſt correct edition of Quintilian is that of Mr. Obrecht [H]. The dialogue de cauſis corruptæ eloquentiæ is inſerted in this edition, as in all the reſt; though all Criticks do not think Quintilian to be Author of it, many aſcribing it to Tacitus, and it being commonly printed with the works of that Hiſtorian. It is certain that our Author had writ a book de cauſis corruptæ eloquentiæ (h). I am of opinion that it is loſt, and am perſuaded that it was as excellent, in proportion, as the compoſitions of that Author which are now extant. I have not yet given an account of every part of his merit; but muſt farther obſerve, that he appears to be a very honeſt man in his works, which likewiſe contain a great number of excellent moral inſtructions. He is blamed for being too laviſh of his applauſes on Domitian; and though he did this but tranſiently, and with great art and delicacy (i), yet the Criticks will not pardon this fault in him, which doubtleſs appears a very great one, to ſuch as have read the hiſtory of that wicked Prince. This article might have been a good one, could I have procured Dodwell's Annales Quintilianei (k); but, from a misfortune which I ſo often complain of, viz. my being in want of the moſt neceſſary books, I have not had an opportunity of conſulting that work.

(h) Quintil. Inſt. lib. 6. init. and lib. 8. in fin.

(i) Idem, ib. lib. 10. cap. 1.

(k) Printed at Oxford in 1698.

(47) That of the manuſcript which the German Grocer was going to tear to pieces.

(48) Larroque, Preface des Nouvelles Accuſations contre Mr. Varillas, folio * 4 verſo.

as follow: "How great ſoever this loſs had been "(47), it yet would not be irreparable; a fine ma- "nuſcript of this Roman Rhetorician, above five "hundred years old, and now in the Bodleian Li- "brary, would have compenſated the publick for "the loſs of the other; as well as ſeveral others of "conſiderable antiquity, which I was lately aſſured "by the learned Grævius, were found in Colen and "Berne. And had theſe happened to have fallen in- "to the hands of ſome mercileſs grocer, this loſs "might alſo have been repaired, there being ſeve- "ral of them in the library of his Gallic Majeſty. "If the catalogue I have ſeen is not erroneous, there "are fourteen or fifteen copies of it there (48)."

[H] The moſt correct edition of Quintilian is that of Mr. Obrecht.] It was publiſhed in two volumes in 4to, at Straſburg in 1698. This Editor has reſtored the text in ſeveral places, either by the aſſiſtance of manuſcripts, or his own conjectures (49). He did not follow the beaten road of Criticks, who inſert in their notes, or at the end of their works, the readings which they judge to be the beſt, and leave thoſe in the text which they look upon as correct: but this Author gives the text as he thinks it ought to be read. Mr. Salo gives this advice in 1665, to all editors of ancient Authors. See his Journal des Savans of May 16. 1665 (50).

(49) See Acta eruditor. for Dec. 1698. p. 546 & ſeq.

(50) p. m. 222.

QUINTIN (JOHN), Profeſſor of the Canon Law at Paris, in the 16th century, was born at Autun. He was a man both of learning and genius. He, at firſt, liked what were called the new opinions, (thoſe of the reformers) and declared his mind ſo freely, in that particular, in a ſpeech, that he drew ſuch a ſtorm upon himſelf, as obliged him to leave Poitiers [A]; but his faith, which was only temporary [B], was not proof againſt a long perſecution. He ſoon after accepted of a good benefice, to which he was collated ſoon after, among the Knights of Malta (a); and when he returned from that iſland, where he had been in the ſervice of the Grand-maſter, he was appointed Profeſſor of the Canon Law at Paris in 1536. The circumſtance for which he was moſt ſpoken of was the ſpeech he pronounced in the name of the Clergy, in the Aſſembly of the States of Orleans, in December 1560. He required, in the name of the Clergy, that thoſe who profeſſed the new opinions ſhould be proſecuted with the utmoſt ſeverity; a demand that would have been ſtill more ſurprizing, had it not been a thing frequently practiſed for many ages: but notwithſtanding that this blood-thirſty ſpirit had prevailed ſo long, people were very much ſurprized to hear a Miniſter promote ſuch an affair [C]. Quintin did not ſuppoſe, that the chief of the Proteſtants would exert themſelves

(a) Doujat. Præn. Canonic. lib. 5. cap. 8. p. 620.

[A] To leave Poitiers.] Preſident de la Place informs us of this in manner following. "Several "perſons, who heard the ſpeech of the ſaid Quintin, "were aſtoniſhed at it, not imagining he would "have delivered ſuch a one, becauſe he had been "formerly ſuſpected, nay perſecuted, on account of "his religion; and forced to leave the city of "Poitiers, for a ſpeech he had delivered in publick, "in a very different ſtrain from that ſpoken by "him then (1)." Beza ſays the ſame thing (2).

(1) La Place, de l'eſtat de la Religion & Republiq. lib. 4. folio 151 verſo.

(2) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Tom. 1. p. 436.

[B] His faith . . . . was only temporary.] Beza (3) ſpeaks as follows concerning him. "Some years "before another ſtudent named Quintin, a native "of Autun, had alſo entered the liſts; but having "been forced to retire, he was ſo far from perſever- "ing, that he, on the contrary, fell entirely off; "and at laſt being a famous Doctor of the Canon "Law in the Univerſity of Paris; and having ob- "tained a conſiderable benefice among the Knights "of Rhodes, he became a moſt violent perſecu- "tor." This Hiſtorian ſpeaks of ſeveral other perſons, whom he conſidered as people who had received the ſeed in ſtony ground (4), and among thorns: they had heard the word, and immediately received it with joy; but they had no root in themſelves; they were temporizers; ſo that tribulation or perſecution ariſing becauſe of the word, by and by they were offended; the care of this world, and the deceitfulneſs of riches, choaked the word, and made it unfruitful.

(3) Ibid. p. 63.

(4) St. Matt. xiii. 20.

[C] To hear a Miniſter promote ſuch an affair.] Quintin having demanded, that all the inhabitants of the Kingdom ſhould be obliged to turn Roman Catholicks; that the Non-chriſtians, i. e. the heretics, ſhould not be admitted into the converſation and ſociety of the Chriſtian Subjects (5); and that thenceforward, all Heretics ſhould be prohibited and forbid to trade in any merchandiſe, whether books or other goods (6), added the terrible words following (7). "And "therefore our requeſt is juſt, reaſonable, holy and "catholick, and grounded on the expreſs command "of God, who enjoins your Majeſty to grant it to "us; he repeating in different places and at various "times his ſaid command. He ſpeaks of the Ido- "laters and Gentiles eſtranged from the law; the "heretics among the Chriſtians are conſidered and re- "puted ſuch. The words of the ſaid law of God are "as follow: be ſure never to contract a friendſhip, to "aſſociate with, or marry among them. Suffer them "not to inhabit the earth: have not the leaſt com- "paſſion for them; beat them and kill them. And "now follows the reaſon of that command: leſt "they ſhould make thee ſin againſt me, if thou "ſhouldſt imbibe their opinions; which will occa- "ſion a ſcandal and offence that will raiſe my fury "againſt

(5) La Place, de l'eſtat de la Religion & Republ. folio 139 verſo.

(6) Ib. p. 140.

(7) Ib. p. 141.

themſelves with ſo much vigour in that aſſembly; much leſs did he foreſee that he ſhould be ſo extremely affected with the animadverſions that would be made on his ſpeech; had he foreſeen theſe things, he doubtleſs would have continued in Paris; and have choſe to explain ſome decretal to his pupils, rather than give leſſons of cruelty to his Sovereign, in preſence of the three Eſtates of the Kingdom. Admiral Chatillon made ſuch loud complaints againſt this ſpeech of Quintin [D], that the King and Queen-mother ſent for this Orator, in order to call him to an account for the things he had advanced. He anſwered, that he had only obeyed the orders and inſtructions of the body of men, whoſe ſpokeſman he had been. This anſwer did not give ſatisfaction (b); ſo that he was obliged to promiſe to declare, before the aſſembly of the States, that he did not intend to reflect in any manner on Admiral Chatillon, and was as good as his word. But that which gave him the greateſt pain was the jokes and criticiſms on his declamation, which were handed about [E]. This mortified him to a prodigious degree; and he took it ſo much to heart, that he fell ſick upon it, and died about the beginning of April 1561.

(b) Commentaires de l'etat de la Religion & Republ. lib. 4. fol. 152. Thuan. lib. 27.

He

" againſt thee; ſoon after which I ſhall deſtroy thee. " I beſeech both your Majeſties, if you love to preſerve your ſouls, and the ſceptre you ſway, take " warning by thoſe horrid and dreadful menaces. " This, may it pleaſe your Majeſty, is what your " Clergy of France propoſes and remonſtrates to you " with all imaginable ſimplicity, obedience, humility, ſubmiſſion, and correction, with regard to the " honour and ſervice of God in your Kingdom; and " for the extirpation and abolition of whatever is " contrary to it, viz. of ſects and hereſies: the " whole being amply and circumſtantially diſcuſſed " and handled in their memorial, to which we expect an anſwer." Quintin's whole ſpeech is inſerted in Preſident de la Place's Hiſtory. It is plain that the moſt humble and devout orators for the Clergy (8) propoſed the ſhedding of blood, in caſe it was neceſſary; ſince they reminded the King of the command and menace of Moſes: not to mention that Quintin had already declared very expreſsly, that his Majeſty being powerful, and armed with the ſword, ought to reſiſt heretics; for this end, and no other, God had put the ſword into his hand, that he might defend good men and puniſh the wicked, and that no one can deny but that a heretic is capitally wicked, and conſequently ought to be puniſhed capitally, and be ſubject to the ſword of the civil Magiſtrate (9),

(8) Quintin is made to ſpeak in this manner, in La Place, Comm. de l'eſtat de la Religion & Republ. fol. 139.

(9) Ibid. folio 134 verſo.

The Clergy of France behaved in a more artful manner an hundred and twenty five years after; for, in a ſpeech they made to the King ſome months before the repealing the edict of Nantes, they declared, that they did not deſire his Majeſty to employ his power, to extirpate heretics. This artifice, in the main, is no very deep one; and I do not know whether the too ingenuous openneſs of the year 1560, is not preferable to the diſſimulation employed in 1685. Read the following words of Mr. Claude (10). " Whilſt the thing was only preparing, the " real fomentors of the perſecution did not conceal " themſelves; but concealed the King as much as " poſſible . . . . . (11) When things were carried to " the laſt extremity, and open force, they then did " all that lay in their power to hide themſelves, and " revealed the King in open day light. Nothing " was then heard but ſuch words as theſe: The King " will have it ſo; the King has made it his buſineſs, " the King goes greater lengths than is agreeable to the " Clergy. By theſe two methods, they have had the " cunning to charge themſelves with only the leaſt " violent part of this perſecution; and to charge the " King with the moſt conſpicuouſly odious part of " it."

(10) Complaints of the Proteſtants, p. 130.

(11) Ib. p. 131.

[D] Admiral Chatillon made ſuch loud complaints againſt the ſpeech of Quintin.] He had been ſo plainly pointed at in ſome parts of this ſpeech, that every one fixed their eyes on him, not to mention that he had been deſcribed in a moſt offenſive manner; and plainly ſhewn, that a deſign was formed in order to load him with infamy, and deſtroy him. Here follows one of theſe paſſages (12). " Firſt, we beſeech " your Majeſty, that if any broacher of old hereſies, " already dead and buried, ſhould be ſo impious as " to attempt to introduce or revive any ſect already " condemned, (as are all thoſe in general of theſe " calamitous and ſeditious times) and in order to it " petition for a church, deſire leave to inhabit in " his Kingdom, (as ſome of your Provinces have lately very impudently done in their particular aſſemblies) that ſuch a petitioner, as a favourer of heretics, ſhall himſelf be looked upon and declared " a heretic; and as ſuch ſhall be proceeded againſt " in all the rigour of the conſtitutions canonical and " civil, that the evil may be taken away from among " us; ut auferatur malum de medio noſtri." Here follows another (13). " Gainas, Captain General of " both foot and horſe, under the Emperor Arcadius, " anno 410 or 412, conſpiring againſt his Sovereign's Crown, with a deſign to drive him from " the throne; to cloak his wicked deſign, and conceal " his treachery, found no better way for that purpoſe, " than to requeſt the liberty to have a Church apart in " Conſtantinople, in order to pray in (as he ſaid) and " ſing with his brethren, who were all heretics, " as are all thoſe who now ſue for Churches."

(12) La Plac. de l'etat de la Religion & Republ. fol. 135 verſo.

(13) Ib. p. 136 verſo.

[E] Jokes and criticiſms in his declamation . . . . . were handed about.] The Author of the Commentaries De ſtatu Religionis & Reipublicæ in Regno Galliæ, does not ſay poſitively, that theſe jokes and ſatyrs, which were poſted up in ſeveral places againſt Quintin, occaſioned his death; he makes an alternative between this and his remorſe of conſcience (14). Preſident de la Place and Varillas uſe no alternative; and the former does not ſuppreſs the reaſons, which were offered in juſtification of Quintin. His words are as follow. " Some obſerved, that ſuch perſons " as blamed him on that account, did not conſider " that his leſſon had been given him in writing; " which indeed he read all the time, without making " the leaſt motion or action, as is uſual with Orators; and that the chief Prelates, the Cardinals, " &c. were the witneſſes and comptrollers of what " he read. However, whether he was, or was not, " the Author of that piece, he died a few days after, " greatly afflicted to ſee ſo many pieces publiſhed " againſt him (15)." Let us now hear the other Hiſtorian. " The zealous Calviniſts, ſays he (16), did " not ſhew ſo much moderation; they publiſhing ſo " bloody a libel (againſt Quintin) divided into three " parts, the firſt of which contained the groſs ignorance, the ſecond the manifeſt calumnies, and the " third the malicious omiſſions in the ſpeech; that this " doctor, who was more ſtrongly affected than he ſhould " have been, took to his bed a little after he had " read this libel written againſt him, and never roſe " from it afterwards." Had Varillas given himſelf the trouble to read this libel, he would not have called it a bloody one: it is a little piece, of three pages, by way of remonſtrance to the Queen, which however was not preſented to her, and came but into few hands. The whole is inſerted in Beza's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (17), and has in no manner the air of a libel or ſatyr, but is rather a kind of inſtrument, exhibited before the Judges, in the uſual ſtyle and the common formalities. Little more is done than to mention the heads of the complaint; and the following words were added to the calumnies there ſpecified: We require theſe accuſations to be proved before us, being ready to ſubmit to puniſhment, upon condition that the accuſers, in caſe they cannot make out their allegations, ſhall be puniſhed, as the branding us with ſuch calumnies may juſtly merit. It is very probable, that the mortal affliction, with which this Author was ſeized, aroſe " from

(14) Paſſim vero in eum dicteria jactari, libellos affigi: ille denique palam irrideri: tandemque ſeu contumeliarum illarum impatiens, ſeu male geſtæ rei conſcientia in morbum delapſus, vitam cum morte commutavit. Folio 87.

(15) La Place, de l'eſtat de la Religion & Republ. folio 151 verſo.

(16) Varillas, Charles IX. Tom. 1. p. 18.

(17) Tom. 1. p. 437.

(c) This was John de Beaumont, a Dr. of Phyſick.

(d) See John de Launoi, De varia Ariſtotelis fortuna, cap. 13. p. m. 52. and the art. RAMUS, rem. [D].

He was buried at Paris, in the quire of the church of St. John de Lateran [F]. I ſhall mention the works publiſhed by him [G]. Peter Ramus made choice of him for one of the Judges in the diſputation he had with Govea in 1543; but Quintin, and the other Judge (c) choſen by Ramus, would not concern themſelves in that affair, when the deciſion was to be given (d).

(18) Sane ob id mordacibus libellis ac dicteriis petitus tantum dolorem cepit, ut contracto inde morbo paulo poſt deceſſerit, homo alioqui minime malus, ſed Decretalis Juris quam rerum agendarum peritia clarior, & qui ſerio de emendanda Eccleſia aliquando cogitaverat. Thuan. lib. 27.

from ſome other writings. Thuanus employs the plural number; and obſerves that Quintin, in other reſpects, was an honeſt man; and had formerly endeavoured, in good earneſt, at the reformation of the Church (18). There was no meddling with the Proteſtants at that time, they having too many able pens on their ſide. Here we find a man pine away and die, for declaring prepoſterouſly againſt them. Let us add him to the examples mentioned in the article HIPPONAX (19).

(19) Rem. [F].

[F] He was buried at Paris in the Quire of the Church of St. John of Lateran.] His epitaph is ſeen there, which is as follows (20).

(20) Vide Doujatii Præn. Canonic. lib. 5. cap. 8. p. 620.

Quintinus Doctor, librorumque Helluo ſummus,
Dum nulla dapis alterius tentatur orexi,
Dumque fidem pro qua calamo pugnavit & ore
Fortiter, affligi videt, acrius & dolet, ex hoc Orbe, invitis, non invitus, migrat amicis
Obiit nona Aprilis 1561.

" Quintin, devourer of whole loads of books,
" Still fond of them, no other food requir'd.
" When he the faith, for which he oft had fought
" With pen and voice, ſaw ſhaken and oppreſt,
" Grief ſeiz'd his ſoul, and willingly he left
" The world; his friends lamenting oft his loſs.
" He died the ninth of April 1561.

The reader will here take notice, that the Author of this Epitaph aſcribes Quintin's death to the ſorrow, with which he was ſeized to ſee the Church afflicted, whilſt others aſcribe it to the melancholy into which he was plunged, to ſee himſelf made a laughing-ſtock. This is a ſubterfuge which mock zealots have employed on all occaſions.

[G] The works publiſhed by him.] Melitæ Inſulæ deſcriptio, Tractatus de ventis, & nautica buxula ventorum indice. Scholia in Tertulliani librum de præſcriptionibus hæreticorum (21). Repetitæ Prælectiones Capituli de multa providentia, de præbendis & dignitatibus, & Cap. novit. de judiciis. The ſubject of the laſt mentioned work is the plurality of benefices, and the ariſtocracy of the Chriſtian Religion. Octoginta quinque Regulæ ſeu Canones Apoſtolorum, cum vetuſtis Joannis Monachi Zonaræ ſcholiis Latine modo verſis. Speculum Sacerdotii. Synodus Gangrenſis explicata commentariolis ex Gratiani diſtinctione trigeſima. Hæreticorum Catalogus & Hiſtoria ex Gratiano. He had made a Latin verſion of Syntagma Canonum Græcorum, written by Frier Matthew Blaſtares. This tranſlation, which is ſtill in manuſcript, is in the King's Library (22).

(21) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri.

(22) Doujatii Præn. Canonic. lib. 5. cap. 8.

QUINTUS CALABER, a Greek Poet, lived in the fifth century, if we may rely on the conjectures of ſome learned perſons [A]. He wrote a large ſupplement to the Iliad, in which a relation is given of the Trojan war, from the death of Hector to the deſtruction of Troy. Cardinal Beſſarion firſt made that poem known [B]. He met with it in St. Nicholas's church, near Otranto in Calabria, for which reaſon the Author was named Quintus Calaber. Others being more accurate, call him Quintus, or rather Cointus Smyrnæus, they ſuppoſing him a native of Smyrna. Thoſe who ſay that he taught youth in that city [C], ſeem to have no good foundation for it. The learned Reineſius

[A] He lived in the fifth century, if we may rely on the conjectures of ſome learned perſons.] Rhodomanus (1) aſſerts very juſtly, that he did not flouriſh before the mighty conqueſts atchieved by the Romans; he introducing Calchus the ſoothſayer, who foretells that Æneas ſhould reign in Italy; and leave poſterity in that country which ſhould extend his empire from eaſt to weſt.

(1) Laurent. Rhodomanus, in Præf. ad Cointum Smyrnæum.

Ἐκ τῶ δὲ γίνε͡ται μετόπισθεν ἀνάξειν,
Ἄχρις ἐπ' ἀντολίην τε καὶ ἀκάμαντον δύσιν ἔλθῃ.

——— Ejuſque exinde progenies regnet,
Donec ad ortum & occaſum inſuperabilem imperii fines extendat (2).

(2) Cointus Smyrnæus, lib. 13. ver. 340. p. m. 650.

Beſides, he mentions (3) the exerciſes of the Circus, as practiſed under the Roman Emperors. Hence we may be perſuaded that he did not live before the firſt Cæſars; but this circumſtance being too general to ſatisfy an inquiſitive mind, a more limited conjecture has been drawn from his ſtyle. Rhodomanus thinks that the characteriſtic of his muſe reſembles ſo much thoſe of Tryphiodorus, Coluthus, &c. that we muſt conclude they were all contemporaries (4). Character ipſe carminis γραμματικώτερον elaboratus oſtendit, eum Coluthi (qui ad quintum Chriſti nati ſeculum poema lepidiſſimum de Helenes raptu conſcripſit) aliorumque illa ætate vigentium, æqualem aut vicinum fuiſſe. Enimvero ſi dictionem Cointi, Coluthi, Tryphiodori, Muſæi, (illum dico, qui Leandri Heruſque amores cecinit) & Nonni, ad examen criticum vocâris, ſimillimam & ferè eandem ſermonis ideam ſtructuræque rationem deprehendes; unde ætate quoque propinquos inter ſe fuiſſe ratiocineris. i. e. " The elaborate characteriſtic of his muſe ſhews " that he was either contemporary with or lived near " the age of Coluthus (who wrote a moſt beautiful " poem on the rape of Helen, in the fifth century " after Chriſt) and with other authors who flouriſhed " at that time. For if we examine, in a critical " way, the diction of Cointus, Coluthus, Tryphiodo- " rus, Muſæus (the poet I mean who ſung the loves " of Hero and Leander) and Nonnus, we ſhall find " a very exact reſemblance between the caſt and " manner of his writing, and theirs; whence one " may juſtly infer, that they lived about the ſame " time." The circumſtance added by Rhodomanus, viz. that the name Cointus, derived from the Latin, ſeems to imply, that this Poet was made a Roman citizen, is a very trifling proof to confirm what he had ſaid before; for this Poet, though he had lived before Cicero, might have been made a citizen of Rome. Reineſius (5) has good reaſon to laugh at thoſe who declare that he lived under ſome of the Emperors of the family of Julia. They ground their opinion on the oracle of Calchas; and pretend, that Nero being the laſt of the family of the firſt Cæſar, the Poet muſt have lived, at fartheſt, under Nero's reign. This is an ill way of drawing conſequences! The Poets of this age might introduce Calchas making this prediction, though it is many Centuries ſince the Roman Empire was diſmembered. Cointus had no occaſion to conſider the Emperors, who declared themſelves the deſcendants of Æneas: it was ſufficient for his purpoſe, that the city founded by Romulus, who deſcended from Æneas, did rule, or had ruled, in the Eaſt and in the Weſt.

(3) Lib. 6.

(4) Rhodomanus, in Præf. ad Cointum Smyrn. folio †† verſo.

(5) Thom. Reineſius, Epiſt. 67. ad Rupert. p. 593.

[B] Cardinal Beſſarion firſt made this Poem known.] Here follows a paſſage from Conſtantine Laſcaris. Poeſis autem Homericiſſimi Quinti jam multo tempore omnibus ignota fuit, & tanquam extincta: ſed propius Beſſarion Nicæas Cardinalis Tuſculani, ille ſane quam bonus & vere doctus, & ut Homericè dixerim, ſimilis Deo vir, aliaque plurima in nos, & hanc ex Apulia cum ſervaſſet, volentibus tradidit, quam & ipſe olim deſiderabam (6). i. e. " The poem written by Quintus, an author " prodigiouſly like Homer, was, during a long courſe " of years, unknown, and extinct as it were; but " lately Cardinal Beſſarion that excellent, truly learn- " ed, and to uſe Homer's words, that godlike man, " having

(6) Conſtant. Laſcaris, in Grammatica, apud Lorenzo Craſſo, Iſtoria de' Poeti Greci, p. 436.

neſius pretends, that he is the ſame perſon with a Grammarian called Corintus [D], who publiſhed

" having preſerved many pieces for me, and particu" larly this in Apulia, delivered it to me, who had
" long deſired it of him." Very few writers have mentioned this poem (7). This ought to leſſen our ſurprize, that no one ſhould have mentioned Quintus Curtius during ſo many ages. The firſt edition of our Cointus is that of Aldus Manutius. It abounded with errors (8).

(7) Hujus præter unum atque alterum e Græcis, & quidem recentioribus, nemo in ſcriptis ſuis mentionem facit. Rhodom. in Præfat.

(8) Geſner, in Bibl. folio 575.

[C] That he taught youth in Smyrna.] Rodomanus argues as follows. Since our Cointus declares, that he fed the muſes ſheep in the beautiful garden of Smyrna, we muſt ſuppoſe that he taught a very famous ſchool on this Ionian coaſt. This was not a petty ſchool, he ſaying that his pupils were perſons of eminence; he therefore muſt have been one of thoſe profeſſors of philoſophy and eloquence called Sophiſts. This is the ſubſtance of Rhodomanus's argument; but here follows his own words at length. Ex indicio iſto, quod de ſe ipſe facit, Muſarum oves in liberali Smyrnæ horto ſe paviſſe teſtatus, ſcholam in Ioniæ littore iſto nec infrequentem nec incelebrem habuiſſe Poetam noſtrum, colligere eſt. Nec triviale magiſterium id fuiſſe apparet inde, quod oves ſuas, id eſt diſcipulos, nobiles ſeu fama illuſtres, (περίκλυτα) epitheto ſatis emphatico, appellat, unde ſi divinare licet, id tandem elicimus, Cointum fuiſſe ex profeſſione illorum, quos Sophiſtas, id eſt philoſophiæ & eloquentiæ magiſtros, Grammaticos, qui Poetarum interpretes erant, & juventutis ſcholaſticæ doctores; florens adhuc Græcia indigitabat. Quid enim aliud per Muſarum hortum & oves, præterquam ſcholam, & diſcipulos in ea doctrinæ & eloquentiæ ſtudiis addictos, intelligi exiſtimemus (9)? i. e. i. " From the account he " gives concerning himſelf, viz. that he had fed the " muſes ſheep in the fine garden of Smyrna, it may " be inferred, that our Poet had a large and renowned " ſchool, on that Ionian coaſt. And that it was not " a petty ſchool appears from the emphatical title
" (noble or illuſtrious) he beſtows on his ſheep, that " is, his ſcholars. If therefore I may be allowed to " gueſs, I would conclude, that Cointus was of the " profeſſion of thoſe perſons, who, when Greece was " in a flouriſhing ſtate, were called ſophiſts, that is,
" maſters who taught philoſophy and eloquence, and " Grammarians, who uſed to explain the Poets, and " taught youth: for what elſe can we think is meant,
" by the muſes garden and ſheep, than a ſchool,
" and pupils educated there in eloquence and philo-
" ſophy?" He had ſpoke as follows a little before (10): Cum tota ejus vita ignorantiæ tenebris involuta ſit, patria tamen ſola vindiciis inde aſſerta eſt. Nam libro XIV & hanc & vitæ quodam modo genus exprimit; ubi ſe Muſarum ovibus paſcendis Smyrnæ operam dediſſe profitetur. i. e. " Though we are quite igno" rant as to the particulars of his life, yet the place
" of his birth may be diſcovered; for in book XIV,
" he declares this, and, in ſome meaſure, the kind
" of life he led; he there affirming, that he ſpent
" his time at Smyrna, in feeding the muſes ſheep."
Here follows a ſurprizing inſtance of a wild imagination. I will firſt cite the Greek lines of Cointus. Theſe are not in the 14th book, as is affirmed by Rhodomanus, but in the 12th, and conſiſt of an invocation to the muſes, concerning the enumeration of thoſe, who had the courage to get into the wooden horſe.

(9) Rhodoman. in Præf. ad Cointum Smyrn. folio †† 2 verſo.

(10) Ibid. p. 2.

Τὰς μοι νῦν καθ' ἕκαστον ἀνειρομένῳ σάφα μῦσαι
Ἑσπετε, ὅσοι κατέβησαν ἴσω πολυχαιτέϊ ἵππῳ·
Ὑμεῖς γὰρ πᾶσαν μοι ἐνὶ φρεσὶ θήκατ' ἀοιδὴν,
Ἰλίῳ μοι ἀμφὶ ταφῇ κατασκίδνασθαι ἴλλον,
Σμύρνης ἐν δαπέδοισι περικλυτὰ μῆλα νέμοντι (11).

(11) Cointus Smyrn. lib. 12. ver. 302. p. 610.

" Ye muſes, clearly now relate to me,
" The Greeks, who entred the fam'd Trojan horſe:
" 'Twas ye who taught me ev'ry kind of verſe,
" Before the riſing down my chin o'erſpread,
" Whilſt I, in Smyrna's meads, fed tender ſheep."

It is plain this author ſays to the muſes, that they made him a Poet at a time, when, being yet beardleſs, he fed ſhep in the Smyrnean fields. Now can this ſignify that he taught youth; that his ſchool was famous, and his diſciples perſons of eminence? Is a beardleſs youth qualified to exerciſe ſuch a profeſſion? Is it poſſible that Rhodomanus ſhould have been ſo inattentive; he who ſpent many years upon that Poet; made a Latin tranſlation and an epitome of it in Greek and Latin verſe? Where had he ſeen Cointus boaſting, that he had fed the muſes ſheep (12)? What follows ſhews the indolence of another learned man. Nunc veriſimilius Smyrnæum nuncupant: quia ipſe lib. XIV. dicat, ſe περικλυτοῖς ſive illuſtribus Muſarum ovibus Smyrnæ paſcendis, operam dediſſe: ex quo ſi de patria haud certo colligitur, ſaltem videmus ſcholam non infrequentem præſtantium diſcipulorum habuiſſe Smyrnæ (13). i. e. " Now he is called, with greater
" probability, a Smyrnean; becauſe he himſelf ſays
" in book XIV, that he had been employed in feed-
" ing the illuſtrious ſheep of the muſes in Smyrna;
" from which circumſtance, if we cannot certainly
" diſcover the place of his birth; we, at leaſt, ſee,
" that he muſt have had a numerous ſchool of emi-
" nent pupils in Smyrna." Voſſius, without giving himſelf the trouble to look into Cointus, only followed Rhodomanus's preface: he copied from thence the falſe quotation of book 14, and the falſe commentary with regard to the muſes ſheep, with the whole conſequence which this tranſlator drew from it. He and other learned men are a thouſand times guilty of ſuch faults. I am ſurpriſed that Reineſius ſhould approve ſuch an explication of Cointus's verſes. He alſo is of opinion, that they inform us that our Poet taught ſchool in Smyrna. Convenit autem, ſays he (14), ut quod maximè, Grammatico, qualis fuit Corintus, ludimagiſtri officio fungi & docere pueros, quod noſter de ſe profitetur l. II (15), verſibus dulciſſimis: neque falſi ſunt viri docti, imprimis Parrhaſius, & diligentiſſimus ejus recenſitor ac interpres Laur. Rhodomanus, qui eos de inſtitutione ſcholaſtica apud Smyrnenſes interpretati ſunt. i. e. " It ſuits
" perfectly well with the character of a Grammarian,
" as Corintus was, to keep a ſchool, and inſtruct
" youth, which our Poet affirms he did, book II,
" in very delightful verſes; nor are learned men
" miſtaken, particularly Parrhaſius and his moſt ac" curate reviſer and commentator Laurence Rhodo-
" manus, who explain them as relating to his teach" ing ſchool among the Smyrneans." What he ſays in the following paſſage is better grounded, where he rejects the opinion of thoſe who affirm that Cointus meant nothing more in that paſſage, than to boaſt his following Homer. Dubitoque igitur quenquam ita ſimplicem eſſe, qui Smyrnæ oves paſcere idem eſſe ac Homerum ſequi, quem bona pars Smyrnæum cenſuit, credere velit, aut ita perſpicacem qui duo iſta eadem eſſe videre poſſit. Mihi quidem tam beato eſſe nondum contigit, & habeo pro violenta & à ſenſu Poetæ alieniſſima eam expoſitionem (16). i. e. " I therefore doubt
" very much whether any one can be ſo ſilly, as to " believe, the feeding ſheep at Smyrna, to be the ſame
" as following Homer, whom many think a Smyrnean;
" or ſo ſharp-ſighted, as to ſee thoſe two things to " be one and the ſame. I muſt confeſs that I was " never ſo fortunate; and cannot but conſider that " interpretation as forced, and quite wide of the " Poet's meaning." I myſelf am of opinion, that the whole myſtery is no more than an imitation of Heſiod. Read the following paſſage of le Fevre. Heſiod became a Poet as he was keeping ſheep; and I hope you will believe him, as he declares ſo himſelf. And thoſe, who have ſaid this ſince, affirm it wholly on the authority of the Poet, or as they were told it by the Bœotian ſhepherds, who looked upon that incident as ſo extraordinary, that they made a ſong on it, which is ſince loſt (17). Our Cointus, if I miſtake not, meant, that the muſes indulged him the ſame favour as they had done to Heſiod (18). By the way, it is without the leaſt ſhadow of reaſon that Volaterranus and ſome other authors declare him to be a Roman; and that Geſner (19) imagined Volaterranus does not hint at the ſame Poet, whoſe XIV books derelictorum ab Homero, were publiſhed by Aldus. The epitomizers of Geſner have not corrected this error; they having divided, after him, in two articles, the Quintus Poeta Romanus of Volaterranus, and the Quintus Calaber printed by Aldus.

(12) Se Muſarum ovibus paſcendis Smyrnæ operam dediſſe profiteretur. Rhod. in Præf. ad Cointum Smyrn. folio †† 2 verſo.

(13) Voſſius, de Poetis Græcis, p. 81.

(14) Thom. Reineſius, Epiſt. 67. ad Rupert. p. 593.

(15) It ſhould be lib. 12.

(16) Reineſius, Epiſt. 67. ad Rupert. p. 593.

(17) Le Fevre, Vie de Poetes Grecs, p. m. 10.

(18) Compare this with rem. [C] of the art. ÆSCHYLUS.

(19) In Bibl. fol. 575, where he cites Volaterranus's words.

[D] Reineſius pretends, that he is the ſame perſon with a Grammarian published a book concerning dialects. The beſt edition of the poem of Quintus Calaber, is that of Rhodomanus [E]. Some Criticks admire Cointus, whilſt others ſpeak very contemptuouſly of him. See the paſſages quoted by Lorenzo Craſſo (a); and Baillet's Judgments on the Poets (b). One Udenus Niſielus praiſes him for certain things, and cenſures him for ſome others. See his Progymnaſmata : it is an Italian work.

(a) Lorenzo Craſſo, Iſtoria de Poeti Græci, p. 436 & ſeq.

(b) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poetes, Tom. 2. num. 1195.

a Grammarian called Corintus.] Reineſius's words are as follow : Fuit Corintus Grammaticus, cujus libellum de dialectis ad ſtudioſum quendam juvenem ſcriptum habemus editum cum appendice H. Stephani, eumque citat Joh. Petrus Nunneſ. not. ad Phrynichum. Sylburg. ſpicil. ad Herod. Betuleius not. ad Lact. l. 1. c. 6. Joh. Talenton. l. 2. rer. recondit. c. 19. è cujus vero nomine κόριντ☉ amiſſa una literula vel prætervisa à primo deſcriptore exiit κοῖντ☉ (20). i. e. " Corintus " was a Grammarian, and his treatiſe concerning " dialects, addreſſed to ſome ſtudious youth, was pub- " liſhed, with an Appendix of Henry Stephens ; " and is quoted by John Peter Nunneſius in his notes " &c. by Betuleius and by Joh. Talentonus &c. Co- " rintus's true name was, through the omiſſion or " overſight of a ſingle letter by the firſt copiſt, " changed to Cointus." It muſt be owned that κόριντ☉ might eaſily have been changed into κοῖντος ; and that our author's poem ſeems to be very much in the caſt of a Grammarian (21). Reineſius proves this at large. He obſerves that Corintus the Grammarian lived after John Philoponus, in the VIth or 7th century ; and that he cannot be made later, ſince Tzetzes cited him (22). Fuit autem poſt Johann. Gramm. Alexandrinum, d. Philoponum, teſte ipſo in procem. l. de dial. inter mediæ ætatis Græcos ſeculo ſexto ſeptimove, quibus Græcia etſi à politia degeneraſſet plurimùm, viros tamen doctos & memorandos aliquos aluit. . . . . Pauci ſunt, quos nominare poſſumus iſtorum temporum : Johannes Stobæus, Georgius Piſides, Theophyl. Simocates, Thomas & Coprogenius Magiſtri, Euphronius, Moſchopulus, Chœroboſcus, Demetrius Triclinius, Georg. Syncellus, Euſtathius, & extremo octavi Photius, & qui ex ejus doctiſſimis epiſtolis noti ſunt : prioribus inter memoratos etiam adcenſeri debet Corintus iſte. Fuiſſe in æſtimio & non inferiorem tempore quàm determinavi inde apparet, quod laudantur à γραμματικωτάτῳ Tzetze in Chiliad. & comm. ad Lycophr. ubi de Machaone (23). i. e. " But he lived later than " John Philoponus, a Grammarian of Alexandria ; " he himſelf delaring in the preface to his dialects, " in the ſixth or ſeventh century, among the Greeks " of the middle age, at which time, though Greece " was greatly degenerated in politeneſs, it neverthe- " leſs gave birth to ſome learned and eminent men. " . . . Some few, of that age, whom we may enu- " merate, are John Stobæus, George Piſides, Theophyl. " Simocates, Thomas and Coprogenius, Magiſtri, Euphronius, " Moſchopulus, Chœroboſcus, Demetrius Triclinius, George " Syncellus, Euſtathius, and, in the cloſe of the eighth " century Photius ; and ſuch as were made known to " the world by his moſt learned epiſtles : that Co- " rintus ought alſo to be ranked among the firſt. " That they were eſteemed, and not later than the " period I mentioned, is evident from their being " applauded by that learned Grammarian Tzetzes in " Chiliad, and the commentary on Lycophron, where " he mentions Machaon."

(20) Reineſius, Epiſt. 67. ad Rupert. p. 591.

(21) Non autem niſi πρέσβυτα quendam Grammaticum & conſummatæ peritiæ literatorem iſta Paraleipomena ſcripſiſſe patet imprimis ex accurata & curioſa valde locorum deſcriptione, quæ diligentius multo enarrat, quam aliquis de vulgo Poeta faceret ; ut cum, &c. Reineſius, ibid.

(22) Tzetzes lived at the cloſe of the 12th century. See the preface of Nicholas Gerbelius on Tzetzes.

(23) Reineſius, Epiſt. 67. ad Rupert. p. 592.

[E] The beſt edition . . . is that of Rhodomanus.] I have not that of Hanaw 1604, mentioned in the Bodleian catalogue ; but have that of 1614, ex officina Aubriana. It contains all Rhodomanus's labours on that author ; and the notes of Claudius Dauſquejus in Quintum Calabrum, Tryphiodorum, & Coluthum. One Jodocus Valaræus made a proſe tranſlation of Cointus, which was printed at Lyons in 1541 (α). There is another tranſlation of Bernardinus Baldus.

§ (α). There is a preceding edition, in 12mo. Antwerp, apud Joannem Steelſium 1539. It is in the title editio prima ; and the dedication is dated the XIth of the calends of Auguſt of that year. REM. CRIT.]

QUIQUERAN (a) (PETER DE) Biſhop of Senez, in the 16th century, was ſon to Anthony de Quiqueran, Lord and Baron of Beaujeu (b) in Provence. He ſtudied Rhetorick and Poetry at Paris, under James Lewis Strebe, after which he went to Italy, and there applied himſelf very aſſiduouſly to the ſtudy of Muſick. Being returned to Paris, he applied himſelf to the Mathematicks ; and wrote, in Latin, a book in praiſe of Provence, his native country. Whilſt the impreſſion of it was carrying on, he died at Paris, the 18th of Auguſt, 1550, aged twenty-four years. His mother and ſiſter completed the impreſſion of this work (c). It is a ſmall folio volume, conſiſting of 89 leaves, printed at Paris by Lambert Dodu, in 1551. There were added to it an hundred Latin hexameter verſes, written by Quiqueran, on the arrival of Hannibal at Arles. There is a great deal of learning, and a conſiderable number of curious particulars in this Author's work, who doubtleſs, had Heaven indulged him a longer life, would have been one of the moſt learned men of his time. He merited the fine elogiums which are beſtowed on him in the epitaphs given hereunder [A]. Any perſon who conſiders that he had not attained

(a) Moſt Authors, who quote him, call him, falſely, Quinqueran or Quinqueranus.

(b) This is the reaſon why he ſirnames himſelf Bellojocanus.

(c) Extracted from the dedication to the book, entitled, de Laudibus Provinciæ, by Amandus Caſſius.

[A] The Epitaphs given hereunder.] I have tranſcribed them from the antiquities of Paris, collected by Corrozet. In another chapel of the Church belonging to the Auſtin Friers in Paris, in the nave, is the effigies of a Biſhop on his knees, fixed on high ; and, underneath, two epitaphs, between which, on the ſide of the baſe, is raiſed, in mezzo relievo, an image of fame, ſitting on a globe, and leaning on a lute ; in one hand ſhe holds a trumpet ; and under her feet are books ; round her is a ſphere, a compaſs, and other inſtruments of the liberal arts. The firſt epitaph is in gold letters.

Epitaphium domini Petri Quiquerani Epiſcopi Senecenſis.

Dum Juvenilis honos, prima lanugine malas
Veſtit, & in calido pectore fervet amor,
Me rapuit, que cuncta rapit, mors invida doctis :
Hei mihi, cur vitæ tam brevis hora fuit
Cur brevis hora fuit ? rerum ſic volvitur ordo,
Alternatque ſuas tempus & hora vices.
Si fera longævæ tribuiſſent fata ſenectæ
Tempora, venturis poma dediſſet ager.
Flos periit, periere ſimul cum cortice fructus,
Aridáque ante ſuos poma fuere dies.
Nemo tamen lacrymis nec triſtia funera fletu
Fœdet, cur ? volito docta per ora virum.

The Epitaph on Peter Quiqueran, Biſhop of Senez.

" In youth's gay bloom, whilſt love inſpir'd my breaſt,
" Death, that grim tyrant, tyrant to the learn'd,
" Tore me from life ; alas ! why ſnatch'd ſo ſoon !
" Why ſnatch'd ſo ſoon ! but ſo the fates decreed.
" Had Heav'n indulg'd me a long courſe of years,
" A fruitful crop I then ſhould have produc'd.
" But oh ! the flower and fruit are wither'd both,
" And the fair tree which gave thoſe beauties birth.
" Yet, let none mourn for me, or weep my fate,
" Since my far ſpreading name can never die"

The

attained to the age fitted for discharging the episcopal functions, will not be surprized that the particulars he relates concerning some of his amusements or diversions, shew him to have little practised the duties of a Bishop [B]. A very pernicious custom prevailed at that time, viz. the bestowing Bishopricks on children.

The other Epitaph.

Hic jacet nobilis vir reverendus in Christo pater dominus Petrus Quiqueranus Episcopus Senecensis filius domini Anthonii Quiquerani equitis & Baronis Bellojocani illustrissimi in Provincia : cujus libri tres de Laudibus Provinciæ extant disciplinarum ac rerum cognitione efflorescentes, obiit anno domini 1550 Kalen. Septembris 15 annos natus 24 (1). i. e. "Here lyes the noble and reverend Father in God Peter Quiqueran, Bishop of Senez, son to Anthony Quiqueran, Knight and Baron of Beaujeu in Provence; whose three books are extant in praise of Provence, and they abound with knowledge and learning. He died in 1550, the 15th of the calends of September (Aug. 18.) aged twenty four years." Peter de St. Romuald (2) was very much in the wrong to quote the first of these epitaphs as declaring, that Quiqueran . . . . . was a great Orator, a great Poet, and a great Divine. It is plain the epitaph does not say this. This Author observes, that he died, as it is thought, before he was consecrated.

(1) Antiquitez de Paris, par Gilles Corrozet, folio 89. Paris edit. 1586. 8vo.

(2) In his Journal Chronologique, Tom. 2. p. 183. under the 17th of August. He should have fixed Quiqueran's death at the 18th, and not the 17th.

[B] Some of his amusements or diversions shew him to have little practised the duties of a Bishop.] The trophies about his monument suit infinitely better a man who was passionately fond of the polite arts, than to a Bishop; but the reading of the book De Laudibus Provinciæ, will shew, that our Bishop of Senez employed himself in things quite different from the Government of a Diocess. He did not study the diseases of the soul, and the remedies proper for healing them. His curiosity prompted him to search into the properties of plants, minerals, and animals. He kept a great number of beasts, was a great sportsman, and took vast delight in cock-fighting. Camerarius cites him often (3); but it is only about such things as these. He quotes particularly the passage in which the Author confesses that his amusements or employments were condemned. "John Pierius Valerianus * relates, that the most courageous cocks are in the island of Rhodes; and says that he himself had seen the proofs of this, in some which had been brought from thence to Rome, where some were of a prodigious size, and surprizingly brave. Peter Quinqueran confirms this, he saying †, a cock, brought from Rhodes, was presented to me, and I paid a great price for it. Though he was but six months old, he yet was so courageous, and fond of fighting, that any dog who ventured into my court-yard, was sure to be furiously set upon: as to such common cocks as ventured near him, he killed them all. I myself used to be highly delighted with making him fight with a large Turkey-cock I had, as weighty as a fat sheep. Turkey cocks are extremely cholerick, and raise themselves haughtily, as is evident from their swelling necks, and the noise they make; though otherwise their voice is plaintive or whining, and ridiculous. As to my Rhodian game-cock, after having fought a numberless multitude of battles he fell sick; and though all the methods possible were tried to recover him, died; whereof the history of the preceding battles, as well as those of others, gave me sufficient warning. But reading the diversions of this kind practised by the Delians, Athenians, Greeks, Asiaticks, even the Roman Emperors, and by the various nations of Italy, where people used to stake all they had in the world, that such and such a cock would be victorious in battle; I also was desirous of tasting this pleasure. Neither the judgment of the ancients, nor my own inclination, deceived me; and I have frequently viewed such battles with pleasure; on which account certain enemies, whom I had formerly disgusted, not knowing on which side to attack me, took occasion, as often as they could, to say that I took a pleasure in cock-fighting. They one day carried matters so far, that crowds of men, women, and children, and old men, ran to my episcopal palace, and afterwards gave out that I was too much addicted to those sports. Do you ask whether I disdained or laughed at their folly? I really know not what reply to make. I probably should have acquiesced in their judgment, had I not known that they themselves have none at all (4)."

(3) In Tom. 2. of his Historical Meditations. See there the pages marked in the index of the Authors cited under the word Peter Quinqueran, in the French translation of Simon Goulart.

* In his Hieroglyph.

† Book 2. Of the Praises of Provence.

I am to observe, that Quiqueran does not say in his Latin original, that people flocked to his episcopal palace. His words are as follow: Tandem viri, fœminæ, juvenesque, senesque certatim exiliunt, proclamant, in libellis proscribunt me studiosiorem gallinaceæ pugnæ (5). Camerarius has corrected some typographical errors that were in the original, but those who printed from him have made others more considerable (6). Simon Goulart's translation is not always just, which those will soon find, who compare, with his version, the following words of Quiqueran: Mox paulo nequicquam tentatis omnifariis remediis perierit, ejus solatii ex Gallorum pugnis, historia me admonuerat. Quippe eas cùm legerem quàm frequenter celebrassent Delii, quàm Athenienses . . . . decrevi ego quoque ejus voluptatis particeps fieri. Goulart supposes that the Author's meaning is, that the History of the preceding battles of the cocks, and those of others, had sufficiently warned him, that his Rhodian cock would be sick, and could not be cured by any remedy; but that nevertheless the reading of the diversions of the ancients had excited him to taste the same pleasure. Now this sense is false, and partly absurd. Quiqueran says only this, that History had informed him of the pleasure, which people may taste in cock-fighting.

(4) Camerarius, Meditations historiques, Tom. 2. liv. 5. chap. 9. p. 365, 366. according to the French translat. of Simon Goulart, Lions edit. 1610.

(5) Quiqueranus, de Laudibus Provinciæ, lib. 2. folio 39.

(6) In the Frankfort edit. of 1658.

Custom might, in some measure, excuse our Prelate, for the diversion he took in hunting, several Bishops in that age taking that exercise, not remembering that it is forbid by the Canons. See the Extravagantes or decrees, De Clerico venatore (concerning the hunting of Priests). One of the Monks, who wrote against the Bishop of Bellai, insinuates, that Bishops laid out great sums in hawks and hounds (7). He wrote about the year 1644.

(7) See the Anti-Basilisk of Camus, Bishop of Bellai, p. 550, 551.

QUIRINUS (PUBLIUS SULPICIUS) Consul the year of Rome 742 (a), was born in Lanuvium, and not related to the Patrician family Sulpicia (b). He owed his rise and advancement entirely to the services (which were very assiduous and ardent) he had done Augustus, especially in war. After his Consulship, he commanded an army in Cilicia (c), in order to subdue certain nations (d), who were looked upon as the fiercest in all that country (e). He conquered them by starving them (f), for which he was honoured with a triumph (g). Some place this at the time of our Saviour's birth; and imagine, that although there was another Governor in Syria, yet Augustus gave to Quirinus, to reward the glory he had lately obtained, a commission for the taxation mentioned by St. Luke (h), it not being doubted that the person called Cyrenius (i) in scripture, is the same with our Quirinus. Augustus plainly shewed the high regard and esteem he had for him, when he appointed him Governor to Caius Cæsar his grandson, after Lollius's death, who had enjoyed that post. The Reader may have seen elsewhere (k) the difference, which Tiberius made between these two Governors of Caius Cæsar. Quirinus's

(a) Dio, lib. 54. p. m. 619.

(b) Tacit. Ann. lib. 3. cap. 48.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Called Homonadenses.

(e) Strabo, lib. 12. p. 392.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Tacit. Ann. lib. 3. cap. 48.

(h) In the 2d chapter.

(i) Ibid. ver. 2.

(k) In the rem. [B] of the art. LOLLIUS.

Quirinus's marrying Æmilia Lepida, is a very ſtrong proof of the great credit in which he lived; that young Lady having been deſigned for Lucius Cæſar, grandſon to Auguſtus (l). She was not happy in her marriage with Quirinus, he divorcing her; and, ſeveral years after, charged her with the guilt of many crimes [A], for which ſhe was ſent into baniſhment. This conduct of Quirinus was looked upon as ſo ſtrange, that people were moved to compaſſion for Lepida, though ſhe was quite infamous and guilty [B]. The conqueſt he gained over her was publickly deteſted; the world compared, on this occaſion, the meanneſs of his extraction, to that Lady's exalted birth. He alſo had made himſelf odious by the ſordid manner he paſſed his old age in the midſt of an immenſe eſtate. He died in the year of Rome 774; and, at Tiberius's requeſt, a publick funeral was made in his honour (m). Thoſe who deſire to know whether he ought to (l) Tacit. Ann. lib. 3. cap. 23.

(m) Ex eod. Tacit. ibid. and cap. 48.

[A] He divorced his wife; and, ſeveral years after, charged her with the guilt of many crimes.] He charged her with pretending, that ſhe had had a child by him. There might be ſtrong motives on one ſide for ſuch a pretence; he being very rich, and having neither ſons nor daughters. The other charges related to adultery, poiſoning, and the conſulting of ſoothſayers with regard to the Imperial Family. At Romæ Lepida, cui ſuper Æmiliorum decus L. Sulla ac Cn. Pompeius proavi erant, defertur ſimulaviſſe partum ex P. Quirino divite, atque orbo, adjiciebantur adulteria, venena: quæſitumque per Chaldæos in domum Cæſaris, defendente ream Manio Lepido fratre. Quirinus poſt dictum repudium adhuc infenſus, quamvis infami ac nocenti miſerationem addiderat (1). i. e. "But "Lepida, who not only had the honour to deſcend "from the Æmilian family, but alſo was grand-"daughter to L. Sylla and Cn. Pompey, was im-"peached in Rome of falſely affirming that ſhe had "had a child by P. Quirinus, a wealthy man who "had no children. She likewiſe was charged with "the crimes of adultery, poiſonings, and conſulting "ſoothſayers, with regard to Cæſar's family; Ma-"nius Lepidus, her brother, being counſel for her. "Quirinus, though he had divorced her, continuing "ſtill exaſperated, moved the people to pity, though "ſhe was infamous and criminal." It appears by the beginning of this paſſage, that Æmilia Lepida was great grand-daughter to Sylla and Pompey: but ſhe was not the better woman for that. I am ſurprized that Suetonius, who wrote after Tacitus, ſhould reduce the charge to one article; he ſaying only, that Lepida was accuſed of a deſign of poiſoning her huſband Quirinus. Condemnatam & generoſiſſimam fœminam Lepidam, in gratiam Quirini conſularis prædivitis, & orbi, qui dimiſſam eam è matrimonio poſt vigeſimum annum veneni olim in ſe comparati arguebat (2). i. e. "Lepida, a Lady of great diſtinction, was likewiſe "condemned at the ſuit of Quirinus, a very wealthy "man, of conſular dignity, and having no children, "who twenty years after he had divorced her charg-"ed her with having formerly attempted to poiſon "him." This omiſſion of Suetonius is attended with another fault; he ſaying, that ſhe was condemned twenty years after ſhe had been divorced from Quirinus. However, he is not accurate in his chronology, which I thus prove. This Lady was ſentenced in the year 773. There was a deſign to marry her to Lucius Cæſar, grandſon to Auguſtus; and conſequently ſhe was not married to Quirinus till after the death of that young Prince. Now he died in 755, according to the calculation of Archbiſhop Uſher and Father Noris (3); or the year 756 according to Petavius, or the year 757 according to Valeſius (4). It is not probable that Quirinus repudiated her before they had been married a twelvemonth; he conſequently could not have divorced her twenty years in 773. The Commentators on Suetonius are quite ſilent on that head, and yet it ought to have been cleared. Father Noris (5) has juſt reaſon to cenſure Archbiſhop Uſher, who declared on one hand, that Lucius Cæſar died in 755; and on the other, that Lepida was married to Quirinus in 753. Now theſe two things are inconſiſtent, ſince it is certain that the marriage of Quirinus was after Lucius Cæſar's death; now will any one ſay, that there was a deſign to marry the Emperor's grandſon to a woman whom Quirinus had abandoned or divorced? Archbiſhop Uſher fell into this miſtake by his truſting to Suetonius, that is, by ſuppoſing that Suetonius had exactly calculated the years between Lepida's divorce, and her proſecution. He ought not to have entertained ſo good an opinion of him. I muſt not omit, that Tiberius, after the ſentencing of the Lady in queſtion, declared at laſt, that he was certainly informed by the teſtimony of Quirinus's domeſticks, that ſhe had attempted to poiſon her huſband. Dein tormentis ſervorum patefacta ſunt flagitia, itumque in ſententiam Rubellii Blandi, à quo aqua atque igni arcebatur: huic Druſus adſenſit, quamquam alii mitius cenſuiſſent, mox Scauro qui filiam ex ea genuerat, datum, ne bona publicarentur. Tum demum aperuit Tiberius, compertum ſibi etiam ex P. Quirini ſervis, veneno eum à Lepida petitum (6). i. e. "The ſervants being afterwards "racked, her wickedneſs was diſcovered; and the opi-"nion of Rubellius Blandus was agreed to, by which "ſhe was voted to baniſhment; Druſius aſſented to "it, though others had been more favourable in "their opinion; and immediately after Scaurus, to "whom ſhe had brought a daughter, obtained that "her eſtate ſhould be preſerved. But at laſt Tibe-"rius aſſerted, that he had diſcovered evidently by "Quirinus's ſervants, that Lepida had attempted to "poiſon him." We ſhall preſently ſee, that Lepida, in all probability, was ſentenced very juſtly to baniſhment.

(1) Tacit. Ann. lib. 3. cap. 22.

(2) Suet. in Tiberio, cap. 49.

(3) See Cenotaphia Piſana of Father Noris, p. 258 and 260.

(4) In Notis ad Excerpta Dionis, p. 90. See Noris, ibid. p. 259.

(5) Noris, ibid. p. 258.

(6) Tacit. Ann. lib. 3. cap. 23.

[B] People were moved to compaſſion for Lepida, tho' ſhe was quite infamous and guilty.] It cannot be aſſerted that Tacitus has reflected too much on Tiberius, much leſs can it be ſaid that he ſpared him in any manner. Since therefore he confeſſes that Lepida was guilty, and ruined in her reputation (7), we muſt ſuppoſe it an evident fact. He does not deny but that Tiberius took ſome ſteps during Lepida's trial, which ſhewed that he was for having her puniſhed; but he confeſſes, by ſome other ſteps, he might be ſuſpected of being inclined to pardon her. Haud facile quis diſpexerit illa in cognitione mentem Principis, adeo vertit ac miſcuit iræ & clementiæ ſigna (8). i. e. "It was not an eaſy matter to diſcover, in this trial, "the intention of that Monarch, he ſo changed and "blended the indications of his anger and clemen-"cy." The worſt that can be ſaid, is, that Tiberius uſed his utmoſt endeavours under hand, to prove the crimes laid to Lepida's charge. This is not called to oppreſs innocence, injuſtice, nor tyranny, &c. Let us therefore conclude, that the Lady in queſtion merited the puniſhment to which ſhe was ſentenced. Nevertheleſs the people were highly exaſperated againſt the contrivers of that proſecution, and murmured aloud, and with dreadful imprecations, at ſo illuſtrious a Lady's being ſacrificed to Quirinus. She had found the art to move the people to compaſſion, by the complaints ſhe made during the ſolemnization of the public games, not to mention that Quirinus had made himſelf odious. This was the grand point; for thoſe who make themſelves obnoxious to the people, endear to themſelves the intereſt of thoſe perſons they attack, though thoſe perſons have really no merit, but are even very guilty. Quirinus quamvis infami ac nocenti miſerationem addiderat (9). . . . . Lepida ludorum diebus, qui cognitionem intervenerant, theatrum cum claris fœminis ingreſſa, lamentatione flebili majores ſuos, ciens ipſumque Pompeium, cujus ea monumenta, & adſtantes imagines viſebantur, tantum miſericordiæ permovit, ut effuſi in lacrymas, ſæva & deteſtanda Quirino clamarent, cujus ſenectæ atque orbitati, & obſcuriſſimæ domui, deſtinata quondam uxor L. Cæſari, ac divo Auguſto nurus, dederetur (10). i. e. "Quirinus had raiſed the com-"paſſion of the people, though ſhe was infamous and "criminal.

(7) Quamvis infami ac nocenti. Idem, ibid. cap. 22.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Idem, ibid.

(10) Idem, ibid. cap. 23.

to be called Quirinus, or Quirinius (n), may read Mr. Ryck's notes on Tacitus's Annals, p. 37. Joſephus calls him Κυρήνιος Cyrenius; and informs us that he had filled all employments, and was one of the moſt illuſtrious perſonages of that age (o).

(n) He is called ſo in moſt of the editions of Tacitus.

(o) Joſeph. Antiquitat. Judaic. lib. 18. cap. 1. p. 616.

" criminal. . . . . Lepida, during the ſolemniza-
" tion of the public games, which happened at the " ſame time with the trial, coming into the theatre
" with ſeveral Ladies of diſtinction; calling, with
" the heavieſt moan, upon her anceſtors, and eſpecially
" upon Pompey, whoſe monuments and images be" ing there exhibited to the view, excited their pity
" to ſuch a degree, that burſting into tears, they
" vented the moſt horrid imprecations againſt Quirinus,
" to whom, when old, childleſs, and of a very mean
" extraction, Lepida was ſacrificed, though ſhe was
" deſigned formerly to be the wife of L. Cæſar, and " daughter-in-law to the divine Auguſtus." The puniſhment inflicted on Lepida only increaſed the odium of the people againſt Quirinus (11). Compare this with what was ſaid above (12).

(11) Sed cæteris haud læta memoria Quirini erat, ob intenta, ut memoravi, Lepidæ pericula ſordidamque & præpotentem ſenectam. Idem, ibid. cap. 48. (12) Article MARILLAC (Lewis de) rem. [A], num. 1.

R.

R.

RACAN (HONORAT DE BEUIL, MARQUIS OF) ſon to a Knight of the Order of St. Michael, was born a Roche Racan in Touraine (a), anno 1589 (b). He was one of the Pages to his Majeſty in 1605 (c); and as he began to amuſe himſelf with writing Poetry, he got acquainted with Malherbe, from whom he learnt all the ſkill he had in French Poetry. . . . . This acquaintance and friendſhip with Malherbe laſted till his death, which happened in 1628 (d). He was choſen one of the Members of the French Academy, at the time of its foundation; and there had a ſpeech written by him, againſt the ſciences, which was read, the 9th of July 1635 (e). Had he been in Paris, he would have ſpoke it himſelf, but he was then in the country at his native place. He printed this ſpeech with ſome of his poems (f), and died in 1670. The ſeat become vacant by his death was filled by Mr. de la Chambre, Pariſh-Prieſt of St. Bartholomew's. He happened to write a Quatrain, (a ſtanza of four verſes) exactly like that of a Poet, whoſe writings he believed he had never read [A]. I ſhall obſerve

(a) Peliſſon, Hiſt. de l' Academie Franc. p. m. 344.

(b) I ſhall obſerve, in the rem. that he was 19 years old in 1608.

(c) Malherbe's Life, p. 5.

(d) Ibid. p. 6.

(e) Peliſſon, Hiſt. de l' Academie Franc. p. 102, 103.

(f) Ibid.

[A] He happened to write a Quatrain, . . . exactly like that of a Poet, whoſe writings he believed he had never read.] Menage relates ſeveral curious particulars, which deſerve to be tranſcribed in this place; "(1) I have frequently heard Mr. Chapelain ſay, "that himſelf and Mr. d'Andilli had wrote the "ſame verſe (2), without knowing it was Mal-"herbe's. And at the time I am writing this remark, "Mr. Furetiere informs me, that the ſame thing "had happened to him. I have alſo often heard "Mr. Corneille ſay, that he had hit upon, in his "Polyeucte, the two famous verſes following, rela-"ting to fortune.

"Et comme elle a l' éclat du verre,
"Elle en a la fragilité.

"Fortune, like glaſs, is ſhining and is brittle.

"He had compoſed, I ſay, theſe lines, without "knowing that they were firſt made by Biſhop Go-"deau, who had introduced them into an ode, ad-"dreſſed by him to Cardinal Richlieu, fifteen years "before Corneille had given them a place in his "Polyeucte. It is a common thing for writers to "hit upon the ſame thought and expreſſion. Por-"phyry, in a fragment of his book on philology, "quoted by Euſebius in Chap. III, Book X. of his "Præparatio Evangelica, mentions one Aretades, who "had compoſed an entire treatiſe on ſuch fortuitous "hits. . . . . It is, I ſay, common enough for a "writer to hit upon the ſame thought and expreſſion "of others; and particularly when ſuch a one has "ſeen that thought and expreſſion before, as d'An-"dilli, Chapelain and Furetiere, had doubtleſs "ſeen that verſe of Malherbe, and Coneille thoſe "two of Biſhop Godeau; for it often happens "that we remember a thing, but forget the au-"thor of it. But what happened to Mr. de Racan "is very extraordinary. In 1608, he being in gar-"riſon at Calais, and but nineteen years of age, "compoſed the four verſes following.

"Eſtime qui voudra la mort épouvantable,
"Et la face l'horreur de tous les animaux;
"Quant à moy je la tiens pour le poinct deſirable,
"Où commencent nos biens, & finiſſent nos maux.
"Let death be formidable deem'd by men,
"And made the horror of all animals;
"For different are my thoughts; to me it ſeems
"The point where bliſs begins, and mis'ry ends.

"Being ſome time after in Paris, and repeating theſe "verſes, as his own, to his friend Ivrante, the latter "told him, that he ſhould not impoſe on him in that "article: that he very well knew thoſe verſes were "wrote by Mathieu; and that it was the firſt qua-"train of his book entitled Les Tablettes de la vie "& de la mort. Mr. de Racan, who had never ſeen "that book, perſiſted with obſtinacy, a long time, "in declaring, that it was not poſſible for Mathieu "to have wrote thoſe verſes; and would not yield "till Ivrante, to Racan's great aſtoniſhment, ſhewed "him them in Mathieu's book. I do not doubt "the truth of this ſtory; firmly perſuaded that "Mr. de Racan, who has often told it me before "many perſons, is a man of ſtrict veracity. But I "very much queſtion the truth of what Leonard "Salviati informs us of, in his firſt book on Anver-"timenti della lingua Italiana, viz. that a Poet, his "contemporary, wrote ſonnets exactly like thoſe of "Cardinal Bembo, though he had never ſet eyes on "them." We ſee that Menage makes a great difference between what happened to Racan, and the incident relating to the reſt of the Poets mentioned by him. There appears to him ſomething more extraordinary in the former. However, were I to ſpeak my thoughts on that matter, I ſhould form a different judgment. Moſt people know, that children who are well educated, are commonly taught ſome religious and moral maxims; and that they are made to learn by heart ſome ſententious ſtanzas before they can read. The Proteſtants chooſe, for this purpoſe, ſome paſſages in David's pſalms; or, as the Romaniſts, ſome quatrains of Pibrac, or from another Poet of the ſame ſtamp (3), ſome of whom are found in all countries. Doubtleſs Racan, when but five or ſix years of age, had heard his governeſs or his mother, repeat ſome of the fine quatrains in queſtion, or thoſe of Mathieu, which are commonly bound with thoſe of Pibrac. The traces of theſe, which imprinted themſelves on his brain, were ſtopped for ſome years; but afterwards they opened again, and preſented themſelves to him as a quite new object; and without calling up the particular remembrance of the author, or of the book from which they had been taken. He therefore imagined himſelf to be the author of thoſe four verſes, though they, in reality, were no more than a recollection. Was a man to enquire attentively into his own mind, he would find that, on a hundred occaſions, thoughts which he fancies were invented by himſelf, were, in reality, no more than what he had heard or read before; but only that he did not remember that circumſtance. I will here quote ſome verſes from Moliere, which confirm what I obſerved with reſpect to the education of children. Here follows the cenſure of a coquet, whom her father is ſuppoſed to addreſs in manner following.

Voilà, voilà le fruit de ces empreſſemens,
Qu'on vous voit nuit & jour à lire vos Romans:
De colibets d'amour vôtre tête eſt remplie,
Et vous parlez de Dieu bien moins que de Clelie.
Jettez moi dans le feu tous ces méchans écrits,
Qui gâtent tous les jours tant de jeunes eſprits:
Liſez moi comme il faut, au lieu de ces ſornettes,
Les Quatrains de Pibrac, & les doctes Tablettes
Du Conſeiller Matthieu, ouvrage de valeur,
Et plein de beaux dictons à reciter par cœur:
La guide des pécheurs eſt encor un bon livre,
Ce'ſt là qu'en peu de tems on apprend à bien vivre,
Et ſi vous n'aviez leu que ces moralitez,
Vous ſçauriez un peu mieux ſuivre mes volontez (4).

"Such

(1) Menage, Obſervations ſur Malherbe, p. 254 & ſeq. He has inſerted all this in the Anti-Baillet, chap. 128.

(2) i. e. d'arbitres de la paix, de foudres de la guerre, which line is found in the paraphraſe of Pſalm 145, by Malherbe.

(3) There is a book entitled, Le miroir des vertus et le chemin de bien vivre. (The mirrour of the virtues, and rules for holy living.) This mirrour is a collection of chriſtian and moral Quatrains, by Peter Habert, Counſellor and Secretary to the King.

(4) Moliere, Sganarelle ou le Cocu imaginaire, Scene 1.

(g) Rem. [F] of the art. TIRESIAS.

observe elsewhere (g), how fond he was of the favours of the fair.

" Such is the benefit, which you have reap'd
" By poring o'er Romances day and night:
" With love's vain toys your silly brain is fill'd,
" And Clelia less than God, employs your thoughts.
" But, instant, burn those idle, trifling books,
" Which, daily, spoil the morals of our youth.
" Study attentively the learned Matthieu,
" Or virtuous Pibrac, noble pieces both,
" And fill'd with maxims which enrich the mind.
" To these you well may add the Sinner's guide,
" By which frail man is led to virtue's temple.
" Ah! had these heavenly books been all your study,
" My will, in every thing, you'd have obey'd."

[Bayle supposes above, that Racan, when a child, had read the Tablettes of Matthieu; and that afterwards, the first quatrain occurring to his memory, he imagined he himself was author of it. Bayle did not know that the Quatrains ou Tablette de la Vie & de la Mort, were not published till 1609, Racan being then twenty years old, and having wrote verses at fifteen or sixteen years of age. However, I am of opinion, with Bayle, that when he wrote the four verses in question, he was indebted for them to his memory, and not to his judgment *.]

* From the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 979. col. 1.

(a) See the advertisements to the 2d edit. of this Dict.

RADULPHUS, or RALPH (a), Archbishop of Bourges, was the son of Radulphus, Count and Lord of Turenne, Lay-Abbot of Tulle, Count of Quercy, and of Agana his wife. He was of illustrious birth, being of the Blood-royal of France; and of the same stock with Wifridus, Count of Bourges (b), which the acts of St. James the Hermit, and those of St. Genulfus, affirm to have sprung from the Kings of France (c).

(b) Mabillon, Act. SS. Benedict. sæc. 4. Tom. 2. p. 156. ibid. p. 151. Robertus quidem Saxiaci vici, & circumjaculis regionis dominus, vir potens, & nobilis, ex regum Francorum genere ortus erat, & quod optabilius est Christiana pietate insignis: cui affectu & origine respondebat uxor ejus nomine Agana, ex patre Wifrido comite quondam Bituriensi, regali prosapia exorto, & Matrona Oda nomine, filia, & hi omnes ex regio Francorum sanguine traxerant originem.

(c) Ibid. p. 226. Vita S. Genulphi. Wifredus hic ex illa Nobilium Scarra quam gloriosus rex Pipinus præfati Augusti Ludovici avus, in urbe Biturica ad Quaifarii Ducis Aquitaniæ partes expugnandas reliquerat, originem trahens regali quoque prosapia oriundus.

(d) Ibid. p. 157.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ibid. Et Gall. Christ. à Sammarthanis, Tom. 1. p. 151, 152. Patriarch. Bituricon, cap. 47. in Bibliotb. Labbe, Tom. 2. p. 66.

(g) La Thaumassiere, Hist. du Berri, p. 294.

(h) Besli, Hist. des Comtes de Poictou, & Ann. Bertini, ad ann. 855.

(i) Sirm. Concil. Gall. Tom. 3. cap. 11. p. 141.

(k) Ibid. p. 144.

(l) Sæc. Benedict. 4. Tom. 2. p. 165.

(m) Sirm. Concil. Gall. Tom. 3. p. 160.

(n) Ibid.

(o) Cron. Vierzon, in Bibl. Labb. Tom. 2. Act. SS. Benedict. Sæc. 4. Tom 2. p. 158, & seq.

(p) Ibid.

(q) Hist. de S. Martial, part. 3. p. 315.

(r) Dominici, Ausberti familiæ redittiva. Du Bouchet, Veritable orig. de la Maison de France. Labbe, Tableaux genealogiques.

(s) Fragmentum vit. S. Jacobi Eremitæ, relatum in Patriarch. Bituricensi, cap. 67. Labbe, Bibl. Tom. 1.

(t) Interea vir Dom. Jacobus inter tot præclara bonorum operum exercitia illustratus gratia divina prædixit obitum præstantissimi pontificis Rodulphi, qui insita sibi prudentia, animi quoque nobilitate sua tempestate plebem sibi creditam optime regens, merito pater patriæ à cunctis Aquitaniæ gentis Primoribus dici poterat. Idem refertur in Vitâ S. Jacobi Eremitæ, apud Mabillonium. Sæc. Benedict. 4. Tom. 2. p. 256. in Elog. Hist. Sanct. Radulph. Archi. Biturie.

(u) Gall. Christ. à Sammarth. Tom. 1. p. 151, 152.

(x) Nicolai I. Papæ Epist. 39.

(y) Sæc. Bened. 4 Tom. 2. p. 164.

(z) Appendix ad Canones Rhegiuonis à Stephano Baluzio, p. 528. Justel, Preuves de l'Hist. de Turenne, p. 15.

(aa) Annal. Bertin. ad ann. 866.

(bb) Bibl. Cluniac. p. 84.

(cc) Justel, Preuves de l'Hist. de Turenne, p. 18.

He founded, with his patrimony, several Abbies, viz. that of Devre in Berry, afterwards translated to Vierzon (o); that of Beaulieu in Limosin; that of Vegenues in the same country; and that of Sarasac in Querci. The two last are ruined (p).

He also rebuilt Château-Gourdon, in Saisseau. This town was part of his patrimony. He there deposited the body of St. Satire, whence it was called St. Satur, which it bears to this day (q). It is situated near Sancerre, which was the chief place of the other part of Saisseau, possessed by Wifridus, Count of Bourges; and which Agana his daughter, brought in marriage to Robert, brother of Ingeltrude, wife of Pepin I. King of Aquitain (r). This Robert is the same person with Robert the Strong.

An ancient Author informs us (s), that St. Radulphus governed the people who were under his care, with so much prudence and greatness of soul, that he might justly be called, by all the great men of Aquitain, the Father of his country (t). He took a very particular care of his Clergy; and it was, in the view of instructing and edifying them, that he drew up fifteen canons or ordinances, which Mr. Baluse printed. He likewise drew up some other canons, which Mr. Baluse promises also to publish. He is the first Archbishop of Bourges, whom we certainly know to have been Patriarch and Primate of the Provinces of Aquitain and Narbonne (u). It was, on this account, that Pope Nicholas I. wrote a long letter to him, which informs us, that Primates ought not to take immediate cognizance of the affairs of the Clergy of the other Dioceses, within their own, but only by appeal (x).

He died the twentieth of June 866, and was canonized (y).

Himself, his brothers, and the descendants of those brothers, adhered all very zealously to Robert the Strong, and his descendants.

Two of his brothers, GODFREY and ROBERT, left posterity. That of Robert ends with Aimar, Viscount of lower Limosin, a Lay-abbot, and Restorer of the abbey of Tulle. He restored to the Monks of this house, the dignity of Abbot, and the revenues of the abbey; these having been in his family ever since the time of his great-grandfather, who had obtained them by the munificence of our Monarchs (z).

Count Godfrey fought against the Normans in the battle of Brieserthe, with Robert the Strong, who was slain in it (aa). He left two sons, Count GODFREY, of whom St. Eudes, Abbot of Clugni says, that he would oblige St. Geraud, Count of Aurillac, to become his vassal (bb).

RANULPHUS, younger brother of Godfrey, carried on the line. The elder branch of his descendants ends in SULPICE, who, by marriage, brought Turenne into the family of Comborn (cc). The younger branch, which assumed the name of Souillac, when sirnames became hereditary, still exists; and continues the line of those Princes, Counts, and Lords of Turenne, sprung from the same stock as Wifridus, Count of Bourges.

RADULPHUS

RADULPHUS (RALPH), a Benedictin Frier, ſirnamed Flaviacenſis, or Flaicenſis, becauſe he belonged to the Convent of St. Germer de Flaix, in the dioceſe of Beauvais, flouriſhed in 1157, as Albericus (a) affirms, on the teſtimony of Helinand (b). Several eminent Writers have committed an error in placing him under the year 910 (c): he is called by ſome Raoul, or Ralph the Black (d). His commentary on the book of Leviticus is ſtill extant; it being inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and printed ſeparately at Colen in 1536. There (e) has been reſtored, to him, a commentary on Solomon's ſong, which was thought to be a work of St. Gregory. The partizans of the hiſtory of Pope Joan [A] rank him among their teſtimonies with regard to her, but they are greatly miſtaken in ſo doing.

(a) Albericus trium Fontium Monachus in Chronic. See F. Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 274.

(b) A Monk of Froimond, in the dioceſe of Beauvais, about the cloſe of the 12th century, and the beginning of the 13th. See Father Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 275.

(c) See Father Labbe, ibid. p. 273.

(d) Mr. du Pin. Bibl. Tom. 9. p. 185, is one of theſe.

(e) Father Hommey, in the Supplement. Patrum, in 1684.

RADZIWIL

[A] The partizans of the hiſtory of Pope Joan, ranked him among their teſtimonies, with regard to her, but they are greatly miſtaken in ſo doing.] This aroſe from confounding him with a Benedictin Frier, named Ranulphe de Hygeden (Ralph Higden) an Engliſhman, who died in 1363. Father Labbe imagines that Conrad Decker firſt occaſioned this blunder. Auctor Primus illius apud Blondellum erroris atque in Mareſio malæ fidei fuit homo furioſus Conradus Deckerus in libro, cui titulum fecit de Papa Romano & Papiſſa Romana, quod Joannes Octavus fuerit mulier & puerpera, Oppenheimii ad Rhenum in 8vo anno 1612; ſic enim loquitur pagina 430. Deſcripſit Radulfus hanc Hiſtoriam in ſuo Polychronico libri V. cap. 32. teſtis locupletiſſimus & omni exceptione major, utpote in quo veritatis Hiſtoricæ nulla deſiderantur κρίνρια: & vixit juxta Trithemium anno circiter 930. ita ut Papale hoc puerperium ab iis accipere poterit, qui illud videerunt. Atque ex illo cænoſo fonte promanavit in cæteros error (1). i. e. "The "firſt ſource of that error in Blondel, and diſingenuity in Mareſius, was one Conrad Decker, a man "of a violent ſpirit, in a book to which he gave "the title, of The Roman Pope, and the Roman Popeſs, "declaring that John VIII was a woman, and had "been delivered of a child, which book was printed "in Oppenheim on the Rhine, in 1612, 8vo; he "writing as follows in page 430. This ſtory was "told by Radulphus in his Polychronicon, book 5, "chap. 32, he being a moſt authentic witneſs, and "to whom nothing can abſolutely be objected, there "being none of the marks belonging to an hiſtorian "wanting to him. Farther, he lived, according to "Trithemius, about the year 930, ſo that he might "have been informed of Pope Joan's delivery by "thoſe who were eye-witneſſes to it. The error "ſpread itſelf from this polluted ſpring, to other "writers." But it is certain that Vignier had committed it two years before Conrad Decker's work was printed. He publiſhed as follows in 1610. "What Baronius and Bellarmin ſay, viz. that Ma"rianus Scotus, who wrote about the year 1080, "firſt publiſhed that ſtory, is falſe; as is evident "from the Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of the late Nicho"las Vignier my father, in which he produces the "teſtimony of Ranulphus, in his Polychronion, who "was a benedictin, and lived about the year 930, "according to Trithemius (2)." A capuchin who wrote againſt Vignier in 1611, did not know how to make a proper uſe of the advantages he had. He was not enough acquainted with books and authors; and did not know that the author of this Polychronicon, which his adverſary had quoted, lived in the XIVth century, and not in the Xth. Here follows the anſwer he made to him. Read your father again attentively; you will find, in the hiſtorical library, on the ſame ſubject, firſt, that he commits an error where he ſays, that all who have wrote the hiſtory of the Popes, Anaſtaſius excepted, declare unanimouſly that Pope Joan ſucceeded Leo IV. as he might have learnt from Onuphrius, whom he quotes in the ſame place. Secondly, that he ſpeaks timorouſly and doubtfully of this affair, as well as others, who were miſtaken concerning it. Thirdly, it will appear from his text, when duly examined, that he quotes Marianus as the firſt author who tells this ſtory. Fourthly, that he does not quote in any manner, in this place, your Arnulphus, but mentions John Lucidus; but if you are deſirous of making but one of thoſe two, know that we give but very little credit, or rather none at all, to the allegations of your ſaid father (3). But this was not aiming at the mark, nor diving to the bottom of the cauſe. Vignier furniſhed weapons againſt himſelf, in giving the title of Ranulphus's work. It was owing to this title that father Labbe (4) diſcovered, by a paſſage in Decker, the ſource of this miſtake. The learned Blondel had taken no notice of this title; whence he was prevailed upon to believe, that Radulphus Flaviacenſis has ſpoke of Pope Joan (5). He indeed has not given into the error of thoſe who place him either under the year 910 or 930. He fixed his death to the year 1157, and grounds his conjecture on the teſtimony of Albericus; but he ought to have obſerved, that Albericus does not place the death of our Radulphus under that year, but the proſperous part of his life. They were not more accurate, when they repreſented to him that his Radulphus is of greater antiquity than he had made him, that he is a teſtimony to the ſtory of Pope Joan, prior to Marianus; and, in a word, that he might have really ſeen Pope Joan (6). Hic (Radulphus Flaviacenſis) inter teſtes veritatis malè tertius ponitur à Mariano: Nec enim Radulphus Flaviacenſis mortuus eſt denuò anno 1157. niſi eum multò longæviorem faciamus Johanne de Temporibus; cùm floruerit ipſo nono Chriſti ſæculo, pluſquam 100. annis antequam Marianus naſceretur, adeo ut ipſam Joannam vidiſſe potuerit: Etenim Bellarminus de Scriptor. Eccl. Radulphum ait floruiſſe anno Chriſti 910 (7). i. e. "This "Radulphus Flaviacenſis is wrongly ranked in the "third place, among thoſe who witneſſed to the "truth, after Marianus; for Radulphus Flaviacenſis "did not die in 1157, unleſs we can ſuppoſe him "much more ancient than Johannes de Temporibus, "ſince he flouriſhed in the ninth century after "Chriſt, above a century before Marianus came into "the world, ſo that he might have ſeen Pope Joan; "for Bellarmin ſays, in his Eccleſiaſtical writers, "that Radulphus flouriſhed in the year of Chriſt "910." He who wrote in this manner plunged into ſome miſtakes, which father Labbe cenſured with ſurprizing ſeverity (8).

Had Hartnac known this, when he publiſhed a new edition of Micrælius's Syntagma Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ, he doubtleſs would have informed his readers, that the following words, Nobile indignari, Aventine, Onuphri, Raymunde (9), Bellarmine, Baroni, Bini, Florimunde, quod veſtram audaciam in negando muliebri hoc pontificatu nihil curans, veritatem rei profero ex Rudolpho Flaviacenſi, monacho Benedictino qui vixit circa annum 1000. ex Mariano Scoto, qui natus, &c (10). i. e. "Aventinus, Onuphrius, Raymundus, "Bellarmin, Baronius, Binius, Florimundus, now "vent your noble indignation, becauſe that, without "paying any regard to your impudence, in denying "the reality of this female pontificate, I prove it to "be true, by Rodolphus Flaviacenſis, a Benedictin, "who lived about the year 820, and by Marianus "Scotus, who was born &c." That theſe words, I ſay, are erroneous, and that we muſt eraze ex Rodolpho Flaviacenſi. This ſhews how much it concerns controverſial writers not to rely on the writers of their own party, without entirely diſcuſſing all the replies of the adverſe party. If a writer ſhould content himſelf with only conſulting Mareſius, he would copy his quotations; but if he alſo conſulted the author who refuted him (11), he then would diſcover the good from the bad. I muſt obſerve by the way, that Hartnac has mentioned in the margin, the names of ſeveral Proteſtant authors who adhere to the ſtory of Pope Joan, and moſt of whom wrote after Florimond de Remond (12). He quotes, among others, the famous Gerhard, Whitaker, and Andrew Willet.

(1) Labbe, in Cenotaphio everſo, ad calcem, Tom. 1. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 986, 987.

(2) Nicholas Vignier, Theatre de l'Anti-chriſt, part. 2. chap. 28. p. m. 1055.

(3) Silveſtre de l'Aval, Predicateur Capucin, les juſtes Grandeurs de l'Egliſe Romaine, liv. 3. p. 78.

(4) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 1. p. 987.

(5) Blondel, in Examine Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, p. m. 5.

(6) It is pretended that ſhe came to the Pontificate after Leo IV. who died in 855.

(7) Sam. Mareſius, in Johanna Papiſſa reſtituta, p. 5.

(8) See Tom. 2. of his Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 274, and 795, & ſeq.

(9) He ought not to have been diſtinguiſhed from Florimunde, who comes after; they have ſplit an Author, and made two of him.

(10) Micrælius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. ſect. 1. de Papis, p. 508. edit. 1699.

(11) i. e. Father Labbe.

(12) Compare this with rem. [F] of the art. POPE JOAN.

RADZIWIL (NICHOLAS) IV. of that name [A], Palatin of Vilna, grand Marſhal and Chancellor of Lithuania in the 16th century, was a very illuſtrious man. He travelled into moſt parts of Europe in his youth; and was ſo ſkillful in bodily exerciſes, that he ſurpaſſed all the Gentlemen of his time in that particular. He had a conſiderable ſhare in the eſteem and friendſhip of King Sigiſmund Auguſtus; was Captain of his guards, and commanded thrice in Livonia. He there obtained a ſignal victory over the Germans, whereby he diſpoſſeſſed them of that province, and ſubjected it to Poland. He brought to the King, the Archbiſhop of Riga, and the Grand-Maſter of the Knights of Livonia, and delivered up to him, in full Senate, the ſeal of that order, and the croſs which the Grand-Maſter uſed to wear about his neck. This noble expedition crowned him with glory. When he was ſent Embaſſador to Charles V. and of Ferdinand King of the Romans, he ſtood god-father to Archduke Erneſt. He died in 1567, and was carried to the grave on the ſhoulders of his four ſons (a) [B]. I muſt not omit that he turned Proteſtant, and cauſed the Bible to be printed in the Poliſh language [C]. He anſwered, with the utmoſt ſharpneſs and ſeverity, Lippoman, the apoſtolical Nuncio, who had ſpoke to him in very reproachful terms [D]. The Clergy of Vilna

(a) Extracted from Simon Starovolſcius, in Sarmatiæ Bellatoribus, p. 172, 173.

[A] IV of that name.] Jagello being converted to Chriſtianity, and having united his country, Lithuania, to the crown of Poland, which had been beſtowed on him, created a Nobleman named Radziwil, Palatine of Vilna, he having alſo turned Chriſtian. This Palatine aſſumed the name of NICHOLAS at his baptiſm; and ordered that, for the future, all the eldeſt ſons of his family ſhould be named Nicholas. He lived to above an hundred years of age (1). His only ſon NICHOLAS II, Palatine of Vilna, ſerved the commonwealth very glorioufly under ſix Kings ſucceſſively. He died at fourſcore and nineteen years of age (2). The eldeſt of his four ſons, NICHOLAS III Palatine of Vilna, was created Prince of the Empire by the Emperor Maximilian I; and died full of glory aged above ſeventy years (3). GEORGE RADZIWIL his brother, Palatine of Kiovia, Marſhal of the Court, Caſtellain (a kind of Lieutenant General) of Vilna, and Great General of Lithuania, was father of Barbara Radziwil, ſecond wife to King Sigiſmund Auguſtus. He died in 1565 (4). JOHN RADZIWIL, his brother, the laſt of the four ſons of Nicholas II, was created a Senator of the Kingdom by King Sigiſmund I. He was afterwards Caſtellan of Troci, and at laſt grand Marſhal of Lithuania. He went to Rome under the Pontificate of Julius II (5). He left an only ſon, NICHOLAS RADZIWIL IV of that name (6), who is the ſubject of the preſent article.

(1) Simon Starovolſcius, in Sarmatiæ Bellatoribus, p. 163, 164.

(2) Idem, ibid. p. 165, 166.

(3) Idem, ibid. p. 167 & ſeq.

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 169, 170.

(5) Idem, ibid. p. 171, 172.

(6) Idem, ibid.

[B] He was carried to the grave on the ſhoulders of his four ſons.] The reader will ſoon hear their names and employments. Read only the following Latin paſſage: Quatuor filios, itidem bello inclytos, nec deteriores ingeniis (qui, ut inquit Valerius Maximus patriæ rem non ſuam augere properabant) reliquit. Nicolaum Hieroſolymitana peregrinatione clarum: Georgium, Vilnenſem primò deinde Cracovienſem Epiſcopum, & S. R. E. Cardinalem; Albertum ſupremum M. D. L. Marſalcum: & Staniſlaum Samogitiæ Toparcham: qui cum plurimis lachrymis, patre pro concione laudato funeratoque ampliſſime, propriis manibus Urnam Mauſoleo inferre non erubuerunt (8). i. e. "He left four ſons famous for their "warlike actions, and no leſs renowned for their "genius, who, as Valerius Maximus ſays, endeavoured to increaſe their country's wealth, and "not their own; theſe were Nicholas, famous for "his travels to Jeruſalem; George, Biſhop of Vilna, "and afterwards of Cracow, and Cardinal; Albert, "Grand Marſhal of the great Dukedom of Lithua-"nia; and Staniſlaus, principal Governor of Samo-"gitia: all theſe having heard, with a flood of "tears, their father's funeral ſermon, were not a-"ſhamed to carry, with their own hands, his body "to the grave, he being buried with great magni-"ficence." Thuanus (9) obſerves, that they all four returned to the Communion of the Church of Rome, and that Albert married a daughter of the Duke of Courland. He fixes the death of Nicholas Radziwil to the 28th of May 1565, as does alſo Bucholcerus in his Index Chronologicus. I am to obſerve that David Chytræus (10) relates the ſame particulars as Thuanus. The paſſage I quoted from Simon Starovolſcius informs us, that Nicholas Radziwil, eldeſt ſon of our Nicholas Radziwil, was famous for his journey to Jeruſalem. This obliges me to take notice, that the ſame Author obſerves in another work (11), that Thomas Treterus, Canon of Warmia, tranſlated into Latin the Journey to Jeruſalem of NICHOLAS CHRISTOPHER RADZIWIL (12). This journey was performed in 1584; Nicholas Chriſtopher Radziwil including it in four letters in the Poliſh tongue. I have ſeen the Latin verſion of it printed at Antwerp in 1614. The dedication of Treterus the tranſlator is dated in 1601.

(9) Thuan. lib. 38. p. 769.

(10) David Chytræus, in Saxonia, lib. 21. ad ann. 1565. p. 558. edit. Lipſ. 1602.

(11) Staravolſc. in centum Polonorum Elog. p. 70, 71.

(12) This is the ſame with our Nicholas Radziwil's eldeſt ſon.

He who performed that journey died in February 1616; and was buried in a pilgrim's habit, in the College of the Jeſuits of Nieſwiez (13). He had been created Prince of the Empire, and left four ſons (14), from one of whom, if I miſtake not, Prince STANISLAUS ALBERT RADZIWIL deſcended, who was Duke of Olyka and Nieſwiez, Chancellor of the great Dukedom of Lithuania (15), and Author of a Panegyric of our Lady of Czeſtochovia. He flouriſhed at the ſame time that Le Labourer publiſhed the relation of a journey to Poland, that is, in 1647.

(13) Staravolſc. in Bellatoribus Sarmatiæ, p. 176.

(14) Idem, ibid.

(15) Le Laboureur, Relation de Pologne, part. 3. p. 25.

[C] He cauſed the bible to be printed in the poliſh language.] Nicholas Oleſnicki, as I obſerved elſewhere (16), eſtabliſhed the Proteſtant Religion in Pinczovia, at Stancarius's deſire. In the ſame place was alſo ſettled a ſchool which was a nurſery of learned men. John Laſcus, George Blandrata, Francis Liſmaninus, Martin Crovicius, Peter Statorius, George Schoman, Gregory Pauli, Brelius, Triceſſius, and ſome others, rendered it ſo flouriſhing that Pinczovia was then looked upon as the Athens of Poland (17). It was there that thoſe learned perſons tranſlated the whole bible into the vulgar tongue. Their tranſlation was printed at Breſt in Lithuania at the expence of our Nicholas Radziwil. He was Governor of the Royal City, and had ſet up a printing-houſe there. David's Pſalms, a collection of ſpiritual ſongs, and ſome other works of the ſame kind, were printed at the ſame place, and greatly contributed to the converſion of the people. My Author's words are as follow: Ibi (Pinczoviæ) à Viris illis piis & doctis univerſa Biblia Sacra in Linguam vernaculum tranſlata, ſumptibus Nicolai Radzivilii Palatini Vilnenſis Principis Magnificentiſſimi & Fortiſſimi renaſcentis veritatis vindicis impreſſa ſunt Breſtiæ Lithuanorum. Huic enim urbi Regiæ Præfectus datus erat, in qua comparatam privato ære officinam typographicam condiderat, & illi Wojewodæ Cracoviâ evocato commiſerat. Ibidem exſcriptus fuit liber Pſalmorum & Hymnorum aliique ejus notæ, quorum lectione populus à Romanis ſuperſtitionibus ad veram Dei colendi rationem revocabatur (18). This Author obſerves (19), that this impreſſion of the bible was finiſhed in 1563, and that it was the firſt verſion made of the Scriptures into the Poliſh tongue. He adds, that it was followed by another in 1572, compoſed by Simon Budæus, and that of the New Teſtament, five years after, by Martin Czechovicius. It is to be obſerved, that the tranſlators of the bible, printed at the expence of Nicholas Radziwil (20, were but five in number, according to John Lætus (21). Theſe were Orſacius, Zazius, Triceſius, James Lubelſcius, and Statorius.

(16) In the art. STANCARUS.

(17) Ita ut tunc Pinczovia, velut Athena Sarmatica celebraretur. Staniſlaus Lubieniecius, Hiſt. Reformat. Polonicæ, lib. 1. cap. 5, p. 33.

(18) Staniſl. Lubieniecius, Hiſt. Reform. Polon. lib. 1. cap. 5. p. 33.

(19) Idem, ibid. lib. 3. cap. 1. p. 170.

(20) He laid out ten thouſand florins on that occaſion. Jo. Lætus, ubi infra.

(21) Jo. Lætus, in Compend. Hiſt. Univerſ. p. m. 412. He cites Laſicius, lib. 5. Chytræus, in Sax. ad ann. 65.

[D] He anſwered with the utmoſt ſharpneſs and ſeverity Lippoman the Apoſtolical Nuncio, who had ſpoke to him

(c) Regenſvolſc. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Slavonicar. p. 142.

(d) Elizabeth Sidlowieski.

(e) David Chytræus, in Saxonia, lib. 15. p. 393.

Vilna not permitting the Proteſtant Miniſters to preach in churches, he made them preach in the yard of his houſe, oppoſite to St. John's church (b). The firſt Proteſtant Synod was held, under his protection, at Vilna, in December 1557 (c). His Lady (d) aſſiſted him very zealouſly in endeavouring to ſettle the reformation (e). At this time one CHRISTOPHER RADZIWIL turned Proteſtant; and it is ſaid, that his change was owing to ſome impoſtures of the Monks which had been diſcovered [E]. Others call him Nicholas (f), and ſay that he was firſt couſin to the Gentleman who is the ſubject of the preſent article; and brother to Barbara Radziwil, who married Sigiſmund Auguſtus,

(b) David Chytræus, in Saxonia, lib. 15. p. 393.

(f) See the cloſe of the rem. [E].

him very reproachful terms.] I am perſuaded that the reader will be well pleaſed to find part of that anſwer here. Apoſtaſia cum ei non ſine conviciis à Lippomano Pontificis Legato exprobraretur, eidem docta Apologia reſpondit, fidei ſuæ rationem dedit, inter alia vero: Certum tibi eſſe volo, ſic me nunc doctiſſimorum virorum videndorum deſiderio teneri, ut ſi ſcirem me eos, aut alios etiam ex præcipuis illis qui ſunt in Germania, Melanchthones, Brentios, poſſe in mea poſtulata aliquomodo pertrahere, in eo vel præcipuè, non ſervitoris tantum mittendi laborem conferendum, ſed etiam omnes opes facultateſque meas eſſe mihi experiendas putarem: quos quia per inſignem malitiam hæreticos appellas, omnium Hæreticorum, quos orbis terrarum habet, maxime Hereticus es (22). i. e. "When Lippomanus, the Pope's Nuncio, "branded him in moſt opprobrious terms with being an "Apoſtate; he anſwered him by a learned apology, "wherein he gave the reaſon of his faith, and ſaid, "among other particulars; I would have you to know, "that I have ſo earneſt a deſire to ſee and converſe "with the moſt learned men, that if I knew it was "poſſible for me to prevail with them, or others "ſo famous in Germany, as Melanchthon and Brentius, to acquieſce with my requeſt; I then ſhould "look upon it as incumbent on me, not only to "ſend a ſervant for that purpoſe, but likewiſe to "ſpend my whole eſtate; and as you, through the "moſt inverate malice, call theſe men heretics, you "yourſelf are the greateſt heretic in the world for "ſo doing." The latter he received from Lippomanus, and his anſwer to it was printed at Koinſberg in 1556 (23).

(22) Jo. Lætus, &c. p. 390, 391.

(23) Regenſvolſcius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Slavonicar. p. 142.

[E] It is ſaid, that his (Chriſtopher Radziwil's) change was owing to ſome impoſtures of the Monks which had been diſcovered.] When the Reformation began to be eſtabliſhed in Lithuania, this Chriſtopher Radziwil being extremely ſorry that a Prince of his family, embraced that religion, he went to Rome, and paid all imaginable honours to the Pope. The Roman Pontiff being alſo deſirous of indulging his kindneſs to him, gave him, at his departure, a box filled with relicks. Being returned to his houſe, and the news of theſe relicks being ſpread abroad, certain Friers, ſome months after, came and told this Prince, that a man was poſſeſſed with the devil, who had been exorciſed to no purpoſe. They therefore beſought him, for the ſake of that unhappy wretch, to lend them the precious relicks which he had brought from Rome. The Prince granted them very readily, upon which they were carried to Church in ſolemn pomp, all the Monks going in proceſſion on that occaſion. At laſt they were laid on the altar; and, at the day appointed, a numberleſs multitude of people flocking to this ſhew, after the uſual exorciſms, the relicks were applied. At that very inſtant the pretended evil ſpirit came out of the body of the man, with the uſual poſtures and grimaces. Every one cried out, a miracle! And the Prince lifted up his hands and eyes to Heaven, to return thanks for his having brought ſo holy a thing, which performed ſuch miracles. But ſome days after, as he was in that admiration and tranſport of joy, and was beſtowing the higheſt elogiums on the virtue of thoſe relicks, he obſerved that a young Gentleman of his houſhold, who had the keeping that rich treaſure, began to ſmile, and made certain geſtures, which ſhewed he only laughed at his words (24). The Prince flew into a paſſion, and would know the reaſon of his deriſion. A promiſe being made to the Gentleman that no harm ſhould be done him, he declared ſecretly to the Prince, "that in their return from "Rome, he had loſt the box of relicks, which "had been given him to keep; and that not daring "to divulge this, for fear of puniſhment, he had "found means to get one like it, which he had "filled with the little bones of beaſts, and ſuch "trifles as reſembled the relicks he had loſt. That "ſeeing ſo much honour was paid to that vile heap "of filth, and that they even aſcribed to it the virtue of driving away devils, he had juſt cauſe to "wonder at it. The Prince believed this ſtory to "be true; and nevertheleſs, being deſirous of geting farther light into this impoſture, he ſent for "the Monks the very next day, and deſired them "to enquire, whether there were no more Demoniacks who wanted the aſſiſtance of his relicks. "A few days after they brought him another man "poſſeſſed with an evil ſpirit, who acted the ſame "part with him who had appeared before. The "Prince commanded him to be exorciſed in his "preſence; but as all the exorciſms which are "uſually employed on thoſe occaſions proved ineffectual, he ordered that man to ſtay in his palace "the next day, and bid the Monks withdraw. After they were gone, he put the Demoniac among "his Tartarian grooms, who, purſuant to the orders "which had been given them, firſt exhorted him "to confeſs the cheat: but as he perſiſted obſtinately in it, ſtill making his furious and dreadful geſtures, fix of them chaſtiſed him ſo ſeverely "with rods and ſcourges, that he was obliged to implore the Prince's mercy, who pardoned him the "inſtant he had confeſſed the truth. The next "morning the Prince ſent for the Friers, when the "wretch in queſtion throwing himſelf at his feet, proteſted that he was not poſſeſſed, and had never been "ſo, but that thoſe Friers had forced him to act "the part of one who was ſo. The Monks, at "firſt, beſought the Prince not to believe this; ſaying that it was an artifice of the devil who ſpoke "through that man's mouth. But the Prince anſwered, that if the Tartarians had been able to "force the devil to tell truth, they would alſo be "able to extort it from the mouth of thoſe Friers. "But now theſe Monks, ſeeing themſelves put to it "in this manner, confeſſed the impoſture, ſaying, "that they had done all this with a good intention, "and to check the progreſs of Hereſy. But the "Prince offered up his hearty praiſes to God, for "having been ſo gracious as to diſcover ſuch an "impoſture; and now entertaining a ſuſpicion of "a religion, which was defended by ſuch diabolical "practices, though they went by the name of pious "frauds, ſaid, that he would no longer depend on "any perſon for his ſalvation; and thereupon began "to read the Scriptures with unparallel'd aſſiduity. "In ſix months time, all which he ſpent in reading and prayer, he made a wonderful progreſs "in piety, and in the knowledge of the myſtery of "the Goſpel. After which he himſelf, with his "whole family, publickly profeſſed his religion in "1564 (25)." This paſſage is from Mr. Drelincourt, Miniſter of the Proteſtant Church in Paris. It is related in an anſwer publiſhed by him in 1663, to the letter which Prince Erneſt, Landgrave of Heſſe, had writ to the five Proteſtant Miniſters of Paris; and he adds the following words (26): Your Highneſs may give credit to it, if you judge proper: but I proteſt to you, the ſame as if I was before the Almighty's throne, that this ſtory was told me in this manner, by the Miniſter belonging to Prince Januſſius Radziwil; nay, he delivered to me in writing, part of what he told me, and which he explained to me more at large by word of mouth.

(24) Drelincourt, Reponſe au Prince Erneſt Landgrave de Heſſe, p. 357.

(25) Drelinc. &c. p. 359 & ſeq.

(26) Ibid. p. 362.

Regenſvolſcius (27) gives the name of Nicholas Radziwil, to him, whom the diſcovery of a monkiſh impoſture prompted to quit the Popiſh errors in 1564;

(27) Regenſvolſcius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Slavonicar. p. 145.

Auguſtus, King of Poland, who died the 12th of May 1551. They obſerve that the Church he built for the Proteſtants in Vilna, of which he was Palatine, was honoured with a noble privilege by King Stephen Battori in 1579, and that he died the 27th of April 1584; that Nicholas and Chriſtopher RADZIWIL, his two ſons, continued in the religion in which he had brought them up, and that their deſcendants preſerved that ſacred Depoſitum, as an invaluable treaſure (g) [F].

(g) Ex eodem Regenſvolſc. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Slavonic. p. 144, 145.

1564; but he does not take any notice, either of his journey to Rome, or of thoſe relicks. He only ſays that the Monks of Czenſtochovia (28) had ſuborned a pretended Demoniac, during the time that Nicholas Radziwil was on a pilgrimage, for the performance of which he had made a vow, after obtaining a great victory over the Muſcovites.

(28) See La Laboureur, Relat. de Pologne, part. 3. p. 18 & ſeq. concerning the miraculous image of the bleſſed virgin, honoured in this place.

[F] Their deſcendants preſerved that ſacred depoſition, as an invaluable treaſure.] NICHOLAS RADZIWIL, Palatine of Novogrod, was the father of GEORGE, who died Caſtellan of Troki in 1614, and left no children. CHRISTOPHER RADZIWIL, brother of this Nicolas, was Palatine of Vilna, and died in 1604, leaving two ſons, JANUSSIUS and CHRISTOPHER. Januſſius Duke of Bierze, and Caſtellan of Vilna, died in 1621, aged forty two years. He had by his wife, who was the daughter of the Elector of Brandeburg's daughter, a ſon named BOGESLAUS. His brother Chriſtopher, Palatine of Vilna, Grand Marſhal of Lithuania, died the 19th of September 1640, aged 55 years, and left an only ſon named JANUSSIUS, who was great Chamberlain of Lithuania. This Bogeſlaus, and Januſſius RADZIWIL, couſin Germans, were living, and profeſſed the Proteſtant Religion, at the time that the Author whom I cite (29), wrote his book about the year 1650. We were informed by the News-papers, in the beginning of the year 1681, that Princeſs LOUISA RADZIWIL, being fourteen years of age, married Prince Lewis, ſecond ſon by the Elector of Brandeburg, at Koniſberg the 7th of January 1681, that ſhe was the only daughter of the late Prince Bogeſlaus, and poſſeſſed in Lithuania, a Dukedom, above forty leagues in extent, on the Frontiers of Livonia, with two fortreſſes. She was a Proteſtant; but after the death of Prince Lewis of Brandeburg, ſhe was married again in 1688, to a ſon of the Elector Palatine, and turned Roman Catholick. It had been reported, that there were ſome thoughts of marrying her to Prince James, ſon to John Sobieſki King of Poland.

(29) Regenſvolſcus, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Slavonicar. p. 145, 146.

RAIMARUS (NICHOLAS), an Aſtronomer of the 16th Century. See URIUS.

RAMUS (PETER), in French de la Ramée, was one of the moſt famous Profeſſors of the 16th Century. He was born in a village in Vermandois, in Picardy, in anno 1515 (a). His grandfather withdrew to that Province after having loſt all his poſſeſſions, at the time that his native place, in the territory of Liege, was reduced to aſhes [A], by the laſt Duke of Burgundy. He was obliged to earn his livelihood, during the remainder

(a) Theophilus Banoſius, in Vita Petri Rami, p. 2.

[A] His native place in the territory of Liege was reduced to aſhes.] This is not conformable either to Moreri or Teiſſier. The former ſays, that Ramus's grandfather had been forced, during the wars, to leave Burgundy, and that he retired to the Vermandois; the latter ſays (1), that Peter Ramus was deſcended from a noble family, which came originally from the town of Evreaux; for his grandfather having been drove from his native country, and diſpoſſeſſed of his eſtate by the Burgundians, flew for ſhelter to the Vermandois. Thus, according to Moreri, Ramus's grandfather was a Burgundian; but according to Teiſſier, a Norman. Now I can anſwer my readers that he was neither, he being a native of the territory of Liege, and this I prove in the following manner. Parentes Rami agricolæ fuerunt pauperrimi. Avus certe, ut ipſe commemorat in Præfatione Regiæ ſuæ profeſſionis, in Eburonum gente familia in primis illuſtri fuit: ſed patria à Carolo Burgundionum duce capta, & incenſa, in Veromanduorum agrum profugus, ob paupertatem carbonariam artem exercuit (2). i. e. " Ramus's parents were very " poor huſbandmen. His grandfather, as he him- " ſelf informs us, was certainly of a moſt illuſ- " trious family in Liege; but his native country be- " ing ſeized upon and burnt by Charles Duke of " Burgundy, he fled to the Vermandois, where he " was in ſuch miſerable circumſtances, that he was " forced to turn collier to ſupport himſelf." We find, by all good Geographers, that the Eburones are the ſame people as the inhabitants of Liege. [As Bayle ſays that Ramus was born in 1515, " he, at " that rate, was but 57 years of age when he loſt " his life in the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's-Day; " but it is my opinion that he was a great deal older. " The time of Ramus's birth is of importance, " becauſe many perſons imagine that he had diſtin- " guiſhed himſelf very early, particularly in his diſ- " pute with Govea, &c. My proofs are as follow. " I. Cayet who had known him at Paris, and been " acquainted with him whilſt he was Profeſſor, ſays " expreſsly in his Navarreide (in the annotations, p. " 17.) it is written that Ramus died a bachelor aged " ſeventy years. Cayet makes a long elogium of " him, p. 672. II. Du Boulay, Tom. VI. p. 967. " ſays, Ramus Academiæ nomen dedit, an. 1527. Now " it is not at all probable that he was but twelve " years old at that time. There is no reaſon to " doubt but that du Boulay ſpeaks truth, ſince Ramus " himſelf in his Actio prima of 1566, ſays that he " had ſeen and heard, during near forty years, what " paſſed in that Univerſity: Multa per annos fere " quadraginta in Academia Pariſienſi vidi & audivi. " I do not know that the names of ſuch ſcholars " are written in the Univerſity books, as are but in " the ſixth and other low claſſes, but only the Phi- " loſophers, &c. III. Ramus informs us that he had " many misfortunes in his youth, &c. of which " Bayle himſelf takes notice. Would it therefore be " probable, that he was put to ſchool at twelve years " of age, that he purſued his ſtudies afterwards " without interruption, &c? IV. Ramus, in his Actio " ſecunda againſt Charpentier, in March 1566. expa- " tiated on his ſilver hair and his old age, (pag. " 22.) Rami canos . . . . & annos, &c. imagining " that theſe would make his adverſaries reverence " him. If we ſuppoſe him ſixty four years of age, " he would have ſpoke with propriety; but on the " contrary, he muſt have expreſſed himſelf very ri- " diculouſly, had he been but fifty one or fifty two " years old. It is to be obſerved that Charpentier " his adverſary, againſt whom he oppoſed his white " hair and his age as a buckler, had, at that " time, been upwards of twenty two years Profeſſor " in the Univerſity in queſtion; and conſequently " forty five years old, or thereabouts, at leaſt. Un- " leſs a man ſhould doat before he comes to old age, " would ſuch a man, becauſe he was fifty two years " old, lay any ſtreſs upon his old age, to get the bet- " ter of a cauſe over an adverſary, who was forty " five at leaſt? V. Charpentier in his ſpeech againſt " Ramus, ſpeaks of him as an old man who might " be allowed to doat becauſe of his advanced age. " See page 4. of Jacobi Carpentarii . . . contra impor- " tunas Rami actiones . . . . . Oratio habita initio pro- " feſſionis (Mathematicæ) in Auditorio regio an. 1566. " Cal. April. He there ſays, Ramum qui ÆTATIS " beneficio Regii Gymnaſii Decanus, &c. And page 51. " Ramo JAM GRANDI ÆTATE erat, conſiderandum, " &c. He ſays, page 12. that meeting Ramus, he " had ſaluted him, imagining that he owed that " reſpect

(1) Teiſſier, Addit. à Monſr. de Thou, Tom. 1. p. 371. edit. 1699.

(2) Theophilus Banoſius, in Vita Petri Rami, p. 2.

mainder of his days, by making and ſelling coal. He left a ſon, who got his bread by following huſbandry (b), and was the father of our Ramus, that is, of a man who was the ſport of fortune; his life being one perpetual viciſſitude of proſperity and adverſity. A thirſt of learning having prompted him at eight years of age, to go to Paris (c); he was forced by poverty to leave that city; but returned to it as ſoon as he could, when being unable to ſupport himſelf, he left it a ſecond time; but his paſſion for ſtudy was ſo violent, that notwithſtanding he had been unfortunate in two journies, he yet went once again to look for a place in that city. He was maintained there during ſome months by one of his uncles, after which he was obliged to be a ſervant in the College of Navarre [B]. Spending the day in waiting upon his maſters, and the greateſt part of the

(b) Ex eodem Theophilo Banoſio, in Vita Petri Rami, p. 2.

(c) Ibid. p. 3.

" reſpect to his long beard, and his advanced age, " &c. quod exiſtimarem hoc ætati & barbæ deberi, " &c. Ramus did not return him the bow, nor to " thoſe who accompanied him, among whom was " Leger du Cheſne (Leodegarius à Quercu) and were " ſurpriſed, on that occaſion, at SENIS ineptias, &c. " All thoſe people were acquainted with Ramus, and " particularly Charpentier, who, as I have already " obſerved, had been a Profeſſor ever ſince October " 1543. I believe they do not know very exactly " Ramus's age, and that they perhaps thought him " older by ſome years than he really was; but then " it is no ways probable, that he was ſo far miſtaken " as thoſe are who fix his birth at 1515. VI. John " Dorat, who was one of Ramus's adverſaries in " that quarrel, wrote the year following 1567, a ſa- " tyr upon him, entitled, Decanatus, Hoc eſt in Petrum " Ramum Decanatum Collegii Profeſſorum Regiorum ſibi " vindicantem. We there find that Ramus called " himſelf Dean of the Royal College, not only be- " cauſe he was at that time the moſt ancient Pro- " feſſor, but becauſe he was the oldeſt of them all. " He pretended alſo, as he was Dean, to be thereby " entitled to a kind of ſuperiority, or juriſdiction, " imagining himſelf to have a right to examine the " Profeſſors, &c. Our Poet in his anger, as he him- " ſelf confeſſes by the hemiſtich which he joins to " his piece, GENUS irritabile vatum, alludes pleaſant- " ly enough to the names of his two antagoniſts, " Charpentier and Ramus, ſignifying branch, &c.

" Tua ligna tortuoſa
" ANNOSA CARIOSA DE SENECTA
" (Carpentarius) . . . . LABORE pertinaci
" Runcinat, dolat atque deſcobinat,
" Planat, lævigat, aſciat, remulcat,
" Torquet, dirigit, exigit bicrucis
" Ad normæ juga, pendulamque amuſſim
" Aptat, denique circinat, terebrat,
" Et quæ cætera nota ſunt tibi ipſi
" Ex Fabri patrui tibi officina,
" A quo prima rudis tibi atque craſſa
" Monſtrata eſt PURO Matheſis;
" De qua tu tamen ipſe diſciplina
" Te jactans SENIOR ſuperbienſque, &c.

" Theſe are all the terms, which denote what is done " by a carpenter, who intends to employ in ſome " work, the bough of a tree that is quite worm- " eaten through age. Dorat ſays, & cætera quæ, " &c. becauſe he ſuppoſes that Ramus underſtood all " the terms of the trade; he having been brought up " at an uncle's, a carpenter, who taught him ſome " of the lower parts of the mathematicks. (It ap- " pears by the remark [B] hereunder of Bayle, that " this uncle of Ramus's was named Carpentier, but " Dorat ſuppoſes it was his trade. See Dorat, pag. " 282.) Dorat indeed does not ſay that Ramus was " the oldeſt of all the Profeſſors, but then he does " not deny it. He contents himſelf with ſaying to " him, that if he is the oldeſt, he is not therefore " the wiſer, p. 278.

" . . . . Nec unus inter illos (ſodales)
" Unus fortè vetuſtior, nec unus (es)
" Ni longa, ſapientior, bifurcæ
" Barbæ canitie. Si ecce contra
" Te tuamque ſenilitatem
" Reclamat . . . . . .
" Mens tua nec ſatis ſenilis
" Et pluſquam pueriliter ſuperba . , . .

" And page 283.

" Audes tam tibi tamen placere
" Ut noſter ſtudeas Decanus eſſe
" Cum non ſis ſenior, ſaniorve,
" Vel quamvis ſenior, tamen cerebro
" Nullos de ſeniere ſat ſeniles
" Senſus dictaque proferas . . . .

And page 287.

" . . . . . Heus tu
" Longa canitie ſenex verende . . . . .
" Et vis ut ſenior Decanus eſſe . . . . .

" Ramus's collegues at that time were, John le " Mercier, John de cinq Arbres, Denys Lambin, du " Hamel &c. If Leger du Cheſne, who certainly " was his collegue in 1568, was the ſame in that " year 1567, Dorat had juſt reaſon to doubt whe- " ther Ramus was really the oldeſt of the profeſſors " as he pretended to be, for Du Cheſne was in 1701. " After all, I believe that every one who reads what " Dorat ſays of Ramus's advanced age, (Dorat might " have known him thirty years) muſt ſuppoſe Ramus " to have been at that time more than 51 or 52 " years of age. By the way Dorat looked upon " Ramus as much older than himſelf. Bayle could " not anſwer this laſt circumſtance, which forms an " argument ad hominem againſt him. [According " to Bayle, whom I refuted under the Article DAU- " RAT, the latter was born in 1507, conſequently " he muſt, according to Bayle, have been eight " years older than Ramus. But I do not lay any " ſtreſs on this, becauſe I proved, in the ſame place, " that Dorat was not born till the year 1517 *."]

* From the remarks to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 979, 980.

[B] He was obliged to be a ſervant in the College of Navarre.] I have followed Banoſius, and not Joſeph Scaliger. The latter pretends that Ramus was a ſervant when he went to Paris (3). Ramus ad annum uſque decimum nonum, ne quidem primas notas didicerat, inſerviebatque Dom. de la Broſſe (4). Lutetiam deductus tantum famulus profecit maximo diſcendi deſiderio percitus, ut quamvis repugnante ingenio tardo, rudi & ſtupido; repugnante, quod majus eſt, inſtitutione ſera: labore & diligentia in id litterarum decus pervenerit, quò pervenire vix credibile ſit, ita ut anno trigeſimo contra Ariſtotelem ſcripſerit meliori ſtylo quam poſterioribus annis. i. e. " Ramus did not know his letters, when he was " nineteen years old, and was Mr. de la Broſſe's ſer- " vant. Though brought to Paris only in quality of " a ſervant, he yet was fired with ſo ſtrong a thirſt " for learning, that though he was of a ſlow and hea- " vy genius, and what was a ſtill greater obſtacle, did " not apply himſelf to ſtudy till late; yet by his care " and pains, he attained to ſuch a perfection in " learning as is almoſt incredible; inſomuch that he " wrote, in the thirtieth year of his age, againſt " Ariſtotle in a better ſtyle than in his riper years." I can ſcarce believe all that we are here told by the great Scaliger; it is no ways probable that Ramus lived till the age of nineteen (5) without being able to read, nor that he was dull and heavy in his underſtanding. Be this as it will, he was not thirty when he began to write againſt Ariſtotle; his book, after a thouſand conteſts, was condemned the 10th of May 1543, at which time he was but eight and twenty. I therefore ſhould chooſe to credit Banoſius, who relates that Ramus, at eight years of age, came to Paris of his own accord, &c. Anno ætatis ſuæ circiter octavo ſponte Lutetiam venit, & inde bis abductus violentia temporis, bis eodem tamen, quam libet reflantib. ventis reverſus, & ardenti diſcendi ſtudio incenſus, ab Honorato Carpenterio avunculo victum per aliquot menſes perexiguum accepit, ut artes addiſceret: deinceps neceſſitate

(3) Scaligerana prim, p. 127.

(4) Teiſſier, Addit. Tom. 1. p. 371, imagines that Scaliger ſpeaks of a Lady; but Dom. is the contraction of Domini as well as Dominæ.

(5) Teiſſier, ib. citing the Scaligerana 1. ſays only nine years.

the night in ſtudy (d), he made ſo conſiderable a progreſs, that when he took his Maſter of Arts Degree, he offered to maintain a quite oppoſite doctrine to that of Ariſtotle, or whatever might be objected to him (e) [C]; but it muſt be obſerved that, before this, he had gone through a courſe of Philoſophy, which took him up three years and a half in the ſchools (f). He anſwered extremely well the objections which were made him during a whole day. This ſucceſs gave him an inclination to examine the doctrine of Ariſtotle more cloſely, and to combat it vigorouſly; but he applied himſelf to little more than the improving the ſcience of logic: all his ſtudy was directed to that, and even all the lectures of eloquence which he uſed to read to his pupils (g). The two firſt books he publiſhed, the one entitled, Inſtitutiones Dialecticæ, the other Ariſtotelicæ Animadverſiones, occaſioned great diſturbances in the Univerſity of Paris [D]: and Francis I. was obliged to intermeddle in this affair; and to bring before himſelf the cauſe carrying (d) Ex eodem, ib.

(e) Jo. Thomas Freigius, in Vita Petri Rami, p. m. 10.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Idem, p. 10 and 11.

tate coactus multos annos duram ſervitutem in collegio Navarræ ſervivit. Sed quum interdiu dominis ſuis fidelem operam præſtitiſſet, nocte, Cleanthis Philoſophi exemplo non diſſimili, oleo & lucerna diſciplinarum lumen brevi tempore tantum ſibi comparavit, ut artium liberalium laurea ſit donatus (6). i. e. "When he was about "eight years of age, he travelled to Paris of his own "accord; and though drove twice from thence by "the violent commotions, he yet returned twice to "that city, though very much oppoſed by fortune; "when being fired with a ſtrong thirſt for learning, "he contented himſelf with being ſlenderly ſubſiſted, during ſome months, by Honoratus Charpentier his uncle, in order to have an opportunity of "attaining the liberal ſciences. Neceſſity afterwards "obliged him to undergo, during many years, a hard "ſervice in the College of Navarre. But as he uſed "to diſcharge his duty faithfully to his maſters in "the day-time, ſo, in the night, in imitation of "Cleanthes the Philoſopher, he, by the aſſiſtance of "his oil and lamp, made ſo great a progreſs in a "ſhort time in the liberal arts, that he was admitted "to a degree in the Univerſity." But here follows a ſtrong proof againſt Banoſius, which I borrow from Ramus's own words, as related by John Freigius. Confiteor vitam mihi totam acerbiſſimis fluctibus jactatam eſſe. Puer vix è cunis egreſſus duplici peſte laboravi: juvenis invita modiſque omnibus repugnante fortuna Lutetiam ad capeſſendas artes ingenuas veni, inde bis abductus violentia temporis, bis eodem tamen quamlibet reflantibus ventis reverſus, atque eò ardentiore diſcendi ſtudio incenſus, quò vehementius prohibebar (7). i. e. "I will "own that all my life has been the ſport of ill "fortune. When but a child I laboured under a "double calamity; and when I was grown up, and "a young man, I came to Paris to learn the liberal "arts, fortune being my enemy in all reſpects. "Though I was drove twice from that city by the "commotions which then raged, I nevertheleſs returned twice thither, though in the moſt unhappy "circumſtances, and was fired with the ſtronger "thirſt for learning, in proportion as I was prevented from ſatiating it." If Ramus was but eight years old the firſt time he went to Paris, would he have employed the word juvenis? would he not have made uſe of the word puer? Surely not. [As Bayle ſays above that Ramus, after having been ſubſiſted ſome months by his uncle, was a ſervant in the College of Navarre, this ſeems to prove very ſtrongly, that he was not then a boy of only twelve years old; for what ſervice could a child of that age do in a College, &c (*)?]

(6) Banoſius, in Vita Petri Rami, p. 3.

(7) Joh. Th. Freigius, in Vita Petri Rami, p. 7. ex Scheckiano epilogo Rami.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 980. col. 1.

[C] He offered to maintain a doctrine quite oppoſite to that of Ariſtotle, on whatever might be objected to him.] Taſſoni looks upon this as a great boldneſs. Ma più audace, ſays he (8), fu la prova di Pietro Ramo, autore per altro poco degno d'eſſere nominato. Queſti dovendo ſecondo l'uſo di Parigi ſoſtener concluſioni prima che foſſe creato Maeſtro, per bizarria d'ingegno propoſe queſta ſola a qualunque voleſſe argumentare, dando libero campo à tutti. Quæcunque ab Ariſtotele dicta ſint, falſa, & commentitia eſſe. La quale havendo eccitati contra di lui tutti gl'ingegni, tutte le profeſſioni, tutte le ſcuole; egli nondimeno con tanta protezza, e ſottigliezza di riſpoſte la diſeſe, che fe remaner confuſa e ſtupita la Città di Parigi: E ben ne' ſuoi libri appariſcono ancora i ſegni della ſua audacia. i. e. "But bolder ſtill was the proof given "by Peter Ramus, an author, in other reſpects, not "worthy of being mentioned. This man being, according to the cuſtom of Paris, to maintain ſome "theſes before he took his Maſter of Arts degree, "was ſo whimſical as to maintain the following "doctrine to whomſoever ſhould oppoſe it, that "whatever Ariſtotle has advanced is falſe and feigned. "This having made all ſorts of ſcholars, men of "every profeſſion, and all the ſchools his enemies, "he nevertheleſs defended himſelf with ſo much "quickneſs and ſubtlety, that the whole city of Paris "was ſurprized and confounded; and the marks of "his boldneſs are ſtill ſeen in his writings." The beſt of all is, he does not deny but that the reſpondent defended this theſis with ſo much ſubtlety, that all Paris was ſurprized. Here follows what Freigius relates concerning this adventure. Lutetiæ magiſterii titulum ſuſcepturus, pro more & conſuetudine ſcholarum liberam diſputandi copiam examinatoribus facere cogebatur. Problema igitur ſumpſit: Quæcunque ab Ariſtotele dicta eſſent, commentitia eſſe. Attoniti novitate & inſolentia problematis Magiſtri, cùm authoritatem Ariſtotelis (qua tanquam ſcuto ſeſe ad omnes inſultus muniri conſueverunt) ſibi ereptam viderent, irrito conatu per diem integrum, Magiſtrandum (ut barbari barbarè vocant) oppugnarunt. Ex hoc fortuito ſucceſſu anſam deinceps ſeriò & liberè in Ariſtotelem animadvertendi & inquirendi arripuit (9). i. e. "When he was going to take "his Maſter of Art's Degree in Paris, he was "forced, purſuant to the cuſtom of the ſchools, "to give the examiners full liberty of diſputing "with him. He therefore advanced the following "problem; that whatever Ariſtotle has advanced is "falſe. Our Maſters or Profeſſors being ſurpriſed at "the novelty and inſolence of ſuch a problem, "as they ſaw that they were going to be diſpoſſeſſed of the authority of Ariſtotle, which they "uſed to make uſe of as a ſhield, to defend themſelves againſt all attacks; they in vain employed "a whole day to prevent his taking his Maſter's "Degree: and from this accidental ſucceſs he afterwards took an occaſion to enquire ſeriouſly and "freely into Ariſtotle's opinions." [I very much doubt, 1ſt, That he offered to maintain an oppoſite doctrine, &c. 2dly, That his examination laſted a whole day. I am firmly perſuaded, that, beſides that this is the uſual cuſtom, he would not, in that caſe, have been admitted to his Maſter's Degree *.

(9) Freigius, in Vita Petri Rami, p. 9, 10.

* See the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 980. col. 1.

[D] The two firſt books he publiſhed . . . . occaſioned great diſturbances in the Univerſity of Paris.] The Profeſſors of Paris, who were admirers of Ariſtotle, ought to have refuted Ramus's books by writings and lectures; but inſtead of confining themſelves within the juſt bounds of academical wars, they proſecuted that Anti-peripatetic before the civil Magiſtrate, as a man who was going to ſap all the foundations of religion. They raiſed ſuch clamours, that the cauſe was carried before the Parliament of Paris; but the moment they perceived it would be examined equitably, and according to the uſual forms, they, by their intrigues, took it from that tribunal, and brought it before the King's Council. Vix Ariſtotelicæ animadverſiones lectæ erant, cum Petrus Ramus repente non ad humanam aliquam, & literis uſitatam diſputationem ab Academia vocatur, ſed ad Prætorii tribunalis capitalem contentionem per certos homines falſo Academiæ nomine rapitur, novique & ante hunc diem inauditi criminis accuſatur, quòd Ariſtoteli repugnando Theologiam & artes enervaret. Hac enim oratione Ariſtotelea actio inſtituta eſt. Hinc Ariſtoteleorum clamoribus agitatus ad ſummum Pariſienſis Curiæ conſilium traducitur: deinde cum legitimo judicii more res agi, atque apertiùs iniquiſſimæ fraudis invidia percipi videretur, novis artibus à Senatu Pariſienſi ad regiam carrying on in the Parliament at Paris, between Ramus and Anthony Govea. Judges were aſſigned to the parties, to pronounce on their controverſy after they ſhould have ended cognitionem disjicitur (10). i. e. " Ramus's animad- " verſions on Ariſtotle had ſcarce been read, but he " was ſent for, not by the Univerſity to diſpute on " ſome learned ſubject as uſual; but was dragged " by certain perſons who falſely called themſelves " the Univerſity, and carried to the Judge, before " whom he was impeached of a new, and till then, " unheard of crime, viz. that he weakened divi- " nity and the liberal arts, by his oppoſing Ariſtotle; " the Ariſtotelian pleading begun with this " ſpeech. It was brought from hence, by the cla- " mours of the Ariſtotelians, before the Parliament " of Paris; but thoſe afterwards perceiving, that " the cauſe would be tried there legally, and that their " abominable frauds were diſcovered more and more, " they got it removed, by new artifices, from the " Parliament of Paris to his Majeſty's Council." The King ordained, that Anthony Govea, who had offered to oppoſe and refute the ſaid books, and the ſaid Ramus who ſupported and defended them, ſhould nominate and chooſe, each of them reſpectively, two worthy men well ſkilled in Greek and Latin, and verſed in Philoſophy (11). Purſuant to this ordinance, Govea and Ramus choſe each two perſons. Peter Danes and Francis Vicomercat were pitched upon by Govea; John Quintin, Doctor of the Canon Law, and John de Beaumont, Doctor of Phyſick, were choſen by Ramus. His Majeſty appointed for the fifth, John de Salignac, Doctor of Divinty. The preamble to the letters patents is as follows. " Before whom (12) " the ſaid Govea and Ramus would have been heard " in their diſputes and conteſts, till the ſaid Ramus, " to put a ſtop to the affair, lodging an appeal from " the ſaid cenſors, which coming to our ear, we " iſſued out letters patents, directed to our Provoſt of " Paris, or his Lieutenant, to compel the ſaid Govea " and Ramus to put an end to their diſputes; in or- " der that the ſaid information might be given us, " by the ſaid cenſors, notwithſtanding any appeal to " the contrary. Purſuant to theſe letters, the ſaid " Govea and Ramus appeared again before the ſaid " Cenſors; when the ſaid Ramus finding he could " not defend the ſaid books, he declared he would " diſpute no longer, and that he would ſubmit them " to the cenſure of the ſaid Judges. And as they " would have proceeded in it, the ſaid Quintin and " Beaumont declared reſpectively that they would no " longer be concerned in it. Upon this the ſaid " Ramus was ſummoned and required to nominate " and chooſe two others, which he refuſed to do, and " ſubmitted entirely to the judgment of the three " others abovementioned. Theſe having examined " and conſidered the whole matter, declared it as " their opinion, that the ſaid Ramus was raſh, ar- " rogant, and impudent, for having rejected and " condemned the logic received by all nations, of " which he himſelf was ignorant; and that his ig- " norance was manifeſt, from his daring to reprove " Ariſtotle in his book of Animadverſions. Far- " ther, that he ſhewed his evil intention for pretend- " ing to blame Ariſtotle for many things which he " never once dreamt of. In the whole, that the " ſaid book of Animadverſions was ſtuffed with lies " and ſlanders; and therefore that it would be of " advantage to learning to have the ſaid book en- " tirely ſuppreſt. In like manner the other book, " entitled, Dialecticæ Inſtitutiones, as containing alſo " many falſities, and particulars that are foreign to " the ſubject." The King's order upon this is as follows. " We declare, that having ſeen the ſaid " information, and had other informations and de- " liberations about it, with many learned and wor- " thy men, we have condemned, ſuppreſſed, and " aboliſhed, and do condemn, ſuppreſs, and aboliſh, " the ſaid two books, the one entitled, Inſtitutiones " Dialecticæ, and the other Ariſtotelicæ Animadverſiones; " and we have forbiden, and do forbid all printers and " bookſellers of our kingdom, country, territories and " lordſhips; and all our other ſubjects of what rank " or condition ſoever, not to print again, or cauſe " to be printed the ſaid books; nor to publiſh, ſell, " or put off, in our ſaid kingdoms, countries, terri- " tories, and lordſhips, upon pain of forfeiting the " ſaid books, and of corporal puniſhment, whether " printed in our ſaid kingdoms, countries, territories " and lordſhips, or other places not ſubject to us. " We alſo command the ſaid Ramus not to read the " ſaid books any more; not to cauſe them to be " writ, copied, publiſhed, nor diſperſed in any man- " ner; nor to read any logical or philoſophical Lec- " tures without our expreſs permiſſion firſt obtained. " Likewiſe not to employ any more invectives and " ſlanders againſt Ariſtotle, nor againſt any other " ancient Authors received and approved; nor againſt " our ſaid daughter the Univerſity, and members " thereof upon the penalty above-mentioned. We " therefore order and command, &c. (13)."

(10) Audomarus Talæus, in ſua ad Carolum Lotharingium Cardinalem Academia, apud Launoium de varia Ariſtotelis fortuna, p. 57, 58. Paris 1653.

(11) Theſe are the words of the King's letters patents, dated the 10th of May 1543. See Launoi, de varia Ariſtotelis fortuna, p. m. 52. Theſe letters patents of the King are inſerted in du Verdier Vau-Privas's Bibl. Franc. under the word Pierre de la Ramée.

(12) i. e. the five Judges; him nominated by the King, and the four choſen by the parties.

(13) See Launoi, de varia Ariſtotelis fortuna, p. 52.

The man who hears but one party hears nothing; for which reaſon it will be proper for me to relate the whole proceedings, as given by one of Ramus's friends. Ramus, in obedience to his Majeſty's orders, appeared before the five Judges, though three of them were great enemies to him. They diſputed two days, He aſſerted that Ariſtotle's logic was imperfect, becauſe it did not contain either definitions or diviſions. The two Judges choſen by him declared in writing, the firſt day, that definition is neceſſary in all regular diſputes (14): but the three others declared in writing, that logic may be perfect without definition (15). They acknowledged the next day in writing, that diviſion is neceſſary to logic; but ſeeing that Ramus concluded from thence, that he had reaſon to condemn Ariſtotle's logic, ſince it was not divided, they put off the affair to another day; when finding that they themſelves were ſo much puzzled that they could not get off with honour, they declared that it would be neceſſary to begin the diſpute again, and look upon whatever had been tranſacted the two days before as nothing. Ne non damnaretur Ramus, novum conſilium initur ut ab initio tota diſputatio retexatur, & adhuc injudicata induceretur, proque nihilo haberetur (16). Ramus complained aloud of this procedure, in which the Judges not only ſhewed that they deſigned to condemn him, but alſo that they themſelves annulled their own judgment. He therefore excepted againſt them, and entered an appeal againſt whatever they might decree. However, his appeal was annulled by Francis I. who ordained that the five Judges ſhould pronounce definitively in that cauſe. Upon this the two Judges nominated by Ramus withdrew, being unwilling to be preſent at the judgment, as they foreſaw that it would be unjuſt (17). The other three pronounced whatever their paſſion and prejudice ſuggeſted; and the King's mind was ſo greatly prepoſſeſſed by falſe reports, that they obtained a confirmation of their ſentence. Hæc omnia Regis, licet omnium Regum & humaniſſimi & literarum amantiſſimi, tamen per falſas & improbiſſimè confictas calumnias inducti, auctoritate confirmantur (18). i. e. " Though no Monarch was " of a more tender diſpoſition, or had a ſtronger " love for literature than Francis I. nevertheleſs all " theſe ſentences were confirmed by his Royal Au- " thority, which the perſons in queſtion had obtained " by the falſeſt and moſt villainouſly contrived ca- " lumnies." I am to obſerve that the King declares in his letters patents, that Ramus ſubmitted entirely to what theſe three Judges ſhould determine, after the other two had withdrawn themſelves. Now this incident is falſe according to the Author cited by me; for after having ſaid that the two Judges would not concern themſelves any farther with the proceedings, he adds, that Ramus did the ſame; and that the three others condemned him unheard. Idemque Ramus ipſe non ſine ſtomacho, cùm à tribus illis contumeliosè illuderetur, fecit, & ſe tempora ſperare dixit, quibus tales judices de ſuo facto nequaquam parem eſſent voluptatem percepturi. Ita vi victa vel certe hominum quorumcunque opinione ad tempus oppreſſa cauſa eſt. Condemnantur igitur triumvirali ſententia, non modò indicta, ſed incognita planè cauſa, animadverſiones Ariſtotelicæ (19). i. e. " Ramus was greatly diſguſted to " ſee

(14) Omnem diſputationem quæ via & ratione procederet definitione proficiſci debere. Audom. Talæus, in Academia, apud Launoium, ibid. p. 58.

(15) Ad Dialecticæ artis perfectionem definitione nihil opus eſſe. Idem. ibid.

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Ex eo autem conſeſſu ſe diſcedere quia ſe non ſocios conſiliis, ſed injuriæ quæ Ramo fieret adhibitos teſtes intelligerent. Idem, ibid.

(18) Idem, ibid p. 59.

(19) Idem, ibid.

ended their diſputation. Govea had all the advantages he could deſire; Ramus's books being prohibited in all parts of the Kingdom, and their Author ſentenced not to teach Philoſophy any longer. His enemies diſcovered a moſt ſurprizing joy on that account [E]. This happened in 1543. The year following, the plague made great havock in Paris, and forced moſt of the Students in the college de Prele to quit it; but Ramus being prevailed upon to teach in it, ſoon drew a great number of auditors (b). The Sorbonne attempted to drive him from that college, but to no purpoſe, he maintaining the Headſhip of that houſe by Arret of Parliament (i). [" I imagine that theſe incidents, (from " the year 1543, mentioned above) are miſplaced, and that Ramus was not Principal " of de Preſle college ſo early as is mentioned here. It was in the college of Ave Ma- " ria, that Ramus, Omer, Talon, and Bartholomew Alexander, opened their ſchools " together, the 4th of November 1544, where each of them made a ſpeech. Talon, " who ſpoke firſt, was for polite Literature, Alexander for the Greek tongue, and Ra- " mus for the Mathematicks. Theſe orations were printed under the following title: " Tres orationes à tribus liberalium Diſciplinarum Profeſſoribus Petro Ramo, Audomaro " Taleo, Bartholomeo Alexandro Lutetiæ, in gymnaſio Mariano habitæ, & ab eorum diſ- " cipulis exceptæ, Anno Salutis 1544. Pridie Nonas Novembris. Paris, 4to, containing " 16 leaves *."] The Cardinal of Lorrain proved ſo generous a Patron to him, that he obtained from Henry II. the liberty of writing and ſpeaking in 1547; and the royal Profeſſorſhip in Philoſophy and Eloquence, in July 1551 (k). The Parliament of Paris had, before this, maintained him in the liberty of joining Philoſophical Lectures to thoſe of Eloquence (l), which Arret or Decree had put an end to ſeveral proſecutions, which (b) Theoph. Banoſius, in Vita Rami, p. 7.

(i) Idem, ibid.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 980. col. 1, 2.

(k) See the rem. [L].

(l) Theoph. Banoſius, in Vita Rami, p. 7 and 8.

" ſee himſelf ſo ſcandalouſly uſed by the three men " in queſtion; and ſaid, that he hoped the time " would come when ſuch Judges as they ſhould not " reap ſo much pleaſure from what they had done. " Thus being overcome by force, and the opinion of " certain men, the cauſe was trampled upon for a " time. In this manner the animadverſions in A- " riſtotle were condemned by the ſentence of three " men, not only without their ſhewing any cauſe, " but without any cauſe being known." It might be obſerved, that this incident is related in this manner, not in any anonymous work, but in a piece which Audomarus Talæus dedicated to the Cardinal of Lorrain. If we give credit to this, we muſt reject as a fable what Peter Galland relates. He ſays that Francis I. being informed that a certain Sophiſt was perpetually inveighing againſt Ariſtotle, Cicero and Quintilian, had reſolved to ſend him to the gallies; but that Caſtellanus mentioned another kind of puniſhment, which was, to oblige this Sophiſt in queſtion to engage in a diſpute, in which his folly would be ſhewn, by the ſilence to which he would be reduced. The King was pleaſed with this expedient; and when he ſaw that the perſon in queſtion was put to a nonplus, he was contented with inflicting this puniſhment on him. Peter Galland hints at Ramus on this occaſion; but it muſt be remembred that the former was his great enemy. Cùm in hac ſchola ante annos octo Sophiſta famoſus Muſis iratis natus, gloriæ popularis ſiti inexplebili præceps, Ariſtotele, Cicerone, & Quintiliano petulanter & ignoranter vexatis, nullum finem in quemvis auctorem claſſicum debacchandi facturus videretur, priuſquam præſentem literarum ſtatum labefactaſſet, & ad ſuam libidinem pervertiſſet; permulti doctrina & virtute conſpicui homines audaciam tam prodigioſam indigniſſime tulerunt. Cumque de eo apud regem ita conqueſti eſſent, ut ille, pro ſua perpetua in literas & literarum Profeſſoris benevolentia, hunc indignabundus ad remum damnatum triremibus addicere ſtatueret, Regis animum faceti leporis ſuavitate emollitum, ad mitiorem ſententiam traduxit. Sophiſtam nugantem & inepte philoſophantem ab humaniſſimo Rege nullo capitali ſupplicio puniendum eſſe. Verum cum doctis hominibus coram gravibus diſceptatoribus in diſputationis certamen commiſſum, argumentis convincendum, & ratione aliqua leviore ad ſanitatem reducendum. Quorum ſententiæ, cum illum Rex inſcitiæ, impudentiæ, & temeritatis damnatum, ſilentiique pœna multatum vidiſſet, facile acquievit, neque acerbius quicquam in eum ſtatuit (20). [" Bayle is right in ſaying that as ſoon as the two " books hinted at in the beginning of this note were " publiſhed, they occaſioned great troubles &c. Theſe " troubles broke out in December 1543; and Bayle, " as well as ſeveral before him, who dated the diſ- " pute between Ramus and Govea, and the letters " patents againſt Ramus, in May 1543, are miſ- " taken; the whole being in 1544. It is to be ob- " ſerved that theſe letters patents are dated, in ſome " books 1543, and in others 1544; but that it is always " expreſſed anno regni noſtri trigeſimo, and in the " French, le trentiéme de notre regne (the thirtieth year " of our age,) which plainly points at the year 1544. " The thirtieth year of this Prince's reign began the " firſt of January of that year, ſince he aſcended " the throne the firſt of January 1515 *."]

(20) Petrus Gallandius, in Vita Petri Caſtellani, num. 45. p. 75, 76.

[E] His enemies diſcovered a moſt ſurprizing joy.] They made a greater noiſe, in proportion, than the proudeſt Princes for the taking of a conſiderable city, or the winning of a very important victory. The ſentence of the three Judges was publiſhed in Latin and French in all the ſtreets of Paris, and in all parts of Europe whither it could be ſent. Plays were acted with great pomp, in which Ramus was mocked and abuſed a thouſand ways, in the midſt of the acclamations and applauſes of the Ariſtotelians (21). Triumphus de tam nobili victoria mirificus agitur, triſtis illa & horrenda Triumvirûm ſententia impreſſis & Latina & Gallica oratione libellis, non modo per hujus urbis compita, ſed per orbis terrarum loca omnia, quò expectari potuit (22), promulgatur. Ludi magno apparatu celebrantur, ubi ſpectantibus & plaudentibus Ariſtoteleis, omni ludibrii & convicii genere Ramus afficitur. [" I " look upon a great many particulars concerning " Ramus, as related by Bayle, to be doubtful, but I " have not time to make the proper inquiries, nor " all the books requiſite for that purpoſe. Freigius, " from whom Bayle has ſo often borrowed in this " life, was not, in my opinion, ſufficiently informed " of particulars, and flattered Ramus too much, of " which I will here give an inſtance. He tells us, " in the remark [K] of Bayle, that Ramus was of " a very diſintereſted a turn of mind, that he refuſed " ſome advantageous profeſſorſhips, and choſe rather to " teach in the College of Preſle, though he had not a " publick ſalary there. He adds, that he did not ac- " cept of any preſents from his pupils &c. He tells us " on the other hand in the ſame place, that he main- " tained ſome ſtudents at his own expence. It is like- " wiſe very certain that Ramus had purchaſed 700 " livres a year, in the Town-houſe of Paris, before, " the year 1568, as appears from his will remark " [N] in Bayle. He alſo had a valuable library, " which, it is ſaid, was worth a thouſand crowns, " and which was plundered in 1562. Now do not " theſe laſt incidents evidently deſtroy what we are " told by Freigius? Ramus was poor in himſelf, and " had no patrimony; this is an undoubted fact. If " therefore he had no ſalary when he was profeſſor, " and did not accept of any preſents from his pupils, " how could he be maſter of a fund amounting to " fourteen thouſand livres; of a library valued at a " thouſand crowns; and be able to defray the expences " *of ſome pupils ? "]

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Tom. 4. p. 980. col. 1.

(21) Idem, Talæus, apud Launoium, de varia Ariſtotelis fortuna, p. 59. See alſo Ramus's Life by J. Tho. Freigius, p. 17.

(22) Thus we read in Mr. de Launoi, de varia Ariſtotelis fortuna, p. 60; but Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 17. relating the ſame paſſage of Talæus, ſays quo exportari potuit.

* From the rem. edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 980, col. 2.

which Ramus and his pupils had ſuffered. They had been proſecuted ſeveral ways [F], both before the Univerſity Judges and the Civil Magiſtrates (m), during the winter of the year 1551 (n). As ſoon as he was made Regius Profeſſor, he was fired with a new zeal for improving the Sciences; and was extremely laborious and active on this occaſion, in ſpite of the hatred of his enemies, who were never at reſt; and who even affirmed, that the manner in which himſelf and his Collegues pronounced the letter Q, was an innovation, for which he deſerved to be proſecuted [G]. They carried their animoſity to ſuch lengths, that he was obliged to conceal himſelf; and went, for that

(m) Jo. Thomas Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 18 & ſeq.

(n) Ramus, in Orat. habita anno 1551. p. m. 9.

[F] They had been proſecuted ſeveral ways.] I ſhall not relate the particulars of thoſe perſecutions, but will refer the reader to Freigius (23). I ſhall only obſerve, that when Ramus's enemies perceived that the reſt of the complaints did not make impreſſion enough, they accuſed him of perverting the minds of young perſons, by ſowing in them the ſeeds of hereſy and ſcepticiſm. Unius primum accuſationem graviſſimam audivit, ramum Academicum nominantis, & inaudita calumnia deſcribentis, humanarum divinarumq; rerum hoſtem & inimicum, qui de humanis diviniſque legibus addubitaret, deque iis dubitare diſcipulos ſuos doceret: qui lubricos Divi Auguſtini locos ſuis auditoribus ad effrænatam & impiam libertatem proponeret, qui (quò facilius incautis animis abuteretur) omnes Logicas diſputationes tolleret (24). i. e. "The firſt thing he heard (the "heavieſt of all accuſations) was the charge of one "perſon againſt Ramus, againſt whom he vented un"heard of calumnies, and declared that he was an "enemy to all learning both divine and human; "who not only doubted in his mind, of the laws "both of God and men, but alſo taught his pupils "to entertain the ſame doubts; who employed ſome "dangerous paſſages of St. Auſtin, to his auditors, "to inforce an unbridled and impious liberty; and "who, that he might the more eaſily impoſe on "thoughtleſs, unwary ſouls, inſiſted that all logical "diſputations ſhould be taken away."

(25) Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 18 & ſeq.

(24) Idem, ib. p. 20. this is extracted from Ramus's inaugural ſpeech, ſpoke in 1551.

[G] The manner in which himſelf and his collegues pronounced the letter Q.] The regius profeſſors corrected, among other abuſes, that which had crept into the pronunciation of the Latin. Some of the Clergy followed this regulation, though the Sorboniſts were ſo much offended at this innovation. A Miniſter who had a good living was very ill treated by them on that account, they cauſing him to be ejected from his benefice. He applied to the Parliament, and the regius profeſſors fearing he would fall a victim to the credit and authority of the faculty of Divines, for preſuming to pronounce the Latin tongue purſuant to their regulations, they thought it incumbent on them to aſſiſt him. Accordingly they went to the Court of Juſtice; and repreſented in ſuch ſtrong terms the indignity of ſuch a proſecution, that the perſon accuſed was cleared. Quas novas turbas innovata pronunciatio peperit? Sub annum milleſimum quingenteſimum quinquageſimum, cum Profeſſores regii ſinceriorem Latinæ linguæ pronunciationem ſenſim introducere cœpiſſent, moleſtè ferebant cùm alii, tum præſertim Sorbonici, inveteratam loquendi conſuetudinem Gallorum improbari, ut quæ pueri didiciſſent, ſenes perdenda fateri cogerentur: in primis verò de ſono ipſius literæ Q. ambigebatur: regiis ſic, uti debet, cum ſequente u pronunciantibus, Quiſquis, Quanquam: Sorbonicis verò conſuetudine vernacula, Kiſkis, Kankam. Jam cum ſacris addictum hominem ob genuinam pronunciationem ampliſſimis proventibus Sorbonici ſpoliandum curaſſent, & lite coram Senatu Pariſienſi conteſtata, ne miſer ille ob grammaticam hæreſin (ut illi vocabant) theologicis fructibus jure excideret, periculum eſſet: profeſſores regii, & inter hos Petrus Ramus facto agmine in Curiam convolant, & judicii inſolentiam præfati, quod Jureconſulti de legibus regiis diſputare ſoliti, ad grammaticorum leges dijudicandas ſeſe dimiſiſſent, judices ita commoverunt, ut ſententiis ſuis non modo ſacerdotem abſolverent, ſed & impunitatem de Grammatica pronunciatione diſputandi tacito aſſenſu in perpetuum ſtabilirent. Ergo Kis, & Kalis, & Kantus, & Miki, & ſimiles Gottiſmi & Barbariſmi erant in Pariſienſi Academia ante regios profeſſores uſitati: quos barbariſmos ſi collega aliquis imitari nollet, acerbè & contumelioſè accipiebatur, quod collegii conſuetudinem violare diceretur. E ſchola regia tum primum Quis, Qualis, Quantus, Mibi, Latinè & Romanè ſonuerunt, & pudor fuit, regiis Profeſſoribus tanquam regis ipſius voci palàm reclamare (25). i. e. "What new com"motions were occaſioned by the innovation in pro"nouncing words? In the year one thouſand, five "hundred and fifty, the regius profeſſors having be"gun to introduce a purer pronunciation of the La"tin tongue, ſeveral profeſſors were offended, and "particularly the Sorboniſts, to find the pronuncia"tion uſed anciently by the French condemned; and "conſequently, that they ſhould be obliged to blot "from their memory, in their old age, what they "had learnt when boys. The diſpute began with "the ſound of the letter Q; the regius profeſſors "pronouncing it, when followed by the letter u, as "it ought to be, viz. Quiſquis, Quanquam; but the "Sorboniſts ſounded it according to the genius of "their native tongue, Kiſkis, Kankam. The Sor"boniſts had endeavoured to eject a Miniſter from a "very good living, becauſe he employed the true "pronunciation; and the cauſe being brought before "the Parliament of Paris, there was great danger "that this unhappy Pariſh-prieſt would be deprived "of his living, for a grammatical hereſy, as it was "termed by them. But the regious profeſſors, a"mong whom was Peter Ramus, aſſembling toge"ther, flew to the Parliament, where expatiating this "unuſual method of procedure, viz. that Lawyers, "who were accuſtomed to diſpute on the laws enact"ed by the King, ſhould deſcend ſo low as to judge "the rules of grammar; this, I ſay, made ſuch an "impreſſion on the judges, that they not only ac"quitted the Miniſter, but alſo, by a tacit aſ"ſent, eſtabliſhed, for all future times, an impunity "with regard to any future diſputes about grammati"cal pronunciation. Thus Kis, Kalis, Kantus, Miki, "and ſuch Gothciſms and barbariſms were uſed, "in the Univerſity of Paris, before the Regius "Profeſſors; which barbariſms, if any of them "refuſed to make uſe of, he met with very harſh "treatment, as being one who preſumed to violate "the laws of the College. It was then that Quis, "Qualis, Quantus, and Mibi, were firſt ſounded, "after the true Roman manner, in the King's Col"lege; and people did not dare to criticize openly "the regius profeſſors, they being conſidered as the "voice of the King himſelf." This is ſo ſtrange and ſurprizing an incident, that I thought proper not to omit a ſingle word of the author who informs us of it. He tells us, immediately after, another which ſurprizes me ſtill more, the original of which I ſhould be glad to find in the archives, otherwiſe I would not adviſe any perſon to give entire credit to it, any more than to the proſecution relating to Kankam and Kiſkis. The other affair is as follows. It was neceſſary to employ the authority of the ſtate, to oblige many Doctors of Paris, to give up the following theſis which they maintained obſtinately, viz. that ego amat is as juſt a phraſe as ego amo. Freigius's words are as follow: Incredibile propè dictu eſt, ſed tamen verum & editis libris proditum, in Pariſienſi Academia Doctores extitiſſe, qui mordicus tuerentur ac defenderent, Ego amat, tam commodam orationem eſſe, quàm Ego amo; ad eamque pertinaciam comprimendam conſilio publico opus fuiſſe (26) (α). i. e. "It is almoſt incre"dible to relate, yet true, and alſo publiſhed, that "there were ſome Doctors in the Univerſity of Paris, "who obſtinately maintained and defended, that Ego "amat was as good grammar as Ego amo; and "they were obliged to have recourſe to the autho"rity of the ſtate, in order to overcome this obſtina"cy." However, notwithſtanding my incredulity, I yet will obſerve, that many things happened in the XVIth century, in the faculty of Divines at Paris, at which they now bluſh whenever they recall them to their memory. They were heartily laughed at on that account.

(26) Idem, ibid.

(25) Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 24.

§ (α). Extracted from Agrippa, de vanitate Scientiarum, that purpoſe, with the King's leave, to Fontainebleau (o) [H], where, by the help of the books he found in the King's library, he continued his Geometrical and Aſtronomical labours. But as ſoon as his enemies knew he was there, he imagined himſelf no ways ſafe; ſo that he was forced to go and conceal himſelf in ſeveral other places (p). During this interval, his library in the college of Preſle was plundered; but after a peace was concluded in 1563, between Charles IX. and the Proteſtants, he again took poſſeſſion of his employment; maintained himſelf in it with vigour, and was particularly aſſiduous to promote the ſtudy of the Mathematicks. This laſted till the ſecond civil war in 1567. He then was forced to leave Paris, and ſhelter himſelf among the Huguenots (q), and was in their army at the battle of St. Denys. Peace having been concluded ſome months after, he was reſtored to his Profeſſorſhip; but fore-ſeeing that the war would ſoon break out again, he did not care to venture himſelf in a freſh ſtorm; and for that purpoſe begged the King's leave to go and viſit the Univerſities of Germany, which was granted. He accordingly undertook this journey in 1568, and received very great honours wherever he came (r). He returned to France after the third war in 1571 (s); and loſt his life miſerably, in the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day, as appears from the paſſage of Thuanus quoted by Moreri. He doubtleſs was a great Orator [I], a man of univerſal learning, and endowed with very fine moral qualities; free from avarice, ſober, chaſte;

(o) Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 26.

(p) Idem, p. 28.

(q) Idem, p. 30.

(r) Idem, ibid. and p. ſeq.

(s) This is grounded on its being related, that he made a ſpeech at Baſil in 1571.

rum, cap III, de Grammatica. See note 8, on chapter 19, of book I. of Rabelais. REM. CRIT.]

[H] He went . . . with the King's leave, to conceal himſelf in Fontainebleau.] I wiſh Freigius had not ſuppreſſed the particulars of Ramus's retreat, and I wiſh particularly that he had ſpecified the time; but, perhaps, had he ventured to mention the year, he would not have been more juſt, than when he ſays (27) that Ramus's animadverſiones were condemned in 1545, and the author at the ſame time forbid to concern himſelf any more with Philoſophy; but that Ramus, being reſtored by King Henry (28) at the ſolicitation of the Cardinal of Lorrain, made a ſpeech in 1546, de Studiis Philoſophiæ & Eloquentiæ conjungendis. Be this as it will, he inſinuates plainly, that the King, not daring to protect Ramus openly, ſent him to Fontainebleau, to ſave him from the fury of his enemies. Paucis menſibus per reliqua Geometriæ myſteria pervaſiſſet, niſi curſus induſtriæ per fatalem quandam calamitatem abruptus fuiſſet. Acceptis igitur à rege literis, ad regiam Fontiſbellaquei bibliothecam profectus, mathematicas ſuperiorum temporum prælectiones ab initio plenius & uberius retractavit & conſideravit (29) . . . . . Hæc meditantem ſolitudo cervorum ac ſylva diutius occulere non potuit. In Italiam tum cogitavit, quò ipſum Bononia honorificè invitarat. In Germaniam noſtram ipſius illis mathematum amoribus chariſſimum ſæpe reſpexit, ſed viis omnibus terror mortis intentus ac pavor: rumor etiam Prælei ſui indignis modis direpti, tum bibliothecæ chariſſimis quibuſque rebus ſpoliatæ ac depopulatæ, ad regiam Vincennarum propius urbem revocarunt: quin alia vis etiam gravior accidit, ut è Vincennis per invia itinera profugiendum eſſet, & ſubinde variis in locis deliteſcendum: in fuga tamen latebris otium lucemque reperit (30). i. e. "He would have gone thro' "the reſt of the myſteries of geometry, in a few "months, had not his great application and diligence "been ſtopped by a fatal calamity. Having there- "fore got a letter from his Majeſty, he went to the "royal library at Fontainebleau, where he reviſed "more fully, all his former mathematical lectures. ". . . But neither the ſolitude of ſtags, nor the em- "bowering woods could conceal him any longer "whilſt he was contemplating on theſe things. He "then had ſome thought of retiring to Italy, the inha- "bitants of Bologna having given him an honourable "invitation to their city. He frequently turned his "eyes towards Germany, a country he loved becauſe "the mathematics, his darling ſtudy, were ſo much "purſued there. But the ſaddeſt apprehenſions and "the fear of death ſurrounded him on all ſides. A "report that the College of Prele was ſhamefully "plundered, and his library ſtripped of the moſt "valuable things in it, made him return to Vincen- "nes, nearer the city. Another accident ſtill more "grievous than this happened, and forced him to "fly from thence by pathleſs ways, and to conceal "himſelf in ſeveral places. Nevertheleſs, during "his flight, and in his hiding places, he found op- "portunities to improve his mind." Banoſius informs us that Ramus withdrew to Fontainebleau, during the firſt war raiſed on a religious account, that is, in the year 1562 (31).

We find by a letter of Languet's (32), dated from Paris the firſt of February 1562, that Ramus was at the head of thoſe members of the Univerſity (33), who informed Catharine of Medicis, that they had no concern in the petition preſented to the Parliament, by the Rector or Principal, in the name of the whole Univerſity, to prevent the publication of the edict of January; but that, on the contray, they deſired it might be publiſhed. It is certain that the Rector had not deliberated about this, with perſons whom he knew to have an affection for the Proteſtant Religion (34). ["As to Bayle's ſaying, "it is certain that the Rector had not deliberated about "this, with perſons whom he knew to have an affection "for the Proteſtant Religion, this aſſertion is ground- "ed merely on caprice. The 24th of January 1561 "(1562 according to our computation) the Rector, ac- "companied by ſome members of the Univerſity, went to "the Parliament, and there declared in the name of "the ſaid Univerſity, that he oppoſed the publication "and impreſſion of the new edict of this month, and "which was favourable to the huguenots. The "26th, in a numerous aſſembly (habitis frequentis co- "mitiis) the Univerſity reſolved to ſend a ſolemn deputa- "tion to the King, concerning the affair of Religion. "Ramus was the only perſon who oppoſed this mo- "tion. Interceſſit unus Ramus quominus mittantur "negati in Aulam regiam, quin prius intelligatur & "deliberetur publice de articulis Univerſitatis nomine ad "regem mittendis, actumque ſuæ interceſſionis à Scriba "petiit. Eadem die habitis privatis comitiis Deputato- "rum hora pomeridiana, idem Ramus Præſlei, Nicolaus "Charton, Doctor Medicus Bellovaci, Guillelmus Gal- "landius Becodiani (de Bomourt) Collegii primarii re- "clamarunt adverſus orationem à Rectore habitam die "24 nomine publico. Such is the tenor, according to "du Boulay, p. 549. of the records of the Univer- "ſity *."]

[I] He doubtleſs was a great Orator.] I deſire no other proof of this than the following teſtimony of Brantome, it containing particulars, which I do not meet with in any other Author. Brantome, in the catalogue he has given of the learned men whom Henry II. maintained, ſays as follows. "Mr. Ga- "landus Torticolis was a good Orator; but was ſur- "paſſed by Ramus his enemy, he being a very elo- "quent Orator. Few have equalled him in that re- "ſpect, he having had an unparallelled graceful de- "livery. Having turned Huguenot ſome time after, "and attending the Prince and the Admiral in their "journey to Lorrain; the Reiſtres or German "Cavalry, they had ſent for, refuſing to march into "France, unleſs money was given them; after "the Huguenots had collected ſome monies among "themſelves from them, and Ramus had made a "ſpeech to them, they were prevailed upon; and "accordingly marched into the center of France, "where they committed great havock (35).

(27) Freigius, ib. p. 14.

(28) Henry II. did not begin to reign till the year 1547. Ramus was ſilenced in 1543.

(29) Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 26.

(30) Idem, ibid p. 28.

(31) Banoſius, in Vita Rami, p. 20.

(32) The 68th of book 2. Hall edit. 1699.

(33) Eorum qui Rectorem accuſant dux eſt Petrus Ramus. Languet, Epiſt. 68. lib. 2. p. 201.

(34) Idem, ibid.

* From the Paris edit of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 980. col. 2.

(35) Brantome, Memoires des Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 2. p. 55.

chaſte [K]; fearing God; zealous for the Proteſtant religion; but at the ſame time a little obſtinate, and given to contradiction; and it is even ſaid that he robbed Ludovicus Vives of his inventions (t). He diſcovered great conſtancy and reſolution in his misfortunes [L]. The Proteſtant Miniſters did not love him much; he making himſelf a kind of

(t) See Keckerman, in Præcognitis Logicis, tract. 2. cap. 5.

[K] He was free from avarice, ſober, chaſte.] He refuſed very profitable Profeſſorſhips, and choſe rather to teach in the College of Prele, though he had no publick ſtipend there (36). He would not accept of the preſents which his pupils offered him (37), and he maintained ſome ſcholars at the own expence (38). He refuſed to go into Poland, though he had a promiſe of being well paid for his elogiums he ſhould beſtow on the Duke of Anjou: on this occaſion he anſwered, that eloquence ought not to be venal; and that an Orator ought to be a man of honour and probity. Inter cætera referam quod cuidam reſpondit, qui in Poloniam legatus, Ramo, ut ſecum proficiſceretur ad Henrici, qui nunc eſt, Galliarum regis laudes decantandas, magno pretio perſuadere conatus eſt. At vero, ait, oportet Oratorem non tantum dicendi peritum, ſed virum bonum eſſe: nec viri boni lingua venalis eſſe debet (39). We here learn a particular that is very worthy of being remarked, viz. that Monluc was deſirous of making uſe of Ramus's eloquence, to faſcinate the Poles, in order that this might incline them the more to make choice of the Duke of Anjou for their Sovereign; for it is not to be queſtioned, but that the perſon, who made this propoſal above-mentioned to Ramus, was Monluc Biſhop of Valence, who negotiated ſo ſucceſsfully the election of Henry III. and who, among other methods, employed the eloquence of ſome perſons, who, in their verſes and ſpeeches, beſtowed the higheſt encomiums on the Duke of Anjou's qualities. He had the good fortune to ſhun the ſnare mentioned in a maxim of Horace.

Multa fidem promiſſa levant, ubi plenius æquo
Laudat venales qui vult extrudere merces.
" To praiſe too much, like a deſign appears,
" When he extolls that would put off his wares."
CREECH.

(36) Thom. Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 35.

(37) Idem, ibid.

(38) Solebat in patriam proficiſcens bonæ indolis juvenes pauperes ſuis ſumptibus fovere; eoſque in Academia Prælea bonis informabat diſciplinis: ex quorum numero plerique ſuperſunt viri doctiſſimi. Banoſius, in Rami, p. 14.

(39) Idem, ibid. p. 13.

(40) Horat. Epiſt. 2. lib. 2. ver. 10.

[" I can ſcarce believe what Bayle ſays here, viz. " that Ramus refuſed to go into Poland; and a Panegyriſt does not appear to me a good teſtimony on " this occaſion. Sigiſmund, King of Poland, did " not die till the 7th of July 1572; and it muſt be " ſome time before the news of it could reach France. " Henry III. then Duke of Anjou, did not immediately declare himſelf a candidate for that Crown. " Some time was required, before King Charles his " brother, and Queen Catharine of Medicis could " have made him take that reſolution, or conſent to " it. An affair of this conſequence is not concluded " in one day; and this being done, the Court " muſt caſt about for perſons capable of conducting " that negotiation, and Monluc was appointed for " that purpoſe. He afterwards muſt have ſought " out for perſons to aſſiſt him; and he choſe, as we " are told, Ramus, who had a promiſe of being well " paid for the elogiums he ſhould beſtow on the Duke of " Anjou. Nevertheleſs it is certain that Ramus was " killed in the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's-Day, " which was the 24th of Auguſt; and conſequently " here was but an interval of forty eight days between the King of Poland's death and that of Ramus. I very much doubt whether ſo ſhort a time " was ſufficient for making the preparations neceſſary " for the journey to Poland, for appointing the perſons who were to head the negociation, &c. *."]

* From the Pariſ edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 980. col. 2.

Ramus's temperance was very exemplary. He contented himſelf with only boiled meat, and eat but little at dinner. He did not drink any wine during twenty years, and would not have drank any, had it not been preſcribed him by the Phyſicians. He lay upon ſtraw; uſed to riſe very early (41), and ſtudy all day (42). He led a ſingle life with ſuch a purity as was not ſuſpected of even the leaſt uncleanneſs; and fled from obſcene diſcourſes as if it had been poiſon. Cælebs vixit honeſtiſſime, ab ſcortationis non tantum crimine, ſed etiam ſuſpicione ſemper immunis: colloquia obſcæna, utpote quæ bonos mores corrumpunt, tanquam toxicum fugiebat (43).

(41) Banoſius, in Vita Rami, p. 12.

(42) Idem, ibid.

[L] He diſcovered great conſtancy and reſolution in his misfortunes.] Every man but he would have left Paris after the fulminating decree of Francis I. which his adverſaries gloried ſo much in, and were ſo liberal of their inſults; but he ſtood his ground in the College of Prele, and let them make what noiſe they pleaſed, without once anſwering the many pieces they publiſhed againſt him. It will be anſwered, that he did not dare to make any reply, as the King had forbid him to concern himſelf with any thing relating to philoſophy. But to this I anſwer, that had he not been a great maſter of his paſſions, he would have left the Kingdom, that he might have full liberty of venting his complaints. Perhaps nothing in the world is ſo difficult as for an Author, who has been attacked and cruelly ſatyrized on all ſides, to continue ſilent; and yet Ramus had patience enough to do this. I will relate it in the words of an Author, who expreſſes it very well. Adverſus contumelias Doctorum quamlibet & eruditorum hominum perpetuum ſilentium juraverat. Nil Goveano, Gallandio, Perionio, Turnebo reſpondit: nil ingenii & doctrinæ per univerſam Germaniam principi Melanchthoni reſpondit. Cumque divulgatis per orbem terrarum Gallica & Latina lingua probris eſſet notatus, publicis ludis ignominioſiſſimè traductus: conſtricta lingua, vinctis manibus, prohibitus quicquam de philoſophia vel publicè vel privatim dicere, ſcribere, cogitare etiam (ſi menti tantùm potuiſſet imperari) prohibitus eſſet: adverſus tantas tot acerbitatum plagas, unicum patientiæ remedium adhibuit, in animoque ſemper illud habuit: Grata ſuperveniet, quæ non ſperabitur hora (44). i. e. " He had ſworn to be for " ever ſilent, with reſpect to the reproaches and " ſlanders of his enemies, though men of the greateſt " learning. He did not make the leaſt reply to Go- " veanus, Gallandius, Perionius, and Turnebus; he " made no anſwer to Melanchthon, who was famed, " throughout all Germany, for genius and learning; " nor made any reply to other Germans, and certain " Italians. When he was branded with reproaches, " both in Latin and French, which were publiſhed in " all places againſt him; when he was ſhamefully " traduced in the theatres, though both his tongue " and his hands were reſtrained; and he was forbid, " either publickly or privately, to ſpeak, write, or " even think (had it been poſſible for him to have " conſtrained his mind ſo far) about philoſophy; ne- " vertheleſs, amid theſe numberleſs calamities, he " applied no other remedy to them but patience, and " ever had this in his mind, he always living in hopes " of ſeeing better times." This Author has publiſhed a circumſtance, which would have been a great ornament to this triumph, I mean the power he had over himſelf to be ſilent, for which he applauds Ramus. This Philoſopher, four years after, recovered the liberty both of his tongue and his pen, with regard to philoſophy; which he himſelf informs us of in the firſt ſpeech, delivered by him after he was Regius Profeſſor. Miſero Rex Henricus, Hercules videlicet Gallicus, adfuit, meque quarto abhinc anno ad poſtulationem Caroli Lotharingi Cardinalis, & manibus & lingua ſolvit, ſolutoque Eloquentiæ & Philoſophiæ docendæ, exercendæ, illuſtrandæ poteſtatem fecit (45). i. e. " King Henry, the Gallic Hercules, came to my aid " in my diſtreſs; and four years ago, at the requeſt " of Charles, Cardinal of Lorrain, gave me the li- " berty both of ſpeaking and writing; and impowered " me to teach, exerciſe, and explain eloquence and " philoſophy." Here follow ſome other proofs of his conſtancy and reſolution. The firſt time he explained his logic in the College of Cambray, the emiſſaries, who were ſet on by his enemies, did all that lay in their power to exaſperate him, and oblige him to leave his lectures. They hiſſed and hooted at him; they clapped their hands and ſtamped with their feet. However, all this ſignified nothing, they not being able to diſconcert him. He would ſtop at intervals till

(43) Ibid.

(44) Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 34.

(45) Ramus, in Orat. habita anno 1551. circa init. p. m. 7.

of head of a party, to change the discipline of the Protestant churches; but his design was traversed and defeated in a national Synod [M]. I could have related a great many more particulars concerning him, had I not avoided repeating what we find in Moreri, and the ample collections of Teissier, not to mention that I could not consult a book (u) I formerly had, and which contains a great number of particulars. I shall make short observations on the relation given by those two Writers [N], in which the Reader

(u) The Life of Peter Ramus, by Nancelius. Teissier says nothing of it in his Bibl. Bibliothecar.

till such time as the noise was over, and in this manner used to go through with his lectures. His enemies were surprized at this resolution, and it afterwards made them be less insolent. Anno 1552, cùm in Cameracensi schola frequentissimo auditorio suam dialecticam auspicaretur, ab æmulis clamores, strepitus, sibili ingentes per summam petulantiam excitari cœpêre. Hac insolentia nihil ipse permotus, eum se oratorem præstitit, ut multum diuque licet obnitentibus adversariis, per intervalla tamen clamorum, incredibili constantia, nec minori cum gloria perorarit. Qua ejus virtute consternati inimici, in posterum minus ei fuêre molesti (46). He met with the same insults at Heidelberg, but with as little success, during the Lectures he read there in 1568 (47). This shews that he was become extremely obnoxious to several persons in Germany as well as in France, for having presumed to write against Aristotle. It must be confessed, that he had done this with a little too haughty an air; and had too studiously affected to divest this Philosopher of all his glory. He took from him, as far as he was able, the works that are ascribed to him; and when he found him to be the author of any pieces, he condemned the doctrine contained in it; and went so far as to calumniate his person by the odious description he gave of his vices and actions (48). See the two speeches which Perionius published in 1544.

(46) Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 34.

(47) Proinde minus debet mirum videri, si dum libera legatione regis permissu, tertio civili bello ardente Gallia fungitur, in Heidelbergensi Academia principali autoritate ad profitendum adductus, consimiles æmulorum clamores invicto animo pertulit, tanta quidem constantia ut adversarios suæ petulantiæ pudere merito debuerit. Idem, ibid.

(48) See Keckerman, in Præcognitis Logicis, p. m. 95, 96.

[M] His design was . . . defeated in a national Synod.] He was for introducing a democratical government in the Church. He declared that the power of the keys, which Jesus Christ conferred on the people, ought to be allowed the consistories in no other view, than that they might weigh and debate matters, and that their opinion or judgment should afterwards be proposed to the people; and that they should not pass into a law, till confirmed by the votes of the heads of the several families. He affirmed that, without such a regulation, oligarchy and tyranny would be introduced into the Church. His opinion was examined in a national Synod (49), and rejected. Beza employed his utmost endeavours to get that ecclesiastical democracy rejected, which indeed would occasion numberless confusions, and produce anarchy. He was afraid that, should Ramus refuse to acquiesce with the judgment of the Synod, this would give rise to many disorders; he looking upon him as a pragmatical fellow. His words are as follow. Pseudodialecticus ille, quem ὄζον ἄρην jampridem docti multi cognominarunt, contentionem non parvam excitavit de tota Ecclesiastica ὑπαξία, quam inquit Democraticam esse oportere, non Aristocraticam, sola προβουλεύματα presbyterio relinquens. Synodus ob eam causam Nemausi ineunte Majo coacta, cui etiam interfui, dogma istud planè, meo judicio, absurdum & pernicioſum, refutatis contrariis omnibus argumentis damnavit, cui si cum suis pauculis ille obsequatur, bene erit: sin minùs, certè turbas dabit homo ad turbanda optima quæque comparatus (50). Ramus was not so stupid as to require to have the discipline abolished, he only attacking the jurisdiction of Consistories and Synods. He was of opinion, that the people ought to be judges of the doctrine, to choose Ministers, to excommunicate and absolve (51). It was suspected that the reason of his doing this was, in order to revive, in the Church, the power of the Demagogues of Athens, or that of the tribunes of Rome; for he was so eloquent, that he would have moulded the passions of the people at pleasure. Ille nescio quem adeò Christianum populum somnians ut semper à Spiritu sancto regatur, solaque προβουλεύματα presbyterio relinquens, nihil vult ratum haberi, nisi quod præsens populus rogatis expressisque suffragiis decreverit, quod ni fiat, clamitat Oligarchiam ac Tyrannidem invehi in Ecclesiam, nihil interea Ochlocratiam reformidans, in qua nimirum ipse, & ejus similes dominentur. Contendunt iidem quibusvis etiam ἰδιώταις prophetandi partes in Ecclesia concedendas, huc detorto Pauli loco ex cap. prioris ad Cor 14 (52).

(49) Held in Nismes, in May 1572.

(50) Theodor. Beza, Epist. 67. It is dated July 1. 1572.

(51) Contendebat non adversus disciplinam, sed penes quos esset ecclesiastica gubernatio: volebat enim non penes paucos, sed penes universam Ecclesiam esse judicium doctrinæ, electionem ministrorum, excommunicationem, & absolutionem. Simler. in Vita Bullingeri, folio 45.

[N] I shall make some short observations on the relations given by Moreri and Teissier.] I. I have already taken notice of their mistake (53) with regard to the country of our Ramus's grandfather. II. They mention an error of Thuanus without correcting it. This great man supposes (54), that Ramus, after having taught polite literature, philosophy, and afterwards the mathematics in the College of Prele, and afterwards in the King's College, invented at last a new philosophy opposite to that of Aristotle (55). But he is mistaken; for Ramus began by attacking Aristotle, as has been seen above (56). III. What they say with regard to the founding of a professorship for the mathematics is true; but then the reader is prompted to believe, from their relation, that Ramus paid five hundred livres a year to the Professor, who filled that chair, which I do not take to be true. His intention probably was, that this sum should be taken out of his estate, and paid to the Professor who should be chosen pursuant to the regulations published by him. Banosius (57) has given us his entire will. He made it the 1st (58) of August 1568, just before he went to set out, in order to visit foreign Universities. He appointed, by this will, that out of the yearly rent of 700 livres which he had on the town-house of Paris, five hundred should be paid by way of salary to a Professor, who should teach during three years, arithmetic, music, geometry, opticks, mechanicks, astrology, and geography, in the King's or the Royal College; and he appointed Frederic Reisnerus to be the first Professor who should enjoy that income. There is such a puerile error, in Pasquier's Recherches, on this occasion, that I am afraid of animadverting upon him for it. This learned man, by forty five years study and industry, had got five hundred livres a year *(β), to be received from the town-house in Paris, an hundred livres of which he bequeathed to an uncle by the mother's side; another hundred to a nephew of his, son to his half sister; and the five hundred remaining livres, to that person who, on account of his learning, should best deserve the mathematical chair (59). These are Pasquier's words. Here we have an instance of that absence of mind which I mentioned elsewhere (60); and is worse than if a person should say, in casting up a sum, 3 times 7 are 22. Pasquier has the sum of 500 livres under his eye. He takes a hundred from them on the one hand, and an hundred on the other, nevertheless he still finds five hundred livres remaining; and nevertheless though he reads over his period several times, he does not perceive that he has calculated wrong. If it is not he, who committed this error, we must put it to the account of the corrector of the press. By the way, Ramus was but fifty three years old when he made his will; how then shall we find the forty five years of his labour and oeconomy! Father du Breul (61) supposes, that Ramus bequeathed but five hundred livres to his mathematical professor. IV. Moreri had reason to say, that it appears by Beza's letters, that Ramus was desirous of retiring to Geneva, there to be philosophy professor. The two letters, which Beza wrote to him are remarkable enough, and plainly shew that there was very little friendship between them. The first of these letters is dated the 30th of September 1569. Beza therein answers some complaints of Ramus; but, at the same time, he assures him that he condemned his logic, and his old and obstinate disease, viz. his censuring the greatest authors, and approved of those who opposed him. Illud ego multis sæpe dixi, & ad teipsum scripsi non temere, ut tu putas, neque vel ὑποψύμενος, vel ullo, ita me bene Deus amet, maledicendi studio, sed quoniam tuum istud in summis omnibus & extra omnem judiciorum aleam positis scriptoribus reprehendendis cacoethes probare nunquam potui, ac ne nunc quidem possum. . . . . Miror autem à me requiri, quod tam multi doctissimi viri tam accuratè & verbis & scriptis præstiterunt, quibus summo consensu tuas in Aristotelem animadversiones prorsus displicuisse non

(52) Theo. Beza, Epist. 68. of the same date as the other.

(53) In the rem. [A].

(54) Thuan. lib. 52. p. 1078. ad ann. 1572. Spondanus commits the same error, ad ann. 1572. num. 15.

(55) Postremo erroneam in Philosophicis doctrinam invexit, Aristotelem voce & scriptis importune oppugnans. Idem, Thuanus, ibid.

(56) In the rem. [D].

(57) In Vita Rami, p. 15 & seq.

(58) And not the 8th, as Pasquier affirms, Recher. de la France, liv. 9. cap. 19. p. m. 835.

*(β) The latter editions of the Recherches de Pasquier, are very full of errors, and particularly that of Paris 1643. Nevertheless we read in this seven hundred livres, and not five hundred. It is in p. 835. Rem. Crit.

(59) Pasquier, ib.

(60) In the rem. [C] of the art. CATIUS.

(61) Antiquitez de la Paris, p. 568. Paris edit. 1639, 4to.

(x) Scriptitans tam miſere pingeret, ut in legendis ipſius ſcriptis typographus inſudaret. Petrus à S. Romualdo, Fulienſis, in Continuatione Chronicæ Ademari, p. 344.

Reader will find that ſome incidents are cleared up. He publiſhed a great number of books, the catalogue of which is inſerted in Teiſſier. His writing was ſcarce legible, and gave the Printers prodigious trouble (x). His ſect flouriſhed ignoras. Cum iſtis ſi ferre non potes ut à te diſſentiam, tuo ſanè judicio fruere (62). i. e. "I have ſo frequently declared to many people, and alſo wrote "the ſame thing to you, not, as you ſeem to think, "heedleſsly by way of ridicule, or from a deſire of "ſlandering; but becauſe I could not, nor ever can, "approve of the ſtrong itch you have to condemn "the greateſt and beſt eſteemed authors. . . . . I "am ſurprized you ſhould expect from me, what ſo "many very learned men have performed ſo very "accurately both by their words and writings, and "to whom you are very ſenſible your animadverſions "on Ariſtotle were diſpleaſing. If you cannot al"low me to differ, with theſe perſons, from your "opinion, even follow your own judgment." Such are the gentle expreſſions that Beza wrote to him. He complains, in the other letter, of Ramus, for not communicating to him his deſign with regard to the profeſſorſhip of philoſophy in the Univerſity of Geneva, and looks upon this as an indication of diffidence (63). He was right in his conjecture; for it is certain that Ramus did not expect any favour from Beza, and had no reaſon to expect the leaſt in that reſpect. However, Beza made him ſome compliments; wrote to him in polite terms; but told him, upon the whole, that he muſt not expect any profeſſorſhip in Geneva: that all the employments were filled; the funds appointed for the ſalaries of the Profeſſors could not be augmented; and that the Univerſity was reſolved not to permit any ſyſtem but that of Ariſtotle. Duo tantum obſtant quo minus quod optas, & noſtrum collegium alioqui vehementer cuperet, commodè nunc confici poſſe videatur. Unum, quòd nullus nunc ſit in ſchola vacuus locus, noſtrorum verò tenues adeò ac penè nullæ ſint facultates, ut nec augere poſſint profeſſorum numerum, nec conſtitutis antea ſtipendiis, quæ ſanè perexigua ſunt, quicquam adjicere: alterum, quòd nobis certum ac conſtitutum ſit & in ipſis tradendis Logicis, & in cæteris explicandis diſciplinis, ab Ariſtotelis ſententia ne tantillum quidem deflectere. Hæc ad te ingenuè ſcribo ex vetere formula. Inter bonos bene agier oportet (64). There is a remarkable circumſtance. When Ramus was offered a noble employment out of the kingdom, he refuſed it ſeveral times; but when he deſired one in Geneva, it was refuſed him. V. Teiſſier tells us this, where he ſpeaks of the invitations which our Philoſopher refuſed. After the death of Romulus Amaſeus, the city of Bologna offered him a thouſand ducats, provided he would ſucceed that profeſſor in his employment. The King of Poland invited him to Cracow: and John King of Hungary offered him the ſuperintendance of the Univerſity of Weiſſemburg (65). Theſe words of Teiſſier anſwer to the following Latin paſſage of Banoſius. Nulla eſt Chriſtiani orbis natio, quæ Rami ſapientiam non amaverit, & præmio laudando redimere ſtuduerit. Amiſſo enim Romulo Amaſæo, qui mille ducatorum ſtipendiis in celeberrima Bononienſi Academia docuerat, Angelus Papius totius Academiæ conſenſu illum in demortui locum evocavit. Ab Andrea Duditio Imperatoris legato Cracoviam eſt invitatus. Joannes Rex Pannoniæ Albæ Juliæ adminiſtrandæ magna propoſita mercede præficere voluit, & chirographo Regio obſignavit (66). i. e. "There is no "country in the Chriſtian world but admires Ra"mus's wiſdom, and endeavours to purchaſe it at a "great price: for after the death of Romulus Ama"ſeus, who had a yearly ſalary of a thouſand crowns, "for teaching in the moſt flouriſhing Univerſity of "Bologna; Angelus Papius, by the conſent of the "whole Univerſity, invited him to ſupply the place "of the late Profeſſor. Andrew Duditius, the Em"peror's Embaſſador, invited him to Cracow. John "King of Hungary offered him the ſuperintendance "of the Univerſity of Weiſſenburg; promiſing him "at the ſame time a very conſiderable ſtipend, and "confirmed his promiſe with his ſign manual." The following ſhort cenſure will therefore not be addreſſed to Teiſſier, but to Banoſius. Romulus Amaſeus died in 1558, ſeveral years after Pope Paul III had taken him from the Profeſſorſhip of Bologna. Ramus therefore was not invited to fill the place, which had been left vacant by this Romulus's death. Banoſius ſhould have ſaid that this Profeſſorſhip was offered to Ramus, when Amaſeus quitted it, in order to go to Rome, to educate the grandſon of Pope Paul III. But if it was not offered him till after Amaſeus's death, Banoſius ſhould only have ſaid, that Ramus was offered a very honourable and profitable employment in the city of Bologna; the very employment which Amaſeus had formerly filled. It is miſleading the reader to tell him, that Ramus refuſed the profeſſorſhip, which was become vacant by the death of Romulus Amaſeus; for this is ſuppoſing that Romulus Amaſeus died in his profeſſorſhip at Bologna, which is not true. VI. Moreri is miſtaken in ſaying that Ramus was baniſhed, by virtue of the judgment or ſentence pronounced by the commiſſioners of Francis I. He only was enjoined not to concern himſelf any more with Philoſophy; immediately after which he taught polite literature in the College of Prele. I am of opinion that the following Latin paſſage of Audomarus Taleus miſled Moreri, or the authors copied by him. Auctori Animadverſionum & Inſtitutionum toto Philoſophiæ regno velut aqua & igni, gravi etiam pœna addita, interdicitur, ne unquam vel ſcribendo, vel docendo in ullam Partem ingrederetur (67). i. e. "The author of the animadverſions and inſti"tutions was baniſhed, as it were, from every part "of Philoſophy; and a heavy penalty added, in "caſe he ever preſumed to write upon, or teach it "any more." Some perſon, for want of attention, imagined that Ramus was baniſhed the whole kingdom of France; and did not take notice, that he was baniſhed only from the whole empire of Philoſophy, toto Philoſophiæ regno. VII. Moreri adds, that he was charged with being a heretick, on account of the book entitled, De Religione Chriſtiana, which was printed at Francfort ſome time after his death. This book was not known in the author's life-time, but the original of it was ſaved when his library was plundered (68); and being carried to Germany, Banoſius cauſed it to be printed in 1576 (69). I believe we might challenge all Moreri's friends to prove, that Ramus ever ſuffered any perſecution on account of that work. There were other proofs enough that he was a good Proteſtant: a ſpeech delivered in publick; an action that had ſomething like an image-breaker (70); and the anſwer he made to a buſy body, who aſked why he went ſo ſeldom to Maſs, would convict him on that occaſion. Hujus zelo inflammatus, publica concione Pariſienſis ſcholæ monachos graviter admonuit, ut puriorem Theologiam ex Evangelio, relictis Sophiſtarum lacunis, diſcerent. Idola gymnaſii Prælei amoveri & recondi juſſit ne conſpicerentur. Miſſæ autem raro intererat. Interrogatus vero hac de re à viro graviſſimo, ſtrenue reſpondit, E toto Vetere Novoque Teſtamento nihil quidquam magis à noviſſimis Chriſtianis depravatum & corruptum eſſe, quàm ſecundum mandatum Legis & Cœnæ Sacramentum, ut homo in utroque per ſpeciem religionis in exſecrabilem idololatriam laberetur (71). i. e. "Being inflamed with this zeal, he "gravely admoniſhed the Friers of the ſchool of "Paris, in a publick ſpeech, to learn a more pure "Divinity from the Goſpel, and leave the polluted "ſtreams of ſophiſtry. He commanded all the "images in the College of Prele to be removed, "and concealed in places where they might not "be ſeen. He went very ſeldom to Maſs. A very "grave perſon aſking him the reaſon of this, he "anſwered reſolutely, that nothing in all the Old "or New Teſtament was more depraved or cor"rupted by the modern Chriſtians, than the ſecond "commandment of the Decalogue, and the Sacra"ment of the Euchariſt; by which a man, in both "thoſe particulars, would be guilty of the moſt exe"crable idolatry, under the ſpecious ſhew of Reli"gion." He concealed himſelf during the firſt civil war; followed the Prince of Conde in the ſecond; and, during the third, he profeſſed, in Germany, the ſentiments of Calvin publickly, and received the communion at Heidelberg with the Proteſtants (72). He obſerves, among other particulars,

(62) Beza, Epiſt. 34.

(63) Mallem ex te ipſo tuum hoc de ornanda noſtra ſchola conſilium quam ex amicis intellexiſſe, minime id quidem quod abs te vel quoquam alio rogari velim, ut homines ambitioſi ſolent, ſed quod inde conjiciam te nonnihil de meo in te animo dubitare cœpiſſe, Idem, Epiſt. 36. It is dated the 1ſt of Decemb. 1570.

(64) Beza, Epiſt. 36.

(65) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. 1. p. 373, 374.

(66) Banoſius, in Vita Petri Rami, p. 9. See alſo Freigius, in Vita ejuſdem, p. 36 and 41.

(67) Audomar. Talæus, in Academia, apud Launoium de varia Ariſtotelis fortuna, p. 59.

(68) Banoſius, in Vita Rami, p. 28.

(69) I make uſe of the Frankfort edit. of 1594; but Ramus's Life that is prefixed to it, and which is written as a dedication to Sir Philip Sidney, is dated the 1ſt of January 1576.

(70) He removed all the images from the college of Prele, and hid them. See the following quotat. ["He "broke them, "ſacras imagines confregit. "See du Rou"lay, p. 549.] From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 981. col. 1.

(71) Banoſius, in Vita Rami, p. 19 and 20.

(72) Cum Heidelbergæ una apud Immanuelem Tremellium anno ſeptuageſimo viveremus, Gallicis concionibus ſemper interfuit, & ſacræ Cœnæ, edita primum fidei ſuæ confeſſione, cum magno Dei timore & cultus divini reverentia non ſemel communicavit. Idem, ibid. p. 25.

ed pretty much for ſome time [O]. I muſt make an obſervation in oppoſition to Paſquier lars, in a ſpeech delivered publickly in Baſil, that he had had the good fortune to compoſe it in the ſame place where Calvin had wrote his inſtitutions. Inter Academiæ Baſilienſis hoſpites Joannes Calvinus præcipuè commemorandus eſt lumen Galliæ, lumen Chriſtianæ per orbem terrarum Eccleſiæ, lumen in hoc ipſo (in quo hæc meditor commentorque) hoſpitio præcipuè perſpectum : hic enim tanti luminis faces (ut Catharina Petita lectiſſima matrona ſanctitate ſingularis ingenii mirificè capta tum Calvini, modò etiam Rami hoſpita jucundè mihi narravit) primùm ſunt incenſæ : hic illuſtres illæ Chriſtianæ inſtitutionis cœleſteſque vigiliæ ſunt exaratæ & elaboratæ (73). i. e. " Among the various ſtrangers, who came to the Univerſity of Baſil, " the moſt conſpicuous was John Calvin, the light " of France, the light of the Chriſtian Church " throughout the earth ; and a light that made itſelf " particularly conſpicuous in the very lodgings where " I am now meditating, and writing this piece : " here the burning torch was firſt lighted up, as I " have been often pleaſantly told by Catharine Petit, a " moſt valuable woman, who being prodigiouſly " ſtruck with Calvin's holineſs and talents, was at " that time his landlady, and afterwards Ramus's. " Here his celeſtial lucubrations, his renowned Chriſ- " tian inſtitutions were elaborately compoſed." In fine, being returned to France after the firſt peace he obtained from Charles IX. a ſpecial permiſſion to profeſs the new religion, with a conſiderable ſtipend. Impetrat ergo à Rege ſtipendia perampla, ut non tantum privato ſtudio artes meditando ſcribendoque illuſtraret, ſed etiam ut, ſublatis impedimentis, reformatæ Religionis ſanctiſſimis exercitiis in poſtremum liberius frueretur (74). [" Freigius, who only is cited on this occaſion, is " a very bad witneſs with regard to theſe incidents " which are no ways probable, conſidering the ſtate " of affairs at that time. We learn by the records " of the Univerſity, in du Boulay, p. 552. that " Anthony Muldrac Vice-Principal of the College of " Preſle, informed the Univerſity, in the aſſembly of " the 10th of February 1562, (1563 according to " our calculation) Magiſtrum P. Ramum de hæreſi SUSPECTUM & ob hoc ex hac urbe expulſum, conari reditum in Academiam & Primariatum priſtinum. The " concluſion of the aſſembly was, ipſum NULLATENUS recipiendum. No mention was there made of " permiſſion, &c. The word ſuſpectus ſhews, that " Ramus did not profeſs the principles of Calvin o- " penly. The particular I ſhall relate of the choice " which the Univerſity made of him, &c. proves " that he pretended to be a Roman Catholick in " 1564. His conteſt for the employment of Dean, " alſo proves the ſame thing *." VIII. Teiſſier affirms, that Ramus taught himſelf philoſophy, without the aſſiſtance of a maſter (75). Nevertheleſs Ramus himſelf told the publick, that he had gone through a courſe of philoſophy in the ſchools ; and that this courſe, as uſual, had laſted three years and a half. Cum tres annos ſexque menſes, inquit, in philoſophia ſcholaſtica ex Academiæ noſtræ legibus poſuiſſem : Logicis Organi libris cognoſcendis, diſputandis, meditandis (ex omnibus enim Ariſtotelicis libris Logici præcipuè toto triennii tempore clamantur & reclamantur) cum, inquam, tempus illud ita traduxiſſem, & jam ut abſolutus artium ſcilicet magiſter, philoſophica laurea donatus eſſem : ſubducta ætatis meæ ratione, &c. (76). " i. e. After I had " paſſed, ſays he, three years and a half in ſtudying " ſchool Philoſophy, purſuant to the laws of our U- " niverſity ; in learning, diſputing and meditating on " logical books, (for of all the works of Ariſtotle, " thoſe relating to Logic are chiefly ſtudied during " the three years ;) after, I ſay, I had ſpent my time " in this manner, and, having taken my Maſter of " Arts decree, was crowned with the philoſophical " laurel ; without a regard being had to my age, &c." IX. See number 4 of this remark, and then I leave my Reader to judge, whether it appears by two letters, which Beza wrote to him in 1570, that he intended to retire to Geneva, and that Beza ſhewed a great regard for him (77).

[O] This ſect flouriſhed pretty much for ſome time.] It was not known in Spain and Italy, and made but little progreſs in France ; then it ſpread very much in Scotland and England, and ſtill more in Germany. This is manifeſt, by the great number of books, which ſeveral German Ariſtotelians publiſhed againſt the Ramiſts. Some of them even thought themſelves obliged to take notice of the reaſons (diſadvantageous ones) why that ſect multiplied ; for they could not bear to have the progreſs it made alledged, as an indication of its truth. Et miramur adhuc quid rei ſit, cur . . . . ea (contra quam ſcribimus) philoſophandi ratio locum inveniat hoc ſeculo in pleriſque Germaniæ provinciis, etiam in iis, de quibus id nunquam quiſquam vel metuere vel ſperare potuiſſet ? Non eſt ſanè cauſa hujus per Germaniam & Angliam etiam ac Scotiam incrementi (nam in Italia, Hiſpania & Gallia etiam ipſa planè obſcura eſt philoſophiæ Rameæ fama) ſed hæc cauſa eſt, quod cauſam optimam commode non agimus (78). Theſe words are extracted from a chapter of Keckerman, in which the method of the Ramiſts is cenſured judiciouſly enough (79). This Author beſtows (80) great applauſes on a piece which David Pareus publiſhed againſt them in 1589. I have obſerved elſewhere (81), that this great Divine had little eſteem for their Founder. Keckerman makes great complaints of Henningus Rennemannus, the Ramiſt, who exclaimed with great fury againſt Beza and Zacharias Urſinus, about Ramus. He alſo ſpeaks of another haughty and violent Writer for the Ramiſts, and whoſe name was Caſpar Pfaffradius (82). Scimus Philoſophos Rameos quodam eloquentiæ faſtu plerumque in alios (magiſtri ſui indole) deſpumare : exempla ſunt in luce : ex quibus unum illud proferam, quod & recens eſt, & præ reliquis inſigne, M. Henningi Rennemanni Saxonis, qui pro Ramea Philoſophia Diſſertationem ante annos circiter tres (83) ſcribere non potuit, quin maledicam linguam ſtringeret non tantum in Clariſſimum Philoſophum Philippum Scherbium, ſed & eos viros, qui Eccleſiam Chriſti adverſus Papatus furores, & Heterodoxorum ſophiſmata tot, tantis, tam tota Europa ſuſpiciendis ſcriptis juverunt . . . . . (84) Clariſſimum dico Theodorum Bezam, cujus ille Epiſtolas de P. Ramo ſcriptas, velut anathematicas livide exagitat ; & item ſummum illum atque admirabilem æque Philoſophum ac Theologum Dominum Zachariam Urſinum, piæ memoriæ, cujus de P. Rami Dialectica & Rhetorica ſcriptum ad voluntatem Friderici 3. Electoris Palatini Principis, merito certe, ſi quiſquam unquam Princeps, cognomentum Pii adepti, judicium, furentem vocat Rami execrationem. i. e. " We know that " ſome Philoſophers, who are Ramiſts, inveigh with " a certain pomp of eloquence (in imitation of their " Maſter) againſt others. There are ſeveral exam- " ples of this, among which I ſhall ſelect the fol- " lowing, as happening lately, and being particular- " ly remarkable. It relates to Henningus Renneman- " nus, the Saxon, who, about three years ſince, could " not write a diſſertation againſt the philoſophy of " the Ramiſts, without exclaiming with ſcurrility, " not only againſt the moſt famous Philoſopher, Phi- " lip Scherbius, but likewiſe againſt thoſe men, who " undertook the defenſe of the Church of Chriſt, " againſt the fury of the Romaniſts, and the ſophi- " ſtry of the Heterodox, by writings ſo well received " in every part of Europe. . . . . The perſon I " mean, is the moſt famous Beza, whoſe Epiſtles re- " lating to Ramus he maliciouſly cenſures, as though " they had been anathematized ; and alſo that great " and wonderful Divine and Philoſopher, Zacharias " Urſinus, of pious memory, to whoſe judgment on " Ramus's rhetoric and logic, written at the com- " mand of Frederick III. Elector Palatine, (who " juſtly deſerved the ſirname of Pius, if any Prince " ever did) he gives the name of a furious invective " againſt Ramus." Paſquier relates (85), that the philoſophy of Ariſtotle has been baniſhed from the univerſities which are in the dominions of the Landgrave of Hain (86), and received that of Ramus ; giving thoſe who ſtudy logic the title of Ramiſts. I ſhall employ Scaliger's words, as the laſt proof. Ramus was a learned man, but too high a value was ſet upon him. . . . . Ramus magnus fuit vir, ſed magni nimis fit (87). The principles of Ramus had like to have been introduced into the univerſities of Holland, but were excluded from

(73) Ramus, in Baſilea, p. m. 58.

(74) Banoſius, in Vita Rami, p. 24.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 981. col. 1.

(75) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Elog. Tom. 1. p. 372.

(76) Freigius, in Vita Rami, p. 10. citant Ramus in epilogo libri quinti ſcholarum Dialecticarum.

(77) Tieſſier, Addit. aux Elog. Tom. 1. p. 372.

(78) Keckerman, in Prægogn Logicis, tract. 2 cap. 4. p. m. 133.

(79) See alſo the preface to this work of Keckerman's.

(80) Ibid. cap. 6. p. 187.

(81) In the cloſe of rem. [H], of the art. PAREUS (DAVID).

(82) Idem, Keckermann. in Præcogn. Logicis, tract. 2. cap. 5. ſub fin. p. 169.

(83) This book of Keckerman was printed in 1599.

(84) Ibid. p. 170.

(85) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, liv. 9. cad. 18. p. 834.

(86) He means Heſſe.

(87) Scaligerana 2, p. 201.

Paſquier [P], in which ſome particulars will be ſeen with regard to Mercerus.

from it on account of the oppoſition made by Scaliger, and ſome others. Cujus (Ramiſticæ Philoſophiæ) introductioni in Academias Belgii cordatiores & intelligentiores fortiter obſtiterunt, quos inter Joſephus Scaliger ſui ſæculi Phœnix eminuit (88). I find by a letter of Iſaac Pontanus, written in 1629 (89), that the profeſſors of Harderwic adviſed the univerſity of Leyden to permit Ramus's Logic, or that of Du Moulin, to be taught indifferently.

I have been informed (90), that the doctrine of Ramus ſtill prevails in Switzerland; and that the Magiſtrates of Berne have taken it under their protection, inſomuch, that the Philoſophy Profeſſors of Berne and Lauſanne are obliged to make uſe of no other Logic, but that of Ramus; and if they dictate any thing from Claubergius, or the Art of Thinking, they do it as under the auſpices of Ramus, and by way of explaining his doctrine.

[P] I muſt make an obſervation in oppoſition to Paſquier.] He obſerves (91), that la Fon complains (92), that one Ramus and Mercerus, who had gone aſtray from the old religion, were the heads of the faction, who obliged the Parliament of Paris, in 1564, not to grant the Jeſuits their demands. He anſwers, that neither Ramus nor Mercerus were particularly concerned in it; and that they only joined with their brethren, the Regius Profeſſors. He adds (93), that Mercerus was ſo far from engaging himſelf in cabals, that he was acquainted with nothing but his Hebrew books, which he uſed to ſtudy continually from morning till night. That he was prodigiouſly well ſkilled in that language, and ſurpaſſed the Jews in that reſpect, in the opinion of the moſt learned men; but that he was totally ignorant of all worldly affairs. He afterwards ſays as follows. The Jeſuits printed, in 1595 , Verſoris's plea. This man intending to render the univerſity odious, gives out, not that Mercerus, but Ramus and Gallandius had voluntarily acted as Solicitors of that cauſe; which circumſtance was judged ſo unlikely, that it was looked upon as a hyperbole, becauſe of the open enmity they had born to one another at all times, and which they carried to their graves. This enmity was ſtrongly ridiculed by Rabelais, the Lucian of our age, in the preface to his third book; and afterwards by that ingenious Poet, Joachim du Bellay, in one of his moſt remarkable poems; which ſatyrical pieces, written profeſſedly againſt them, are thought to be the prettieſt in all their works. Beſides, Gallandius was always a Roman-Catholick. Paſquier forgets the beſt method he has to refute this plea, which is, that Gallandius, Ramus's adverſary, had been dead five years, when Verſoris pleaded the cauſe of the Jeſuits (94). Rabelais is not juſtly cited there; it ſhould be, the preface to the fourth book.

["As to Bayles's ſaying, that Paſquier forgets the "beſt method . . . Gallandius, . . . Ramus's adver"ſary had been dead, &c. Bayle himſelf has com"mitted a miſtake, as well as Paſquier, by his not "diſtinguiſhing two Gallandius's. Peter died, as "Bayle informs us, in 1559; but had been ſuc"ceeded, in the Headſhip of the College of Boncour, "by William Galland, whom I mentioned before. "It was this Gentleman who, in conjunction with "Ramus, oppoſed the reception of the Jeſuits in "1564. Bayle innocently committed the miſtake "I animadvert upon here; but it is difficult to ſay as "much of Paſquier. He denies, in the paſſage co"pied by Bayle, that Ramus and Gallandius had "acted as Solicitors againſt the Jeſuits, and the on"ly reaſon he gives for this is, that theſe two men "were ſworn enemies. But how is it poſſible for us "to ſuppoſe him ſincere on this occaſion? For here "are incidents which he could not poſſibly be igno"rant of, ſince he himſelf had ſo great a ſhare in "them. Du Boulay, who certainly was not very "favourable to the Jeſuits, has related what he "tranſacted for and againſt them; and even cites "and tranſcribes the particulars of that proſecution. "Here follows what we there learn concerning the "incident in queſtion. The four Advocates in the "univerſity, in 1564, were Montholon, Choart, "Chauvelin, and Chyppart, the laſt mentioned being "John Dorart's father-in-law. Theſe Advocates be"ing conſulted by the univerſity upon the following "queſtion, viz. whether they ſhould admit the Je"ſuits, voted for their reception; and not one of theſe "four, when the univerſity had formed a contrary "reſolution, pleaded, in its favour, againſt the Je"ſuits. See Verſoris's plea for thoſe Fathers, in du "Boulay, p. 598. Upon this the univerſity had re"courſe elſewhere, and pitched upon Paſquier, who "was then young. That body appointed, at the "ſame time, certain perſons to aſſiſt and furniſh him "with memorials. The records, according to du "Bouly, p. 593. declare as follow. Anno 1564, die "17 Martii congregata fuit univerſitas . . . . præſertim "ſuper confirmatione ſententiæ D. D. (Dominorum) "Rectoris & deputatorum . . . . per quam elegerant D. "Paſchaſium qui agat cauſam ipſius univerſitatis in Se"natu . . . . & per quam ex ſingulis facultatibus elege"runt viros, inſignes videlicet . . . . ex artium Facul"tate RAMUM & GALLANDIUM . . . . qui cauſam "ipſis Patronis elucident. Verſoris's plea ſays exactly "the ſame things, as appears from page 594, 598, "600 and 645. Verſoris was Paſquier's antagoniſt "on this occaſion; and therefore was it poſſible for "the latter to have forgot theſe particulars? Is it "not much more probable, that it was merely from "diſſimulation he pretended to believe, that when "Verſoris ſaid that Ramus and Gallandius had acted "as ſolicitors againſt the Jeſuits, he ſpoke of Peter "Galland? It is to be obſerved Paſquier anſwers, "as though he had never known nor ſpoke to ano"ther Gallandius *."]

(88) Sam. Mareſius, in Præf. Indiculi præcipuar. Controverſ. Theologic. adverſus Witticb.

(89) Printed in Matthæus's collection in 1695. It is the 99th.

(90) By Mr. des Maizeaux, a Memoir of whoſe was publiſhed by Mr. Barnard, in his Nouv. les de la Republ. des Lettres, Nov. 1700. art. 1.

(91) Paſquier, Catechiſme des Jeſuites, liv. 1. chap. 6. p. m. 45.

(92) See Reponſe de Rene de la Fon, pour les Religieux de la Compagnie de Jeſus, au Plaidoié de Simon Marion, p. 28.

(93) Paſquier, ibid. p. 46.

(94) Du Breul, Antiquitez de Paris, p. m. 565, ſays, that Peter Galland, Regius Profeſſor of the Greek tongue, died the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1559.

* Folio 24 and 32 of Plaidoié de Verſoris.

* From the rem. to Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. 981. col. 1.

☞ RANDOLPH (THOMAS), an eminent Engliſh Poet in the 17th Century, was born at Houghton according to Mr. Langbaine (a), or at Newnham near Daintry in Northamptonſhire according to Mr. Wood (b), on the 15th of June 1605; and was ſon to Mr. William Randolph of Hams near Lewes in Suſſex, (Steward to Edward Lord Zouch) by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Mr. Tho. Smith of Newnham. He was educated in Weſtminſter-School, and thence elected as one of the King's ſcholars, to Trinity College in Cambridge in 1623, of which he became Fellow, and took the Degree of Maſter of Arts (c), in which he was likewiſe incorporated in the Univerſity of Oxford in 1631 (d). He had very early diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his excellent genius, for about the age of nine or ten years he wrote the Hiſtory of the Incarnation of our Saviour in verſe, which probably is ſtill preſerved in manuſcript under his own hand writing, as it was in Mr. Wood's time. His ſubſequent writings have eſtabliſhed his character [A], and gained him the eſteem and friendſhip of ſome of the greateſt men of that age, and particularly

(a) Account of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets, p. 411. edit. Oxford 1691.

(b) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 244. 2d edit.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 253.

[A] His writings have eſtabliſhed his character.] His dramatic performances are as follow: I. The Muſes Looking-Glaſs; a Comedy, which by the author was firſt called The Entertainment, as we learn from Sir Aſton Cockam's works, p. 98. This play anſwers both the deſigns of poetry, profit and delight; and Mr. Richard Weſt, a Student of Chriſt Church in Oxford, ſaid of it very juſtly,

Who looks within his clearer Glaſs, will ſay,
At once he wrote an Ethic Tract and Play.

II. Amyntas: or, The impoſſible Dowry. A Paſtoral. Acted before the King and Queen at Whitehall. III. Ariſtippus; particularly of Ben. Johnſon, who adopted him one of his ſons; on which account Mr. Randolph wrote a gratulatory Poem to him, printed among his works. He died in March 1634, at the houſe of William Stafford of Blatherwyke in Northamptonſhire, Eſq; after having ſpent ſome time at his father's at Little Houghton in the ſame county. His body was interred on the 17th of that month in the Church of Blatherwyke, where a monument of white marble was erected to his memory, at the expence of Sir Chriſtopher (afterward Lord) Hatton of Kirby; the inſcription upon which in Latin and Engliſh was written by his friend Mr. Peter Hauſted of Cambridge (e). He had a brother named ROBERT RANDOLPH, who publiſhed his Poems, and was a good Poet himſelf, as appears from ſeveral copies of his verſes printed in various books. He was a ſtudent of Chriſt Church in Oxford, where he took the Degrees of Bachelor of Arts February the 18th 1627, and was at firſt Vicar of Barnetby, and afterwards of Donnington in Lincolnſhire, where he died, and was interred July the 7th 1671, aged about ſixty years (f).

(e) Idem, Athen. Oxon. col. 244, 245.

(f) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 239.

Ariſtippus: or, The Jovial Philoſopher. Preſented in a private ſhew. IV. The conceited Pedlar, as it was preſented in a ſtrange ſhew. London 1630 in 4to. V. The Jealous Lovers. A Comedy preſented to their gracious Majeſties at Cambridge by the Students of Trinity-College. Dedicated to Dr. Comber, Dean of Carliſle, Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge, and Maſter of Trinity-College. This play was revived on the ſtage at London in 1682, as appears from an Epilogue written by Mrs. Behn, and printed in her Collection of Poems at London 1685 in 8vo. This Comedy was reviſed and publiſhed by the author himſelf, and was uſhered into the world by commendatory Poems of the chief wits of both Univerſities. Mr. Edward Fraunces ſpeaks of it thus:

" Tho' thou haſt made it public to the view
" Of ſelf-love, malice, and that other crew;
" It were more fit it ſhould impaled lie
" Within the walls of ſome great library;
" That if by chance, thro' injury of time,
" Plautus and Terence, and that * fragrant thyme
" Of Attic wit ſhould periſh, we might ſee
" All theſe reviv'd in his own Comedy.
" The Jealous lovers, Pander, Gull, and Whore,
" The doting father, Shark, and many more
" Thy ſcene doth repreſent unto the life,
" Beſide the character of a curſt wife,
" So truly given, in ſo proper ſtyle;
" As if thy active ſoul had dwelt a while
" In each man's body, and at length had ſeen
" How in their humours they themſelves demean."

* Ariſtophanes.

VI. Hey for Honeſty, down with Knavery. A Comedy tranſlated from Ariſtophanes's Plutus, and afterwards augmented and publiſhed by F. J. and printed at London 1651 in 4to. All theſe Dramatic pieces, except the laſt, were collected, and publiſhed together with his poems in one volume, by the care of our author's brother Mr. Robert Randolph; the fifth edition of which, with ſeveral additions, and corrected and amended, was printed at London 1664 in 8vo.

H.

RANGOUZE, was a French Author, in the reign of Lewis XIV. I know nothing of the bright part of his character, or his valuable qualities; for we cannot give this name to the induſtry, which an Author employs in reaping profit by his dedications and adulation. Not but that this induſtry, though very bad morally ſpeaking, may hold a very conſiderable rank among what we call good qualities, whether natural or acquired [A].

[A] What we call good qualities, whether natural or acquired.] All languages may be ſaid to be more or leſs barren; which is chiefly found with reſpect to ſuch things as are deprived of the perfection that is due to them. If this perfection be a moral virtue, thoſe things are termed bad: if it is a phyſical virtue, they alſo are called bad. On the other hand we call indifferently good things, thoſe which poſſeſs the moral virtue of thoſe ſpecies, and thoſe which poſſeſs the phyſical virtue of their condition. An unjuſt Judge is called a bad Judge; an ignorant painter is called a bad painter. That man is called a good Judge, who is equitable and wiſe; and he who draws fine pictures is called a good painter. We here are ſenſible that words are wanting (1), ſince we are obliged to employ the words good and bad, to denote a hundred things very different in their nature. The reader therefore muſt not wonder that I have ranked among the number of good things, the induſtry of Rangouze, after excluding it from among the moral virtues. It is good in the ſame ſenſe, that we ſay a good memory, ſight, hearing, ſmelling, &c. when thoſe faculties are endued with the perfection allotted them by nature. Every ſcience, without excepting even that of overreaching and cheating, is a kind of perfection. An acuteneſs of mind is a natural advantage, in like manner as ſtupidity and fooliſhneſs are great imperfections. The ſcience of cheating, morally ſpeaking, is neither good nor bad; but phyſically ſpeaking, it is a very good quality, it is an advantage, a perfection: a ſimpleneſs of mind, which is capable neither of cheating, nor to avoid being cheated, is, phyſically ſpeaking, a bad quality and a defect. If the art of cheating is reduced into practice, it becomes, morally ſpeaking, a very bad thing, and a crime that merits puniſhment; but when Government breaks on the wheel certain thieves, whoſe induſtry, and other natural qualities, had attained to a ſovereign perfection in their kind, we nevertheleſs admire the phyſical good in them, and only deteſt the ill uſe they had made of them. It therefore muſt be ſaid in general, that the art of growing rich, either by the revenues, or by trade, is a good thing, and a natural advantage, which deſerves eſteem, when ſeparated from the abuſe which men may make of it. The ſame muſt be ſaid of the induſtry of an Author who acquires riches by his pen, and the dexterity and ſubmiſſiveneſs, with which he deals about dedications and copies of his books ſent to different perſons. It cannot be denied, but that ſuch a man has a kind of genius, a ſort of ſagacity, and acute diſcernment, which are a natural perfection, that ought to be admired in certain reſpects, ſave the right we have to deſpiſe and blame it, becauſe of its abuſes and conſequences. Equitable perſons do not equally condemn this ſpecies of Authors: they do not diſcharge all the ſatyrical flings, which Furetiere has collected in his Somme Dedicatoire (2), at Authors, who, having a numerous family, without patrimony or penſion from the publick, have no other way of ſupporting themſelves than by their pens. People in that caſe excuſe the multiplicity of their dedications; and admire much leſs why each of their works are divided into various tomes, dedicated to ſo many different perſons; and that the ſecond editions are dedicated to new Mecænas's; people, I ſay, admire this much leſs, than they do to ſee them ſupport honourably, merely with their pens, their wives and children; and that this is the ſole way they have to ſupport themſelves. People extend, in their favour, a rule laid down by a wit, by way of apology for ſuch perſons as apply themſelves to trifles. His words are theſe: Farther, it is certain that writers are ſometimes obliged, for very ſolid reaſons, to apply themſelves

(1) It is to be obſerved, that the idleneſs of man, and the caprice of cuſtom, are alſo one cauſe of it. For if people would, other words might be found to denote a Painter, who underſtands, or is ignorant of his art.

(2) It is annexed to the Roman Bourgeois. A ſort of Latin tranſlation of it is inſerted in the preface to Tom. 3. Obſervationum ſelectarum ad Rem Literariam ſpectantium, printed at Hall, in 1701.

De Rangouze poſſeſſed it in an eminent degree [B], as will appear from my remarks.

ſelves to works, which ſeem to be far from ſolid; and that frequently a ſecret and unknown duty often prevails, without the leaſt injuſtice, over a publick and conſpicuous one. A writer for inſtance, whom we cenſure, perhaps found that, in order to reſtore his health which was loſt; to ſecure himſelf from ill fortune; or for the advantage of a family which was ſupported entirely by his pen; that it was more profitable to him to employ himſelf about compoſing ſongs, than about treatiſes of morality and politicks. If this be the caſe, I will venture to affirm, that the very principles of morality and philoſophy enjoin him to write ſongs; and that it is the greateſt injuſtice to condemn the employments of other perſons, when we know neither the motives nor circumſtances of them (3).

(3) Peliſſon, Diſcours ſur les Oeuvres de Mr. Sarrazin, p. m. 39, 40.

[B] De Rangouze poſſeſſed it in an eminent degree.] Coſtar furniſhes me a proof of this. "God forbid "I ſhould make a compariſon with the Sieur de Ran- "gouze, who by his eloquence, has gained fifteen or "ſixteen hundred piſtoles within theſe eight months, "and who may be called the Cherilus, in proſe, of "our age. Cherilus incultis qui verſibus & malè natis "Retulit acceptos regale numiſma Philippos. According "to the Goſpel rule, that tree is good, which pro- "duceth ſuch good fruit. Suppoſing what we are "told in the fabulous hiſtory to be true, the gar- "den of the Heſperides, ſo much boaſted by the "poets, was far leſs valuable, ſince, according "to a Greek Scholiaſt of great credit and authority, "the tree in queſtion bore golden apples only in its "ſeaſon, and not the whole year round (4)." Here follows another teſtimony, I mean the illuſtrious Mademoiſelle de Scudery. She ſpeaks of an author, who had three epiſtles dedicatory ready drawn up for the ſame book, for three perſons vaſtly different with regard to their rank and merit; he having reſolved to make uſe of that which would produce him moſt money; and making uſe of a third perſon to manage that affair. Accordingly, he dedicated his book to that perſon, who gave him moſt money, though of the leaſt merit. She ſays afterwards, that a late author having prepared an epiſtle dedicatory, which might be looked upon as a great panegyric, ſuppreſſed it, becauſe, before his book was quite printed off, the perſon to whom he dedicated it was fallen into diſgrace. She adds, that a certain Dauphineze having wrote a panegyric on Cardinal Richelieu, and finding him dead at his arrival, he turned it into a panegyric of the Queen-mother, Anne of Auſtria. And I have alſo known, that an author, after having greatly and juſtly applauded a perſon who was living, bereaved him of all the encomiums he had beſtowed upon him, without his having done any thing to make him unworthy of it, except his dying, without having an opportunity to give this author what he imagined he deſerved. All theſe inſtances, continues ſhe, are very particular. But I have been told a whimſical ſtory of one Rangouze, who had made a collection of letters, which he printed without numbering them. By this means the book-binder, who bound his book, put that which the author thought proper, firſt; and by this means all the perſons to whom he preſented this book, ſeeing their names at the head, thought themſelves the more obliged to him for it. This appears to me very odd; and a writer muſt be as fond of dedicating, as an able Italian Phyſician was, who having wrote upon Hippocrates's aphoriſms, dedicated each book of his Commentaries to one of his friends, and the Index to another (5). Sorel writes thus on the preſent occaſion. Rangouze's letters may juſtly be called golden ones, "ſince he boaſted that he did not "write any under twenty or thirty piſtoles; he writ- "ing very few but to perſons of the higheſt qua- "lity, and who were in circumſtances to pay him "for them. They all were as ſo many brief elo- "giums of the perſons to whom they were addreſſ- "ed; ſpecifying their moſt valuable qualities, and "moſt remarkable actions; and a profuſion of com- "pliments for thoſe, of whom little could be ſaid "with juſtice. Some ingenious perſons have been "ſurprized, how it was poſſible for this man, who "had no learning, to draw up ſo great a number "of different letters, on praiſes that reſembled one "another ſo much. I do not ſcruple to take notice "of him; becauſe thoſe who are unacquainted with "the quality and fortune of the great men of the "kingdom, may there be informed of them (6)."

(4) Coſtar, Lettre 50. part. 2. p. 115.

(5) Mademoiſelle de Scuderi, Converſations ſur divers Sujets, Tom. 1. in the dialogue at the beginning.

(6) Sorel, Bibl. Franc. p. m. 119.

RAPHELENGIUS (FRANCIS), born (a) in Flanders the 27th of February, 1539, gained great reputation by his ſkill in the oriental tongues. Having began his ſtudies in Ghent (b), his father died, for which reaſon his mother was forced to deſign him for trade: but the maſters whom he ſerved, having ſent him to Nuremberg, to ſome perſons who let him indulge the paſſion he had for learning, he again applied himſelf to his ſtudies. Being returned to Flanders, he found an opportunity to go to Paris, and there made a great progreſs in the Greek and Hebrew languages. The civil wars forcing him to ſeek for ſome other abode, he went into England, and taught Greek during ſome time in the univerſity of Cambridge. He afterwards returned again into the Netherlands, and was corrector of the preſs in Antwerp, to the famous Chriſtopher Plantin. He ingratiated himſelf ſo far into the favour of this Maſter, both on account of his abilities and candor, that he gave him his daughter in marriage in 1565 (c). He was of very great ſervice to him in his printing, particularly with regard to the edition of the famous Bible, called the Antwerp Bible [A]. Plantin going to Leyden, to be at a farther diſtance from the commotions, left his preſſes under the direction of his ſon-in law; but when he returned to Antwerp in 1585, Raphalengius went to Leyden with his whole family. He there had the direction of his father-in law's printing-houſe in that city; and pleaſed ſo well the Curators of the univerſity, that they made him Hebrew Profeſſor. He acquitted himſelf worthily of that employment, and ſpent part of his time in ſtudying the Arabic, and even compoſed a dictionary in that language (d). He ſcarce had ended it, but he was ſnatched away by death, the 20th of July 1597. He had wiſhed to die during (a) At Lanoi, near Liſle.

(b) And not at Louvain, according to Moreri.

(c) And not in 1555, as Moreri writes.

(d) It was printed with Erpenius's notes, in 1613.

[A] With regard to the edition of the famous Bible, called the Antwerp Bible.] I ſhall make uſe of Meurſius's words, to ſhew the part our Raphelengius had in it. In horum editione incredibile quantos labores Raphelengius ſuſtinuerit, dum accuratiſſime ſingula recognoſcit; Annotationibus, ubi opus erat, illuſtrat; verſionem interlinearem adornat; Grammaticam Hebræam, ex optimis quibuſque Grammaticis, cum judicio & cura collectam, addit; Epitomen Theſauri linguæ Hebrææ Santis Pagnini infinitis vocibus auget, & innumeris locis emendat; quod ſatis teſtimonio Benedicti Ariæ Montani, inter Prolegomena præmiſſo, patet. Multa iiſdem annis ad ornamenta librorum, quos ſocer excudebat, præcipue in linguis Orientalibus, corrigendo, illuſtrandoque, præſtitit; quamvis raro nomen ſuum adſcribi pateretur (1). i. e. "It is incredible the prodigious pains Raphe- "lengius took in the printing of theſe books; he "reviſing every particular with the greateſt accu- "racy; illuſtrating them with annotations where- "ever theſe were neceſſary; improving the inter- "lineary verſion; adding a Hebrew Grammar, ju- "diciouſly and carefully compiled from the beſt "Grammars; augmenting, with a numberleſs multi- "tude of words, Pagninus's Epitome Theſauri linguæ "Hebrææ,

(1) Meurſius, Athen. Bat. p. 140.

ing three years; he being oppoſed by two domeſtic enemies (B), which greatly incommoded him; the one, the grief for having loſt his wife; and the other, a palſy with which he was afflicted (e).

(e) Extracted from Meurſius, in Athen. Bat. p. 140 & ſeq.

" Hebræ, and alſo correcting it in a vaſt number of " places; as is manifeſt from the teſtimony of Arias " Montanus, in the Prolegomena. During the time " we are ſpeaking of, he did great ſervice to his " father-in-law, in correcting and illuſtrating the " books he was then printing, particularly thoſe " wrote in the Eaſtern languages; and yet he very " ſeldom permitted his name to be put to them."

[B] Being oppoſed by two domeſtic enemies.] Moreri here falls into the Sophiſm called à non ſufficienti enumeratione partium, which is the leaſt reproach that can be made him; for it might be ſaid, that he neither relates the entire thought, nor part of it. Let us compare his words with thoſe of Meurſius. He died, ſays he, with grief, for having loſt his wife. Thus he tranſlates the following Latin paſſage: Mors quam toto triennio præ tædio amiſſæ uxoris & paralyſi afflictatus ſæpe optaverat, virum optimum humanis exemit (2). We do not there find, that Raphelengius died with grief for the death of his wife; we ſee only, that his grief for loſing his wife, joined to a palſy, had made him frequently wiſh for death during three years. If it be anſwered, in favour of Moreri, that as this grief might have brought the palſy upon him, it was juſt to reduce Meurſius's two cauſes to one; I anſwer, that a Copiſt ought never to give us his conjectures and arguments, as ſo many incidents extracted from the authors to whom he refers us. But we will leave theſe trifles, and come to a more important reflection. Raphelengius regretted his wife, and thought himſelf unhappy in ſurviving her; this is an indication that he had loved her, and that he had taſted many ſweets in the nuptial ſtate. This conſequently was a very happy marriage. Now conſider the conſequences of this propitious marriage, viz. three years paſt in a kind of deſpair. What muſt we therefore think of an unhappy marriage, ſince a happy one is expoſed to ſuch evils? Let us not argue here according to the rule of contraries; but rather ſay, that an unhappy marriage is attended with advantageous conſequences. The ſurviving perſon, in this caſe, feels no affliction; and his or her widowhood is a ſtate of reſt and pleaſure. So that, inſtead of conſidering only the miſeries of this life, we muſt conſider the mixture of good and evil allotted to man: we muſt remember the two caſks of Homer, which I ſpeak of elſewhere (3). We muſt ſay, that the liquor, which comes down upon the earth is of a mixed kind, but, in ſuch a manner, that frequently the good and the bad liquor come one after the other. If we begin with one, we end with the other. If a perſon has enjoyed happineſs in the wedded ſtate, he is unhappy in widowhood: but if he has been unhappy in marriage, then widowhood is a felicity. I do not deny, but that, in certain reſpects, the two liquors are mixed and confounded together as to their inſenſible parts, ſince there is ſcarce any pleaſure but what is immediately attended with ſome uneaſineſs; but it is certain that, in other reſpects, the lot or fate of man is in a glaſs, in which the good and bad liquor are ranged, as it were, in different gradations or ſtories. I have examined elſewhere (4), whether the bad liquor exceeds the good, with reſpect to quantity. I will ſay no more of this, but will nevertheleſs obſerve, that thoſe who alledge Raphelengius's marriage, to prove that the good ſurpaſſes the evil, might be miſtaken in their computation. He enjoyed his wife twenty nine years, and felt the anguiſh of widowhood but three years. It therefore will be ſaid, that his lot was blended with more good than evil; but this conſequence will be denied. A man, who, during three years, is ſo much tortured with grief and pain, that he frequently calls upon death to free him, ſwallows a greater quantity of the bad liquor, than he had ſwallowed, in proportion, of the good during thirty years. For it muſt not be ſuppoſed, that our man's marriage conſiſted of entire pure wine during the twenty nine years that it laſted. Not to mention the uneaſineſſes and ſorrows that flowed from other cauſes, let us only conſider the diſadvantageous parts of his marriage. Every huſband, who is extremely afflicted for the death of his wife, has not always lived with her, without ſome diſpute or other. Farther, the more he loves her, the more he is grieved whenever ſhe is ſick. It muſt not be here objected, that, at this rate, it were better he hated her; for it will be anſwered, that the indifference with which he would ſee her menaced with death, does not equal the horrid evils of conjugal hatred. It would even be ſaid, that if, on the one hand, he is not afraid ſhe will die, he is afraid on the other, that ſhe will not die. Now this fear may counter-balance that good. I am ſurprized that we do not find, in the books of the ancients, ſome dilemma expreſſed a little differently from that of Bias (5); for inſtance in manner following. You either will love your wife, or you will not love her. If you love her, you will be always afraid of loſing her; and if you do not love her, you will always be afraid of your not loſing her. This dilemma is not better ſtated than that of Bias; for without examining the other imperfections of it, we might content ourſelves with ſaying, that according to the uſual courſe of all ages, neither conjugal love nor hatred are carried to ſuch exceſs. We need not to fear, from a very ſmall number of inſtances, that we ſhall feel a tenderneſs that is accompanied with diſquiet, or ſuch an antipathy as will give the greateſt uneaſineſs. There is reaſon to believe, that we ſhall be one of the moſt numerous party, i. e. that we ſhall enjoy the preſent, without being much concerned about futurity; and with a good reſolution to be comforted in caſe that ſhould happen.

(2) Meurſius, Athen. Batav. p. 140.

A REFLECTION on the conſequences of marriage.

(3) About the middle of the rem. [C], of the art. MANICHEES.

(4) Rem. [D] of the art. XENOPHANES.

(5) See the art. BION, rem. [G].

RAPIN (NICHOLAS) exerciſed two profeſſions, which are ſeldom united in the ſame perſon, thoſe of Provoſt-marſhal and Poet. He committed but few faults in his poetical employment; but committed ſome ſo very enormous in the adminiſtration of juſtice, that, had it not been for his Protectors, he would have been put to death [A]. He

[A] Had it not been for his protectors, he would have been put to death.] I have but one teſtimony concerning this particular, ſo that the reader may give what credit he pleaſes to it. " All thoſe people of Fon- " tenay are good for naught; and ſo is Mr. Rapin, " whoſe life I ſaved, which he owned. He was a " prieſt's ſon; Mayor of the city of Fontenay and " put ſome Proteſtants to death; ſo that he was pro- " ſecuted at the extraordinary Seſſions, by all the in- " habitants of the city both Roman-Catholicks and " Proteſtants, and all the nobility of lower Poictou. " I was the only perſon who oppoſed all this, he " having bribed me by his verſes, and knew that I " had great intereſt. He owes his life to me, next " to Preſident du Harlay, ſo that he now loves the " Proteſtants (1)."

(1) Scaliger, in Scaligeran. Voce Rapin, p. m. 201.

[" The only proof Bayle brought for ſo erroneous " a charge, is a falſhood of Joſeph Scaliger, which " I have amply refuted in my Bibliotheque du Richelet, under the word Rapin. I have there given " ſeveral other particulars with reſpect to Rapin's " life; and would here add many others, had I more " room than can here be well allowed me. Here " follows an account of his life, in few words. He " was born at Fontenai-le-Comte, in the dioceſe of " Lucon; and was fellow ſtudent of Scævola and " Lewis Sammarthanus; the former, who, was born " in 1536, being ſome years older than Rapin. Af- " ter having gone through a courſe of law-ſtudy, he " was admitted an advocate in the Parliament of " Paris, and afterwards had judiciary employment in " the place of his birth. He married there about

He was a man of wit, and did not ſuffer himſelf to be corrupted by the Leaguers. He followed Henry III. when he fled from Paris, and wrote ſeveral verſes againſt the faction of the Sixteen (a). He writ a conſiderable part of the ingenious ſatyr, entitled, Catholicon d'Eſpagne [B]. After the death of his ſon, to whom he had given all his employments (b), he retired to Fontenai-le-Comte, where he was born, and died in the year 1609 [C]. I ſhall mention ſome circumſtances concerning his death, which appear to me very curious [D]. He was buried without pomp; but ſome ſay that his laſt deſire was (a) Sequutus eſt Henricum III cum fœderati eum Lutetia pellerent, & Cæſaroduni Turonum multa egregia carmina in monſtrum Pariſienſe, quod ſedecim capitibus conſtabat, vulgavit. Continuat. Thuan. lib. 2. ſub fin.

(b) Ibid.

" the year 1565, and had a conſiderable number of " children, the eldeſt of which was killed in the ſiege " of Paris in 1590, in the ſervice of Henry IV. " Rapin was Mayor of Fontenai in 1570. The poſt " of Provoſt-marſhal being created in France, in the " year 1576, for Fontenai and the lower Poitou, he " purchaſed it. His ſervices were wanted in the " extraordinary Seſſion held at Poictiers in 1579; " Achilles de Harlay, who preſided in it, was ſoon " ſenſible of his abilities. This Magiſtrate being " appointed firſt Preſident in 1584, he, about the " end of that year, got Rapin to be made Lieutenant " de la robe courte, in the Provoſtſhip of Paris; and " having afterwards recommended him to Henry III, " his Majeſty beſtowed upon Rapin the poſt of great " Provoſt of the Connetablie. He was involved in " ſome difficulties about the year 1588; and it ap- " pears that Henry III, at the ſolicitation and for fear " of the League, removed him from his employment " of the Connetablie. However, he was reſtored a " very little time after, and was of great ſervice to " Henry IV. By an arret of Parliament of the 24th " of May 1599, againſt the pretended demoniac Mar- " tha Broſſier, ſhe was ordered to be carried back to " Romorantin, the place of her birth, by Maitre " Nicolas Rapin Lieutenant de Robbe courte, de la dite " Provoſte de Paris. Rapin not long after this re- " ſigned his employments, and retired to Fontenai, " and died in February 1609, aged only threeſcore " and eight years *."]

* From the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 981. col. 1 and 2.

[B] He wrote a conſiderable part of the Catholicon d'Eſpagne.] We are told by du Puy's notes, publiſhed in the edition of this ſatyr publiſhed in 1677, that the ſpeech of the Archbiſhop of Lyons, that of Roze, and that which Engoulevent was to have ſpoke, were wrote by Rapin. If this be true, d'Aubigné ſhould not have endeavoured to undeceive thoſe who aſcribe the whole ſatyr Menippée to that wit, and afterwards declare that he only contributed ſome verſes to it *. He poſſibly might have advanced this, becauſe that, in the 4to volume of Rapin's works, printed at Paris in 1610, we find only three Latin epigrams which form part of the Catholicon (2)? This reflection of the Author of the new notes is judicious.

* D'Aubigne To. 3. l. 3. ch. 13.

(2) Notes ſur les Catholicon, p. 385. edit. of 1696.

De Vigneul Marville, who has collected a great number of curious particulars with reſpect to the Catholicon d'Eſpagne, obſerved that Paſſerat and Rapin compoſed the verſes of the ſecond part, which was entitled, An abridgment of the ſtates of the League aſſembled at Paris, the tenth of February; that Rapin wrote the ſpeech of the Archbiſhop of Lyons, and that of Doctor Roſe; and that he collected all the reſt of the ſpeeches, and added them to the Catholicon d'Eſpagne (3), under the title of Satyre Menippée; and it is on this account that many have aſcribed the whole Catholicon to him (4).

(3) It is the title of the 1ſt part of the work, written by Mr. le Roy, Canon of Roan.

(4) Vigneul Marville, Melanges d'Hiſtoire & de Litterature, Tom. 1. p. 201. Roan edit. of 1699.

[C] He died in the year 1609.] Botereius (5), the Mercure Francois (6), and the continuator of Thuanus (7), fix his death under that year. Father Garaſſe, whom I ſhall ſoon cite, ſays, that he was preſent in December 1608, at Rapin's death, before which he had languiſhed ſome weeks. Now, as Moreri relates that Rapin died the 15th of February 1608, I ſuppoſe Garaſſe means, that this brave man fell ſick in December 1608, and died ſome weeks after, if this be his meaning, he refutes Moreri, not with regard to the day, but to the year in which he died. Be this as it will, I join in opinion with thoſe, who ſay that Rapin died in 1609: and nevertheleſs I find that many accurate perſons agree with Moreri (8).

(5) Rodolph. Botereius, de Rebus in Gallia geſtis Commentar. lib. 16. p. 567, 568.

(6) Tom. 1. p. 408.

(7) Lib. 2. in fine.

(8) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poetes, num. 1376. The Author of Notes ſur le Catholicon, p. 385.

[D] Some circumſtances concerning his death which appear to me very curious.] Here follows a long account from father Garaſſe, of which the reader may form what judgment he pleaſes. " In December of " the year MDCVIII, I was at Poictiers (9) at the " deceaſe of the late Mr. Rapin, who having led, " during threeſcore and fourteen years, a pretty looſe " life, according to the genius of that age and his " own diſpoſition, whereby he contracted a dangerous " acquaintance with ſeveral perſons, after paſſing " ſome weeks in a languiſhing condition, was aſſiſted " by four of the fathers of our ſociety, and died in " their preſence. He expreſſed the higheſt ſatisfac- " tion at his departing this life ſo happily in the " hands of thoſe, whom he had perſecuted all his " life time, without knowing them. After mak- " ing his confeſſion, which he performed with the " ſtrongeſt ſenſe of the ſins he had committed, be- " fore he received the bleſſed Sacrament, the room in " which he died being filled with perſons of the " greateſt diſtinction in the city, he made the follow- " ing general confeſſion of all his paſt life, and that " in three articles. I. That he had never been a " Huguenot, nor wavering in his belief, though he " had lived familiarly among them, and ſtrongly " hated the Jeſuits. II. That he had led a very " licentious life; and did not think that God could " have found him ſo well diſpoſed in any other " moment of his life. III. That the only good he " remembred ever to have done, from his youth, was " his preventing ATHEISM from being publickly " taught in Paris; and then turning himſelf to the " Jeſuits who were preſent, he gave them a conciſe " account of that ſtory for our inſtruction. He ſaid " that there was in his time a certain miſcreant in " Paris; a ſtranger, and of a pliant and facetious " turn of mind (α); who having got familiarly ac- " quainted with the ſeven wits, that formed the " conſtellation of Poets, who were headed by Ron- " ſard; he began to ſpread ſome very wicked and " abominable maxims againſt the Deity, which had " begun to make an impreſſion on ſome of the band, " inaſmuch as our minds are more prone to evil " than to good; ſo that, ſays he, perceiving that " the novelty of this doctrine charmed ſome among " them, four of us oppoſed this impious wretch, and " fixed the unſettled minds of the other three, and " of ſeveral other perſons of our acquaintance, whom " the wretch in queſtion had corrupted by his diſ- " courſes. Ronſard, he ſaid, was the firſt, who in " the heat of his courage, exclaimed againſt him; " and wrote this fine poem againſt atheiſts, which " begins thus.

" O ciel, ô terre, ô mer, ô Dieu Pere commun, &c.
" O heaven, earth, ſea, O God, our common fa" ther, &c.

" Turnebus wrote a noble ſpeech againſt him. Sam- " marthanus compoſed an excellent poem, in Iam- " bic verſe, and entitled, IN MEZENTIUM, without " calling him by any other name, becauſe he was a " worthleſs wretch, whoſe name would defile paper. " And we did not give over, ſaid Rapin, till we " had got this infamous creature condemned to die " by an arret of Parliament; he being accordingly " hanged, and afterwards burnt publickly at the " Greve. Had we not made this ſtrong oppoſition, " I am afraid, continued he, that France would at " this time, have been a ſink of atheiſm; particu- " larly if we had countenanced him, and thereby " have given a ſanction to his maxims. Such were " Rapin's laſt words (10)."

(9) Moreri is therefore miſtaken, in ſaying, that Rapin died at Tours.

§ (α). He probably means Geoffry Vallée of Orleans, who for profeſſing atheiſm, was hanged and burnt at the Greve, the 9th of February 1573 *. With regard to the three poets of the conſtellation, whom Garaſſe declares that this wretch drew away. See Memoires de l'Etat de France, &c. Tom. I. fol. 278 verſo, of edition 1579. REM. CRIT.

(10) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, liv. 2. p. 124 & ſeq.

* Nouv. Menagiana, Tom. 4. p. 311.

[E] Some

was not complied with in this particular [E]. He had oppoſed the Proteſtants ſtrongly [F], and afterwards the Jeſuits (c). His friends beſtowed the following encomium upon him, that he was the moſt learned Soldier, and the braveſt Counſellor in the world (d). Moreri informs us of other particulars.

(c) See the rem. [D].

(d) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, p. 122.

[E] Some ſay, that his laſt deſire was not complied with in this particular.] Father Garaſſe ſhall be my voucher on this occaſion. " The late Scævola Sammarthanus, ſays he (11), honoured the late Mr. " Rapin, his good friend, with a true and very ho- " nourable elogium, in which he ſays, that Delatus " eſt Fontenaium, & modico funeris apparatu, quemad- " modum Teſtamento præſcripſerat, ſepultus; i. e. He " was carried to Fontenai, and privately buried there, " as he had ordered by his will; but it is proper in " juſtice to Rapin, to know punctually the ſtory, ac- " cording to the real truth, of which I myſelf was " an eye-witneſs. It is therefore certain, that the " late Mr. Nicholas Rapin being on his death-bed in " the year 1608, at the time of the extraordinary " cold winter, had made his will (before he confeſſed " himſelf to father James de Moucy) by which he " had ordered, that his body ſhould be carried from " Poictiers to Fontenay, in the ſame manner that that " of Budæus was carried from St. Avoye ſtreet to the " Convent of the Celeſtins, that is, without lights, " pomp, or company, on a waggon covered with " black cloth, a boy walking before with only a " bell and lanthorn. But he being told that ſuch a " burial might be ill conſtrued, and confirm the " opinion many perſons had, viz. of his thinking " too freely in matters of Religion, he changed his " opinion, and made a codicil, by which he revoked " his firſt will; and, inſtead of his Cook, whom he " had appointed his Executor, he beſought father " Francis Solier, who was there preſent, and who " was to preach the Lent ſermons of 1609 in Fon- " tenay, to cauſe his body to be honourably buried, " after the manner of the Catholicks, with the uſual " prayers, in which he put a great and peculiar con- " fidence. It is indeed true that, by the fault of his " heirs, his codicil was not directly executed accord- " ing to his deſires; but his end, his confeſſion, his " tears, and the ſtory I related in the ſecond book, " ſhew that he died a very good Catholick."

(11) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, liv. 7. p. 922, 923.

[F] He had oppoſed the Proteſtants ſtrongly.] The reader has ſeen what Scaliger ſays on this ſubject; but a more expreſs proof is contained in the following paſſage, it thereby appearing that the Proteſtants poſſeſſing themſelves of Fontenai in 1570, could not be prevailed upon to comprehend Rapin (the Mayor) in the capitulation; however, they could not prevent his eſcaping. " The beſieged being ſum- " moned to ſurrender, had no ſooner demanded that " their lives ſhould be ſpared, and they ſhould march " out with their arms and their baggage, but it was " granted them by Soubize (who commanded in the " abſence of la Noue, till the reſolutions of the Coun- " cil of Rochelle ſhould be known) and the capitu- " lations faithfully obſerved by the Proteſtants, who " gave them leave to go to Niort, to carry the news " of that ſurrender, which was on the 28th of June, " without the participation of Rapin the Mayor. " This Magiſtrate was ſo much hated by the Prote- " ſtants, either becauſe he had declared expreſsly a- " gainſt them, or becauſe that, at his perſuaſion, " Landereau had ſided with the contrary party, that " he was carefully ſought after by every one, in or- " der to put him to death. But ſeeing the city was " ſurrendered, that his friends were going out of it " (and that the Proteſtants would never be prevailed " upon to comprehend the Mayor;) he diſguiſed " himſelf in the habit of a ſervant, when he hid " himſelf in a poor woman's houſe, whence he be- " ſought Creſſoniere to free him. Accordingly the " latter had him conducted ſafely out of the city, " after which he retired to Niort with the other Ca- " tholicks (12)."

(12) La vraie & entiere Hiſt. des Troubles, liv. 13. folio 387. Rochelle edit. 1573.

RAPIN (RENATUS), a famous Jeſuit, who profeſſed the fourth vow, was born at Tours in 1621, and entered into the ſociety in 1639. He taught Polite Literature during nine years (a). He had made it his particular ſtudy; and ſhewed, by ſome Latin pieces [A], that he was able to write on the fineſt ſubjects with great art and eloquence. He excelled in Latin poetry [B]; and venturing, at laſt, to write in French, he ſucceeded wonderfully well in that tongue. He wrote in that language, ſeveral treatiſes on Polite Literature, and on pious ſubjects, which met with a very favourable reception from the publick. The treatiſes on Polite Literature, having been publiſhed at various times, were collected in a body, and printed at Paris in 1684, in two volumes in 4to; and at Amſterdam in two volumes in 12mo, in 1686. Long extracts were given of them in the 1ſt tome of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, and in the Acta Eruditorum (b). Moſt of the treatiſes on pious ſubjects were collected in the Amſterdam edition of 1695 (c). Some think he is too peremptory, for a Writer who ſeems to have more good taſte and delicacy than depth of erudition (d). He died at Paris the 27th of October 1687. His elogium was publiſhed the month following (e). It is a ſhort piece, very well turned, and writ by Father Bouhours. He is there repreſented as poſſeſſed of the fineſt qualities that can adorn a man of probity, and a good chriſtian. We there find, among other particulars, that his zeal for religion, and the honour of the ſociety, made him undertake, above twenty years ſince, a large work, to which he applied himſelf without interruption, though he ſaw no probability that he ſhould live to ſee it publiſhed, and yet Heaven

(a) Ex Nathanaele Sotuello, Bibl. Script. Societat. p. 717.

(b) p. 192 and 263 & ſeq. ann. 1686.

(c) See Acta eruditorum, 1695. p. 387.

(d) See the paſſage of the Menagiana, in the rem. [F].

(e) His article, in the Supplement to Moreri, is extracted from thence. See an extract of this elogium in l'Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, for Nov. 1687. p. 413. See alſo Rabutin's Letters; Letter 31 and 32, of part 2; and Letter 128, of part 3.

[A] By ſome Latin pieces.] Here follow the titles of ſome of them. Sereniſſimæ Reipublicæ Venetæ trophæum ob debellatum Turcam & reſtitutam Societatem Jeſu, at Paris 1657 folio. Trophæum famæ Eminentiſſimo Cardinali Mazarino, ib. 1657 folio. Lacrymæ in alumni ſui Alphonſi Mancini tumultum nepotis ejuſdem Cardinalis (1), ibid. 1658 folio. Pacis triumphalia ad Em. Cardinalem Mazarinum, ibid. 1659 folio. Pax Themidis cum Muſis, ibid. 1659 folio. Pacifer Delphinus, ibid. folio. Add to theſe Elogium Franciſci Foucquet defuncti, ibid. 1669.

(1) Father Rapin had directed the ſtudies of this nephew of Cardinal Mazarin.

[B] He excelled in Latin poetry.] Beſides the pieces mentioned in the preceding remarks, ſee his Eclogæ ſacræ cum Diſſertatione de carmine paſtorali, printed at Paris in 1659 4to. and his Chriſtus patiens carmine heroico, printed in the ſame city anno 1674. 12mo. But ſee particularly his Hortorum libri 4. quibus addita eſt Diſputatio de univerſa hortenſis culturæ diſciplina. This work printed in 4to. at Paris anno 1665 (2), was reprinted there in 12mo, anno 1666. It is highly applauded in the Journal des Savans (3). See Baillet (4), who in the chapter where Father Rapin is conſidered as a Poet, has collected a great number of curious remarks, moſt of which are in honour of this Jeſuit. See alſo the 9th Journal des Savans for the year 1682, where mention is made of the collection of all Father Rapin's poems (5).

Some perſons ſay, that he has been a little too much flattered in Baillet's Jugements; and that the Jeſuits think his verſes are far from coming up to the delicacy

(2) And not in 1661, as we are told by Sotuel, in Bibl. Script. Societat. p. 717.

(3) See the Journal of Feb. 9. 1665, and that of May 10, 1666.

(4) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poetes, num. 1537.

(5) Printed at Paris in 1682, in 2 vols 12mo.

ven was ſo indulgent as to give him an opportunity of publiſhing it before he died. This great work is the hiſtory of Janſeniſm. Father Rapin was a dangerous adverſary of that party. He attacked it, on its weak ſide, in a Latin work publiſhed by him in 1658 [C]. The Janſeniſts inveighed ſtrongly againſt an anonymous letter he publiſhed [D], ſince what they call the Peace of the Church. It is pleaſant enough to ſee this Jeſuit repreſented as a Phyſician in ſome Bibliotheques [E]. The circumſtances of the diſpute between him and his brother Jeſuit Francis Vavaſſeur have not been juſtly related in the Menagiana [F]. His enemies endeavoured to make him obnoxious to the late Prince of cacy and purity of thoſe of Father Commire; or to the grandeur and majeſty of thoſe of father de la Rue; or to the eaſe and neatneſs of thoſe of Father Coſſart, not to mention thoſe of Father Hoſchius, and Father Vallius; that his gardens are his beſt poems, and that after this work he lived upon his reputation. They were reprinted at Naples, and tranſlated into Engliſh by J. Evelyn. This tranſlation was dedicated to the Lord Arlington, and printed at London in 1673 8vo.

[C] He attacked Janſeniſm on its weak ſide (6), in a Latin work publiſhed by him in 1658.] It is (7) entitled, Diſſertatio de nova Doctrina, ſeu Evangelium Janſeniſtarum. I confeſs I have not read it, and am of opinion that moſt learned perſons in foreign countries can ſay the ſame; but an ingenious man informed me of the turn which Father Rapin has given to it. He ſuppoſes a Janſeniſt, who goes to carry the light of the Goſpel into a country of Infidels, and who teaches them, with ſincerity, the ſyſtems of Grace, viz. that the greateſt part of mankind have, from all eternity, been predeſtinated to everlaſting puniſhment, and the remainder to the glory of Paradiſe; that God, the Author of this abſolute predeſtination, not being willing to want ſome pretence, in order to colour his decrees with regard to damnation, declares to mankind, that it is entirely in their own power to ſave themſelves, and that they need only obey his commands. He employs menaces and exhortations, and at the ſame time is ſenſible that he commands them impoſſibilities; that it is not in their power to obey; and that he refuſes all men, the elect excepted, efficacious grace, without which they cannot poſſibly be converted, or even have a good impulſe. Father Rapin ſuppoſes that the Infidels, who hear ſuch a Goſpel, are greatly ſurprized to hear ſuch a deſcription of God, and aſk why he ſends preachers to perſons who cannot poſſibly be converted, unleſs he indulges them his Grace, which yet he had bound himſelf, by his eternal decrees, to refuſe them. Father Rapin's Janſeniſt replies, that God acts in this manner in order to leave mankind no excuſe, and more deſerving of Hell torments. Here it is replied, that ſuch a motive is not worthy of an infinitely good Being, and is no ways adapted to deprive men of the means to defend themſelves before the Throne of the Almighty; that he leaves them the right of ſaying, that man is not obliged to do impoſſibilities; and that no legiſlator ever inflicts puniſhment, but on the ſuppoſition, that thoſe who violate the laws had it in their power to obey them; this is the reaſon why lunaticks are not puniſhed. We may eaſily figure to ourſelves what a Moliniſt, who knows how to make the beſt of an argument, may ſay pro and con, after entering upon the converſation in the manner related above. But beſides a hundred other good anſwers, he might be told, that a Janſeniſt, who was to preach for the firſt time to the Infidels of Japan or China, would not be ſo ſtupid as to begin with the doctrine that denies man's free-will, or that of abſolute predeſtination. He would preach agreeably to the manner of the Pelagians, as one of our moſt rigid Predeſtinarians (8) ſays we muſt do; and would ſuſpend his Janſeniſm, till ſuch time as his new converts would be no longer in want of milk, but be able to digeſt more ſolid food. Theſe are myſteries that ought to be diſcovered to none but the initiated.

[D] The Janſeniſts inveighed ſtrongly againſt an anonymous letter he publiſhed.] It is written to Cardinal Cibo, and dated in July 1680 (9). A French verſion of it was publiſhed in Holland anno 1684, and dated the 30th of Auguſt 1683. See what the Author of the Republique des Lettres ſays of it (10). As to the complaints made by the Janſeniſts againſt Father Rapin, ſee among other books the VIII. Tome of Morale pratique. The reader will alſo find (11) that Father Eſtrix, a Flemiſh Jeſuit, is Author of a book entitled, De fraudibus hæreticorum, publiſhed under the fictitious name of Francis Simonis; and that Father Rapin thought this piece ſo beautiful, that he tranſlated it into French; and to give it the greater authority, he dedicated it to the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of France, with a Preface, in which he takes notice that the works of Francis Simonis, written in Latin and printed at Colen, had given occaſion to his, and furniſhed him with materials for compoſing it (12). This work of Father Rapin is entitled, Artifices des Heretiques. It was printed at Paris in 1681, and reprinted the ſame year in Flanders. See la critique generale (13) du Calviniſme (14).

[E] The Jeſuit is repreſented as a Phyſician in ſome Bibliotheques.] He is not ſo called in the new edition of Vander Linden, De Scriptis Medicis (15); but his Hortorum libri are mentioned in it, and afterwards all his works in general, Opera omnia, Lugduni Batavorum 1672, in 12mo. I take no notice of Bartholinus, who has ranked this Jeſuit in his catalogue of ſuch Phyſicians as have been Poets (16), for he does not ſay that he was not a Jeſuit; but I cannot omit what has been already obſerved by Baillet. His words are as follow: "Mr. Koningius ſplits Fa" ther Rapin in two, and ſays, 1. Henricus Rapinus
" quatuor libros Hortorum anno 1671 edi curavit. He " afterwards ſpeaks of Nicholas Rapin of Poitou,
" who is the Grand Provoſt of the Connetablie, which
" he mentioned in its place, and afterwards adds, 2.
" Renatus Rapinus Medicus anno 1659 claruit. Opera
" ejus Medica prodierunt anno 1672. Extant ejuſdem
" Eclogæ ſacræ, item, Hortus Epigrammatum. See " page 678. What he calls works of Phyſick are no
" other than the four books of gardens, the title of " which only (of the Utrecht edition) he had ſeen
" in the year ſpecified by him. One may eaſily ſee
" the cauſe of the other miſtakes. It is not but " ſome other foreign Authors, as de Beughem in " Holland, Lipenius in Germany, have alſo ranked " Father Rapin among the Phyſicians. But they " cannot be accuſed of committing an error, ſince
" they are not miſtaken in the name, the perſon,
" and work of the Author, and ſay nothing about
" his profeſſion. I did not intend to charge Koni-
" gius with being inaccurate; he having done no-
" thing on this occaſion but what is common enough
" to Bibliographers who ſpeak of foreign books, which " they have not ſeen; but to ſhew, on the contrary,
" that thoſe who undertake ſuch works are excuſable,
" becauſe they cannot help falling into ſuch miſtakes
" (17)."

[F] The circumſtances of the diſpute between him and his brother Francis Vavaſſeur have not been juſtly related in the Menagiana.] I ſhall tranſcribe this entire paſſage from the Menagiana, becauſe it confirms a particular mentioned in the text of the Orator.
" Father Rapin had not capacity enough to draw the " parallel between Virgil and Homer. Mr. le Fevre
" (Tanaquil Faber) of Saumur, whom he was en-
" deavouring to make a convert at that time, fur-
" niſhed him with the Greek paſſages cited by him.
" After he had read over his parallel between Ariſtotle
" and Plato, at the firſt Preſident Mr. de la Moignon's,
" I told him I found but one error in it, viz. that
" in ſpeaking of the Colophonian woman whom
" Plato loved, he had ſaid that ſhe was young;
" whereas the Epigram, in which mention is made
" of her, ſays that love had ſeated himſelf in her
" wrinkles. Here Abbé Tallemant ſaid, that the " Father ought to be excuſed; he not imagining
" that it became a man of Plato's wiſdom to love an " old woman. Father Rapin turned Latin verſes
" finely.

(6) Obſerve, that I do not mean that the tenet of grace is the weak ſide of Janſeniſm. I only mean that the weak ſide of this tenet gives a handle for exclaiming againſt the injuſtice of puniſhment, &c.

(7) Printed at Paris in 1658, 8vo.

(8) See Mr. Jurieu's book, entitled, Jugement ſur les Methodes d'expliquer la Grace.

(9) See the Morale pratique des Jeſuites, Tom. 8. p. 97.

(10) For January 1686. p. 97 & ſeq.

(11) p. 50.

(12) Ibid. p. 51.

(13) Letter 3. p. 302, of the 3d edit.

(14) i. e. of the Hiſtory of Calviniſm, by Father Maimbourg.

(15) See Lindenius renovatus, p. 938. It is there ſaid, that the Hortorum libri were printed in 4to, at Paris in 1661, and in 1666; and at Leyden in 12mo, in 1666, and 1668; and at Utrecht in 12mo, in 1672.

(16) Thom. Bartholin. de Medicis Poetis, p. 136.

(17) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poetes, Tom. 4. p. 293, 294.

of Conde, by the malicious turn they gave to his treatiſe on the Sublime (f).

(f) See ſome things in his juſtification, in the Nouvelles de la Rebublique des Lettres, for March 1686. p. 356. This work had been mentioned in the Nouvelles for February 1686. p. 237.

" finely, but was not very learned. Father Vavaſſeur " and he had great conteſts: and he bought up the " whole impreſſion of this Father's treatiſe De Epi- " grammata, (in which he writes againſt him) by " order of the firſt Preſident, in order to ſuppreſs it, " ſo that the book in queſtion is become extremely " ſcarce (18)." All that is here ſaid with reſpect to Vavaſſeur's book de Epigrammate is falſe, and has been rectified in manner following, in the ſecond edition. He had a great quarrel with father Vavaſſeur on account of his Reflections on Ariſtotle's poeticks, which he got Muguet to print, without putting his (Rapin's) name to it. Father Vavaſſeur, who was diſſatisfied with him, publiſhed ſoon after Remarks on thoſe reflections, in which the author of thoſe reflections, whom he pretends not to know, is very ill treated. Father Rapin made a great buſtle about this, and openly complained of the proceeding of his brother Jeſuit, who anſwered, that he might thank himſelf for it; and that, had he declared himſelf to be the author of the Reflections in queſtion, he would never have wrote againſt them. The expedient found to reconcile theſe two Jeſuits was, to ſuppreſs father Vavaſſeur's Remarks, which accordingly was done by the authority of Mr. de Lamoignon, the firſt Preſident; ſo that this book, which was printed by Billaine in 1675, and conſiſts but of 141 pages, is become very ſcarce (19). See the Critique Generale Maimbourg (20), in which ſome particulars are given with regard to this quarrel, and another in which father Rapin was engaged (21). Obſerve two other particulars (22); As father Vavaſſeur wrote two large books of epigrams (23), he was not pleaſed with father Rapin for ſaying, in his reflections on Ariſtotle's poeticks, that it is ſo unuſual a thing for an author to write admirable epigrams, that any perſon may be ſatisfied with having made a few in his life-time (24), and this prompted him to write againſt father Rapin: I was told this by himſelf. Theſe are Menage's words. The other particular I had to ſay is, that father Rapin, in the new edition of his Reflections, did not correct all the errors which his brother Jeſuit had cenſured. He contented himſelf with correcting a ſmall part of them, and retained ſome intolerable ones. He affirms, in the firſt edition, that Homer never vented any impiety (25): he affirms this in the other editions, and yet his cenſor had proved, that Homer has wrote ſeveral profane falſities, as well as infamous impoſtures, in oppoſition to the veneration and reſpect he owed to his Gods (26): nay, he had cited father Rapin as witneſſing this (27). I ſhall obſerve by the way, that the Cenſor did not correct, all the errors which are in the Reflections on Ariſtotle's poeticks; and that, had he criticiſed the reſt of the works of that Author, he would have found a conſiderable number of particulars that deſerved to be animadverted on. See the remarks [A] and [T] of the Article ARISTOTLE.

(18) Menagiana, p. 60, 61, of the firſt Dutch edit.

(19) Menagiana, p. 83, of ſecond Dutch edit.

(20) In the 4th Letter.

(21) That with Father Maimb.

(22) Menage, Anti-Baillet, chap. 84.

(23) You will find, at the end of the book de Epigrammate, the edit. of Paris 1672, three pretty ſmall books of Epigrams, by Vavaſſeur. In 1675, he publiſhed an appendix to the 3d book, and ſome time after the 4th book.

(24) Theſe words are in the Anti-Baillet, ch. 84.

(25) Rapin, Reft. ſur la Poet. en general, n. 9. p. 20.

(26) Vavaſſeur, Rem. ſur les nouv. Reft p. 21 &c ſeq.

(27) See Rapin, ibid. n. 25.

☞ RAPIN DE THOYRAS (PAUL DE), youngeſt ſon of James de Rapin, Lord of Thoyras, was deſcended of a good family [A], and was born at Caſtres March the 25th 1661. He was educated at firſt under a tutor in his father's houſe, and afterwards

[A] Deſcended of a good family.] It was originally from Savoy, where it has been eſtabliſhed from time immemorial, and paſſed through ſeveral honourable employments. We ſhall take notice only of that branch of the family, which was tranſplanted into France, where four brothers of that name ſettled in the time of King Francis I. One of them was Chaplain to Queen Catharine de Medicis, who obtained him from the Duke of Savoy. His brothers, (of whom only one left iſſue) entered into the ſervice, and embraced the Proteſtant Religion; for the profeſſion of which it is ſtrongly conjectured they left their country. The eldeſt had the command of a Regiment of Foot, and was Governor of Montaubon, with power over the Governors of the neighbouring forts. We find his name among the Viſcounts, who commanded the Proteſtant troops in the Southern Provinces of France. Some letters yet extant ſhew how well he was known to Henry IV. to the Princes of Condé, Lewis and Henry, to the Admiral Chatillon, and to a great many other perſons of the firſt rank. All that can be ſaid of another of theſe brothers named PETER is, that by circumſtances a commiſſion of horſe can hardly be referred to any other perſon than him; but this cannot be affirmed, as no name is ſet down. PHILIBERT, another brother, was a Gentleman of the Prince of Condé's Retinue, and Superintendant of his Houſhold; he was equally qualified for the field and cabinet, though the one and the other proved fatal to him, as they expoſed him to the hatred of the Roman Catholicks, and in particular to that of the Parliament of Toulouſe, by whoſe ſentence his head was ſtruck off at the very time he came by the King's order to inroll the Edict of Peace in 1569. The French Hiſtorians make frequent uſe of theſe two brothers; Father Daniel is the only one, who takes no notice of them, nor even the leaſt of this barbarous execution. The reaſon is not immediately obvious, for he cannot ſay, that this ſentence (however unjuſt it may be thought) was nothing more than a private affair, which for that reaſon he was at liberty to omit; ſince on the contrary it is plain, that an adventure ſo memorable in its circumſtances and conſequences, could not but merit a place in Hiſtory. But this Hiſtorian drew a double advantage from his artful omiſſion; the firſt, that he might, as much as he could, ſuppreſs a tranſport of rage, which is a blemiſh on the Roman Catholicks; the ſecond, that he might caſt an odium on the Proteſtants, when he came to relate the devaſtation for ſome time made by the Admiral's army in the neighbourhood of Toulouſe: but even in this particular he lay under a greater reſtraint than he could have wiſhed, being obliged to ſpeak in general terms, for he could not enter into particulars, without ſhewing the connexion between theſe diſorders and Rapin's death, which was both the cauſe of and excuſe for them. However of what he lightly touches, Thuanus and Mezerai give us a juſt detail, and ſet the affair in its true light. Mezerai, who is ſomewhat more particular than the other, and who tells us, that the Proteſtants deſpaired of reducing the town, as there were in it 8000 regular troops augmented by a great number of inhabitants, ſays expreſsly, that the Proteſtants ſet fire to the farms and houſes of the Counſellors, and that the ſoldiers with live coals wrote on the ruins, Vengeance for Rapin's death.

PETER RAPIN, Baron of Mauvers, ſon of Philibert, was Governor of Maſ-granier, one of the cautionary towns granted to the Proteſtants of Guienne. He was a ſoldier from his youth, and followed Henry IV. in all his expeditions, and by much the greater part of that time received nothing from his eſtate, which put him often, as well as others, under the ſame dilemma, to very great ſtraights. From an anſwer which he received, we may ſuppoſe even the King in no better circumſtances; for having loſt an horſe, he deſired his Majeſty to furniſh him with money to purchaſe another; upon which the King replied, I would willingly do it, but my whole ſtock of linen amounts to no more than three ſhirts. But Monſieur Rapin's ſufferings in theſe religious wars were not in the army only. He ſaw his houſe three times either burnt or pulled down, and every thing pillaged. The laſt time indeed he was as far as was poſſible indemnified, and that after a manner, which muſt have given him a ſenſible pleaſure; for the Roman Catholick Gentlemen of his neighbourhood, who had an eſteem and friendſhip for him, aſſembling themſelves reſolved every one to contribute his ſhare to-afterwards ſent to Puyluarens, and thence to Saumur [B]. About the beginning of the year 1679, he returned to his father's houſe, with a deſign to apply himſelf ſeriouſly to the ſtudy of the Law; but he had made no great progreſs, when he found himſelf under an obligation, (as a great many other young Gentlemen were) of being admitted an Advocate, upon the news of an edict, which ſoon after came out, forbidding a Doctor's degree to any, who had not ſtudied five years in ſome univerſity. The ſame year the Court of the Edict was ſuppreſſed, which obliged Mr. Rapin's family to remove to Toulouſe. Mr. Rapin obſerving the unhappy condition of the Proteſtants, which every day grew worſe, deſired his father to conſent, that he might quit the profeſſion of the Law, and apply himſelf to that of the Sword; but received an anſwer, which tended only to the gaining time; for though his requeſt was thought reaſonable and well grounded, his father apprehended, that this new courſe of life, which, more than any other, awakens ambition, might expoſe his ſon to too ſtrong a temptation, as he would find his religion an obſtacle to his fortune, which impediment being once removed, he might hope to riſe, as well as others. This ſtate of uncertainty very much abated his ardour in the ſtudy of the Law; however, he pleaded one cauſe, and one only, and then with more than ordinary attention applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Mathematicks and Muſick, in which he became a pretty good proficient. In 1685 his father died; and two months after the edict of Nantes being revoked, Mr. Rapin, with his mother and brothers, retired to a country houſe; but as the perſecution in a ſhort time after was carried to a great height, he and his youngeſt brother, in March 1686, went to England [C]. But as he had no hopes of any ſettlement in that Kingdom, his ſtay there was but ſhort; he went to Holland where he had ſome relations, and liſted himſelf in the company of French volunteers at Utrecht, commanded by Mr. Rapin, his couſin-german.

wards the ploughing and ſowing his lands; and as thoſe troubles were but of eight months duration, as ſoon as they were appeaſed he found a crop fit to reap, and his whole eſtate in as good a condition (excepting the loſs of his houſe) as the moſt careful owner could have put it. Upon the falſe rumour of his death, he had the pleaſure to read a letter from Queen Mary de Medicis, in which her Majeſty tells his family that ſhe was grieved for his loſs. He married the daughter of Monſieur de Lupé, Lord of Maravat, Captain of fifty men at arms, a Major-General, and Governor of Mauvez in a cautionary town. Monſieur de Rapin left a numerous iſſue, of which the ſecond ſon James, Lord of Thoyras, was the favourite of his parents: his father made a more ample proviſion for him than for any of the younger children; and his mother gave him, over and above his fortune, the eſtate ſhe inherited from John de Ferriere, Vidame of Chartres, one of the heads of the Proteſtants in France, which ſhe enjoyed in right of her mother. He, as well as his brothers, was deſigned for the army; but his mother unwilling to part with him, deſired, that he might apply himſelf to his ſtudies, which his father with ſome reluctance conſented to. After he had qualified himſelf, he was admitted an Advocate in the Court of the Edict of Caſtres; and contrary to the cuſtom of the country (for a Gentleman is never ſeen of that profeſſion) he practiſed to the day of his death at Caſtres, Caſtelnaudary, and Toulouſe; but in this computation we muſt take in four years, which he ſpent at Paris, whither he went upon notice of his brother-in-law Monſieur Peliſſon's being taken up with Monſieur Fouquet. He was thoroughly acquainted with every particular of that remarkable affair, and proved many ways very ſerviceable in it. He was one of the three who had an hand in the Factum, and furniſhed it with what relates to the Roman law; and Monſieur Fouquet wrote to him a letter from the Baſtille, in which he returns him hearty thanks for that piece. He was eſteemed one of the moſt able lawyers of his age, no leſs eminent for his juſtice than his knowledge. His wife, who died at Geneva, being baniſhed thither for refuſing to embrace the Roman Catholick Religion, was ſiſter to the famous George and Paul Peliſſon; her father and grandfather were Judges in the Parliament of Toulouſe, and of the Court of the Edict of Caſtres. Her great grandfather, who had been Maſter of the Requeſts and Embaſſador in Portugal, was afterwards firſt Preſident of the Senate of Chamberri, and General in Savoy, while in the poſſeſſion of the French. The youngeſt ſon of James de Rapin, was Paul Rapin, the ſubject of the preſent article.

[B] Thence to Saumur.] It was here, that when he was about ſeventeen years of age, upon a very ſlight occaſion he had a quarrel with a friend, which occaſioned a challenge. Whether it was that they had ſpent their time in fetching their ſwords, as ſcholars ſeldom wear any, or that they fought a long time, the night came upon them. While they were thus engaged, Mr. Rapin's blade broke off at the hilt, which he was not ſenſible of, but his adverſary, who immediately perceived it, had the generoſity to give him notice of it, which changing the duel into a friendly embrace, they returned together to the town. Some months after this he had another affair upon his hands with a perſon much ſuperior to him in age, who, as he was taking the air, met and rudely joſtled him in a narrow paſs. Mr. Rapin attacked him; but as there was a good deal of company preſent, they were ſoon parted. He immediately ran for his ſword, but at his return the perſon was gone, and though he made a diligent ſearch after him for ſeveral days he could not find him. He heard the aggreſſor was gone to Paris, whither Mr. Rapin ſoon followed him, but his uncle, Mr. Peliſſon, having received information from Saumur of the ſuſpected cauſe of his journey, acquainted the Marſhals of France with the affair, by whom he was put under an arreſt upon his arrival; and the aggreſſor was likewiſe ſecured. Both parties having had an hearing before the Marſhals, the aggreſſor was ſentenced to be immediately impriſoned in Fort l'Eveque, till Mr. Rapin conſented to his being diſcharged, which he did in about a month after, at the requeſt of the Prince of Furſtemburg, Biſhop of Straſburg, then at Paris. The day following the ſentence abovementioned, the brother of the priſoner meeting Mr. Rapin in the ſtreet treated him with ill language, which could not but make a freſh quarrel; upon which Mr. Rapin drew his ſword, and before any perſon could part them wounded his antagoniſt. By advice of friends on both ſides this affair was concealed for fear of irritating the Marſhals.

[C] He and his younger brother in March 1686 went to England.] He had not been long in London, before he was viſited by a French Abbé of diſtinguiſhed quality, a friend of Mr. Peliſſon, who introduced him to Monſieur Barillon, the French Embaſſador, who received him with great civility. Theſe Gentlemen perſuaded him to go to Court, promiſing to preſent him to the King, and aſſuring him of a favourable reception. Mr. Rapin, who ſaw no ground for his pretending to this honour, and fearing that a propoſal ſeemingly ſo advantageous might have unhappy conſequences, refuſed the offer in the civileſt manner. His preſent ſituation was not very agreeable, german. Mr. Peliſſon, the ſame year, publiſhed his Reflections on the difference of Religions, which he ſent to Mr. Rapin, with a ſtrict charge to give him his opinion of the work, which he did at large, retorting in many places Mr. Peliſſon's own words; but nothing of this was found among his papers. He did not quit his company, till he followed the Prince of Orange into England, where in 1689, the Lord Kingſton made him his own Enſign; in which poſt he went into Ireland, where at the ſiege of Carrickfergus, which was undertaken ſoon after their landing, he gained the eſteem of all the Officers of his regiment, eſpecially that of Lieutenant-Colonel Fielding, who, before the cloſe of that year, procured him a Lieutenant's commiſſion. In the beginning of the year 1690, the regiment, in which he ſerved, was given to Lieutenant-General Douglas, who, upon the recommendation of three French Colonels, received Mr. Rapin with greater diſtinction than any other of the Subalterns, and afterwards repoſed a very great confidence in him. Mr. Rapin was preſent at the battle of the Boyne. At the ſiege of Limerick he was ſhot through the ſhoulder; and the ſiege being raiſed the next day, was obliged to ride four miles in very great torture; and being left with the wounded, (among whom was his own brother, who received a ſhot through his body) he could not join his regiment, which marched towards the north. Not long after this, he was appointed, by General Douglas, Captain of the Company in which he had been Enſign. The year following, that General, who commanded the Scots guards, being ordered for Flanders, made choice of Mr. Rapin to be Aid de Camp, whoſe ill ſtate of health would not allow him to accept of that offer. He continued in Ireland till towards the end of the year 1693 [D], when he was ordered for England, without any reaſon aſſigned; but a letter, which he received at the ſame time from Mr. Belcaſtel, informed him, that he was to be Tutor to the ſon of the Earl of Portland. Having never had any thoughts of this nature, he could not imagine to whom he owed the recommendation; which he at laſt found to be from the Lord Galloway. He immediately went to London, and entered upon his charge. This put a period to all his hopes of riſing to thoſe poſts in the army, which ſeveral younger Officers of his acquaintance afterwards obtained. All the return made him, was leave to reſign his company to his brother, who was afterwards a Lieutenant-Colonel of Engliſh dragoons, and died in the year 1719. The King, indeed, granted him a penſion of an hundred pounds a year, till he could provide better for him, which never happened. He enjoyed this penſion ſeveral years; but upon the death of that King, it was taken from him, and a poſt of ſmall value given him in exchange. While the Earl of Portland was Embaſſador in France, he was obliged to be ſometimes in that Kingdom, often in England, and not ſeldom in Holland; but at length he ſettled at the Hague, where the young Lord Portland was learning his exerciſes. While he reſided here, in 1699, he married Marianne Teſtard; but this marriage neither abated his care of his pupil, nor prevented his accompliſhing him in his travels, which they began with a tour through Germany, where they made ſome ſtay at different Courts, but eſpecially at that of Vienna. Hence they went into Italy by the way of Tirol, where the Mareſchal de Villeroy was at that time priſoner, who gave Mr. Rapin a letter for the Cardinal d'Etreés, then at Venice. Having finiſhed their travels, which put an end to his employment, he returned to his family at the Hague, where he continued ſome years [E]. But as he found his family encreaſe, he reſolved to retire to ſome cheap country, and accordingly removed in 1707, to Wezel, where he wrote the works publiſhed by him [F]. Though he was of a ſtrong conſtitution, yet ſevenable, being perpetually preſſedby the Marquis deSciſſac, and other French Catholicks then in London, upon the ſubject of Religion, and eſpecially by the Abbé, who, notwithſtanding he ſhewed the greateſt complaiſance, always turned the diſcourſe to controverſy. Finding it not poſſible for him, who was unprepared, to make his party good againſt a man converſant in every controverted point, and who had treated his ſubject with great art, he reſolved upon returning into the country without taking leave of the Abbé, though he came to town on no other account than to pay his reſpects to that Gentleman. He was ſenſible, that he ſhould be guilty of ill manners in taking this ſtep; however, he thought it better than to continue longer expoſed.

[D] He continued in Ireland till towards the end of the year 1693.] He was at the ſiege of Athlone, as likewiſe at the action, which happened in paſſing the river Shannon, reckoned not only one of the braveſt, but alſo one of the moſt difficult enterprizes, that ever ſucceeded, and which the Generals themſelves in a manner deſpaired of: two regiments of different nations were left in the town, commanded by their reſpective Lieutenant Colonels; neither of whom underſtanding the language of the other, and both being jealous of their authority, it might have proved the ground of continual diſſenſion, if it had not been prevented by the prudence of Mr. Rapin, and of a Captain in the other regiment his particular friend. Theſe two having great influence over their ſeveral commanding officers, and being themſelves diſpaſſionate, happily prevented all differences. From hence Mr. Rapin was ſent to other garriſons, in particular to Kilkenny, where he afterwards waited on the Biſhop, by whom he was very well received; and he ſhould have thought himſelf happy in this ſituation, had not the daily broils, which aroſe between the Mayor of the town and the officers, alloyed the pleaſure he found in that Prelate's agreeable converſation. He exerted himſelf in reconciling theſe animoſities; and it was chiefly owing to his care, that they did not come to extremities. He ſome time after joined his regiment at Kingſale, where Sir James Waller was commanding officer, with whom he contracted a ſtrict friendſhip.

[E] Returned to his family at the Hague, where he continued ſome years.] He employed his leiſure hours in the ſtudy of fortification, but eſpecially of hiſtory; which occaſioned his making ſeveral general and particular chronological and genealogical tables. He was not a little pleaſed with being one of thoſe, who founded an aſſembly of men of merit and letters, whoſe converſation generally turned upon ſubjects of literature.

[F] The works publiſhed by him.] In 1717 he publiſhed at the Hague in 12mo, Diſſertation ſur les Whigs

ſeventeen years application (for ſo long he was in compoſing his Hiſtory of England) intirely ruined his health. About three years before his death, he found himſelf exhauſted, and often felt great pains in his ſtomach. Had he either quite abandoned that work, or allowed himſelf ſome relaxation, he might have hoped for a cure. Though he was ſenſible of this, yet he could not throughly reſolve upon it; all that he could bring himſelf to, was the lying till ſix o'clock in the morning, after which time he could neither ſleep nor be eaſy in his bed. He was ſoon tired of the diverſions he allowed himſelf, the chief of which was taking the air ſometimes; and whenever his illneſs gave him the leaſt reſpite, he returned to his work, which was the ground of his diſtemper, and at the ſame time his only pleaſure. At length a violent fever, with an oppreſſion at his ſtomach, put at end to his life the ſeventh day, which was May the 16th, 1725, he being then 64 years old. He left one ſon and ſix daughters. He was naturally of a ſedate temper. While he was in the army, this diſpoſition, which inclined him to ſeek the company of ſpeculative perſons, injured him in the opinion of ſome of his comrades, and even of ſome of his ſuperior Officers, who would have had him a partner in their diverſions; but on the other hand, it gained him the eſteem and friendſhip of many men of merit, who were in conſiderable poſts. However, we muſt not imagiue, that he was altogether inſenſible of pleaſure; he could be gay upon occaſion, though it was ſeldom, and always with moderation. He compoſed ſeveral little lively pieces, both in proſe and verſe; but as they were upon light ſubjects, or of little importance, and written only for the immediate diverſion of his friends, he never thought them worth the trouble of reviſing (a).

(a) See Bibliotheque Germanique, Tom. 10. Hiſt. Litteraire, Fevrier 1726, and the Life of Rapin prefixed to his Hiſtory of England.

Whigs & les Torys; and drew up extracts from the ſeventeen volumes of Rymer's Fœdera, printed in Mr. Le Clerc's Bibliotheque Choiſie, and Bibliotheque ancienne & moderne. But his greateſt work was his Hiſtory of England, printed at the Hague 1724 in 8 volumes in 4to, and reprinted ſince that time. There are two tranſlations of it, one by the Reverend Mr. Nicholas Tindal, M. A. firſt publiſhed in 8vo, and afterwards reprinted in two volumes in fol. and the other by John Kelly of the Inner-Temple Eſq; in two volumes in fol. Mr. Thomas Carte in a paper of his, containing a plan for an Hiſtory of England, gives the following character of our Author's Hiſtory.

" Rapin, later in time than our other writers, en" joyed by that means one advantage, which all his
" predeceſſors wanted; but withal he laboured un" der greater diſadvantages than any of them, with " regard to a civil hiſtory of this nation; as being
" a foreigner and utterly unacquainted with our con-
" ſtitution, laws, and cuſtoms, any further than he " could learn in converſation, or pick up in Coffee-
" Houſes, the common habitation of his countrymen
" in this city; ſo that his reaſonings or reflections
" upon the paſſages of former times are too often
" founded upon the modern notions, which he had " thus imbibed. Writing his hiſtory abroad, he " wanted an opportunity (if the ſelf-ſufficiency, to
" which ſome natures are ſubject, had not ſtifled in " him the inclination) of conſulting perſons better
" verſed than himſelf in antiquity, whoſe know" ledge might have ſupplied his defects, and whoſe
" informations might have helped to form or correct
" his judgment. The only advantage he had over " others was, that he wrote after Rymer's Fœdera was " publiſhed; and this circumſtance, more than any " other, contributed to recommend his hiſtory. But " as a number of technical words relative to parti" cular uſages are every where to be found in the in-" ſtruments publiſhed in that collection, he thro' the " want of ſufficient knowledge of thoſe uſages did " not always underſtand their true meaning. The " part, which he made moſt uſe of in that work,
" was the publick treaties with foreign Princes;
" but of theſe Rymer himſelf hath given us only an
" imperfect collection; his work containing no trea-
" ties, but ſuch as were inrolled in Chancery, and " are preſerved in the Tower of London, or in the " office of the rolls. Whilſt I was in France, I was " curious in ſearching for every thing, that con" cerned my own country; and have notes or made
" abſtracts of near a thouſand inſtruments of treaties
" and tranſactions between the crowns of England
" and France, which do not appear in Rymer, and
" yet are preſerved in the King of France's Treſor des
" Chartres, and in the regiſters of the Chambre des
" Comptes of the Parliament of Paris. There lie con" cealed at this time in our own archives ſome
" hundreds of the like publick treaties with foreign
" Princes and States, which would afford great light
" to our hiſtory. I never obſerved in Rapin any " quotation out of the Journals of our Privy Council,
" unleſs at ſecond hand out of Dr. Burnet's Hiſtory of
" the Reformation; though a conſcientious hiſtorian
" would never take up any thing on truſt, where
" he might examine the original, and a careful one
" would never have omitted to conſult the books of " that Council, wherein the moſt important affairs,
" that paſs, as well within as without the nation, are " debated and tranſacted. It doth not appear from " his work, that he ever read, either the rolls of " Parliament, or the Journals of either Houſe, which " yet muſt be deemed abſolutely neceſſary for an
" Engliſh hiſtorian. It is certain, that he never ſo
" much as ſaw the Paper-Office, or he could never " have been guilty of that groſs miſtake in affirm-
" ing, that there is not any one letter, that paſſed
" between Queen Mary of Scotland and Queen E" lizabeth and her Miniſters, preſerved in any of our " archives or repoſitories of publick papers. When
" if he had ever looked into the preſs in that office
" marked Scotland, an hundred libels would have of" fered themſelves to his ſight, put on different
" bundles, and expreſſing them to be letters from
" thoſe very perſons to one another in different years
" from 1569 to 1587. In this office are preſerved
" the letters of all our Embaſſadors in foreign Courts,
" and the diſpatches of the Lords of the Privy Coun" cil, of the Clerks of the Council, and of our Se" cretaries of State to thoſe Embaſſadors, in a con-
" ſtant ſeries from the time of Edward IV down to
" the revolution in a regular order; beſides a great " number of original treaties and other papers, which " will be found exceeding uſeful for an Engliſh hiſ-
" tory. It will appear ſtrange to every one, who
" conſiders how neceſſary theſe are for the right un-
" derſtanding of our negotiations abroad and our " tranſactions with foreign States, that no Hiſtorian
" hath yet made any uſe of the Papers in this Of" fice."

T.

(a) Lindenius renovatus, p. 537.

RASARIO (JOHN BAPTIST), an Italian Phyſician, was born in the territory of Novara [A], in 1517 (a). He taught Polite Literature (b) at Venice twenty-two years

(b) Ghilini ſays that he was Profeſſor of the Greek tongue at Venice; and Thuanus, that he was Profeſſor of Eloquence.

[A] He was born in the territory of Navara.] I ſpeak thus in general, becauſe Thuanus and Ghilini are agreed with regard to the name of the place of his birth. The latter calls it Borgo di Seſia (1); and the years with great reputation (c); and his eloquence was greatly applauded, among other occaſions, at the time when he made an oration on the victory gained at Lepanto, in 1571 [B]. He afterwards went to Rome, where Pope Pius IV. offered him a very handſom ſalary; but he did not like to reſide in that city, and choſe rather to accept of the employment which the Senate of Milan offered him (d), viz. that of teaching Polite Literature in the univerſity of Pavia. He died there in 1578 (e), and not in 1573, as we are told in Lindenius renovatus. His Latin tranſlation of ſome of Galen's works was printed in 1545 (f). Neither Ghilini, Teiſſier, nor Moreri, make any mention of this tranſlation in the catalogue they have given of his works. The particulars, which Moreri ſays of Raſario are extracted from Teiſſier. The Reader will do well to look into this laſt mentioned Author, and alſo the original of Thuanus; but he will here find ſome miſtakes that want to be rectified [C].

(1) Ghilini, part. 2. p. 142.

(c) Thuan. lib. 65 ſub fin.

(d) Ghilini, Tom. 2. p. 142.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Linden. renovatus, p. 537.

the former employs a phraſe I do not underſtand, and which is ungrammatical in my edition; Oppido quod à valle Uziæ in Novarienſi diocæſi ſito nomen retinet familia nobili natus (2). Theſe words have been thus tranſlated by Teiſſier, deſcended of a noble family of Valdugia in the Novarreze (3). Moreri adds, that Valdugia is a town of the Novarreze. Paul Freherus (4), quoting the Thuanus enucleatus of Gerard de Stocken, ſays, in vallo Uziæ, and not à valle Uziæ, which alteration, ſo far from leſſening the difficulty, increaſes it conſiderably.

(2) Thuan. lib. 65, ſub fin. p. 233. edit. Franc. 1625.

(3) Teiſſier, Elog. Tom. 1. p. 486. edit. of 1696.

(4) In Theatro, p. 1277.

[B] When he made an oration on the victory gained at Lepanto in 1571.] As ſoon as the Te Deum had been ſung in St. Mark's Church, Raſario was ordered by the Doge to make an oration to the people on this famous victory, which he performed accordingly in that Church, to the great admiration of the people. Princeps Joanni Baptiſtæ Raſario viro doctiſſ. mandatum eodem die dedit, ut de hac victoria orationem ad populum haberet. Quam rem ille die tertio, cum eodem in templo expediret, Senatum, populum, peregrinos, adeoque infinitam prope auditorum multitudinem eloquentiæ ſuæ admiratione attonitam reddidit (5). This ſpeech has borne ſeveral impreſſions.

(5) Jo. Petrus Contarenus, de Bello Venetis à Selimo II illato, p. ult.

[C] Some miſtakes . . . . . want to be rectified in Thuanus.] What he ſays with regard to the eſteem, which Philip II. had for Raſario was unknown to Ghilini, a circumſtance that ſurprizes me. This Prince began to know Raſario's merit, when he paſſed through Milan to go into Germany in 1548 (6). Thuanus adds, that he promiſed him great advantage in order to draw him into Portugal; and to induce him to accept of a Profeſſorſhip in the Univerſity of Coimbra; but that Raſario deſired to be excuſed on account of his advanced age; and yet could not refuſe his requeſt to go and teach eloquence in Pavia; he being obliged to him for procuring his brother his liberty, and the reſtitution of his poſſeſſions which had been confiſcated. Thuanus is miſtaken with regard to the Profeſſorſhip of Coimbra; for Philip II. had not made himſelf maſter of Portugal till the year 1580, and Raſario died in 1578, after having taught four years in the Univerſity of Pavia (7). This great Hiſtorian, attentive chiefly to other particulars that were more eſſential to his work, did not ſufficiently examine thoſe things, which relate to the lives of great men; but thoſe Writers, who have digeſted what he relates concerning them, and publiſhed their collection ſeparately, ought to add the neceſſary corrections.

(6) Thuan. lib. 65. p. 233.

(7) Thuan. ib.

RATALLER (GEORGE), in Latin Ratallerus (a), ſprung from an ancient and noble family in Frieſland, was born at Leeuwarden, about the year 1518. He firſt ſtudied at Utrecht under George Macropedius (b), and afterwards at Louvain, and in the univerſities of France and Italy (c). Being returned to Flanders, he was made Counſellor in the Council of the Province of Artois; afterwards in the ſupreme Council of Malines, and Maître des Requetes (d). The Ducheſs of Parma ſent him on a negotiation to Denmark; and as he acquitted himſelf well on that occaſion, he was appointed Preſident of the Council of Utrecht. He died ſuddenly in the Aſſembly of that Council the 1ſt of October, 1580, according to Sweertius (e); or the 6th of October, 1581, if we may credit Valerius Andreas (f). He was a perſon of merit, and highly worthy of eſteem for his merit, virtue, knowledge and politeneſs (g). He was a good Latin Poet; a proof of which he gave, among other works, by his tranſlation of Sophocles [A]. One John Lallemant, who alſo made a verſion of that Poet, borrowed a great number of verſes from our Rataller, without taking any notice of the Author from whom he borrowed them (h); and conſequently he may be ranked among the Plagiaries.

(a) And not Rotellerus, as in the Epitome of Geſner.

(b) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 266.

(c) Sweert. Athen. Belg. p. 275.

(d) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 269.

(e) Sweert, Athen. Belg. p. 275.

(f) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 266.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(h) Præf. Sophoclis à Ratellero metricè verſi.

RAUBER,

[A] Among other works by his tranſlation of Sophocles.] His tranſlation of Heſiod (1) in hexameter and pentameter verſe, was printed at Francfort anno 1546 in 8vo, with a book of his epigrams (2). He tranſlated into various kinds of Latin verſe, conformable enough to the original, the ſeven Tragedies we have left of Sophocles; but he could not be prevailed upon to let this verſion be printed. However, his friends, who had copies of it, did not regard his ſcruples: but got Gryphius to print at Lyons in 1550 the Ajax (3), the Electra, and the Antigone. At laſt the Author ſuffered himſelf to be wrought upon; he putting the finiſhing hand to theſe three, and to the four others; and publiſhed them together at Antwerp, Ex Officina Gulielmi Silvii Typographi Regii, in 1570 in 8vo. Valerius Andreas knew nothing of this book. He has not only been guilty of an omiſſion on this occaſion, but alſo committed an error; he ſaying that Ratallerus tranſlated into Latin verſe, three Tragedies of Sophocles, the Phœnician Women, the Hippolytus, and Andromache, with the fragments of the ancient Poets found in Stobæus. He did not know that theſe three Tragedies were writ by Euripides, and not by Sophocles. They were printed with theſe fragments at Antwerp 1581, in 16°. as Sweertius (4) informs us. He has been more accurate in this than Valerius Andreas; but he was no ways accurate, when, after ſaying that Ratallerus had tranſlated all Sophocles's Tragedies into Latin verſe, he adds, ejuſdem (Sophoclis) Fabulas III. carmine quoque Latino tranſtulit, i. e. "He alſo tranſlated into Latin "verſe, three Fables of Sophocles." A perſon muſt be extremely ignorant not to know that Tragœdiæ Sophoclis, & Fabulæ Sophoclis, are the ſame thing.

(1) i. e. of Heſiod's Opera & Dies.

(2) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 266.

(3) And not the Alexandria, as in the Epitome of Geſner.

(4) Sweert, Athen. Belg. p. 276.

A Phyſician (5) of Autun, in Burgundy, publiſhed a Latin tranſlation of the ſeven Tragedies of Sophocles, at Paris in 1557, and ſtole many things from Ratallerus. Hic multos verſus & paginas . . . . and in the printed work as far as the word evicerit (6) inclufively.

(5) Joannes Lalemantius or Lalamantius.

Rattallerus's dedication to his Sophocles is worthy of being read. He dedicated it to Frederic Perenot, brother of Cardinal de Granvelle; and repreſented to him, in a noble manner, the advantages, which

(6) Adrian. Myſius, Præf. Sophocles Ratalleri.

men

(a) An article communicated by Mr. DE BRESLER.

(b) Valvaſor. la Gloire du Duche de Carniole, liv. 11.

RAUBER (a) (ANDREW EBERHARD), of Talberg and Weineck [A], Lord of the fortreſs of Petronel, a German Knight, and Counſellor of the Council of War to the Emperor Maximilian II (b). He gained great fame, not only by his great ſtrength, and high ſtature, but alſo by his beard, which was of an extraordinary length. He was deſcended from the very ancient noble family of Rauber, in the Dukedom of Carniola, which the Emperor Maximilian I. raiſed to the dignity of Barons [B]. Our Andrew Eberhard Rauber ſerved the Emperor Maximilian II. from his youth; travelled with him into foreign countries, and was always in the favour of that Emperor, who alſo appointed him Counſellor of his Council of War; and gave him for his firſt wife, Helen Scharſeginn [C], his natural daughter, but he was obliged firſt to win her by a whimſical ſort of a combat with his rival, in which there was no loſs of blood. He gave, on this occaſion, very ſingular proofs of his ſtrength [D]. He had no children by her; but his ſecond wife [E] compenſated largely for that defect, ſhe bringing into the world eight children who were twins, among whom was a ſon named Andrew Eberhard; and ſeven daughters, one of whom died unmarried, and the reſt married into very illuſtrious families. His ſtrength was ſo great, that he could break to pieces the ſtrongeſt horſe-ſhoe. One day that he took a Jew who had been baptized by the beard, and ſtruck upon it with his right hand, both the beard and jaw-bone came off into his hand [F]. His beard was a true prodigy, and of ſo ſurprizing a length, that it deſcended to his feet, and then back again to his girdle [G]. It doubtleſs exceeded that of all the Lombards in length [H]. At laſt Rauber died in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, at his caſtle of Petronel [I], in the year 1575 (c), and was there interred between his two wives.

(c) Ibid. p. 635.

☞ RAWLEIGH,

men in the higheſt ſtations may reap from Tragedy, when they are capable of profiting by the examples and maxims which the ſtage exhibits to them.

[A] Weineck.] This Weineck is a Caſtle in the country of Carniola, called in the language of the country Kraviek. It is ſituated on an eminence in the inward part of Carniola, four leagues from Layback, the capital of the country. It was formerly a caſtle whence came the family of the Lords of Weineck, the poſterity of which has been long extinct; as well as that of Hardegi of Petrau, Governor of Carniolas, who poſſeſſed this caſtle, in 1530. At laſt, after Count Hermann de Cilly had ruined this Caſtle, he gave it in 1433 to Frederic Rauber; ſince which time it has always been enjoyed by the Rauber family (1).

(1) Valvaſor. la Gloire du Duche de Carniole, p. 631 and 635.

[B] Raiſed to the dignity of Barons.] This was the 24th of December 1516, in the city of Hagenau; which dignity was conferred on Leonard Rauber, Grand Marſhal of the Emperor's Court, and Nicholas Rauber his brother, with the title of Baron of Planckhenſtein and Carlſtetten. But this title was dormant for ſome time, and afterwards revived by the preſent Emperor the 12th of April 1651 (2).

(2) Ibid. p. 637, 638.

[C] Helen Scharſeginn.] The Emperor Maximilian II. before he married, was ſmit with the daughter of a Count of Eaſt--Frieſland, who was looked upon as the moſt beautiful woman of her time. His love, and the great familiarity he had with her, had ſo much effect, that a daughter ſprung from it, named Helen Scharſeginn, who was not inferior to her mother in beauty; for which reaſon ſhe had a great number of admirers (3).

(3) Ibid. p. 634.

[D] Of his ſtrength.] We here have a whimſical and even a very uncommon manner of gaining a wife, which doubtleſs is not found in any romance. For though Romance-Writers tell us, that the heroes of ancient times uſed to gain their miſtreſſes by tournaments, duels, combats with giants, dragons, and a hundred whimſies of this nature; the manner employed by Rauber has not been known to any perſon. For when he demanded the Emperor's daughter in marriage, there happened to be, at the Court, a Spaniſh Gentleman of great quality, who alſo aſpired to be the Emperor's ſon-in-law. The reputation of this Spaniard's valour, as well as his tall ſtature, which exceeded that of Rauber, recommended him greatly. The Emperor not being willing to deny either of them, agreed that they ſhould decide the affair by a trial of their ſtrength. He cauſed to be given to each of them a ſack, large enough to hold his opponent, and promiſed that he who ſhould put the other into the ſack ſhould have his daughter in marriage. Accordingly our two lovers engaged before the Emperor, in a kind of combat, in which they exerted their utmoſt ſtrength, which was very much increaſed by love, and each of them, prompted by an ardent deſire to win the Emperor's daughter, endeavoured to force his adverſary into the ſack. At laſt Rauber came off victorious; ſo that the ſtrength and valour of the German put the proud Spaniard's bravery into the ſack. Thus Rauber got poſſeſſion of lovely Helen; and the Spaniard, after receiving ſo ſignal an affront, retired from Court (4).

[E] His ſecond wife.] She was a Hungarian, named Urſula de Tſchillack in Niemptſchitz. She was loſt at the taking of Niemptſchitz, as ſhe was withdrawing privately, and was found by a German Captain, who kept her, out of pity, during ſome time, at his houſe. But he afterwards made a preſent of her to the Emperor Maximilian II. who had her brought up in the apartment of his women; and when ſhe was grown up, he gave her to Rauber in marriage (5).

(4) Idem, ibid.

[F] Came off into his hand.] This happened at Gratz, at the deſire of the Archduke Charles, at whoſe Court there happened to be a baptized Jew, who, on account of his ſtature and ſtrength, ſeemed a giant. The Archduke Charles, deſirous of knowing whether his ſtrength ſurpaſſed that of Rauber, obliged each of them, as a trial of their reſpective ſtrengths, to receive a blow with the fiſt from the other; and at the ſame time permitted them to caſt lots who ſhould ſtrike firſt, which happening to fall to the baptized Jew, he gave Rauber ſo violent a blow, that it obliged him to keep his bed a week, and his room ſtill longer. Some time after he was recovered, the Jew was obliged to receive a blow from him; when Rauber took him by his long beard, and twiſting it twice round his left hand, he ſtruck, with his right, with ſo much violence, that not only his beard, but alſo his under jaw, came off in his hand, by which means the Jew ſoon after loſt his life (6).

(5) Idem, ibid.

[G] To his girdle.] It was ſtill longer, he winding it alſo round a ſtaff. He was ſo proud of it, that he ſeldom went to Court in a coach or on horſe-back, but generally on foot, to ſhew his long beard, which he carried like a ſtreamer, and let it fly with the wind. When he died, it was cut into two tufts.

(6) Ibid. p. 34.

[H] It doubtleſs exceeded that of all the Lombards in length.] The name of Lombard is generally derived from Long-beard, but this is a falſity. This name being rather borrowed from the old German word Borde or Boerde, ſignifying ſpace or extent of country; and this extent of country, which extends along the Elbe, from Tourgou in Miſnia, and by Magdeburg as far as Lunenburg, was formerly called Long-Boerde, that is, the long extent of country, or the long ſpace; and the inhabitants were called Long-Bards.

[I] Petronel.] The caſtle of Petronel is not far from Preſburg; it is now poſſeſſed by Count de Thum, and is built very magnificently.

[A] Raleigh.]

☞ RAWLEGH, or RALEGH [A] (WALTER), was deſcended of an ancient family in the county of Devon [B], and ſon of Walter Ralegh, Eſq; of Fardel, in the pariſh of Cornwood, near Plymouth [C]. He was born in 1552, at a farm-houſe called Hayes, in the pariſh of Budley, in that part of Devonſhire bordering eaſtward upon the ſea, near where the river Ottery diſcharges itſelf into the Britiſh channel (a). He was educated in the univerſity of Oxford [D]; and afterwards went to the wars in France about the year 1569 [E]; and upon his return from thence, is ſaid to have reſided in the Middle-Temple [F]. He went then to the wars in the Netherlands; and ſoon after attended Sir Humphrey Gilbert, his brother by the mother's ſide, in an expedition to the northern parts of America; and upon his return became Captain in the wars of Ireland (b); and in 1581, was one of the Commiſſioners for the Government of Munſter in that Kingdom, in the abſence of the Earl of Ormond, and afterwards Governor of Cork (c). After his return to England, he was introduced at Court [G]; and in June 1583, ſet

(a) Life of Sir Walter Ralegh. By William Oldys, Gent. p. 6, 7.

(b) Ibid. p. 7—16.

(c) Ibid. p. 17, 18.

[A] Ralegh.] This is the manner, in which he wrote his name himſelf, though other writers have ſpelt it differently.

[B] Deſcended of an ancient family in the county of Devon.] It flouriſhed in that county before the conqueſt; and with regard to that branch of it, from which Sir Walter Ralegh was deſcended, Smalridge in the pariſh of Axminſter was one of their moſt ancient ſeats (1).

(1) Life of Sir Walter Ralegh. By William Oldys, Gent. p. 4.

[C] Walter Ralegh of Fardel Eſq; in the pariſh of Cornwood near Plymouth.] This Gentleman was thrice married; and by his firſt wife Joan, daughter of John Drake of Exmouth in Devon Eſq; had two ſons, one named George, and the other John; the latter of whom married Anne the daughter of Sir Bartholomew Forteſcue of Filley in Devon, and relict of —— Gaicrick of Ford; and they had iſſue. Mr. Ralegh's ſecond wife was daughter of Mr. Darell of London; by whom he had a daughter named Mary, who was married to Hugh Snedale of Hilling in Cornwall Eſq; and had iſſue. His third wife was Catharine daughter of Sir Philip Champernon of Modbury, and relict of Otho Gilbert of Compton in Devon Eſq; He had by this wife his third ſon Carew, afterwards knighted, and of Wiltſhire, who married Dorothy daughter of Sir William Wroughton, and relict of Sir John Thynn; by whom he had iſſue; and laſtly his fourth ſon, WALTER, the ſubject of this Article, who was uterine brother of thoſe three eminent Knights, Sir John, Sir Humphrey, and Sir Adrian Gilbert. By this laſt wife Mr. Ralegh had alſo one daughter, Margaret, who was married firſt to Mr. Radford of Mount Radford in Devon, Clerk of the Peace, and afterwards to —— Hull of Larkebere Eſq; in St. Leonard's pariſh Exeter (2).

(2) Idem, ibid.

[D] Educated in the Univerſity of Oxford.] This appears from Mr. Hooker (3), Lord Bacon (4), and Mr. Wood (5), the laſt of whom tells us, that he became Commoner of Oriel College, in or about the year 1568, when his kinſman C. Champernon ſtudied there; and that his natural parts being ſtrangely advanced by academical learning under the care of an excellent Tutor, he became the ornament of the juniors, and was worthily eſteemed a proficient in oratory and philoſophy. But with regard to his coming ſo late thither, as Mr. Wood mentions, and ſtaying ſo long there as three years, as the ſame writer afterwards relates, Mr. Oldys (7) is of opinion, that this is a miſtake, ſince it is evident, that Mr. Ralegh was two years before that time in the wars abroad.

(3) Epiſtle Dedicatory, before his Tranſlation and Continuation of the Chronicles of Ireland, p. 7. printed in Hollingſhed, vol. 2. 1587.

(4) Apophthegms new and old, p. 292. edit. 1625, in 8vo.

(5) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 435. 2d edit.

(7) p. 7.

[E] Went to the wars in France about the year 1569.] Mr. Hooker (8) ſays, that after Ralegh had laid a good ground to build his actions on at the Univerſity, he travelled into France. And this is confirmed by Camden (9), according to whoſe account of time, Ralegh could not be, at his departure, above ſeventeen years of age; and by the occaſion of his firſt going over, it appears, that he firſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf there in a military courſe of life, in a ſelect troop of an hundred Gentlemen voluntiers, commanded by Henry Champernon, a relation by marriage of the Earl of Montgomery; which troop went to France to aſſiſt the Proteſtants in France.

(8) Epiſt. Dedicatory, ubi ſupra.

(9) Annal. Reg. Eliz. ad ann. 1569.

[F] Upon his return from thence is ſaid to have reſided in the Middle Temple.] Mr. Wood aſſerts (10), that after he had left the Univerſity, he went to the Middle Temple to improve himſelf in the intricate knowledge of the municipal law. How long he tarried there, it is uncertain; yet ſure I am from an epiſtle or copy of verſes of his compoſition, which I have ſeen, that he was abiding in the ſaid Temple in April 1576. Sir Robert Naunton likewiſe (11) mentions his having ſtudied at the Inns of Court. But Mr. Lewis Theobald (12) is of opinion, that this is a groſs miſtake, ſince Ralegh, at his arraigment at Wincheſter, in reply to the Attorney General, lays an heavy imprecation upon himſelf, if ever he read a word of law or ſtatutes, before he was a priſoner in the Tower. With regard to the verſes mentioned by Mr. Wood, they are a commendatory poem of three ſtanzas by Walter Rawley of the Middle Temple, as he is there written, and printed, among others, before a ſatyr called the Steele-Glaſs, publiſhed in 1576 by George Gaſcoigne Eſq; Mr. Oldys obſerves (13), that "as to the particular of his being of the Middle Temple, all we can conclude of it is, ſince he has ſo publickly and ſolemnly proteſted he never ſtudied the law there, that it might be as cuſtomary in the Inns of Court then, as it is now, for a young Gentleman to be with a friend, or have the uſe of his Chambers, while he is out of town, or even have chambers of his own, rather than be confined to the ſingularities of a family in lodgings, and never read a word of the law, much leſs have any purpoſe to practiſe it. And this is ſtrengthened by what I have met with both in ſome old writings and ſome hiſtorians of thoſe times, which obſerve, that the inmates not only in private houſes, but thoſe who dwelt among the Lawyers, and did not follow their profeſſion, grew ſo numerous and inconvenient, that there was an order or proclamation for their removal out of the Inns of Court about the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's or the beginning of her ſucceſſor's reign. Further to confirm this conjecture of Ralegh's being only an inmate there, I have been led to enquire after the regiſters of the Middle Temple, which are ſtill extant, of thoſe times; and upon a diligent ſearch have ſatisfied myſelf, that there was no ſuch perſon entered as a ſtudent of the law in that Inn, by the name of Walter Ralegh or any name like it, either in this year that he wrote the aboveſaid poem from thence, or any other year before, up to the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign; though ſome of his countrymen, and, I think relations, occur there in that ſpace of time."

(10) Ubi ſupra.

(11) Fragmenta Regalia, p. 33. edit. 1641.

(12) Memoirs of Sir W. Ralegh, p. 5. edit. 1719, in 8vo.

(13) p. 11.

[G] Introduced to Court.] Fuller only tells us (14), that it was upon the following occaſion. Her Majeſty meeting with a plaſhy place, made ſome ſcruple to go on; when Ralegh dreſſed in a gay and gentile habit of thoſe times preſently caſt off and ſpread his new pluſh cloak on the ground, whereon the Queen trod gently over, rewarding him afterwards with many ſuits for his ſo free and ſeaſonable tender of ſo fair a foot-cloth. Thus an advantageous admiſſion into the notice of a Prince is more than half a degree to perfection. After this, as the ſame writer obſerves, Ralegh coming to Court, and finding ſome hopes of the Queen's favour reflecting upon him, he wrote in a glaſs-window, obvious to her eye,

Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall.

under which her Majeſty ſoon after wrote,

If thy heart fail thee, climb not at all.

Sir Robert Naunton (15) is "confident that among the (14) Worthies of England, in Devon.

(15) Fragmenta Regalia, p. 34.

ſet out with Henry Gilbert in his expedition to Newfoundland, but within a few days was obliged to return to Plymouth, by reaſon his whole ſhip's company was infected with a contagious ſickneſs (d). In 1584, he obtained the Queen's Letters Patents for diſcovering of unknown countries, dated March the 25th. Upon the grant of which, Ralegh fitted out two barks, well furniſhed with men and proviſions at his own expence, which ſet ſail with his inſtructions for America, on the 27th of April following, and diſcovered the country of Wingandacoa (e), which Queen Elizabeth changed to that of Virginia. In the next ſeſſions of Parliament in the latter end of that year, he was elected Knight of the ſhire for the county of Devon (f); and ſoon after was knighted (g) [H]. About the time that her Majeſty granted him the Patent abovementioned, for the diſcovery of remote countries, ſhe ſeems alſo to have given him another, to licenſe the vending of wines throughout the Kingdom; that by the advantages of this, he might be the better able to ſuſtain the great charges, which the other brought upon him (h). The Parliament being prorogued on the 29th of March 1585, Ralegh appears ſeveral ways engaged in the laudable improvements of Navigation. For he was one of the Collegues of the fellowſhip for the diſcovery of the North-weſt paſſage [I]. In April the ſame year, he ſent his own fleet upon a ſecond voyage to Virginia, and deputed Sir Richard Greenville General of the expedition, and Mr. Ralph Lane, who was afterwards knighted, to be Governor of the colony, which they now tranſported. Soon after he received a grant from the Queen of twelve thouſand acres, in the counties of Cork and Waterford, in Ireland [K]. In June following, he ſent ſome ſhips on a third voyage to Virginia, which took ſeveral Spaniſh prizes at the Azores. By this eſtabliſhment of his colony, he was the firſt,

(d) Oldys, p. 21.

(e) Ibid. p. 22—25.

(f) Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, vol. 2. p. 254. edit. 1716. in 8vo.

(g) Oldys, p. 25.

(h) Ibid. p. 26.

" the ſecond cauſes of his growth, there was a vari-
" ance between him and my Lord General Gray, in " his ſecond deſcent into Ireland, which was principal
" for it, and drew them both over to the Council-
" table, there to plead their own cauſes; where
" what advantage he had in the caſe in controverſy,
" I know not; but he had much the better in
" the manner of telling his tale, inſomuch as the " Queen and Lords took no ſlight mark of the man
" and his parts; for from thence he came to be " known, and to have acceſs to the Lords. And " then we are not to doubt how ſuch a man would " comply to progreſſion, and whether or no my " Lord of Leiceſter had then caſt a good word for " him to the Queen, which would have done him
" no harm, I do not determine; but true it is, he " had gotten the Queen's ear in a trice, and ſhe be" gan to be taken with his election, and loved to " hear his reaſons to her demands. And the truth
" is ſhe took him for a kind of oracle, which net-
" tled them all, yea thoſe, that he relied on, began
" to take this his ſudden favour for an alarum, and
" to be ſenſible of their own ſupplantation, and to " project his, which made him ſhortly after ſing,
" Fortune my foe, why doſt thou frown? So that finding " his favour declining, and falling into a receſs, he " undertook a new peregrination to leave that terra
" infirma of the Court for that of the wars." Another writer likewiſe tells us (16), that Ralegh had a quarrel with Grey in Ireland, which being referred to a Council of War, it had like to coſt him his life; but by reference came afterwards to repetition at home before the Lords. Grey had the better cauſe, but Ralegh the advantage in pleading, who ſo took them, eſpecially Leiceſter, that the Queen was told the tale, and ſomewhat more of him. And no ſooner he came to be known to her, but ſhe took him to Grace. And preſently after he writes (17), that Ralegh's riſe of preferment was occaſioned upon a conteſt with the Lord Grey in the Queen's time, which they were to plead face to face; where in deed, but not in truth, Sir Walter had the better by the tongue, telling his tale to advantage, which took the Queen, who took him from that inſtant into favour.

(16) Aulicus Coquinariæ, p. 75. edit. Lond. 1650.

(17) p. 89, 90.

[H] Knighted.] This title her Majeſty beſtowed, as all others of honour, with frugality and choice; and that this honour was intended by her as the moſt ſignificant teſtimony of perſonal merit, may be inſtanced, according to Oſborne (18), in Sir Francis Vere, a man nobly deſcended, and Sir Walter Ralegh, exactly qualified, with many others, ſet apart in her judgment for military ſervices, whoſe title ſhe never raiſed above Knighthood, ſaying, when importuned to make Vere a Baron, that in his proper ſphere, and her eſtimation, he was above it already. Sir Edward Walker, Garter, and Secretary of War to King Charles I, obſerves (19) with regard to the Queen's caution in conferring of honours, that " in all her forty four years
" reign ſhe created but ſix Earls and eight or nine
" Barons; ſo that when ſhe died, the nobility con-
" ſiſted but of one Marquis, nineteen Earls, two Vif-
" counts, and about thirty Barons." And he doubts,
" whether in the reign of King James, the diſpen-
" ſing of honours ſo liberally was not one of the " beginnings of general diſcontents, eſpecially among " perſons of great extraction. So that when this
" King died, having reigned but twenty two years,
" he left the nobility in his three Kingdoms above
" double the number to what he found them, though
" his reign was peaceable, and not full of action,
" which renders men in capacity highly to merit
" from their Prince, and ſo, without envy, receive " advancement." And a little further he remarks, that, " when alliance to a favourite, riches, though " gotten in a ſhop, perſons of private eſtates, and of " families, that many of them and their fathers
" would have thought themſelves highly honoured
" to have been Knights in Queen Elizabeth's time,
" were advanced, then the fruits thereof began to
" appear, &c."

(18) Traditional Memoirs of Q. Elizabeth, among his miſcellaneous works, vol. 2. p. 43.

(19) Obſervations on the inconveniences of frequent promotions to titles of honour, in his Hiſtorical Diſcourſes, p. 300 and 302, &c. edit. 1705, in fol.

[I] He was one of the Collegues of the Fellowſhip for the diſcovery of the North-Weſt paſſage.] Sir Walter's brother, Adrian Gilbert of Sandridge, afterwards knighted, in purſuance of the arguments laid down by his brother Sir Humphrey Gilbert, having been at great charges in finding out the Northern paſſage to China and the Moluccas, and in conſideration thereof having obtained a patent from the Queen to purſue the diſcovery by partners, under the title of The Collegues of the Fellowſhip for the diſcovery of the North-Weſt paſſage; Ralegh was now one of the aſſociates in this enterprize; and after having duly conſulted about the likelieſt means for ſucceſs, and liberally contributed towards the expence, they choſe Captain John Davis, an experienced Navigator, to be undertaker of the exploit. He ſet firſt out upon it the ſummer of the year 1585, from Falmouth in two barks. When he came to land in ſixty ſix degrees forty minutes latitude, he anchored in a very fair road, under a mountain, which, for the ſplendid appearance of it, the cliffs thereof being as orient as gold, they named Mount Ralegh, in honour of their Proprietor; and ſoon after fell into the very paſſage they ſought, ſince well known by the name of Davis's Straits. The Captain made two voyages more thither in the two following years, and in a manner compleated the diſcovery (20).

(20) Oldys, p. 27, 28. And Hakluyt, vol. 3. folio 101.

[K] He received a grant from the Queen of twelve thouſand acres in the counties of Cork and Waterford in Ireland.] He kept this eſtate to the latter end of the Queen's reign, and then ſold it to Richard Boyle, afterwards Earl of Cork, as the Earl in a manuſcript memorial of his own life has related (21).

(21) Budgell's Life of the Earl of Orrery, p. 3 and 18. edit. 1732, in 8vo.

[L] The

firſt, who introduced the uſe of Tobacco into England [L]. Towards the latter end of the year 1586, he was made Seneſchal of Cornwall, and Lord Warden of the Stanneries. In April 1587, he ſent three ſhips upon a fourth voyage to Virginia; and about the ſame time was made Captain of the Queen's guard, and Lieutenant-General of Cornwall (i). In the beginning of the year 1588, he ſent another fleet upon a fifth voyage to Virginia (k). He did great ſervice the ſame year in deſtroying the Spaniſh Armada ſent to invade England; on which account, probably, he received a conſiderable augmentation of his patent of wines, by a grant of tonnage and poundage upon thoſe liquors. He ſet up likewiſe an office of addreſs [M]. He thought proper now to make an aſſignment to divers Gentlemen and Merchants of London, for continuing the plantation of Virginia with Engliſhmen [N]. In April 1589, he accompanied Don Antonio of Portugal in the expedition to that Kingdom; and in the latter end of the ſame year, in his return to England, touched upon the coaſt of Ireland, where he viſited Spenſer the Poet [O], whom he brought to England, introduced into the Queen's favour, and encouraged by his own patronage (l), being himſelf an excellent Poet [P]. In 1592,

(i) Oldys, p. 26——37.

(k) Idem, p. 42.

(l) Idem, p. 42—66.

[L] The firſt who introduced the uſe of tobacco into England.] The Queen was not backward in promoting the advantages, which were promiſed by the traffic of this herb; and we may collect from ſome Authors, that ſhe was very curious to know its virtues and properties; and that once converſing with Ralegh upon this ſubject, he aſſured her Majeſty, that he had ſo well experienced the nature of it, that he could tell her of what weight even the ſmoke would be in any quantity propoſed to be conſumed. Her Majeſty fixing her thoughts upon the moſt impracticable part of the experiment, that of bounding the ſmoke in a balance, ſuſpected that he played the traveller with her, and would needs lay him a wager that he could not ſolve the doubt. So he procured a quantity agreed upon to be thoroughly ſmoked; then proceeded to weighing the aſhes; and in the concluſion, what was wanting in the firſt weight of the tobacco, her Majeſty did not deny to have been evaporated in ſmoke; and farther ſaid, that many labourers in the fire ſhe had heard of, who turned their gold into ſmoke; but Ralegh was the firſt who had turned ſmoke into gold (22).

(22) Apophthegms of the Engliſh Nation, a manuſcript in 4to. inter Collect. Rodnei Fane Armig. and Howel's Epiſt. vol. 3.

[M] Set up an office of addreſs.] Mr. David Lloyd (23) having mentioned Sir Walter's diviſion of his time, who allowed five hours to ſleep, four to reading, two for diſcourſe, and the reſt to buſineſs and other neceſſaries, and having hinted at the diverſity of his correſpondencies, intelligence, and the like, ſays, that in the capacity of an agency for all ſorts of perſons he ſet up a kind of office of addreſs; and that conſidering the diſpatch of ſuch variety of engagements in the former part of his life, one muſt be much to ſeek how a man of ſo many actions ſhould write any thing, and one of ſo many writings ſhould do any thing. Mr. Oldys obſerves (24), that "by another little hint, that has "been elſewhere preſerved, we may conceive this "office did chiefly reſpect a more liberal intercourſe, "a nobler mutuality of advertiſement, than would "perhaps admit of all ſorts of perſons; and ſuch as "advanced rather to the improvement of men themſelves, than their means. But this ſuggeſtion is "drawn only from comparing it with the general "tendency of thoſe other ſchemes, among which I "once ſaw it mentioned, in a letter written by an "ingenious perſon of great note for his writings to a "Nobleman, who had the greateſt correſpondence "with ſuch perſons of any in his time; recommending that long dried fountain of communication, which "Montaigne firſt propoſed, Sir Walter Ralegh put in "practice, and Mr. Hartlib endeavoured to revive." The latter mentioned by Mr. Oldys in this paſſage, was written by John Evelyn, Eſq; to Henry Earl of Clarendon. Montagne's (or his father's) project was for having an office of enquiry in ſeveral towns, in which every perſon might regiſter what they were in ſearch or want of, with their terms for obtaining it (25). There are, ſays he, always conditions, which are hunting after one another, and for want of hearing one another's occaſions leave men in very great neceſſity. He then gives an inſtance of thoſe two excellent ſcholars, Lilius Giraldus in Italy, and Sebaſtian Caſtalio in Germany, who died ſo poor, that they had ſcarce bread to eat; and obſerves, that thouſands would have retained or relieved them, if they had known their wants. For the world is not ſo generally corrupted, but that I knew a man, ſays he, who would heartily wiſh the eſtate his anceſtors had left him, might be employed in ſecuring rare and remarkable perſons of any kind from theſe misfortunes, which ſometimes perſecute them to the laſt extremity. The reader may ſee an account of Mr. Hartlib's ſcheme for an office of addreſs in the article of (Sir William) PETTY.

(23) Obſervations on the Stateſmen and Favourites of England ſince the Reformation, p. 489. edit. 1665.

(24) p. 48.

(25) Montagne's Eſſays, l. 1. c. 34.

[N] Thought proper to make an aſſignment to divers Gentlemen and Merchants of London, for continuing the Plantation of Virginia with Engliſhmen.] The particular of this aſſignment we may collect from "an "inſtrument made the 7th of March. 31 Eliz. be"tween Sir Walter Ralegh of Coliton in Devonſhire, "Chief Governor of Virginia, and Thomas Smith "with other Merchants of London, and adventurers "to Virginia, and John White and other Gentle"men; reciting, that Sir Walter Ralegh had granted "to John White and the reſt free liberty to carry "into Virginia, and inhabit there, ſuch of her "Majeſty's ſubjects, as ſhould willingly accompany "them. And that the ſaid Thomas Smith and others "the ſaid adventurers purpoſing to be made free of "the Corporation and Company late conſtituted by "Sir Walter, in the city of Ralegh, intended to be "built in Virginia, had adventured divers ſums of "money, merchandizes, ſhipping, victual, and o"ther commodities to Virginia. Wherefore Sir "Walter Ralegh, by his indenture, grants to the ſaid "Thomas Smith, and others, and to the ſaid John "White and the reſt, their ſeveral heirs and aſſigns, "free trade and traffic for all manner of merchan"dize to and from Virginia, or any other part of "America, where the ſaid Sir Walter, his heirs or "aſſigns, did, or might claim any intereſt, title, "or privilege, from all rents, cuſtoms, and other "charges, except the fifth part of the oar of gold "and ſilver, which he reſerves to himſelf and his "heirs. And farther, the ſaid Sir Walter Ralegh, "as well for and in eſpecial regard and zeal of "planting the Chriſtian Religion in and among the "ſaid barbarous and heathen countries, and for the "advancement and preferment of the ſame, and the "common utility and profit of the inhabitants there"in, as alſo for the encouragement of the ſaid ad"venturers and other aſſiſtants in Virginia, does free"ly and liberally give them the ſum of one hundred "pounds."

[O] Where he viſited Spenſer the Poet.] Spenſer has deſcribed the circumſtances of Sir Walter's viſit to him in a Paſtoral, which about two years after he dedicated to him, and entitled, Colin Clout's come home again.

[P] Being himſelf an excellent Poet.] We learn from a copy of verſes at the end of Spenſer's Fairy Queen, inſcribed to Sir Walter, that the latter had written a Poem, called Cynthia, which was in praiſe of the Queen, but not then publiſhed. And ſome of his Poems are quoted with great commendation in a book printed at London in 1589 in 4to, under the title of The Art of Engliſh Poeſy, contrived in three Books, ſaid to be written by Mr. Puttenham, one of Queen Elizabeth's Gentlemen Penſioners. In this book the Author obſerves (6), that "for ditty and "amorous ode, he finds Sir Walter Ralegh's vein moſt "lofty, inſolent, and paſſionate." Mr. Oldys has given us from a manuſcript the following piece, entitled,

(6) p. 51.

1592, he was appointed General of an expedition againſt the Spaniards at Panama. In the latter end of this year, and the beginning of the next, we find him very active in the Houſe of Commons (m). In 1593, he was aſperſed with Atheiſm, in a libel publiſhed againſt ſeveral Miniſters of State, who had procured a ſevere proclamation againſt the Engliſh Seminaries abroad [Q]. In 1594, he obtained a grant of the Manor of Sherborne [R]. He was for ſome time in diſgrace at Court, for an affair of gallantry with Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, one of the Maids of Honour to the Queen; but Sir Walter ſoon after married the Lady, and afterwards lived with her in the ſtricteſt conjugal harmony (n). In 1595, he made a voyage to Guiana, and deſtroyed the city of San Joſeph, taking the Spaniſh Governor, Don Antonio de Berreo, priſoner, and entered the great Oronoque river (o); and upon his return, wrote a diſcourſe of titled, The Excuſe, written by Sir Walter Ralegh in his younger years.

(m) Oldys, p. 66—69.

(n) Idem, p. 69—77.

(o) Idem, p. 77—94.

" Calling to mind my eyes went long about,
" To cauſe my heart for to forſake my breaſt;
" All in a rage, I ſought to pull them out;
" As who had been ſuch traitors to my reſt:
" What could they ſay to win again my grace?
" Forſooth that they had ſeen my miſtreſs' face.

" Another time my heart I call'd to mind,
" Thinking that he this woe on me had brought;
" Becauſe that he to love his force reſign'd;
" When of ſuch wars my fancy never thought:
" What could he ſay when I would have him ſlain?
" That he was hers, and had forgone my chain.

" At laſt, when I perceiv'd both eyes and heart
" Excuſe themſelves, as guiltleſs of my ill;
" I found myſelf the cauſe of all my ſmart,
" And told myſelf, that I myſelf would kill.
" Yet when I ſaw myſelf to you was true;
" I lov'd myſelf, becauſe myſelf lov'd you."

[Q] Aſperſed with Atheiſm in a libel publiſhed againſt ſeveral Miniſters of State, who had procured a ſevere proclamation againſt the Engliſh Seminaries abroad.] This libel was printed at Lyons in 1593 in 8vo. under the title of Elizabethæ Reginæ Angliæ Edictum, promulg. Lond. Nov. 29. 1591. & Andr. Philopatris ad idem Reſponſio. In this piece the Writer, who was Parſons the Jeſuit, inveighs againſt Sir Walter Ralegh's ſchool of Atheiſm, inſinuating, that he was not content with being a Diſciple, but ſet up for a Doctor in his faculty, and " ſeduced young Gentle" men into his ſaid ſchool, wherein the Old and " New Teſtament were jeſted at, and ſcholars taught
" to ſpell God backwards." He then complains,
" what a miſerable thing it is, that her Majeſty ſhould
" make laws and proclamations according to theſe
" men's ſenſes and opinions." But as Father Parſons was famous for the virulency of his pen in ſlandering the greateſt men; ſo till we find, ſays Mr. Oldys (27), a more credible father for the aſperſion, we may ſafely enough believe it no genuine iſſue of truth. Nevertheleſs ſome ten years after when Ralegh was trampled down by the Court, and there was a turn of State to ſerve, this might be a good ſerviceable obloquy enough to upbraid him with, and depreciate him in the eye of the populace. Oſborn accounts for the grounds of this aſperſion. " Sir Walter Ralegh, ſays he (28), was
" the firſt (as I have heard) who ventured to tack
" about, and ſail aloof from the beaten tract of the " ſchools; and who, upon the diſcovery of ſo appa" rent an error as a torrid zone, intended to proceed
" in an inquiſition after more ſolid truths; till the " mediation of ſome, whoſe livelihood lay in ham-
" mering ſhrines for this ſuperannuated ſtudy, poſ-
" ſeſſed Queen Elizabeth, that ſuch doctrine was a-
" gainſt God, no leſs than her father's honour;
" whoſe faith (if he owned any) was grounded
" upon ſchool divinity. Whereupon ſhe chid him,
" who was (by his own confeſſion) ever after branded
" with the title of Atheiſt, though a known aſſer-
" tor of God and providence." That he was ſuch a known aſſertor, is confirmed by an Author of his acquaintance, who introduces the apparition of him ſpeaking to him in this manner (29): Thou well knoweſt, that the world hath at ſundry times caſt a foul and moſt unjuſt aſperſion upon me for my preſumed denial of a Deity; from which abominable and horrible crime I was ever moſt free; and not any man now living better knows the ſame than thyſelf, in whoſe preſence I was often accuſtomed, highly to praiſe and eſteem the book of Leſſius, written in proof of the being of a Deity. He then requeſts, that his friend would tranſlate that book into Engliſh, which I myſelf, ſays the ghoſt, had done, if cruel fate had not untimely cut off the thread of my mortality; and let the title bear my name, that ſo the readers may acknowledge it was done by my ſolicitation. Then the tranſlator of that book ſays in his own perſon to the reader: It is well known, that Sir Walter was a man of great natural parts, and yet was ſuſpected of the moſt foul and execrable crime of Atheiſm. How truly God and himſelf only knows; yet I have reaſon to think it a falſe aſperſion. If thus much is ſaid by an Author, who knew him, what credit ſhall we give to another, Mr. A. Wood, who wrote many years later? who never knew him, and produces no authority for the principles, with which he charges him; and yet pretends to give us the tutor's name, from whom he imbibed them, and that a man of no leſs learning and merit, than Mr. Tho. Hariot, whom we have vindicated (30) from the aſperſion of Mr. Wood, who tells us (31), that he infuſed his Deiſtical notions into " Sir Walter Ralegh, when he
" was compiling the Hiſtory of the World." This laſt inſinuation, ſays Mr. Oldys (32), is ſurely a manifeſt ſlander, as Wood himſelf muſt have owned, if he had ſufficiently read that Hiſtory of the World, where Sir Walter has in many places given ſtronger evidences of Chriſtian Faith, than any of his detractors did of their's.

[R] In 1594 he obtained a Grant of the Manor of Sherborne.] Mr. Richard Iſacke (33) tells us, that about that year Dr. John Coldwell, Biſhop of Saliſbury, who had been bred a Phyſician, gave his See a ſtrong purge, by alienating the Manor of Sherborne to Sir Walter Ralegh. And Sir John Harrington obſerves (34), that " Sir Walter uſing often to ride poſt
" in thoſe days upon no ſmall employments between
" Plymouth and the Court, when Sherborne Caſtle
" being right in the way, he caſt an eye upon it,
" as Ahab did upon Naboth's vineyard. And once
" above the reſt being talking of it, of the com-
" modiouſneſs of the place, of the ſtrength of the " ſeat, and how eaſily it might be got from the " Biſhopric, ſuddenly over and over came his horſe,
" that his very face, which was then thought a very " good face, ploughed up the earth where he fell.
" This fall was ominous, I make no queſtion; as " the like was obſerved in the Lord Haſtings, &c.
" But his brother Adrian would needs have him in" terpret that, not as a Courtier, but as a Conqueror,
" it preſaged the quiet poſſeſſion of it." And this, through the Queen's favour came to paſs; for after Dr. John Piers was tranſlated to York, this Dr. Coldwell was elected to ſucceed him in the See of Saliſbury; but it lay vacant three years, during which interval, before the Biſhop's election was confirmed, Sir Walter importuned him to paſs Sherborne to the crown, and effected it, though a pretty large rent was reſerved to the Biſhopric. Sir Walter then begged the Manor of the Queen, who granted it to him. This is the account of Fuller (35), who obſerves, that " among the acts paſſed in King
" James the Firſt's Parliament, none were more " beneficial for the Church, that which made
" the King himſelf and his ſucceſſors incapable of " any

(27) p. 70.

(28) Miſcellany of ſundry Eſſays, &c. in the preface.

(29) Sir Walter Ralegh's Ghoſt: or his Apparition to an intimate Friend, willing him to tranſlate into Engliſh, the learned book of Levinus Leſſius, entitled, De Providentiâ Numinis, &c. edit. 1651, in 8vo.

(30) See the art. HARIOT (Thomas).

(31) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 460.

(32) p. 71.

(33) Antiquities, p. 141. edit. 1681, in 8vo.

(34) Brief View of the State of the Church of England, &c. p. 92.

(35) Church Hiſt. book 10. p. 27.

of his diſcoveries in Guiana [S]. In 1596 he was appointed one of the chief Commanders in the expedition to Cadiz (p). He was afterwards Rear-Admiral in the Iſland voyage (q). In 1600, he was appointed Vice-Admiral (r), and about May the ſame year, he was ſent on an Embaſſy to Flanders [T]; and ſoon after made Governor of the Iſle of Jerſey (s). Not long before the Queen's death, he ſettled his eſtate at Sherborne upon his ſon Walter, being challenged to a duel by Sir Amias Preſton [V]. Upon the acceſſion of King James I. to the Crown, he loſt his intereſt at Court [W], and being accuſed of a plot againſt the King [X], was tried for it at Wincheſter, November 17, 1603, and condemned

(p) Oldys, p. 94—106.

(q) Idem, p. 111 & ſeq.

(r) Idem, p. 133.

(s) Idem, p. 134, 135.

" any ſuch Church-land to be conveyed to them."

[S] Upon his return wrote a Diſcourſe of his diſcoveries in Guiana.] It was printed at London 1596 in 4to, under this title: The Diſcovery of the large, rich, and beautiful Empire of GUIANA; with a relation of the great and golden City of Manoa, called by the Spaniards El Dorado, &c. performed in the year 1595 by Sir Walter Ralegh Knight, Captain of her Majeſty's Guard, Lord-Warden of the Stanneries, and her Highneſs's Lieutenant-General of the County of Cornwall. It is reprinted in Hakluyt, vol. III. fol. 627, and was tranſlated into Latin with the title of Brevis & admiranda Deſcriptio Regni Guianæ &c. per Dn. Gualt. Ralegh Equit. Angl. detectæ. Tabulâ Geographicâ Jodoci Hondii &c. Nuremberg 1599 in 4to.

[T] Sent on an embaſſy to Flanders.] Commiſſioners had been ſent over to Bulloigne to negotiate a peace with Spain in May 1600; and about the ſame time Sir Walter Ralegh and the Lord Cobham were ſent on an embaſſy for the ſame purpoſe into Flanders. Their buſineſs was kept very ſecret; yet Albert Arch-duke of Auſtria, and Governor of the Netherlands having charged the Queen of England with relieving the Hollanders, and being likely to take umbrage at ſo many perſons of quality going over voluntiers to Prince Maurice, as the Lord Northumberland, Lord Rutland, and others; Secretary Cecil wrote in a letter dated July the 14th 1600 to the Commiſſioners at Bulloigne (36), that if the Arch-duke ſhould object in the like manner to Cobham and Ralegh, they were to return anſwer, " That theſe had no charge, " nor carried either horſe or men, except ſome half " a dozen of their own attendants; and finding the " Queen ſo reſolved to have a peace (if good con- " ditions could be had) they obtained leave, with " importunity, to ſee that one action (then except- " ed) before they might deſpair of ſeeing any more " of the like kind in his Majeſty's time." In another letter of Sir Henry Neville, who was one of thoſe Commiſſioners, to Mr. Winwood, dated July the 18th 1600, he mentions it as a report (37), that Cobham and Ralegh " were gone over upon pretext " to ſee the camp and ſiege of the Fort Iſabella " near Oſtend, where Count Maurice is yet unprofi- " tably, as he was before at Neuport; but I cannot, " ſays he, think, but they have ſome other end, and " that in England there is ſome alarum taken of " theſe matters, although we be not worthy to " know it." And in another letter of Sir Henry to Mr. Winwood, dated July the 23d 1600, he obſerves (38), that Cobham's and Ralegh's journey " was not altogether idle, nor upon curioſity only, " but that they carried ſome meſſage, which did no " harm. The particulars you ſhall know, when I " am better informed of them." By Secretary Cecil's Letter above cited, it appears, that Sir Walter was returned to England by the 14th day of July.

(36) Winwood's Memorials, vol. 1. p. 215. edit. 1725.

(37) Ibid. p. 230.

(38) Ibid. p. 231.

[V] Challenged to a duel by Sir Amias Preſton.] Sir Walter mentioned this challenge at his trial. The occaſion of this quarrel is not known. Fuller tells us (39), that he declined to accept the challenge; which ſeems to be a miſtake, ſince Sir Walter declared at his trial, that he intended to anſwer it; but the parties were afterwards reconciled, as Fuller remarks.

(39) Worthies in Somerſetſhire.

[W] Loſt his intereſt at Court.] It is ſaid, that the Earl of Eſſex, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, infuſed prejudices againſt him into King James; and, after the Earl's death, there are ſeveral circumſtances implying, that Secretary Cecil did the like. For though Cecil and Ralegh joined againſt Eſſex and his party; yet when theſe were overthrown, they divided (40). Dr. Welwood obſerves (41), that when King James came to England, Sir Walter preſented to him a Memorial, wherein " he reflected heavily upon Cecil " in the matter of Eſſex; and vindicating himſelf, " threw the whole blame upon the other; further " laying open (at the end thereof) the conduct of " Cecil and his father alſo in the matter of the " Queen of Scots (his Majeſty's mother,) bitterly " charging the death of this unfortunate Queen upon " them. But this had no influence over the King, " and only irritated Cecil the more againſt Ralegh." The ſame writer tells us, that this Memorial of Ralegh is mentioned in a manuſcript written by one Buck, Secretary to the Lord Chancellor Egerton. But what ſeems ſufficient to have incenſed the King againſt Ralegh, was his being of a party, who, in regard of the inveterate feuds between England and Scotland, deſired the King might be obliged to articles; for, as Oſborne writes (42), among theſe noble and publick ſpirits were Sir John Forteſcue, Sir Walter Ralegh, the Lord Cobham, &c. all frowned upon after by the King, who had yet the luck to live ſo long as to change his opinion, and wiſh the number of his countrymen had been limited, and they not ſuffered, like Locuſts, to devour this kingdom. There were likewiſe ſome other particulars, which might render him obnoxious to a perſon of the King's jealous diſpoſition; " for he " had (at the time of his Majeſty's acceſſion to the " throne) the daughter and heir of Baſſet to his " ward, who was to be married to his ſon Walter; " her eſtate was worth three thouſand pounds per " ann. But ſhe was (after his condemnation, we ſup- " poſe) taken from him, and married to Mr. Henry " Howard, who died ſuddenly at table; and ſhe " was afterwards married to the Earl of Newcaſtle, " who profeſſed he would never have wedded her, if " young Walter Ralegh had been alive; conceiving " her, before God, to be his wife, for they were mar- " ried as much as children could be (43)." Now theſe Baſſets were thoſe of Umberlegh and Heaton-Court in Devonſhire; who being deſcended from the Plantagenets, laid ſome claim, at this very time of the King's entrance, to the Crown of England (44).

(40) Oldys, p. 148.

(41) Notes on Arthur Wilſon's Hiſt. of King James, in the 2d vol. of Kennet's Complete Hiſt. of England, edit. 1706. p. 664.

(42) Traditional Memorials of the Reign of K. James, in the 2d vol. of his works, p. 102.

(43) Obſervations on ſome particular Perſons and Paſſages, in a Book lately made publick (by William Sanderſon) entitled, A compleat Hiſt. of the Lives and Reigns of Mary Q. of Scotland, and her ſon James, &c. p. 12. edit. 1656, in 4to.

(44) Prince's Worthies of Devon, p. 114. See alſo Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 366.

[X] Accuſed of a Plot againſt the King.] Thuanus, Tom. V. L. 129. fol. 1056. and Cayet in his Chronologie Septenarie, p. 424. Edit. Paris 1605, in 8vo, and the Mercure François, Tom. XI. p. 352 Edit. Paris 1626 in 8vo, have given a very falſe account of this affair, which they relate thus. That in the month of June, Sir Walter taking leave of his ſiſter at London, intreated her to commend him to God in her prayers, ſince he was going to a place, whence he expected never to return. That ſhe ſuſpecting that he was going to fight a duel, ſpoke of it to ſome Ladies of her acquaintance, till the rumour came to Court. That then Ralegh's friends and relations flocked about him to know his deſign; who imagining himſelf detected, confeſſed the whole matter, and being brought before the King, aſked his Majeſty's pardon, and acknowledged, that ſeeing his Majeſty give more countenance to the Scots than the Engliſh, and had deprived him of his command in the guards, and that many great men expected, when he was eſtabliſhed on the throne, he would be revenged for the death of his mother; he had therefore entered into a conſpiracy with others, whom he named, to ſhed his royal blood; and that they had unanimouſly deputed him to be his Majeſty's executioner, when he rode a hunting. That hereupon the ſaid conſpirators were taken up and tried. Thus far theſe Authors. But we ſhall from Sir Walter's trial draw out a ſhort and regular narrative of the moſt material facts, in which he appears any way concerned; and it is as follows. There was one Matthew de Laurencie, a Merchant of Antwerp, attendant on Count Aremberg, who about the beginning of June came over Embaſſador-extraordinary from condemned to death [Y]. But being reprieved, was committed priſoner to the Tower of from Albert, Arch-duke of Auſtria, to congratulate King James, and aſſiſt in compoſing the general peace. With this Merchant the Lord Cobham had held intelligence ſome years before upon matters of ſtate, with licence. Five days after Aremberg's arrival, that is, about the 9th of the ſame month, Cobham repaired to him with Laurencie, and that night Cobham ſupped with Sir Walter Ralegh at Durham-houſe in the Strand, whereby Ralegh came to underſtand, that Cobham had freſh negotiations with Aremberg; and was, as the chief of thoſe, who oppoſed the peace, offered a ſum of money by Cobham to be a promoter of it; though that offer, which was alſo made to Ralegh, before Aremberg came, was afterwards pretended to have been for treaſonable purpoſes (45). In the next month, thoſe perſons, with whom Cobham had carried on the conſpiracy (or part of it) then on foot, were diſcovered, either by the Spaniſh faction in revenge to Ralegh, the greateſt enemy of Spain then alive, thinking he was too far involved in it or privy to it to eſcape; or by ſome one of the Engliſh conſpirators to ſecure himſelf. And when Cecil, lately made Baron of Eſſenden, found, upon the firſt news of Anthony Copely, one of the conſpirators, who was apprehended on the 6th of July (46), that the King's perſon was to be ſurprized by the Lord Grey of Wilton, and George Brooke, brother to the Lord Cobham, he ſuſpected Cobham himſelf to be in the ſecret; and Cobham's great intimacy with Ralegh at this time, who was now buying an eſtate for him, and ſettling his houſehold-affairs, drew Ralegh alſo into ſuſpicion. Hereupon Cecil meeting Ralegh upon the Terrace at Windſor, tells him, that the Lords of the Council had ſomething to ſay to him. So he was examined about the ſurpriſing treaſon, and particularly about Cobham, as appears from his own words (47), whom he fully cleared. After examination Ralegh farther ſaid; "Whatſoever correſpondence there was between "Cobham and Aremberg, Laurencie might be bet-"ter able to give account of it. Therefore he ad-"viſed to the calling him;" though, as he farther explained, "he knew of no intelligence between "them, but ſuch as might be warranted (48):" and that advice he wrote alſo in a letter to Cecil. When Ralegh returned from examination a private priſoner to his own houſe, Cobham ſent to him to know what had paſſed. Ralegh wrote an anſwer by Capt. Keymis, "that he was examined, and had cleared "him of all;" and Keymis bid Cobham be of good comfort, for one witneſs could not condemn him. This precaution to arm Cobham againſt making diſcoveries was, after his confeſſion of it, objected againſt Ralegh; but he utterly denied, that he ſent any ſuch verbal meſſage (49). Now when Cobham was brought to his examination at Richmond, one date whereof appears to have been July the 18th; and after he had by a conſtant denial cleared both himſelf and Ralegh of all that was queſtioned againſt them, Cobham was, by device, ſays a Gentleman, who was preſent at the trial (50), induced to think, that Ralegh had firſt impeached and betrayed him. For that part of Ralegh's letter abovementioned to Cecil, referring the Lords to Laurence for Cobham's tranſactions with Aremberg, being ſhewed to Cobham, and accompanied with ſuch artful ſuggeſtions as were proper to inflame a man of Cobham's weakneſs, had the deſired effect; for he being led thereby to imagine, that Ralegh had accuſed him of all or more than he knew, burſt into vehement exclamations againſt Ralegh, and in his rage made the following confeſſion: "That having a paſſport to go to the Spa-"niſh King, he intended firſt to confer with the "Arch-duke; and becauſe he knew that he had "not money to pay his own army, meant from "thence to go to Spain, to deal with the King for "ſix hundred thouſand crowns; and then to return "by Jerſey. And that nothing ſhould be done about "the diſtribution of that money to the diſcontented "in England, till he had ſpoken with Sir Walter "Ralegh. Further, that he had never entered into "theſe courſes but by his inſtigation. He ſpake "alſo of plots, but of the particulars could give no "account; yet acknowledged, that he was afraid, "that Ralegh, upon his return to Jerſey, would have "him and the money to the King (51)." After all this, before Cobham departed to the ſtair-foot, he retracted his confeſſion, and profeſſed he had done Ralegh wrong (52); nor does it appear, ſays a certain writer (53), that he did ſubſcribe it. In another branch of his examination Cobham ſaid, that he had of Ralegh a book written againſt the King's title, which he gave to his brother Brook, and that Ralegh ſaid it was fooliſhly written. But this he alſo retracted. Upon this and other parts of his confeſſion more foreign to Ralegh, concerning the advancement of Lady Arabella Stuart to the crown, as alſo from that of George Brook, a known enemy to Ralegh (as Cecil could not deny) aſſerting, that his brother Cobham told him (though Cobham in his confeſſion refuſed to own it,) "that the Lord Grey "and others were only on the bye, but he and Ra-"legh were on the main; meaning thereby, ſaid "Brook, the taking away of the King and his iſſue;" together with what Ralegh acknowledged in his own confeſſion, "that Cobham offered him eight thou-"ſand crowns for his furtherance of the peace, "though the Lord Cecil and Earl of Northumber-"land were to have the ſame proffers (54);" and that in ſome diſcourſes he might have ſaid, that the way to invade England was to begin with ſtirs in Scotland; upon theſe circumſtances, I ſay, Ralegh was indicted at Stains on the 21ſt of September following (55): and from hence that heavy indictment appears to have been accumulated upon him, which we ſee prefixed to his trial. Three days after Cobham and Grey were likewiſe indicted at the ſame place; and not long after this they were all three returned priſoners to the Tower of London. When the time of their trial drew nigh, that is to ſay, in the beginning of November, Ralegh got a poor fellow in the tower to caſt up a letter, faſtened to an apple, in at Cobham's window, while the Lieutenant was at ſupper, to intreat him (becauſe he then knew not but Cobham might be arraigned before him) "for God's ſake to do him juſtice by his anſwer, "and ſignify to him, that he had wronged him in "his accuſation;" and Cobham did, by an anſwer under his hand, confeſs the ſame; which not being perhaps ſo full and expreſſive as Ralegh expected, he afterwards ſent Cobham another letter, deſiring that he would publiſh his innocence at his arraignment. But though Ralegh did not now requeſt any farther juſtification under his hand, Cobham ſent him another anſwer, clearing him in the moſt ſolemn manner (56).

[Y] Tried for it at Wincheſter November the 17th 1603, and condemned to death.] The outragious behaviour of Sir Edward Coke, the Attorney General, towards him, is well known and univerſally abhorred. A Gentleman, who was preſent at the trial in his letter to Mr. Donne (57), above quoted, obſerves, that "touching the ſetting up of Arabella, "nothing at all was proved; nor touching the in-"vaſion, nor ſedition in Scotland, or the deſtruction "of the King, &c. It was confeſſed by Ralegh, "that Cobham offered him eight or ten thouſand "crowns from the Arch-Duke, to make him a fa-"vourer of the peace; which he yet accepted not, "but referred him to another time. Such a book as "was ſpoken of he denied not to have had, but de-"nied that he ſent it to Cobham. The proof againſt "Ralegh did reſt only upon Cobham's accuſation, and "ſome preſumptions, whereof that only was the "ground. Ralegh ſpent the time in diſabling that "accuſation, as being only uttered in fury, by rea-"ſon that by a device Cobham was brought to think, "that Ralegh had firſt accuſed him. Ralegh's defence "was that this accuſation proceeded out of paſſionate "revenge, and therefore was in itſelf diſabled to touch "a man's life. Beſides that he had relented it, and "repented it; and although afterwards by practice "he did affirm it, yet would he never be brought to "ſet his hand to the examination; all which was "clear. His labour was to prove out of divinity, "civil law, ſtatute law, common law, and conſci-"ence, (45) Arraignment of Sir Walter Ralegh, printed in J. Sherley's Account of his Life, p. 124. edit. 1677, in 8vo.

(46) Stow's Ann. folio 826.

(47) Arraignment in Sherley's Life of Sir Walter Ralegh, p. 98.

(48) Ibid. p. 110.

(49) Ibid. p. 140.

(50) Letter from a Member of Parliament to Mr. John Donne, concerning the Arraignment of Sir W. Ralegh, MS. among the collections of Rodney Fane, Eſq; It is alſo printed in Sir Toby Matthews's Collection of Letters, p. 281. edit. 1660, in 8vo.

(51) Arraignment of Sir Walter Ralegh, in Sherley's Life of him, p. 97.

(52) Ibid. p. 100.

(53) Sir Tho. Overbury's Copy of Sir Walter Ralegh's Arraignment, p. 15. edit. 1648, in 4to.

(54) Ibid. p. 12.

(55) Stow's Ann. folio 830.

(56) Overbury's Arraignment of Sir W. Ralegh, p. 23.

(57) In Sir Toby Matthews's Collection, p. 280, & ſeq.

of London, and had his eſtate reſtored to him, though it was afterwards taken away from

" ence, (in every of which he had been plentifully " read) theſe two points; firſt, that there ought to " be produced againſt him two witneſſes; ſecondly, " that his accuſer might be brought to accuſe him " face to face. But the Judges reſolved, that this " latter requeſt did not ſtand with the uſe of law; " and to the former was anſwered, that a witneſs " accuſing another, together with himſelf, was inſtar " multorum. Many excellent reaſons he uſed in diſ- " proof of theſe opinions, but to little purpoſe; for " the Jury, without pauſe, delivered up their ver- " dict, that he was guilty. Some circumſtances " there were to give preſumption, but no proof at " all. But that which weighed moſt with me was, " that ſo ſoon as Ralegh had been queſtioned the firſt " time at large, when Cobham was not ſo much as " named, he ſpeedily diſpatched a letter to Cobham " to this effect; I have been examined of divers points " touching you before the Lords of the Council, but I " have cleared you in all. Be firm, and know, that one " witneſs cannot hurt. Which letter ſeemed to have " been written by Ralegh rather to arm Cobham for " that which might be to come, than to inſtruct him " for that which was paſſed, ſince there was in truth " no ground for ſuch a ſpeed. Again, it was urged, " that a month before Cobham's accuſation, Brook " had delivered it, as out of Cobham's mouth, that " Cobham and Ralegh were upon the main, and that " it would never be well, till the King and his ſubjects " (58) were made away. To this was anſwered, Brook " was his known enemy, and therefore cared not " what he uttered to endanger Ralegh; and beſides " that Cobham had never confeſſed that under his " hand. To the other point of Ralegh's letter; the " weakneſs of his anſwer made it ſtrong, for he de- " nied it improbably. But howſoever the main " evidence being Cobham's accuſation, which (all " things conſidered) was no more to be weighed than " the barking of a dog, I would not for much to " have been of the Jury, to have found him guilty. " For a little before the Jury was going forth, after " that Ralegh had put himſelf upon this, that Cobham " had never thoroughly departed from his relenta- " tion, and that if he would vivâ voce accuſe him " of any part, he would confeſs the whole indict- " ment; the attorney read a letter from Cobham to " the Lords bearing date the 16th of this month, " wherein he did again generally accuſe Ralegh as " before, and particularly that he had promiſed to " become a penſioner to the King of Spain for fif- " teen hundred pounds by the year, by which he " would diſcover to him all the ſecrets he could " come by; and withal confeſſed, that Ralegh pro- " cured him eight or ten days before to juſtify him " by letter; which though he had done by importu- " nity, yet this laſt letter to the Lords he proteſted " was true. To which Ralegh anſwered, confeſſing, " that Cobham had offered him ſuch a penſion; but " that he not only accepted it not, (though Cobham " told him of divers great Counſellors, as namely " the Lord Cecil, Lord of Maſe, ſhould have been " offered the like, for the furtherance of the Peace) " but ſo diſſuaded Cobham from thinking of the like, " as that he believed never to hear more of it. " And as for the letter, which Cobham confeſſed to have " written in Ralegh's juſtification, it was true, and " there it was, deſiring the Lord Cecil to read it, " (which he did) and praying the Jury to mark how " much more proteſtingly and particularly that was " written to acquit him, than the other to condemn " him. For mine own part, I never heard any thing " ſo religiouſly averred, as thus: leſt he ſhould be " guilty of the blood of an innocent perſon, which " he did continually hear crying to God for venge- " ance, therefore he had ſaid thus much for the in- " nocence of Ralegh, which upon the hope, that he " had of ſalvation, in the word of a Chriſtian, (and " I know not how many of the moſt ſerious pro- " teſtations) was true, ſo that he might conclude now " with denial, purus ſum à ſanguine hujus . . . . The " Lord Cecil carried himſelf favourably towards him " that day, the attorney moſt inſolently. Notwith- " ſtanding there were many occaſions given, Ralegh " took no hold to purge himſelf from the imputations, " that lye upon him by reaſon of his carriage to- " wards my Lord of Eſſex, nor yet from Atheiſm, " which the Chief Juſtice and the Attorney did ex- " treme bitterly remember him of. On the other " ſide, the Council learned urged not the leaſt word a- " gainſt him by occaſion of the guilty blow he " gave himſelf in the Tower." The writer of this letter likewiſe remarks (59), that Sir Walter upon his trial behaved himſelf ſo worthily, ſo wiſely, ſo temperately, that in half a day the mind of all the company was changed from the extremeſt hate to the greateſt pity. Cobham's letter to the Lords at Wincheſter the day before the trial was as follows: I have thought fit to ſet down this to my Lords, wherein I profeſs on my ſoul to write nothing but the truth; I am come now near to the period of my time; therefore I confeſs the truth before God and his angels. Ralegh, four days before I came from the Tower, cauſed an apple to be thrown in at my chamber-window: the effect of it was to intreat me to right the wrong I had done him, in ſaying, that I would come home by Jerſey; which under my hand to him I have retracted. His firſt letter I anſwered not, which was thrown in the ſame manner, wherein he prayed me to write him a letter, which I did. He ſent me word, that the Judges were at Mr. Attorney's houſe, and that there was good hope the proceedings againſt us ſhould be ſtayed. He ſent me another time a little tobacco. At Aremberg's coming, Ralegh dealt with me to procure him a Penſion of 1500 pounds a year, for which he promiſed, that no action ſhould be againſt Spain, but he would give knowledge beforehand. He told me, the States had audience with the King. He hath been the original cauſe of my ruin; for I had no dealing with Aremberg but by his inſtigation. He hath been alſo the cauſe of my diſcontentment; he adviſed me not to be overtaken with Preachers, as Eſſex was; and that the King would better allow of a conſtant denial, than to accuſe any. Some ſay, that this letter was not written by Lord Cobham himſelf; but that Sir William Wade, one of Cecil's creatures, tampering with his weakneſs, got Cobham to write his name to a blank; to which Wade no queſtion wrote the accuſation (60). Others intimate, that Cobham wrote it himſelf, after he had been informed by a letter from his Lady, that there was no way to ſave his own life, but to accuſe Ralegh; and that it was ſo reported upon the going together of the Jury (61). Cobham's letter to Ralegh, which the latter produced and deſired the Lord Cecil to read, was as follows: " Seeing my- " ſelf ſo near my end, for the diſcharge of my own " conſcience, and freeing myſelf from your blood, " which, which elſe will cry vengeance againſt me; " I proteſt upon my ſalvation, I never practiſed with " Spain by your procurement. God ſo comfort me " in this my affliction, as you are a true ſubject for " any thing that I know. I will ſay with Daniel, " Purus ſum a ſanguine hujus. So God have mercy " on my ſoul, as I know no treaſon by you." It is ſaid, that ſome of the Jury, after Ralegh was caſt, were ſo far touched in conſcience, as to demand of him pardon on their knees (62); and that even Coke the Attorney General himſelf, being retired into a garden to take ſome air, when his man brought him word, that the Jury had condemned Ralegh of treaſon, anſwered, Surely thou art miſtaken, for I myſelf accuſed him but of miſpriſion of treaſon; " and this rela- " tion, ſays a certain writer (63), upon the word of " a Chriſtian I have received from Sir Edward Coke's " own mouth." Sir John Hawles, Sollicitor-General to King William, in his Reply to a ſheet, entitled, The Magiſtracy and Government vindicated, printed in 1689 in fol. having obſerved, that the Accuſations of Sir Walter Ralegh did not amount to a legal proof, ſays farther (64); not to mention all that might be excepted to in the trial of the caſe cited; I would know by what law is the depoſition of a perſon, who might be brought face to face to the priſoner, read as evidence? would know by what law it is forbidden, that the accuſer ſhould be brought face to face to the accuſed? I would know, by what law Brook's depoſition of what the Lord Cobham told him of Ralegh, was evidence againſt Ralegh? I would know, by what law the ſtory Dyer told of

(58) So it is in the printed copy of this Letter; but it ſhould probably be Cubs, as it is in Ralegh's Trial.

(59) Ubi ſupra, p. 279.

(60) Sir Anthony Weldon's Court and Character of King James, p. 35. edit. 1650, in 8vo.

(61) Overbury's Arraignment of Sir W. Ralegh, p. 24.

(62) Osborne's Memoirs of King James, in the 2d vol. of his works, p. 108.

(63) Obſervations on Sanderſon's Hiſt. of Mary Q. of Scots, &c. p. 9.

(64) p. 55.

of what an unknown man ſaid to him at Liſbon of Don Ralegh, was evidence againſt Ralegh? I would know, by what ſtatute the ſtatutes of the 25th of Edward III, and the 5th of Edward VI. are repealed. This trial was ſo very irregular throughout, that I would willingly believe it was not ſo as it is related. But if it were ſo, I am ſure none can defend it; and even for that reaſon, if any ſuch reſolution was in the caſe, as is cited, I am ſure it ought to carry no credit with it, and there is no reaſon to believe there was any ſuch reſolution, there being no occaſion for it, the queſtion being only fact, which Sir Walter denied. The circumſtances of his trial, in which the Court always over-ruled the priſoner, were ſomewhat like the Lord Ruſſel's: he complained of the ill-uſage of the King's Council, as well as the Lord Ruſſel; and both had reaſon ſo to do. Hearſay was admitted to be given in evidence againſt both; all that either of them ſaid for themſelves, though very material, was ſlighted. The one was put in mind at his trial of the death of the Earl of Eſſex, as the other was of the death of the Viſcount Strafford; both in their dying ſpeeches vindicated themſelves of thoſe aſperſions. The principal witneſſes in both caſes had before the trials affirmed, they knew nothing againſt them. They were both accuſed of having heard what other perſons had ſaid in their company, and had not diſcovered it; they both gave the ſame anſwers, that they could not help other men's talk. I think it is plain at this day, that of Sir Walter is thought a ſham-plot; what the Lord Ruſſel's is thought, let the author ſay. When ſentence was given againſt Ralegh, he deſired, that the King might know the proofs againſt him; that he ſtill perſiſted in his loyalty, notwithſtanding that verdict, which he would pray, that his ſaid Jury might never anſwer for; and only begged pardon for concealing Lord Cobham's offer to him, which he did through a confidence, that he had diverted him from thoſe humours. And ſo he accompanied the Sheriff to the priſon with admirable erection, yet in ſuch ſort as a condemned man ſhould do (65). Juſt before his trial he had written a letter to the King (66), wherein he ſays: "I know, that among many preſumptions "gathered againſt me, your Majeſty has been per-"ſuaded, that I was one of thoſe, who were greatly "diſcontented, and therefore the more likely to "prove diſloyal; but the great God of heaven and "earth diſclaim me from both worlds, if I were "not the contrary." And having humbly beſeeched his Majeſty not to believe any of thoſe, who, under pretence of offences to Kings, do eaſily work their particular revenge, proceeds thus: "For my part, I proteſt "before the ever-living God, that I never intended "treaſon, conſented to treaſon, or performed trea-"ſon againſt you; and yet I know I ſhall fall into "their hands, è quibus non poſſum evadere, unleſs by "your Majeſty's gracious compaſſion I be ſuſtained." In another letter, which he wrote to the Lords, ſpeaking of the two principal accuſations againſt him, he ſays; The firſt was, that money was offered me with a pretence to maintain the Amity, but the intent was to have aſſiſted his Majeſty's Surpriſe: the other, that I was privy to my Lord Cobham's Spaniſh journey. For the firſt, it ſeems, this money was offered to others long after it was offered to me, and upon other conſiderations than it was to me. For myſelf, I avow upon my allegiance, that I never knew or ſuſpected either the man or the new intention. To me it was but once propounded, and in three weeks after I never heard more of it; neither did I believe, that he had any commiſſion to offer it. For if that word Amity had been uſed to me colourably, I muſt have been alſo made acquainted with the true end, for which it ſhould have been given; which it ſeems was the Surprize: but of any ſuch honourable purpoſe, if ever I had ſo much as a ſuſpicion, I refuſe your Lordſhip's favour and the King's mercy. I know your Lordſhips have omitted nothing to find out the truth; but as you have not erred, like ill Surgeons, to lay on plaiſters too narrow for ſo great wounds; ſo I truſt you will not imitate unlearned Phyſicians, to give medicines more cruel than the diſeaſe itſelf. For the journey into Spain, I know I was accuſed to be privy thereto; but I know your Lordſhips have a reputation of conſcience as well as induſtry. By what means that revengeful accuſation was ſtirred, you, my Lord Cecil, know right well, that it was my letter about Keymis; and your Lordſhips all know whether it be maintained, or whether out of truth and out of a Chriſtian conſideration it be revoked . . . . . Your Lordſhips know, that I am guiltleſs of the Surprize intended; you know, or may know, that I never accepted of the money, and that it was not offered me for any ill. And of the Spaniſh journey, I truſt your conſciences are reſolved (67). And in another letter, which he wrote to the King after his trial, he has theſe words: "Loſt I am for "hearing a vain man, for hearing only, and never "believing or approving; and ſo little account I "made of that ſpeech of his, which was my con-"demnation, that I never remembered any ſuch "thing, till it was at my trial objected againſt "me (68)." He was kept at Wincheſter near a month after he was condemned, in daily expectation of death; the time of which was ſo determined, that he wrote what he intended for his laſt words, to his wife, the night before he expected to be put to death, in a very pathetic letter, which was as follows:

"You ſhall receive, my dear wife, my laſt words "in theſe my laſt lines. My love I ſend you, that "you may keep it, when I am dead; and my "counſel, that you remember it when I am no "more. I would not with will preſent you ſorrows, "dear Beſs; let them go into the grave with me, "and be buried in the duſt; and ſeeing that it is "not the will of God, that I ſhall ſee you any "more, bear my deſtruction patiently and with a "heart like yourſelf. Firſt, I ſend you all the "thanks, which my heart can conceive or my words "expreſs, for your many travels and cares for me; "which, though they have not taken effect as you "wiſhed, yet my debt to you is not the leſs; but "pay it I never ſhall in this world. Secondly, I be-"ſeech you for the love you bear me living, that "you do not hide yourſelf many days, but by your "travels ſeek to help my miſerable fortunes, and "the right of my poor child. Your mourning can-"not avail me, that am but duſt. Thirdly, you "ſhall underſtand, that my lands were conveyed bonâ "fide to my child. The writings were drawn at "Midſummer was twelve months, as divers can wit-"neſs. And I truſt my blood will quench their "malice, who deſired my ſlaughter, that they will "not ſeek alſo to kill you and yours with extreme po-"verty. To what friend to direct you, I know not, "for all mine have left me in the true time of trial. "Moſt ſorry I am, that being thus ſurprized by "death, I can leave you no better eſtate. God hath "prevented all my determinations; that great God, "who worketh all in all! If you can live free from "want, care for no more, for the reſt is but vanity. "Love God, and begin betimes; in him you ſhall "find true, everlaſting, and endleſs comfort. When "you have travelled and wearied yourſelf with all "ſort of worldly cogitations, you ſhall ſit down by "ſorrow in the end. Teach your ſon alſo to ſerve "and fear God, whilſt he is young, that the fear of "God may grow up in him; then will God be an "huſband to you, and a father to him; an huſband "and a father that can never be taken from you. "Bailie oweth me a thouſand pounds, and Adrian "ſix hundred. In Guernſey alſo I have much ow-"ing me. Dear wife, I beſeech you for my ſoul's "ſake, pay all poor men. When I am dead, no "doubt you ſhall be much ſought unto, for the world "thinks I was very rich. Have a care to the fair "pretences of men, for no greater miſery can be-"fall you in this life than to become a prey unto "the world, and after to be deſpiſed. I ſpeak, "God knows! not to diſſuade you from marriage, "for it will be beſt for you both in reſpect of God "and the world. As for me, I am no more yours, "nor you mine: death hath cut us aſunder, and God "hath divided me from the world, and you from "me. Remember your poor child for his father's "ſake, who loved you in his happieſt eſtate. I ſued "for my life, but God knows! it was for you and "yours that I deſired it. For you know, my dear "wife, your child is the child of a true man, who, in "his own reſpect, deſpiſeth death and his miſhapen "and ugly forms. I cannot write much; God "knows! how hardly I ſteal this time, when all "ſleep; and it is alſo time for me to ſeparate my "thoughts from the world. Beg my dead body,

"which

(65) Overbury's Arraignment of Sir Walter Ralegh, p. 25.

(66) See his Remains, p. 185. edit. 1726.

(67) Ibid. p. 188, &c.

(68) Ibid. p. 192, &c.

from him, and given to Sir Robert Carr, afterwards Earl of Somerſet [Z]. During his confinement, he devoted a great part of his time to his ſtudies, and wrote ſeveral books [AA]. March the 25th, 1615-16, he was releaſed out of the Tower (t); and in 1617, received a commiſſion from the King, dated Auguſt the 26th, empowering him to (t) Camdeni Annal. Regis Jacobi ad ann. 1615.

" which living was denied you; and either lay it in " Sherborne, or in Exeter Church by my father and " mother. I can ſay no more; time and death " calleth me away. The everlaſting God, power- " ful, infinite, and inſcrutable God Almighty, who " is goodneſs itſelf, the true light and life, keep you " and yours, and have mercy upon me, and forgive " my perſecutors and falſe accuſers, and ſend us to " meet in his glorious kingdom. My dear wife, " farewel; bleſs my boy; pray for me; and let " my true God hold you both in his arms.

" Yours that was, but now not mine own,

" Walter Ralegh."

However, as Cobham never confirmed his accuſation of him, they both were, with the reſt of the priſoners, returned to the Tower of London; where the Lord Grey died; but Cobham was at laſt releaſed, and lived in very neceſſitous circumſtances.

[Z] Had his eſtate reſtored to him, though it was afterwards taken away from him, and given to Sir Robert Car, afterwards Earl of Somerſet.] This eſtate had been actually made over by Sir Walter to his ſon, both inheritance and fee, before Queen Elizabeth's death, as formerly was alſo the leaſe for years (69); ſo that, being entailed on " Sir Wal- " ter's heirs, he could not forfeit them but during " his own life; and the King finding in himſelf the " iniquity of Sir Walter's condemnation, gave him " all what he had forfeited again (70)." But ſoon after this a young Scotſman, named Robert Carr, becoming a great favourite at Court, and having no fortune of his own, it was contrived by thoſe, who had in vain ſought Ralegh's eſtate for themſelves, to lay the foundation of this favourite's future greatneſs upon his ruin; for being thus fruſtrated of the effects of Sir Walter's attainder, they pretended to find a flaw in his laſt conveyance of the fee and inheritance of Sherborne to his ſon; and to this purpoſe an information was exhibited in the Exchequer by the Attorney General Hobart, to which Ralegh put in his anſwer; and therein the ſaid grant or conveyance was ſet forth to be made over, as above-mentioned. Yet for want of a ſingle word, which was found notwithſtanding in the paper-book, and was only the overſight of the Clerk, they pronounced the conveyance invalid, and Sherborne abſolutely forfeited to the Crown; a judgment eaſily to have been foreſeen, ſince his Judge was his greateſt enemy, and the caſe argued between a friendleſs priſoner and the King of England (71). Upon this Sherborne was given to Carr. The Lady Ralegh and her children earneſtly petitioned the King for compaſſion, but could now obtain no other anſwer from him, than that he mun have the land, he mun have it for Carr. And ſhe, a woman of high ſpirit, on her knees prayed to God, that he would puniſh thoſe, who had thus wrongfully expoſed her and her children to ruin (72). There is an elegant letter of Ralegh's extant to Carr himſelf upon this occaſion, which having been corruptly printed, Mr. Oldys (73) has given a more correct copy of it from ſeveral ancient manuſcript copies. It is as follows: " After ſome " great loſſes, and many years ſorrows, of both " which I have cauſe to fear I was miſtaken in the " end; it is come to my knowledge, that yourſelf, " whom I know not but by an honourable fame, has " been perſuaded to give me and mine our laſt fatal " blow, by obtaining from his Majeſty the inheri- " tance of my children and nephews, loſt in the " law for want of a word. This done, there re- " mains nothing with me but the name of life, de- " ſpoiled of all elſe but the title and ſorrow thereof. " His Majeſty, whom I never offended (for I ever " held it unnatural and unmanly to hate goodneſs) " ſtay'd me at the grave's brink; not, as I hope, " that he thought me worthy of many deaths, and " to behold all mine caſt out of the world with my- " ſelf; but as a King, who judging the poor in truth, " has received a promiſe from God, that his Throne " ſhall be eſtabliſhed for ever. As for yourſelf, Sir, " ſeeing your fair day is but now in the dawn, and " mine drawn to the evening, your own virtues and " the King's grace aſſuring you of many favours and " much honour, I beſeech you not to begin your " firſt building upon the ruins of the innocent; and " that their ſorrows, with mine, may not attend " your firſt plantation. I have been ever bound " to your nation, as well for many other graces, as " for their true report of my trial to his Majeſty, a- " gainſt whom I had been found malignant, the " hearing of my cauſe would not have changed ene- " mies into friends, malice into compaſſion, and the " minds of the greateſt number preſent into the " commiſeration of my ſtate. It is not the nature " of foul treaſon to beget ſuch fair paſſions; neither " could it agree with the duty and love of faithful " ſubjects, eſpecially of your nation, to bewail his " overthrow, who had conſpired againſt their moſt " liberal and natural Lord. I therefore truſt, Sir, " that you will not be the firſt, that ſhall kill us out- " right, cut down the tree with the fruit, and un- " dergo their curſe, who enter the field of the father- " leſs; which, if it pleaſe you to know the truth, " is far leſs frui ful in value than in fame; but that " ſo worthy a Gentleman as yourſelf will rather bind " us to your ſervice, being Sir, Gentlemen, not baſe " in birth and alliance, who have intereſt therein; " and myſelf, with the utmoſt thankfulneſs, will " ever remain ready to obey your Commandments." This letter, in one or two old copies, is dated December 1608; but it had ſo little effect upon Carr, or any other applications, which Ralegh might make to the King, with his Majeſty himſelf, that beſides Sherborne, and the manors belonging to it, thoſe other lands, which Ralegh himſelf had purchaſed, called, Pinford and Primeſly, Barton, and the manors appertaining thereto, forfeited with the reſt by his attainder, were alſo granted the following year 1609 to the ſaid favourite (74).

(69) Carew Ralegh's Caſe at the Committee for ſale of Delinquents Eſtates, MS. quoted by Mr. Oldys, p. 163.

(70) Carew Ralegh's brief Relation of Sir Walter Ralegh's troubles, with the taking away of the Lands and Caſtle of Sherborne, in Dorſetſhire, &c. p. 6. edit. 1669, in 4to.

(71) Ibid. and Carew Ralegh's Caſe.

(72) Carew Ralegh's brief Relation, p. 7.

(73) p. 164.

(74) See Carew Ralegh's Caſe.

[AA] Wrote ſeveral books.] We ſhall, after the example of Mr. Oldys (75), conſider his writings under the following heads, viz. Poetical, Epiſtolary, Military, Maritimal, Geographical, Political, Philoſophical, and Hiſtorical. I. Poetical; as his Poems on Gaſcoigne's Steel-Glaſs; The Excuſe; The ſilent Lover; the Anſwer to Marloe's Paſtoral; with his Poems of Cynthia, and two more on Spenſer's Fairy-Queen; The Lover's Maze; A Farewel to Court; The Advice; which laſt three pieces are printed in an old Collection of ſeveral ingenious Poems and Songs by the wits of the age, 1660, in 8vo. another little Poem, printed in the London Magazine for Auguſt 1734; ſeveral in the Aſhmolean Library at Oxford, namely, Erroris Reſponſio, and his Anſwer to the Lie, &c. three pieces written juſt before his death, viz. his Pilgrim, his Epigram in Alluſion to the Snuff of a Candle, and his Epitaph, printed in his Remains. There is likewiſe aſcribed to him a ſatyrical Elegy upon the death of the Lord Treaſurer Cecil, Earl of Saliſbury, printed by Oſborne in his Memoirs of King James, and ſaid to be our Author's by Shirley in his Life of Ralegh, p. 179. II. Epiſtolary, viz. Letters, eight and twenty of which Mr. Oldys tells us he has ſeen in print and manuſcript (76). III. MILITARY. Theſe diſcourſes relate either to the defenſe of England in particular, or contain general arguments and examples of the cauſes and reaſons of war among mankind. On the former ſubject he ſeems to have drawn up ſeveral remonſtrances, which are but ſparingly and ſlowly come to light. However, as he had a principal hand in the determinations of the Council of War for putting the nation in arms, when it was under immediate apprehenſions of the Spaniſh invaſion, there is good reaſon to believe, that he was the Author of a treatiſe concerning Notes of Direction for

(75) p. 173 & ſeq.

(76) p. 174.

to ſet forth ſhips and men upon a voyage to the ſouth parts of America, or elſewhere within America, poſſeſſed and inhabited by heathen and ſavage people, to diſcover ſome commodities and merchandize profitable for the ſubjects of theſe Kingdoms, whereof the inhabitants make little or no uſe, &c. Accordingly he ſet out with his fleet for Guiana in the beginning of July; but his deſign being betrayed to the Spaniards, it was defeated; and his ſon Walter was killed at St. Thome, which was burnt by Captain Keymis, who being reproached by Sir Walter for his ill conduct in the affair, killed himſelf. Gundamor, the Spaniſh Embaſſador in England, being informed of what had paſſed at Guiana, complained in very ſtrong terms to the King, who on the 11th of June, 1618, publiſhed a proclamation to this effect (u), that "Whereas we gave liberty to Sir Walter "and others, to undertake a voyage to Guiana, where they had pretended a probability of "diſcovering gold mines, &c. we did, by expreſs limitation and caution, reſtrain and "forbid them from attempting any act of hoſtility, upon any territories or ſubjects of "foreign Princes, with whom we are in amity; and more particularly thoſe of our "dear brother the King of Spain, in reſpect of his dominions on that continent, which, "notwithſtanding, they have, by hoſtile invaſion of the town of St. Thome, &c. broken "and infringed. We have therefore thought fit to make publick declaration of our "utter miſlike and deteſtation of the ſaid inſolencies; and for the better detection and "clearing up of the truth, we charge all our ſubjects, that have any underſtanding or "notice thereof, to repair to any of our Privy Council, and make known their whole "knowledge, that we may thereupon proceed to the exemplary puniſhment and coercion of all ſuch, as are found guilty of ſo ſcandalous and enormous outrages."

(u) See Rymer's Fœdera, Tom. 17. p. 192.

Ralegh

ſuch Defence of the Kingdom, written three years before that invaſion. To this treatiſe was alſo joined a Direction for the beſt and moſt orderly retreat of an army, whether in Campaign or Straits. And theſe were then preſented in manuſcript to the Privy Council. Herein one advice is, that ſince Frontier forces are unlikely to prevent an enemy from landing, if they ſhould land through the deficiency or abſence of our ſhipping (for this is the force which Ralegh was ever for having firſt uſed againſt ſuch foreign invaſions) it were better by driving or clearing the country of proviſions, and temporizing, to endeavour at growing ſtronger, and rendering the enemy weaker, than to hazard all by a confuſed and diſorderly deſcent of the populace to oppoſe the firſt landing, as their cuſtom was formerly. But this was one of the chief points, which a little before the approach of the Spaniſh Armada was oppoſed by Thomas Digges, Eſq; Muſter Maſter General of the Queen's Forces in the Low-Countries, in a Diſcourſe of the beſt order for repulſing a foreign Force, &c. which he then publiſhed, This occaſioned an Anſwer, which having been found in an old manuſcript copy among others of Sir Walter Ralegh's diſcourſes, and by ſeveral circumſtances therein agreeing with many in his life, as well as with ſeveral orders in the aforeſaid Council of War, ſeveral paſſages in his Hiſtory of the World, and his other writings, it was publiſhed by Nathaniel Booth of Gray's-Inn, Eſq; at London 1734 in 8vo, under this title: A Military Diſcourſe, whether it be better for England to give an invader preſent battle, or to temporize and defer the ſame, &c. But if we would ſee Ralegh's opinion upon this ſubject in a more extenſive and univerſal manner, it muſt be in his Diſcourſes of the original and fundamental cauſe of natural and neceſſary, arbitrary and cuſtomary, holy and civil wars; which, though publiſhed ſeveral years after his death, have ſufficient marks of genuineneſs upon them. IV. Maritimal; viz. his Diſcourſe of the invention of ſhipping, &c. printed among his Eſſays in 1650 in 8vo. his Obſervations and Notes concerning the Royal Navy and Sea-ſervice, dedicated to Prince Henry, printed likewiſe among his Eſſays; his Letter to that Prince concerning the Model of a Ship, printed among his Remains; his Report of the Truth of the Fight about the Iſles of Azores, printed in 1591 in 4to. and reprinted by Hakluyt, Vol. II. Part II. p. 169. edit. 1599; his Relation of the Action at Cadiz, publiſhed among the Remains at the end of an Abridgment of Sir Walter Ralegh's Hiſtory of the World, 1700 in 8vo; and his Memorial touching Dover Port, printed in a pamphlet, entitled, An Eſſay on Ways and Means to maintain the Honour and Safety of England, publiſhed by Sir Henry Sheers in 1701. in 4to. Sir Walter in the Introduction to his Obſervations and Notes concerning the Royal Navy and Sea-ſervice mentions a Diſcourſe of a maritimal voyage, with the paſſages and incidents therein, which he had formerly written to Prince Henry; and in his Hiſtory of the World (77) he takes notice of another treatiſe, written to the ſame Prince, Of the Art of War by Sea; "a ſubject to "my knowledge, ſays he, never handled by any "man ancient or modern; but God has ſpared "me the labour of finiſhing it, by the loſs of that "brave Prince; of which, like an eclipſe of the "ſun, we ſhall find the effects hereafter." V. Geographical, viz. ſeveral diſcourſes and papers of his concerning the diſcovery, planting, and ſettlement of Virginia, which were formerly in the hands of Sir Francis Walſingham (78). A Treatiſe of the Weſt-Indies (79). Conſiderations on the Voyage for Guiana, a manuſcript containing leaves in 4to. in the Library of Sir Hans Sloane, Bart. Diſcovery of the large, rich, and beautiful Empire of Guiana, publiſhed by himſelf, and mentioned above. His Journal of his ſecond Voyage to Guiana, which remains ſtill in manuſcript; and his Apology for the ſaid voyage. VI. Political, viz. The Seat of Government; ſhewing it to be upheld by the two great Pillars of civil Juſtice and martial Policy, and how this is framed out of the Huſband, Merchants, and Gentry of the Realm. This piece was printed among his Remains in 1652, in 12mo. Obſervations concerning the Cauſes of the Magnificency and Opulency, printed likewiſe among his Remains. The Prince; or Maxims of State, printed at London 1642 in 4to. and reprinted among his Remains. Mr. Wood ſays, that it is the ſame with Aphoriſms of State, publiſhed by John Milton at London 1661 in 8vo. The Cabinet-Council, containing the chief Arts of Empire, and myſteries of State diſcabineted, &c. publiſhed by John Milton, Eſq; London 1658 in 8vo. In the ſecond edition at London 1692 in 8vo. it is entitled, The Arts of Empire and Myſteries of State diſcabineted, &c. The Spaniard's Cruelties to the Engliſh in Havanna (80). His Conſultation about the Peace with Spain, and our protecting the Netherlands, in manuſcript. The preſent State of Spain, with a moſt accurate account of his Catholic Majeſty's Power and Rights; alſo the names and worth of the moſt conſiderable Perſons in that Kingdom, in manuſcript; which ſeems to be a different piece from The preſent State of Things, as they now ſtand between the three Kingdoms, France, England, and Spain, in manuſcript. A Diſcourſe on the match propounded by the Savoyan between the Lady Elizabeth and the Prince of Piedmont, and another on that between Prince Henry of England and a daughter of Savoy; both which diſcourſes are in manuſcript. A Dialogue between a Jeſuit and a Recuſant; ſhewing how dangerous their Principles are to Chriſtian Princes, publiſhed by Philip Ralegh, Eſq; among our Author's Genuine Remains at the end of an Abridgment of his Hiſtory of the world, London 1700 in 8vo. A Dialogue between a Counſellor of State and a Juſtice of Peace, better known in the printed copies by the title of the

(77) Lib. 5. c. 1. ſect. 6.

(78) Oldys, p. 33 and 176.

(79) Idem, p. 177.

(80) Idem, p. 178.

Ralegh landed at Plymouth, which was about the beginning of July following (w); and though he heard that the Court was exaſperated by the Spaniſh Embaſſador, he was firmly reſolved to go to London; and after he had ſettled his affairs in the weſt, began his journey for London; but before he came to Aſhburnham, twenty miles from Plymouth, was met by Sir Lewis Stucley, Vice-Admiral of the county of Devon, who arreſted him in the name of his Majeſty, to whom Ralegh wrote a letter in vindication of himſelf

(w) Oldys, p. 209.

the Prerogative of Parliaments, dedicated to King James, and printed at Midelburge 1628 in 4to, and reprinted in 1642 in 4to, and likewiſe among his Remains. A Diſcourſe of the words Law and Right; in manuſcript in the Aſhmolean library. Obſervations touching trade and commerce with the Hollander and other nations, as it was preſented to King James; wherein is proved, that our ſea and land commodities ſerve to inrich and ſtrengthen other countries againſt our own: printed in 1653 in 12mo. But it is doubtful, whether this tract was written by our Author. VII. Philoſophical; viz. A Treatiſe of the Soul; in manuſcript in the Aſhmolean library. His Sceptic or Speculations; printed among his Remains. Inſtructions to his Son and Poſterity, printed in 1632 in 12mo, and reprinted among his Remains; and to this Inſtructions is ſubjoined The dutiful Advice of a loving Son to his aged Father. A treatiſe of Mines and the trial of Minerals, and a Collection of Chymical and Medicinal Receipts; both which are in manuſcript. VIII. Hiſtorical; viz. his Hiſtory of the World, publiſhed in April 1614 in fol. and reprinted many times ſince. It is highly eſteemed, and has been mentioned in terms of the ſtrongeſt approbation by the moſt eminent of our writers. It is a point worth examining, whether there is any foundation for the vulgar ſtory, that he continued this Hiſtory down to his own times, but deſtroyed this continuation, becauſe the firſt part did not meet with encouragement. He obſerves in his Preface, that he "propoſed to confine "his diſcourſe with this our renowned Iſle of Great "Britain;" and that he forbears "to promiſe a "ſecond or third volume, which he intends, if the "firſt receives grace and good acceptance, for that "which is already done may be thought enough "and too much." And in the concluſion of his Hiſtory he ſays; Whereas this book by the title calls itſelf The firſt Part of the General Hiſtory of the world, implying a ſecond and third volume, which I alſo intended and have hewn out; beſides many diſcouragements perſuading my ſilence, it has pleaſed God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whoſe unſpeakable and never enough lamented loſs has taught me to ſay with Job, verſa eſt in luctum cithera mea, & organum meum in vocem flentium. Hence, as Mr. Oldys obſerves (81), it ſeems plain enough, that our Author had only ſome plan, or perhaps a few rough draughts of ſome ſucceeding parts of the hiſtory at his time drawn up; and that he was diſcouraged from making any further progreſs in them. Granting that his mind might change, and that there was time enough to finiſh the remaining volumes between this year and his death, which is ſcarcely allowable; yet as we know how moſt of that time was employed by him, it will admit of no room for any ſuch performance. For in 1615, the year, which followed that, wherein he publiſhed his Hiſtory, two at leaſt of his moſt celebrated tracts beforementioned were written. The ſame year he was alſo buſy in writing letters and making other intereſt for his releaſment, which he obtained before the end of it. After this his employments and affairs made it almoſt impoſſible for him to carry on ſo great a work. There is indeed an intimation of the deſign he had upon ſome part of the ancient Engliſh hiſtory, preſerved in a letter of his own, written, it ſeems, though not dated, before his great work was publiſhed, to Sir Robert Cotton, whoſe library was moſt likely to furniſh him with thoſe uncommon books which he wanted for his purpoſe. The letter is as follows:

(81) p. 186.

"Sir Robert Cotton,

"If you have any of theſe old books, or any ma-"nuſcripts, wherein I may find any of our Britiſh "antiquities, if you pleaſe to lend them me for a "little while, I will ſafely reſtore them, and think "myſelf much beholden unto you; or if you have any "old French hiſtory, wherein our nation is mention-"ed, or any elſe in what language ſoever.

"Your poor friend,

"W. Ralegh."

The original of this letter is in the Cotton library, Julius C. 3; and at the top of it is a liſt of the old Authors, which Sir Walter refers to. But this does not ſufficienly inform us, whether the uſe of theſe books was to continue his General Hiſtory, or furniſh him upon ſome more particular ſubject; though Dr. Thomas Smith (82) inclines to the former opinion. However it is very probable, that Sir Walter's own intimations in the firſt part ſeem to be the only foundation of that formal ſtory related by Mr. Winſtanley (83), who tells us, that "ſome few "days before he ſuffered, he ſent for Mr. Walter "Burre, who formerly printed his firſt volume of the "Hiſtory of the World; whom taking by the hand, "after ſome diſcourſe, he aſked him how that work "of his had ſold? Mr. Burre returned this anſwer, "that it had ſold ſo ſlowly, that it had undone him. "At which words Sir Walter Ralegh ſtepping to his "deſk, reaches his other part of his Hiſtory to Mr. "Burre, which he had brought down to the times he "lived in. Clapping his hand on his breaſt, he "took the other unprinted part of his work "into his hand, with a ſigh ſaying, Ah! my "friend, hath the firſt part undone thee? The ſecond "volume ſhall undo no more: this ungrateful world is "unworthy of it. When going immediately to the "fire-ſide, he threw it in, and ſet his foot on it till "it was conſumed." Upon this paſſage Mr. Oldys remarks (84), that Ralegh had no leiſure to finiſh ſuch a ſecond part of his Hiſtory down to his own time. In the next place, it is no ways probable, that he, who, in regard to the firſt part, could follow the rule of Seneca, that he, who having ſatisfied his own conſcience, could diſregard the cenſure of others, ſhould ſacrifice ſo great a part of his labours, or any part, in ſuch a raſh and inconſiderate manner, to the ſudden repreſentations of a bookſeller, without ever ſuſpecting any mercenary ends in him. Further it does not appear true, that the firſt part did ſell ſlowly, for there was a ſecond edition of it ſet forth by that very bookſeller, within three years after the firſt. And laſtly, the firſt one we can meet with, who reports the ſame, is a trifling and ſuperficial writer, who produces no authority for his aſſertion. As for the unfiniſhed parts he might have of ſuch a continuation, to admit that they were thus deſtroyed, would moreover in no wiſe agree with an account we have more ſatisfactorily atteſted of that great quantity there was in being of Sir Walter Ralegh's unprinted writings ſeveral years after his death. For it is affirmed to us, that the famous Mr. Hamden, a little before the civil wars, was at the charge of tranſcribing three thouſand four hundred fifty two ſheets of Sir Walter Ralegh's manuſcripts, as the Amanuenſis himſelf told me (ſays my author) who had his cloſe chamber, his fire and candle, with an attendant to deliver him the originals, and take his copies as faſt as he could write them (85). Yet what is become of this treaſure, I have not been able to learn: but if we ſuppoſe that Mr. Hamden would not be at the trouble and charge of tranſcribing any of our author's writings, which had then been printed, and grant that all of his, which have been printed ſince that time, as well as all we can hear of remaining in manuſcript, which are allowed to be his, were part of that collection or quantity; they will not both together amount to a fourth part thereof, though we ſhould admit two or three pieces more, alſo aſcribed to him, which have (82) Vita D. Roberti Cottoni, folio 25.

(83) Worthies of England, p. 256. edit. 1660, in 8vo.

(84) p. 187.

(85) Obſervations on the Statſmen and Favourites of England ſince the Reformation. By David Lloyd, M. A. p. 490. edit. 1665, in 8vo.

himſelf [BB]. He proceeded therefore with Stucley on his journey [CC], during which he wrote his Apology [DD]. Upon his arrival at London, he formed a deſign to eſcape, but being betrayed by Stucley, was ſeized in a boat on the Thames, Auguſt the 9th, and committed priſoner to the Tower of London, and two or three days after a Committee was appointed to examine into his eſcape; upon which ſubject he wrote a letter to the Marquis of Buckingham, dated October the 14th [EE]. On Friday October the 23d, there have not yet been named. Theſe pieces are, 1. A notable and memorable ſtory of the cruel war between the Carthaginians and their own mercenaries. Gathered out of Polybius and other authors. Printed in 1647 in 4to. This is only a tranſcript from our author's Hiſtory of the World, L. 5. C. 2, &c. 2. The Life and Death of Mahomet; the Conqueſt of Spain; together with the riſing and ruin of the Saraſen Empire: printed in 1637 in 12mo. This, except a few leaves about Mahomet, is no more than a tranſlation of an Epitome made by ſome ignorant Spaniſh author; and the ſtyle very inferior to that of Ralegh. 3. An Introduction to a Breviary of the Hiſtory of England; with the reign of King William I. entitled the Conqueror: printed in 1693 in 8vo.

[BB] To whom Ralegh wrote a letter in vindication of himſelf.] The letter is as follows:

" May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

" If in my journey outward bound I had my men " murdered at the iſlands, and yet ſpared to take " revenge; if I did diſcharge ſome Spaniſh barks " taken, without ſpoil; if I did forbear all parts of " the Spaniſh Indies, wherein I might have taken " twenty of their towns on the ſea-coaſts, and did " only follow the enterprize I undertook for Guiana, " where, without any directions from me, a Spaniſh " village was burnt, which was new ſet up within " three miles of mine; by your Majeſty's favour, " I find no reaſon why the Spaniſh Embaſſador ſhould " complain of me. If it were lawful for the Spa- " niards to murder twenty ſix Engliſhmen, tying " them back to back, and then cutting their throats, " when they had traded with them a whole month, " and came to them on the land without ſo much " as one ſword; and it may not be lawful for your " Majeſty's ſubjects, being charged firſt by them, to " repel force by force; we may juſtly ſay, O miſera- " ble Engliſh! If Parker and Mecham took Cam- " peachy and other places in the Honduras, ſeated " in the heart of the Spaniſh Indies, burnt towns, " and killed the Spaniards, and had nothing ſaid " unto them at their return; and myſelf, who for- " bore to look into the Indies, becauſe I would not " offend, muſt be accuſed; I may as juſtly ſay, O " miſerable Ralegh! If I have ſpent my poor eſtate, " loſt my ſon, ſuffered by ſickneſs, and otherwiſe a " world of hardſhips; if I have reſiſted, with mani- " feſt hazard of my life, the robberies and ſpoils, " with which my companions would have made me " rich; if when I was poor, I could have made my " ſelf rich; if when I had got my liberty, which " all men and nature itſelf do much prize, I volun- " tarily loſt it; if when I was ſure of my life, I " rendered it again; if I might elſewhere have " ſold my ſhip and goods, and put five or ſix thou- " ſand pounds in my purſe, and yet brought her " into England; I beſeech your Majeſty to believe, " that all this I have done, becauſe it ſhould not be " ſaid, that your Majeſty had given liberty and " truſt to a man, whoſe end was but the recovery " of his liberty, and who had betrayed your Maje- " ſty's truſt. My Mutineers told me, that if I re- " turned to England, I ſhould be undone; but I be- " lieved in your Majeſty's goodneſs, more than in all " their arguments. Sure, I am the firſt, that being " free and able to inrich myſelf, yet hath embraced " poverty and peril; and ſure I am, that my example " ſhall make me the laſt. But your Majeſty's wiſ- " dom and goodneſs I have made my judges, who " have ever been and ſhall ever be

" Your Majeſty's moſt humble vaſſal,

" Walter Ralegh."

[CC] He proceeded therefore with Stucley on his journey.] The particulars of his journey may be ſeen in Captain Samuel King's Narrative of Sir Walter Ralegh's Motives and Opportunities for conveying himſelf out of the Kingdom; with the Manner how he was betrayed. MS. two ſheets in fol. cited by Mr. Oldys; and in Manourie's Declaration annexed to King James's Declaration; and in a piece of Sir Lewis Stucley's, entitled, To the King's moſt excellent Majeſty, the humble Petition and Information of Sir Lewis Stucley, Knight, Vice-Admiral of Devon, touching his own Behaviour in the charge committed to him for the bringing up of Sir Walter Ralegh, and the ſcandalous aſperſions caſt upon him for the ſame. 1618 in 4to.

[DD] Wrote his Apology.] It appears to have been firſt publiſhed among his Select Eſſays in 1650 in 8vo. It was reprinted with theſe Eſſays in 1667.

[EE] Wrote a letter to the Marquis of Buckingham, dated October the 14th.] In it he writes thus: " If " I preſume too much, I humbly beſeech your Lord- " ſhip to pardon me, eſpecially in preſuming to " write to ſo great and ſo worthy a perſon, who " hath been told, that I have done him wrong. I " heard it but of late, but moſt happy had I been, " if I might have diſproved that villainy againſt " me, when there had been no ſuſpicion, that the " deſire to ſave my life had preſented my excuſe. " But, my worthy Lord, it is not to excuſe myſelf, that " I now write. I cannot, for I have now offended " my ſovereign Lord. For all paſt, even all the " world, and my very enemies, have lamented my " loſs; whom now if his Majeſty's mercy alone do " not lament, I am loſt. Howſoever, that which " doth comfort my ſoul in this offence is, that even " in the offence itſelf, I had no other intent than " his Majeſty's ſervice, and to make his Majeſty " know, that my late enterprize was grounded upon " a truth, and which with one ſhip ſpeedily ſet out " I meant to have aſſured or to have died; being " reſolved, as it is well known, to have done it at " Plymouth, had I not been reſtrained. Hereby I " hoped, not only to recover his Majeſty's gracious " opinion, but have deſtroyed all thoſe malig- " nant reports, which had been ſpread of me. " That this is true, that Gentleman, whom I ſo " much truſted, my keeper, and to whom I opened " my heart, cannot but teſtify; and wherein, if I " cannot be believed living, my death ſhall witneſs. " Yea, that Gentleman cannot but avow it, that when " we came back towards London, I deſired to have " no other treaſur than the exact Deſcription of thoſe " places in the Indies. That I meant to go hence " as a diſcontented man, God, I truſt, and my own " actions will diſſuade his Majeſty; whom neither " the loſs of my eſtate, thirteen years impriſon- " ment, and the denial of my pardon, could beat " from his ſervice. Nor had the opinion of be- " ing counted a fool, or rather diſtracted, by re- " turning as I did, balanced with my love to his " Majeſty's perſon and eſtate, any place at all in " my heart. It was that laſt ſevere letter from the " Lords for the ſpeedy bringing of me up, and the " impatience of diſhonour, that firſt put me in fear " of my life, or enjoying it in a perpetual impri- " ſonment, never to recover my reputation loſt, " which ſtrengthened me in my late and too late " lamented reſolution, if his Majeſty's mercy do not " abound; if his Majeſty do not pity my age, and " ſcorn to take the extremeſt and utmoſt advantage " of my errors; if his Majeſty in his charity do not " make a difference between offences proceeding " from a life-ſaving natural impulſion, without all ill " intents, and thoſe of an ill heart; and that your " Lordſhip, remarkable in the world for the noble- " neſs there was a conference held upon the form or manner how priſoners, who have been attainted of treaſon, and ſet at liberty, ſhould be brought to execution, between all the Judges of England; and the queſtion being put, "Whether a Privy-Seal was ſufficient, "it being directed to the Juſtices of the King's Bench, to command them to award execu- "tion againſt Sir Walter Ralegh; or how they ſhould proceed before execution be a- "warded?" it was reſolved by all, that he ought to be brought "to the bar by "Habeas Corpus to the Lieutenant of the Tower, and then demanded, if he could "ſay any thing why execution ſhould not be awarded?" Upon this reſolution, a Privy-Seal came to the Juſtices of the King's Bench, commanding them to proceed againſt him according to law (x). On Wedneſday, October the 28th, Sir Walter was carried to the King's-Bench Bar at Weſtminſter, where ſentence of death was paſſed upon him [FF], and he was then led to the Gate-houſe near the Palace-yard; and the day following beheaded in the old Palace-yard in Weſtminſter [GG]. His body was interred in the chancel of the church of St. Margaret's Weſtminſter; but his head was long preſerved in a caſe by his widow, who ſurvived him twenty-nine years; and after her death, it was kept alſo by her ſon Carew Ralegh [HH], with whom it was buried (y). Biſhop Burnet (z) ſpeaking of ſome great errors in King James the Firſt's reign, proceeds thus: "Beſides theſe publick actings, King James ſuffered much in the opinion of all people, "by his ſtrange way of uſing one of the greateſt men of that age, Sir Walter Ralegh; a- "gainſt whom the proceedings at firſt were cenſured, but the laſt part of them was "thought both barbarous and illegal." And a little farther, ſpeaking of the ſame King, he ſays, "His reign in England was a continual courſe of mean practices: the firſt "condemnation of Sir Walter Ralegh was very black; but the executing him after ſo "many years, and after an employment, that had been given him, was counted a "barbarous

(x) Sir Richard Hutton's Reports, p. 21. edit. 1656, in folio.

(y) Oldys, p. 230.

(z) Hiſt. of his own Time, p. 16, 17. edit. 1724, in folio.

"neſs of your diſpoſition, do not vouchſafe to be- "come my interceſſor, whereby your Lordſhip ſhall "bind an hundred Gentlemen of my kindred to ho- "nour your memory, and bind me, for all the time "of that life, which your Lordſhip ſhall beg for "me, to pray to God, that you may ever proſper; "and over-bind me to remain

"Your moſt humble Servant,

"W. Ralegh."

[FF] Sentence of death was paſſed upon him.] Mr. Oldys obſerves (86), that the King was all this while retired, as it were, or at ſome remoteneſs from this tragical ſcene, and as it is delivered down by particular tradition, was in Hartfordſhire, as if he would have diverted himſelf not only from the ſight or report, but even the thoughts of it. Yet what an effectual and expeditious hand he had in it, may farther appear from his ſpecial warrant for the execution of Sir Walter, which was produced ready ſigned at Weſtminſter, in a manner as ſoon as the ſentence was over, being dated the ſame day, and directed to the Lord Chancellor Bacon (87). Ralegh the night before his death wrote the following verſes, which were found in his bible.

(86) p. 226.

(87) See Rymer's Fœdera, Tom. 17. folio 115.

Even ſuch is time! who takes in truſt
Our youth, our joys, and all we have;
And pays us but with earth and duſt;
Who in the dark and ſilent grave,
When we have wander'd all our ways,
Shuts up the ſtory of our days.
But from that earth, that grave, and duſt,
The Lord ſhall raiſe me up, I truſt.

[GG] The day following beheaded in the old Palace-Yard in Weſtminſter.] He mounted the ſcaffold with a chearful countenance, and ſaluted the Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen of his acquaintance. He introduced his ſpeech with informing them, that as he was yeſterday taken out of his bed in a ſtrong fit of a fever, which much weakened him, if any diſability of voice or dejection of countenance ſhould appear in him, they would impute it rather to the diſorder of his body than any diſmaidneſs of mind. He concludes his ſpeech with theſe words: And now I entreat, that you all will join with me in prayer to the great God of Heaven, whom I have grievouſly offended, being a man full of all vanity, who has lived a ſinful life in ſuch callings, as have been moſt inducing to it; for I have been a ſoldier, a ſailor, and a Courtier, which are courſes of wickedneſs and vice; that his Almighty Goodneſs will forgive me; that he will caſt away my ſins from me, and that he will receive me into everlaſting life. So I take my leave of you all, making my peace with God.

Then Proclamation being made, that all men ſhould depart the ſcaffold, he prepared himſelf for death, giving away his hat and cap and money to ſome attendants, who ſtood near him. When he took leave of the Lords and other Gentlemen, he intreated the Lord Arundel to deſire the King, that no ſcandalous writings to defame him might be publiſhed after his death; concluding, I have a long journey to go; therefore muſt take leave. Then having put off his gown and doublet, he called to the headſman to ſhew him the axe, which not being ſuddenly done, he ſaid, I pr'ythee let me ſee it: doſt thou think that I am afraid of it? Having fingered the edge of it a little, he returned it, and ſaid ſmiling to the Sheriff, This is a ſharp medicine, but it is a ſound cure for all diſeaſes; and having entreated the company to pray to God to aſſiſt him and ſtrengthen him, the executioner kneeled down and aſked him forgiveneſs, which Ralegh, laying his hand upon his ſhoulder, granted. Then being aſked, which way he would lay himſelf on the block, he anſwered, So the heart be right, it is no matter which way the head lies. As he ſtooped to lay himſelf along, and reclined his head, his face being towards the Eaſt, the executioner ſpread his own cloak under him. After a little pauſe, he gave the ſign, that he was ready for the ſtroke by lifting up his hand, and his head was ſtruck off at two blows, his body never ſhrinking nor moving. His head was ſhewed on each ſide of the ſcaffold, and then put into a red leather bag, and with his velvet night-gown thrown over it, was afterwards conveyed away in a mourning coach of his Lady's (88).

(88) Prince's Worthies of Devon, p. 539, 540.

[HH] Carew Ralegh.] He was born in the Tower of London, where his father was priſoner in the latter end of the year 1604, or beginning of the year following, and was Gentleman-Commoner of Wadham-College in Oxford, and afterwards travelled abroad till the death of King James I. In the third year of the reign of Charles I. he was reſtored in blood, and about a year after married Philippa, Relict of Sir Anthony Aſhley, a rich young widow, by whom he had two ſons and three daughters. In 1635 he was made one of the Gentlemen of the King's Privy-Chamber. In the latter end of January 1659 he was appointed Governor of the Iſle of Jerſey. At the Reſtoration, King Charles II. would have conferred ſome perſonal honour upon him, which he declined. The King therefore knighted his eldeſt ſon Walter, who died ſoon after at Weſt-Horſely in Surrey, his father's ſeat. Mr. Ralegh had another "barbarous ſacrificing him to the Spaniards." And Mr. Bevil Higgons, though otherwiſe a great oppoſer of Biſhop Burnet, agrees with him in this particular (aa), where ſpeaking of the artifices, by which King James was prevailed on to put the gallant Ralegh to death, he ſays, that however, he thinks, it might reſult more from want of courage than from cruelty, the action was inexcuſable, being not more unjuſt than mean-ſpirited, and one of the greateſt blemiſhes in his reign.

(aa) Short View of the Hiſtory of England, p. 234. edit. 1734, in 8vo.

feat at Kenton-Park near Hampton-Court. He died in December 1666.

Mr. Wood tells us, that he had ſeen ſome ſonnets of his compoſition, and certain ingenious diſcourſes in manuſcript, and a Poem ſet to muſic by Mr. Henry Lawes. He is ſuppoſed likewiſe to be the Author of Obſervations upon ſome particular perſons and paſſages in a book lately made publick, entitled, A compleat Hiſtory of the Lives and Reigns of Mary Queen of Scotland, and of James King of England, written by W. Sanderſon, Eſq; London 1656 in three ſheets in 4to (89). Sir Henry Wotton (90) gives him the character of a Gentleman of dextrous Abilities. T.

(89) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 440, 441.

(90) Letters, p. 481. edit. 1672.

☞ RAWLEGH or RALEGH (WALTER), an eminent Engliſh Divine in the 17th century, was ſecond ſon of Sir Carew Ralegh, (elder brother of the celebrated Sir Walter Ralegh,) a Gentleman of an ancient family in Devonſhire, deſcended from John de Ralegh, a great man in the time of William the Conqueror, who knighted him in the ſecond year of his reign. His mother was relict of Sir John Thynne, of Longleate, in Wiltſhire, and daughter of Sir William Wroughton, Vice-Admiral under Sir John Dudley, (afterwards Duke of Northumberland) in the expedition againſt the Scots in 1544 (a). He was born at Downton in Wiltſhire, in the year 1586, and educated in Wincheſter ſchool, whence he was ſent to Magdalen-college, in the univerſity of Oxford, of which he became a Commoner in Michaelmas Term, 1602 (b). June the 11th, 1605, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c), and June the 2d, 1608, that of Maſter (d); and being a noted diſputant, was made Junior of the Publick Act the ſame year, in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage (e). About that time he entered into holy orders, and became Chaplain to William, Earl of Pembroke, in whoſe family he ſpent about two years, when he was collated by his Lordſhip to the Rectory of Chedzoy, near Bridgewater in Somerſetſhire, in the latter end of the year 1620 (f). Being ſettled here, he married Mary, the daughter of Sir Richard Gibbs, and ſiſter of Dr. Charles Gibbs, Prebendary of Weſtminſter (g). He was afterwards collated to a minor Prebend in the church of Wells, and to the Rectory of Streat, with the chapel of Walton in Wiltſhire. About the time of the death of his patron the Earl of Pembroke, which happened in 1630, he became Chaplain in Ordinary to King Charles I. and by that title was actually created Doctor of Divinity in 1636. January the 13th, 1641, he was admitted Dean of Wells upon the death of Dr. George Warburton (h). Upon the breaking out of the Civil Wars, he was ſequeſtered on account of his loyalty, and hurried from one priſon to another [A], and ſtill there immured, where ſeveral priſoners died of the plague, and at laſt ſhut up in his own houſe at Wells, which was turned into a goal, where he was ſtabbed by David Barrett, a ſhoe-maker of that city, who was his keeper, and died of the wound [B] October the 10th, 1646, and was interred on the 13th of the ſame month before the Dean's ſtall, in the choir of the cathedral of Wells. His papers, after his death, ſuch as could be preſerved, continued for above thirty years in obſcurity, till at laſt coming into the hands of Dr. Simon Patrick, afterwards Biſhop of Ely, he publiſhed them at London 1679 in 4to, under this title: Reliquiæ Raleighanæ, being Diſcourſes and Sermons on ſeveral ſubjects, by the Reverend Dr. Walter Ralegh, Dean of Wells, and Chaplain in Ordinary to his late Majeſty King Charles the Firſt. Dr. Patrick tells us (i), that "beſides the quickneſs of his wit and ready elocution, he was maſter of

(a) Dr. Simon Patrick's Account of Dr. Walter Ralegh, prefixed to Reliquiæ Raleighanæ. edit. London 1679, in 4to.

(b) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 96. 2d edit.

(c) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 268.

(d) Idem, ibid. col. 179.

(e) Patrick, ubi ſupra, and Wood, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(f) Patrick and Wood, ubi ſupra.

(g) Patrick, ubi ſupra.

(h) Wood, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(i) Ubi ſupra.

[A] Hurried from one priſon to another.] Dr. Walker informs us (1), that it being Dr. Ralegh's month to wait on the King as his Chaplain, the Committee of Somerſet raiſed the rabble, and commiſſioned the Soldiers to plunder his Parſonage-houſe at Chedzoy; and in his abſence they ſeized upon all his eſtate ſpiritual and temporal, drove away his cattle and horſes, which they found upon his ground, and turned his family out of doors. His Lady was forced to lye two nights in the corn-fields, it being a capital crime for any of the Pariſhioners to afford them lodging. After this ſhe went to Downton in Wiltſhire, the ſeat of Sir Carew Ralegh, the Doctor's father; where her huſband met her. The King's party having had ſome ſucceſs in the Weſt, the Doctor had an opportunity to return to his family, and re-ſettle at Chedzoy; but the Parliament party ſoon gained the aſcendant by the defeat of the Lord Goring, Dr. Ralegh was obliged to take refuge at Bridgewater, then garriſoned by the King. Here he continued till that town was ſurrendered to Fairfax and Cromwell, when he was taken priſoner, and after much ſevere uſage ſet upon a poor horſe, with his legs tied under the belly of it, and ſo carried to his houſe at Chedzoy, which was then the head-quarters of Fairfax and Cromwell; and being extremely ſick through his former ill treatment, obtained the favour of continuing priſoner in his own houſe. But as ſoon as the Generals were marched, Henry Jeanes, who was ſolicitous for his Rectory of Chedzoy, and afterwards ſucceeded him in it, entered violently into the houſe, took the Doctor out of his bed, and carried him away priſoner with all his goods. His wife and children were expoſed to ſuch neceſſities, that they muſt have periſhed, if Colonel Aſh had not procured them the income of ſmall tenements, which the Doctor had purchaſed at Chedzoy. After this Dr. Ralegh was ſent priſoner to Ilcheſter, the County-Goal; thence to Banwell-Houſe, and thence to the Houſe belonging to the Deanery in Wells.

(1) Attempt towards recovering an Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy of the Church of England, &c. part. 2. p. 71.

[B] Stabbed by his Keeper, and died of the wounds.] Dr. Simon Patrick gives the following account of the affair (2). The Committee of the county coming to ſit at Wells, the Doctor deſiring to be permitted to ſpeak with them, hoping to gain ſo much liberty as to go to Chedzoy to his wife and children, in order to ſettle ſome affairs, which nearly concerned them. In which reaſonable requeſt meeting with a denial,

(2) Brief Account of Dr. W. Ralegh, prefixed to Reliquiæ Raleighanæ.

" of a very ſtrong reaſon; which won him the familiarity and friendſhip of thoſe great " men, who were the envy of the laſt age, and the wonder of this, the Lord Falkland, " Dr. Hammond, and Mr. Chillingworth; the laſt of which was wont to ſay (and no " man was a better judge of it than himſelf) that Dr. Ralegh was the beſt Diſputant " that ever he met withal: and indeed there is a very great acuteneſs eaſily to be obſerved " in his writings, which would have appeared more, if he had not been led, by the " common vice of thoſe times, to imitate too far a very eminent man (k), rather than " follow his own excellent genius." He was a maſter-workman even in his youth, when ſeveral of theſe pieces, it is evident, were compoſed; and had been a greater, if he had not fallen into a way wherein his wit was ſo much confined, that at laſt it broke out of it, as appears by his diſcourſe of Oaths, which is ſtrong and nervous, clear and judicious, as well as full of ſpirit and life, and may be ſufficient to ſhew what he could have done, if he had ſet himſelf to it, in other arguments, and handled them in the ſame manner, that the reſt of his friends before-named did thoſe, wherein they were engaged. He is ſaid to have written a tract of Millennianiſm, to which notion he was inclined; but this piece has been long ſince loſt (l). In 1719, there was publiſhed at London in 8vo, by Laurence Howel, M. A. Certain Queries propoſed by Roman Catholicks, and anſwered by Dr. Walter Ralegh, Dean of Wells, &c. The Editor obſerves in his Preface (m), that he had this piece from a Gentleman, who received it from a Gentlewoman on her death-bed, whoſe name by her marriage was Farthing, her huſband being grandſon to Dr. Walter Ralegh; and that there were nineteen ſermons of the Doctor's in manuſcript, in the hands of the Gentleman who communicated the tract abovementioned.

(k) Dr. Patrick ſeems to mean Biſhop Andrews.

(l) Wood, col. 96, 97.

(m) p. 14.

a denial, though a Gentleman of a thouſand pound a year offered to be bound for his return at the time they ſhould appoint him, he could not but expoſtulate the matter with them, and happened to ſay, among other things, that it was very hard, that he ſhould be refuſed a courteſy from them, which ſeveral other perſons obtained without them, who had liberty to go home, ſome for a week, ſome for a month, when they pleaſed. This inſtead of mollifying the Committee towards him, only ſharpened their anger towards the Goaler, whom they reprimanded for his remiſſneſs, and threatned to turn him out of his place, if he took upon him any more to grant this licenſe to any priſoner. This rebuke ſtuck in the Goaler's mind, and the next morning entering into the Doctor's chamber, when he was writing to his wife to let her underſtand, that he could not procure leave to come and ſee her, he clapt his hand upon the paper, and demanded a ſight of it. To which the Doctor replied, that he ſhould with all his heart, if he had any authority from the Committee to require it; otherwiſe he might be ſatisfied with this proteſtation, that it was nothing elſe but a letter to his wife, to acquaint her with the denial the Committee had given him, as he knew well enough. Whereupon the Keeper began to endeavour to take it from him by force; but the Doctor being too ſtrong for him, wreſted it out of his hands; which being done, the Keeper ſtept back, drew his ſword, ran it immediately into the Doctor's belly, and gave him an incurable wound, of which, ſays Dr. Patrick, after a few days he died. But Dr. Walker tells us (3), that the Keeper ran the ſword into Dr. Ralegh's belly home to the back bone, and gave him ſuch an incurable wound, that he tumbled out of his chair dead, but being brought to life again by ſome help and aſſiſtance, he lingered on about ſix weeks, and then died of his wound. The author of Mercurius Ruſticus for the year 1647 informs us, that the Committee were ſo little affected with the affair, that afterwards they " turned the Doctor's wife and chil- " dren out of doors, and forced his ſon to fly the " country, for that he would have proſecuted the law " againſt his father's murderer." Whether that be exactly true or no, ſays Dr. Patrick, I am not able to ſay; but this may be relied on (coming from an undoubted hand) that though his wife proſecuted him two aſſizes together, ſhe could not get him brought to a trial. But ſhe falling ſick before the third came, and not able to attend it, then the fellow appeared and was acquitted, there being no body ready to make good the charge againſt him. Dr. Walker likewiſe obſerves (4), that " the Committee ſo much favoured the execrable " murderer, that they ſent out their Warrants to " apprehend the Doctor's eldeſt ſon, Mr. George " Ralegh, becauſe he carried on the proſecutions " againſt Barrett [the Keeper]; inſomuch that Mr. " Ralegh was forced to fly for his ſecurity, and then " Barrett was releaſed, and reſtored again by the " Committee to his place . . . The Committee like- " wiſe apprehended, impriſoned, and kept in cuſto- " dy (till the very hour of his death) one Mr. Stan- " diſh, a Clergy-vicar of the Church of Wells, be- " cauſe he had buried the Doctor by the Common- " Prayer."

(3) Ubi ſupra.

(4) Ubi ſupra. p. 71.

T.

☞ RAY [A] (JOHN) (a), ſon of Mr. Roger Ray, a Blackſmith, by Elizabeth his wife, was born at Black Notley in Eſſex, November the 29th, 1628. He received the firſt rudiments of learning at the Grammar-ſchool at Braintree, in the ſaid county, under Mr. Love; and on the 28th of June 1644, was admitted into Catharine-Hall in Cambridge, where he continued about a year and three quarters, and then removed to Trinity-College in the ſame Univerſity. In 1648, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and on the 8th of September, 1649, was elected one of the Minor-Fellows of the college, and about ſix months after one of the Major-Fellows. He was afterwards one of the Senior-Fellows of that college. In 1651, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts. His intenſe application to his ſtudies having injured his health, he was obliged, at his leiſure hours, to exerciſe himſelf by riding or walking in the fields, which led him to the ſtudy of Plants. There is yet extant, a manuſcript of his, entitled, Catalogus Plantarum non domeſticarum, quæ aluntur Cantabrigiæ, in hortis Academicorum & Oppidanorum; in the drawing of which catalogue, he chiefly makes uſe of Synonyma of the two Bauhines, Gerard, and Parkinſon. He noted likewiſe from Johnſon, Parkinſon, and the Phytologia Britannica, the places where curious plants grew, digeſting them into counties

(a) For moſt of the particulars of this article, we are obliged to our Author's ingenious friend, Mr. Samuel Dale, Author of Pharmacologia, ſeu Manuductio ad Materiam Medicam, the third edition of which was printed at London 1737, in 4to. Since the writing Mr. Dale died at Braintree in Eſſex about March 1739.

[A] Ray.] In the former part of his life he wrote his name Wray; but he afterwards returned to the old way of ſpelling it always uſed by thoſe of his family. See his letter to Dr. Martin Liſter, dated Auguſt counties in alphabetical order; and in the ſummer months of the year 1658, rode from Cambridge to the city of Cheſter; from whence he went into North-Wales, viſiting many places, and among others, the famous Hill of Snowdon, returning by Shrewſbury and Glouceſter. In 1660, he publiſhed at Cambridge, in 8vo, his Catalogus Plantarum circa Cantabrigiam naſcentium. December the 23d, the ſame year, he was ordained Deacon and Prieſt, by Dr. Robert Sanderſon, Biſhop of Lincoln, at his chapel in Barbican, London. In 1661, he accompanied Francis Willoughby, Eſq; and others, in ſearch of Plants, and other natural curioſities, into the North of England, and thence into Scotland; and having viſited Edenburg, Sterling, Glaſcow, and other places of that Kingdom, they returned to England by Carliſle, and arrived at Cambridge September the 7th. In 1662, they made a Weſtern tour from Cambridge to Cheſter, and through Wales to Cornwall, Devonſhire, Dorſetſhire, Hampſhire, Wiltſhire, and other counties, and returned to London by Windſor. This year, on the 24th of Auguſt, he quitted his Fellowſhip of Trinity college, which he had enjoyed near thirteen years; in which time he had been Burſar of the college, and Tutor to many of the Gentry and Clergy of England. The reaſon of his quitting his Fellowſhip was, that though he had never taken the ſolemn League and Covenant, believing it to be an unlawful oath, as he often declared, yet he could not in the oath of Abjuration ſwear, that he did not believe it to be binding upon others. In the year 1663, 1664, and 1665, he travelled with Mr. Willoughby abovementioned, Mr. Skippon, and Mr. Bacon, through Holland, Germany, Italy, France, &c. of which he afterwards publiſhed an account. In 1667, he and Mr. Willoughby made a ſecond tour into the Weſt of England; in which they viſited Worceſterſhire, and all the weſtern counties; and upon his return to London November the 7th, he was admitted Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1668, he viſited Kent alone, and afterwards made a ſecond tour into the North; but being ſeized with the Meaſles in Weſtmorland, he proceeded no farther, but went to the houſe of his friend Mr. Willoughby, at Middleton. In 1670, he publiſhed, in 8vo, his Catalogus Plantarum Angliæ (b), and in 1672, his Dictionariolum trilingue ſecundum locos communes (c), in 8vo. In June that year, Mr. Willoughby dying, appointed him one of his Executors and Guardians to his children, and left him an annuity of ſixty pound per annum for his life, which was duly paid him, without any deduction for taxes. In 1673, he publiſhed his Catalogus Stirpium in exteris Regionibus obſervatarum, and his Obſervations topographical, moral and phyſiological, made in a journey through ſeveral parts of Europe, in 8vo. In July the ſame year, he married Margaret, one of the daughters of John Oakley, of the Pariſh of Launton, in Oxfordſhire, Gent. a younger branch of the Shropſhire family; by whom he had only four daughters, three of whom ſurvived him. After his marriage, he continued in Warwickſhire till Michaelmas 1677, when he returned to Eſſex; and having lived about a year and three quarters at Faulkborn-hall, he removed to Black-Notley, to a houſe of his own building; where, to uſe his own words, he intended (God willing) to ſettle for the ſhort pittance he had yet to live in this world; which accordingly happened. He wrote ſeveral works beſides thoſe abovementioned [B].

(b) Reprinted in 1677.

(c) Reprinted in 1689 and 1696.

As to the caſualties of his life and his diſeaſes, there is nothing noted by him in his Diary, except the meaſles abovementioned, though he had the ſmall pox in his younger years. The latter part of his life was attended with much pain, occaſioned by certain ulcers in his legs, though it did not prevent him from proſecuting his ſtudies, till about three months before his death. As he was not born to any paternal eſtate, ſo he was not maſter of any conſiderable one, having often refuſed preferment; the legacy of Mr. Willoughby being much the greateſt part of what he enjoyed. In his converſation he was modeſt, guſt the 22d 1670 (1); where he has the following words. Videbis me in titulo Catalogi & Dedicatione Literam nominis mei initialem W. abjeciſſe, quod ne mireris, fateor tibi, me eam olim antiquâ & patriâ ſcriptione immutatâ citra idoneam rationem adſciviſſe.

(1) Philoſophical Letters between the late learned Mr. Ray, and ſeveral of his ingenious Correſpondents, p. 72. edit. London 1718, in 8vo.

[B] Several works beſides theſe above-mentioned.] Hiſtoria Plantarum, ſpecies hactenus editas, aliaſque inſuper multas noviter inventas & deſcriptas complectens. Tomi duo. Fol. 1686. Ejuſdem Tomus tertius, qui eſt ſupplementum duorum præcedentium; cum acceſſionibus Cavelli & Tournæfortii, 1704, in fol. Methodus plantarum nova cum Tabulis 1682 in 8vo. emendata & aucta, 1703 in 8vo. Faſciculus ſtirpium Britann. poſt editum Catologum Plantar. Angl. 1688 in 8vo. Synopſis methodica Stirp. Britann. in quâ tum Notæ Generales Characteriſticæ traduntur, tum ſpecies ſingulæ breviter deſcribuntur, &c. 1690 in 8vo. Eadem Synopſis multis ſtirpibus & obſerv. curioſis paſſim inſertis, cum Muſcorum Methodo & Hiſtoriâ pleniore, &c. 1696 in 8vo. Epiſtola ad D. Rivinum de Methodo plantarum, in quâ Elementa Botanica D. Tournefort tanguntur, 1696 in 8vo. Diſſertatio de variis Plantarum Methodis, 1696 in 8vo. Stirpium Europ. extra Britann. naſcentium Sylloge, 1694 in 8vo. Synopſis methodica Animalium, Quadrupedum, & ſerpentini generis, 1693 in 8vo. Franciſci Willughbeii Hiſtoria Piſcium cum Figur. recognivit, digeſſit, ſupplevit Jo. Raius. Oxford 1686 in folio. Ejuſdem Ornithologia cum Figur. edente eodem, 1676 in folio. The ſame much enlarged, in Engliſh 1678 in folio. Collection of unuſual or local Engliſh words, 1674 and 1691 in 12mo. Collection of Engliſh and other Proverbs. Cambridge 1678. Methodus Inſectorum, 1705 in 8vo. Hiſtoria Inſectarum, opus poſthumum. London 1710 in 4to. A Perſuaſion to a holy life, 1700. The Wiſdom of God manifeſted in the works of the Creation. In two parts. To which are added Anſwers to ſome Objections, 8vo. the ſeventh edition 1717. The Phiſico-Theological Diſcourſes, &c. With practical Inferences, 1713, the 3d edition. Synopſis Methodica Avium & Piſcium, opus poſthumum, quod vivus recenſuit & perfecit ipſe inſigniſſimus Author; in quo multas ſpecies in ipſius Ornithologiâ & Ichthyologiâ deſideratas adjecit, methodumque ſuam piſcium naturæ magis convenientem reddidit: Cum Appendice & Iconibus. Edente W. Derham, 1713 in 8vo. Philoſophical Letters between the late learned Mr. Ray, and ſeveral of his ingenious correſpondents, modeſt, affable, and communicative. He was a man of ſtrict probity, charitable, ſober, frugal, ſtudious and religious, allotting the greateſt part of his time to devotion and his ſtudies. He died January the 17th, 1705-6 [C], and as he never affected pomp in his life-time, ſo at his death he deſired to be privately buried, ordering his corps to be nailed up, that none might ſee it. And though the Rector of the pariſh offered him a place of interment in the chancel of the church, yet he modeſtly refuſed it, chooſing rather to be buried in the church-yard with his anceſtors, where a monument was erected to him [D]. He ſettled all his eſtate on his wife and daughters, except a ſmall legacy to the ſpondents, natives, and foreigners. To which are added thoſe of Francis Willughby, Eſq; The whole conſiſting of many curious diſcoveries and improvements in the hiſtory of quadrupeds, birds, fiſhes, inſects, plants, foſſils, fountains, &c. publiſhed by W. Derham Chaplain to his Royal Highneſs George Prince of Wales, and F. R. S. London in 8vo.

[C] He died January the 17th 1705-6.] On the 7th of that month he wrote the following letter to Sir Hans Sloane, Bart. which was his laſt, and bears the marks of a dying hand.

" Dear Sir,

" The beſt of friends; theſe are to take a final " leave of you as to this world. I look upon myſelf " as a dying man. God requite your kindneſs ex- " preſſed any ways towards me an hundred fold: " bleſs you with a confluence of all good things in " this world, and eternal life and happineſs here- " after. Grant us an happy meeting in Heaven.

" I am, Sir,

" Black Notley,
" Jan. 1. 1704. " Eternally yours,

" John Ray.

" POSTSCRIPT.

" When you happen to write to my ſingular friend " Dr. Hotton, I pray tell him I received his moſt ob- " liging and affectionate letter, for which I return " thanks, and acquaint him, that I was not able " to anſwer it, or ——" His ſtrength failing, as may be perceived by his writing, which is ſcarce legible in this poſtſcript, he was forced to break off abruptly.

In the Appendix to our Author's Philoſophical Letters (2) is the following paper, entitled, Mr. Ray's dying Words and Behaviour before the Reverend Mr. Pyke, Rector of Black Notley, and Prebendary of Norwich. (2) p. 374, 375.

" I am a Prieſt of the Church of England, ordained " by Dr. Sanderſon, then Biſhop of Lincoln. That " I did not follow the peculiar duties of my function " more, is now the greateſt concern and trouble to " me. I do here profeſs, that as I have lived, ſo I " deſire, and by the grace of God reſolve to die in " the Communion of the Catholic Church of Chriſt, " and a true though unworthy ſon of the Church by " law eſtabliſhed in this Kingdom. I do think " from the bottom of my heart, that its doctrine is " pure, its worſhip decent and agreeable to the word " of God, and in the moſt material points of both " conformable to the faith and practice of the godly " Churches of Chriſt in the primitive and purer times. " I am not led to this perſuaſion ſo much from force " of cuſtom and education, as upon the clear evi- " dence of truth and reaſon. And after a ſerious " and impartial examination of the grounds thereof, " I am fully perſuaded, that the ſcruples men raiſe " againſt joining in Communion with it, are unrea- " ſonable and groundleſs; and that the ſeparation, " which is made, may very juſtly be charged upon " the Diſſenters themſelves, as the blame-worthy " Authors of it.

" He then deſired me to read to him the prayers " of the Church, which in the viſitation of the ſick " are appointed to be uſed by us; and the Abſolution " in particular he requeſted me to read; which I " having pronounced to ſuch a true, penitent, devout, " and humble ſoul, I could not but have theſe com- " fortable thoughts, that what was thus declared re- " mitted upon earth, would be remitted in Heaven " alſo. After this I gave him the Sacrament of the " Lord's Supper, which as it is men's duty often to " receive in the time of health, ſo at the hour of " death he ſaid it was a neceſſary Viaticum he thought " for the great journey he was now a going."

[D] Where a monument was erected to him. The inſcription upon it is as follows:

Eruditiſſimi viri JOANNIS RAII, A. M.
Quicquid mortale fuit
Hoc in anguſto Tumulo reconditum eſt,
At ſcripta
Non unica continet Regio:
Et Fama undiquaque celeberrima
Vetat mori.
Collegii SS. Trinitatis Cantab: fuit olim Socius
Necnon Societatis Regiæ apud Londinenſes Sodalis, Egregium utriuſque Ornamentum.
In omni Scientiarum genere,
Tam divinarum quam humanarum,
Verſatiſſimus;
Et ſicut alter Solomon (cui forſan unico ſecundus)
A Cedro ad Hyſſopum,
Ab Animalium maximis ad minima uſque Inſecta
Exquiſitam nactus eſt Notitiam.
Nec de ſtantis ſolum quæ patet Terræ facie,
Accuratiſſimè diſſeruit;
Sed & intima ipſius viſcera ſagaciſſimè rimatus,
Quicquid notatu dignum in Univerſi Naturâ Deſcripſit.
Apud exteras Gentes agens,
Quæ aliorum oculos fugerant, diligenter exploravit,
Multaque ſcitu digniſſima primus in lucem protulit.
Quod ſupereſt, eâ morum ſimplicitate præditus,
Ut fuerit abſque invidiâ doctus:
Sublimis ingenii,
Et (quod raro accidit) demiſſi ſimul Animi & modeſti.
Non ſanguine & genere inſignis,
Sed (quod majus)
Propriâ virtute illuſtris.
De opibus tituliſque obtinendis
Parum ſollicitus,
Hæc potius mereri voluit, quam adipiſci:
Dum ſub privato Lare ſuâ ſorte contentus,
Fortunâ lautiori dignus conſenuit.
In rebus aliis ſibi modum facilè impoſuit,
In ſtudiis nullum.
Quid plura?
Hiſce omnibus
Pietatem minimè fucatam adjunxit,
Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ
(Id quod ſupremo habitu confirmavit)
Totus & ex animo addictus.
Sic benè latuit, benè vixit vir beatus,
Quem præſens Ætas colit, Poſtera mirabitur.

This monument beginning to want repair by ſtanding expoſed in the Church-yard, was lately removed and ſet up in the Chancel of the Church; and to the Epitaph is added on the table of the Eaſt ſide what follows:

Hoc Cenotaphium
Olim in Cœmeterio ſub Dio poſitum,
Inclementis Cœli injuriis obliteratum,
Et tantum non collapſum,
Refecit & ſub tectum tranſpoſuit
J. Legge, M. D.
XVI Kal. Aprilis A. D. 1737.

On the table on the Weſt ſide are theſe words:

J. RAY { Nat. 29. Nov. 1628. / Ob. 17. Jan. 170½.

Our Author's Epitaph has been thus tranſlated into Engliſh:

" JOHN

the poor of his own pariſh, and five pounds to Trinity college in Cambridge, to purchaſe books for the library there. All his collections of natural curioſities, he beſtowed on his friend and neighbour, Mr. Samuel Dale, Author of the Pharmacologia, to whom he cauſed them to be delivered about a week before his death.

" John Ray, Maſter of Arts,
" Once Fellow of Trinity-College in Cambridge,
" Afterwards
" A Member of the Royal Society in London;
" And to both theſe learned bodies
" An illuſtrious Ornament.
" Hid in this narrow tomb, this marble ſpan,
" Lies all that death could ſnatch from this great " man.
" His body moulders in its native clay;
" While o'er wide worlds his works their beams
" diſplay,
" As bright and everlaſting as the day.
" To thoſe juſt fame aſcribes immortal breath,
" And in his writings he out-lives his death.
" Of every ſcience every part he knew,
" Read in all arts divine and human too:
" Like Solomon (and Solomon alone
" We as a greater King of knowledge own)
" Our modern ſage dark nature's ſecrets read,
" From the tall cedar to the hyſſop's bed;
" From the unweildieſt beaſt of land or deep,
" To the leaſt inſect that has power to creep.
" Nor did his artful labours only ſhew
" Thoſe plants, which on the earth's wide ſurface
" grew,
" But piercing ev'n her darkeſt entrails through,
" All that was wiſe, all that was great he knew,
" And nature's inmoſt gloom made clear to com" mon view.
" From foreign ſtores his learning bright ſup-
" plies,
" Expoſing treaſures hid from others eyes,
" Loading his ſingle mind to make his country
" wiſe.
" But what's yet more, he was ſo meekly
" great,
" That envy unrepining ſaw his ſtate:
" For rare accompliſhment! his humble mind
" Poſſeſs'd a jewell, which it could not find,
" A great deſcent lent nothing to his fame;
" Virtue, not birth, diſtinguiſh'd his high name:
" Titles and wealth he never ſtrove to gain;
" Thoſe he would rather merit than obtain.
" His private life in humble ſhades he ſpent;
" Worthy a palace, with a cell content.
" Unwearied he would knowledge ſtill purſue;
" The only thing, in which no mean he knew.
" What more did add to theſe bright gifts, we " find
" A pure, untainted piety of mind.
" England's bleſt Church engroſs'd his zealous
" care,
" A truth his dying accents did declare.
" Thus loſt he in retirement his great breath;
" Thus dy'd he living, who thus lives in death.
" Thus has Heav'n call'd his age's glory home,
" And the bright wonder of the age to come."

T.

